JÄGRAT. According to the vision of Rsis or sages, every living being has four states. They are Jägrat (waking state), Svapna (dream), Susupti (profound sleep) and Turiya (the fourth state of the soul, i.e., oneness with Brahman in different degrees). The hermits and sages have said about the four states of soul as given below: —

1) Jägrat. In this state the individual soul is awake. The five organs of senses, the five organs of activity and the four inner organs of the living being will be active, when the soul is awake. In this state he enjoys the outer world through the five senses. That is, he sees with the eyes, hears with the ears, tastes with tongue, smells with the nose and feels with the skin. Every man thinks that his understanding through the senses is real. It is the individual soul which is responsible for this understanding. But it is difficult to say whether these perceptions through the senses are real or unreal. A hermit says as follows:—“An individual soul travels from Jägrat to Svapna and from Svapna to Jägrat as a fish which goes from one shore to the other without touching anything. For an individual soul the state of Jägrat is only one of the four states. So we cannot give the verdict that the state of Jägrat alone is real and all the rest are unreal.” The individual soul which is in the state of Jägrat enjoys the outer world and so it is ‘bahil-prajña’ (external—knowing). In this state the individual soul enjoys the external world with the seven organs and the nineteen faces. The seven organs are, the two eyes, head, soul, body, urinal bladder and the legs. The nineteen faces are the five senses, the five organs of activity, the five life-breaths and the four inner organs of mind, intellect, egoism and will. The individual soul in the state of Jägrat enjoys the external world with these organs and faces. The soul in this state is called ‘Vaśvänara’. This state is experienced by all the human beings of the world and so it is called Vaśvänara\(^1\) (Brhadāraṇyaka, Māṇḍūkyopaniṣad).

2) Svapna (dream). The second state of the individual soul is svapna (dream). He who indulge in dream, forgets everything he had experienced in the state of Jägrat and creating new worlds he enjoys them. While the five organs of senses and the five organs of activity of the dreamer take rest, the four inner organs of citta (will) Ahāra-kāra (egoism) Buddhi (reason) and manas (Mind) will be working. See what the author of Upāniṣad says. “The dreamer separates his self from the wide universe and creates his own radiance by his own radiance. The light of the self is the light for the dreamer. That man creates a chariot or an assemblage of chariots or roads where there is no chariot or an assemblage of chariots or a road; joy, delight or extreme delight where there is no joy or delight or extreme delight; ponds, wells and rivers where there are no ponds, wells and rivers. A dreamer is a Lord; the state of the dream is the state of activity.” Another hermit says as follows about the state of dream: —

“The dreaming individual soul which sees again things which were seen here and there, hears again things which were heard here and there, enjoys again things which were enjoyed in places far and near, is really enjoying greatness. He sees things seen and not seen, heard and not heard enjoyed and not enjoyed. The dreamer, like a King who travels with his train throughout his country, as he pleases, plays by getting in and out of his own body, and enjoys lofty experiences, and so he is happier than he who eats alone and enjoys his food. The individual soul in its state of dream is called the Taitja (the radiant) because he illuminates himself by his own radiance. In this state the individual soul does not touch anything and so it is sinless.\(^2\)

3) Susupti. The third state of the individual soul is Susupti (profound sleep). The soul alone is active in this state. In Susupti the individual soul desires for nothing and does not indulge in dream. In this state the individual soul does not think that the soul and the body are two. So it is unitary. The sleeper is called ‘Prājñā’ also. The individual soul which is in the state of sleep, really reverses its connection with the organs of senses, the organs of action, mind, the Prāṇamayakośa (the chest of the life-breaths), the manomaya ko’a (the cask of mind) and Viṣṇumayakośa, the chest of knowledge or understanding. The mind, the sense organs, Sākṣa (the subtle body) and the actions are the items which could abandon the connection with jivātmā (individual soul). In sleep the jivātmā separating all its connections, for the time being, with these items absorbs itself in the Brahman. See what the author of the Upāniṣad says about the state of Susupti (Sleep). As an eagle folds its wings and falls down weary and tired, after flying round in the air for a long time, the individual soul, avoiding all desires and having no dreams, takes rest. The soul sleeps in the nāḍī, with seventytwo thousand branches called ‘hita’, like a child or a King or Brahman. During sleep the mind, senses etc. are not destroyed. They only keep away. They reappear when the man wakes up from sleep.\(^3\)

4) Turiya. In the state of Turiya the Jivātmā alone is active. The individual souls which abide in creatures are another aspect of Brahman. Everything said about Brahman can be said about the jivātmā in the state of profound sleep. But the bliss that we enjoy in sleep is not remembered in the state of activity. The same bliss that we enjoy in profound sleep could be enjoyed in the state of samādhi (contemplation) of yoga or union with the universal soul. When it came to be known that this supernal bliss could be enjoyed even after one had awakened from contemplation, a fourth state of the jīvātmā (individual soul) was recognized. But in the Brhadāraṇyaka only three states of the jīvātmā are mentioned.

Immersion of the individual soul by the yogin in the universal soul Brahma in the state of jāgrat or activity is called Turīya. The individual soul which is in the state of Turīya, is described as follows in the Chāndogya Upaniṣad.

"The jīvātmā which is in the state of Turīya is not conscious internally. He whose inner consciousness is active is Tajāsa. He is not bahilṣāprajñā (conscious of the outer world). Bahilṣāprajñā is Vaiśāvānara. He is not a combination of Tajāsa and Turīya. He is not compact with consciousness as a conscious man not a conscious man; nor is he an unconscious man. He, who could be explained only by negations, cannot be seen. He is unmanifestable, indiscernible, unthinkable, indescribable and without any characteristic mark. Only by unswerving faith could he be known. It creates the universes and at the same time negates it. It is the supreme reality, the one without a second (dvaita). This is the state of Turīya. Vaiśāvānara is called the soul with annamayakosha (the material body), Tajāsa, the soul with Prāṇamayakosha (the sheath of the life breath), Brahma, The soul with Viṣṇunamayakosha (the sheath of understanding) and Turīya, the soul with anandamayakosha (the chest of bliss).

JĀGUḌA. A country in ancient India. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 25, it is mentioned that the King of this country took part in the Rājaśūya (royal consecration) performed by Yudhiṣṭhira.

JAHNAVĪ. The river Gaṅgā. (See under Jahnū).

JAHNU. A hermit King born in the family of Pūru.

Ajamīḍha had three wives, Dhumīni, Nīli and Keśinī. Rksa was born from Dhumīni, DusyANTA and Parameṣṭhī from Nīli and Jahnū from Keśinī. The descendants of Jahnū are called the Kurīkas. Jahnū handed over his kingdom to his son Balākāvya and went to perform penance. Kurīka was the son of Balākāvya.

2) Drank up the river Ganges. The river Gaṅgā, which flowed through the earth in accordance with the request of Bhagiratha, submerged the hermitage of Jahnū. Jahnū became angry at this haughtiness of Gaṅgā and drank up the river, but at the entreaty of Bhagiratha pushed Gaṅgādevī out through his ear. (See under Gaṅgā). From that day onwards Gaṅgā got the name Jahnāvī.

JĀHUṢA. A King of the period of Rigveda. It is stated in Rigveda, Maṇḍala 1, Anuvāka 17, Sūkta 116, that when this King was surrounded by enemies once, the Asvinidevas got him into their chariot and through easily passable ways took him to the top of a mountain.

JAIGĪṢAVYA. A hermit who attained salvation by the strength of his penance. It is stated in Harivāma, Chapter 18, that three daughters, Aparā, Ekaṁparā and Ekapāṭalā were born to Himilaya by Mena and the hermit Devala married Ekaṁparā and the hermit Jaigīṣavya married Ekapāṭalā. In Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva, Chapter 229, mention is made that this hermit gave much advice to the hermit Devala, son of Asita, about the need for equanimity. On another occasion this hermit talked to Yudhiṣṭhira about the glory of Śiva. (M.B. Anūṣāsana Parva, Chapter 18, Stanza 37).

There is a story about how this hermit Jaigīṣavya attained the world of Brahma. Once he reached the hermitage of Devala, who showed the necessary hospitalities. After a few days this hermit disappeared. After that he used to be seen only at the time of meals. Once Devala took his waterpot and went by air to the sea, to fetch water. When he reached the sea he saw Jaigīṣavya bathing there. Devala had gone when Jaigīṣavya was in the hermitage. How did he reach the sea before Devala? Devala filled the pot and returned thoughtful. When he reached the hermitage Jaigīṣavya was there. After this Devala travelled through the world of the inspired sages. Wherever he went, he saw Jaigīṣavya. He asked the inspired sages how it was possible. They praised the attainments, Jaigīṣavya had obtained, by his 'tapis' (penance). Finally in the sight of everybody, Jaigīṣavya flew to the world of Brahma. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 50).

It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 24, that this hermit Jaigīṣavya sits in the palace of Brahma and carries on meditation and contemplation on Brahma.

JAIMINI I.

1) General Information. A hermit of the highest degree of learning. In the "History of Classical Sanskrit Literature" it is mentioned that Sumantu, Jaimini, Paila, Vaishampayana and Suka were the five important disciples of Vyāsā. Of these Suka was the son of Vyāsa. In Devi Bhāgavata, it is mentioned that Vyāsa had other disciples also in his hermitage, such as Asita, Devala and others. The five disciples mentioned first gave publication to the work of Vyāsā called 'Jaya', which was the original of the Mahābhārata. Vaishampayana and Jaimini made some additions to the work 'Jaya'. In Sanskrit there is another book called Jaimini Bhārata, which contains only Aṣvamedha Parva. (See under Guruparamparā).

2) Other details. (1) It is mentioned in Brahmanda Purāṇa, Chapter 1 that Brahmanda Purāṇa is the story told by Jaimini to Hiranyanābha at Naimiśaranya.

(2) Jaimini was present at the sarpasatra (sacrifice to kill serpents) of Janamejaya. (M.B. Aṭi Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 6).

(3) Jaimini had been a member of the council of 1 Niṁṭhā prajāṁi na bahilṣāprajāṁi nobhayataḥ prajāṁi na prajāṁgahnabanḥ na prajāṁi nāpraṇām adhyātm avyāhāram agraḥvaṁ alakṣaṇaṁ acintyaṁ avyāpadeśyam ekātmāpratayayaśārīram prapañcoṣoṣasāṁ sāṁtanī śivam advaitāṁ caturthāṁ mānaye sa śāṁṣa vijñeyaḥ.
Yudhishṭhira. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 11).

(4) This hermit visited Bhīṣma in his bed of arrows during the Bhārata Battle. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 7).

JAIMINI II. The priest of Subāhu the King of the Cholas (Colas). In accordance with the advice of this priest the King performed many good deeds and consequently attained heaven. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 94).

JAITRA. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 14, that he was killed by Bhīmasena in the battle of Bhārata.

JAITRAM I. The chariot of King Hariścandra. It was by driving in this chariot that the King carried out the conquest of countries. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 12).

JAITRAM II. The conch of Dhṛṣṭadyumna. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 61).

JĀJALI. A hermit who reared birds on his head by the power of penance. This hermit who had practised continence from his childhood lived in a forest. Jājali never thought rain, heat of the sun, snow and such other natural things as unbearable. Once this hermit stood like a pillar in the forest, immersed in meditation. Two birds built their nests in his matted hair. Non-violence being his policy, he did not move. The birds came to their nests every evening and stayed for the night. After a few days they laid eggs in the nest. Still the hermit did not move. The eggs were hatched. The hermit understood that also. Still, he did not move. The young ones got wings. They grew up and began to go out with the parent birds. They went out in the morning and returned in the evening. The hermit stood like a pillar. One morning they went out and did not return in the evening. The hermit stood there for six days waiting for the return of the birds. On the sixth day evening they returned. Next time the hermit waited for a month for the return of the birds. They did not return. So he started from there and went to the sea and dashed in the water and said, “there is no man more virtuous than I either in water or on land” with haughtiness. But the water demons said in an ethereal voice that Tulādhāra, the merchant of Kāśi was more virtuous than he.

Hearing this Jājali went to Kāśi and saw Tulādhāra. Tulādhāra greeted him gladly and they talked for a long time. Jājali understood that Tulādhāra was far more virtuous than he. So he sought advice from Tulādhāra and thus Jājali obtained heaven. (M.B. Śānti Parva, 3 Chapters from 261).

JALA. A deity of water. In Mahābhārata, Śabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 20 it is mentioned that this deva was a luminary in the durbar of Brahmi. JALL. A tributary of river Jamunā. The King Uśnara performed a yāga (sacrifice) on the bank of this river and attained a position higher than Indra. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 13, Stanza 21).

JALADA. A mountain in Śaka island. The famous country known as Kumudottaravāra is near this mountain. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 25).

JALADHĀRA. A mountain in Śākadvipa (The island of Śāka). (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 16).

JALADHĪ. The crocodile which is the conveyance of Varuṇa. It is mentioned in Vyānana Purāṇa, Chapter 9, about conveyances of Gods as follows:—

“The conveyance of Indra is the white elephant, which came into being from the palm of Danu, and is of extraordinary strength and valour. The black buffalo called Paṇḍrakṣa, which was born from the thigh of Rudra, and is as quick as the mind and very fierce, is the conveyance of Yama (the god of death). The conveyance of Varuṇa is the black crocodile called Jaladhi, born from the ear-wax of Rudra, and having divine power of movement. The conveyance of Vaśravana (the god of wealth) is a ferocious man with eyes like two cart-wheels and body as big as mountain, who was born from the leg of Ambikā. The eleven Rudras have speedy horses, terrible serpents and white oxen of high speed. Candra has a chariot as his vehicle yoked with five hundred swans. The vehicles of the Ādityas are chariots yoked with horses and camels. The conveyances of the Vasus are elephants, men for Yakṣas, serpents for Kinnaras, and horses for the Aśvinidevas. The Maruts of fearful appearance have deer as conveyance. The Vidyādharas have parrots for conveyances. An asura called Andhaka has a chariot with thousand posts as his vehicle. Prahlāda had, as conveyance a divine chariot of gold and silver yoked with eight white horses and elephant for Virocana, horse for Kujarībha, divine chariot yoked with yellow horses, for Śaṃkukarna, elephant for Hayagriva, chariot for Maya, Great serpent for Dundubhi, Aeroplane for Śanmara and lion for Ayāsaṅku. JALANDHAMA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 57).

JALANDHARA. A mighty and valiant Asura. Khaḍga-romā was his charioteer and Vṛndā was his wife. Jalandhara was the grandson of the sea of Milk. Once he met with the headless Rāhu, who said to Jalandhara, the whole story beginning from the churning of the sea of Milk. Jalandhara became furious at the gods who had churned his grandfather. So he collected a big army of asuras and went to war with the devas. Though a large number of Asuras were killed in the battle, Indra and Viṣṇu were defeated and Viṣṇu was taken captive and hidden under the sea. Finally Paramāśiva went to fight with the Asura. In the fight Jalandhara was killed and Viṣṇu was rescued. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapters 3 to 5). For further details see under Māyāśiva.

JALAPRADĀNIKA PARVA A sub section of Strī Parva, of the Mahābhārata. This sub section comprises of Chapters 1 to 15 of Strī Parva.

JALAPRALAYA. In all the Asiatic Purāṇas, reference to an ancient great flood, with slight changes occurs. According to Hindu Purāṇas this great flood took place before Mahāviṣṇu took the incarnation of Matsya. In the Holy Bible which is the scripture of the Christians, the story of the great flood is allied to the story of the Noah. (See under Avatāra). This story occurs in the Babylonian literature also. The book 'Gilgamish' which is as old as the Ṛgveda, is considered to be the oldest in the world. The theme of the Gilgamish is the travel of a man named Gilgamesh. This story is written in twelve clay-tablets. After 1850, the scientists of England who carried on an archaeological research, found in the library of Ancient Nineveh, the most famous in the ancient world, these twelve tablets along with twenty-thousand other tablets, all of which were in good condition. This library was built by the King Asurbanipal in 7th century B.C., on a very high place on the bank of the river Tigris, in the ancient Nineveh. All these clay tablets have been removed to the British Museum. It took several decades to decipher them. When these clay tablets were discovered there was not a single man who could read and understand them, in the world. In spite of hard work, several years passed by without getting even a single tablet deciphered. They were written in ‘Accadean’, which was the language of the court of Asurbanipal and the national and the international language of the time. Another copy of this great work was discovered on the bank of the Euphrates, where the capital of the famous King Hámurábi of Ancient Babylon stood. Later discoveries disclosed that this great work Gilgamesh was part and parcel of the famous ancient civilization of the Oriental countries. The Hititites and the Egyptians tried to translate this book Gilgåms in into their own languages. In the tablets with letters in the form of arrow heads, found on the bank of the Nile, the portions which were difficult for them to translate, are given red marks. It was from a small piece of broken clay tablet that clues to the origin of this famous work were obtained. The world is indebted to the Sumerians, who had their capital in the place where the city Ur stands, for the original work of Gilgamesh. Mention is made about a great flood in Gilgamesh, as follows: Gilgamesh set out on an adventurous journey to see his ancestor Utunapitištim to learn from him the means of obtaining eternal life. The gods had told this man about the secret of eternal life. At last Gilgamesh reached an island and found out his ancestor and asked him about the secrets of eternal life. Utunapitištim said that he had lived in ‘Shoorappak’ and that he had been an ardent devotee of ‘Iya’ God. When the gods decided to destroy mankind by a great flood the God Iya called his devotee Utunapitištim and said to him “You, man of Shoorappak, the son of Urbarttû: Demolish your house and build a ship. Leave off your wealth and search for your life. Cast away your property and save your life. Bring the seeds of every living thing into the ship. The ship you build should be according to measurements.” The rest of the story is like the story of the “Ark of Noah”. The scientists are of opinion that in pre-historic times the three continents of Asia, Europe and Africa were one continent and that by earthquake or some other reason the south part of Europe had sunk down and water flowed in and thus the Mediterranean sea came into existence. At a time when the far off regions of the earth were unknown, the people who escaped the flood imagined that the entire world had been submerged by the flood. It could be imagined that this story of the great flood passed on to posterity verbally and after so many generations it appeared in different regions in different languages in different forms.1

1 In writing about Jalapralaya, I have dealt with Gilgamesh a little elaborately. Details on Gilgamesh were obtained from the English translation of a famous German work by Venar Keller. This book had not been received when I wrote about the work 'Gilgamesh'. So these details are included under this word "Jalapralaya".
of the river Narmadā and erecting a hermitage began 'tapas' (penance). Four sons, Rūmanvān, Suhatra, Vasu and Viśvāvān, were born to Jamadagni by Reṇukā. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 58).

4) The birth of Parāśūrāma. Because of the wickedness of the Kṣatriya Kings, the goddess Earth became miserable. She made a representation to Brahmbihāmā who took her to the sea of Milk and told Mahāviṣūṇ everything. Mahāviṣūṇ promised to take an incarnation as the son of Jamadagni and destroy all the wicked Kings. Accordingly Reṇukā gave birth to Parāśūrāma, who was an incarnation of Mahāviṣūṇ. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 59).

5) Jamadagni getting the bow of Viṣūṇ. Once the devas (gods) desired to know who, of Śiva and Viṣṇu was the more powerful. They informed Brahmbihām of their desire. Brahmbihām asked Viṣvākarma to make two tremendous bows. He gave one to Śiva and the other to Viṣṇu. The bow which Viṣṇu got was known as Vaiśvānācāpā and that which Śiva got was known as Śāvacāpā. After this Brahmbihām caused enmity between Śiva and Viṣṇu. A terrible battle ensued between Śiva and Viṣṇu. After a while the Śāvacāpā became less effective. At the request of the devas, the fight was stopped. The devas decided that Viṣṇu was superior to Śiva, in power. Śiva got angry at this decision and gave his bow to Devarāta Janaka, the King of Videha. It was this bow that Śrī Rāma broke at the marriage of Sitā.

Seeing that Śiva had given away his cāpa (bow) Mahāviṣūṇ gave his bow to his devotee, the hermit Rēka. That Vaiśvānācāpā was given to Jamadagni by Rēka. Thus the famous Vaiśvānācāpā arrived at the hermitage of Jamadagni. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kānda, Sarga 75).

6) Reṇukā was killed. Parāśūrāma became fourteen years old. Jamadagni went to the forest to gather fruits, roots etc. After completing the cleansing work of the hermitage, leaving Parāśūrāma in the forest, Reṇukā went to the bank of the river Narmadā (Revā) to fetch water. When she reached the river, Kārtavīryārjuna and his wives were playing in water. She waited for them to go. When they were gone she got into the river. But as the water was muddy because of the play, she walked a little to the east where there was pure water. She saw there Gitarattha the King of Sālva playing with his wife in the water. How beautiful they were! She had never seen so beautiful a woman or so handsome a man. She stood there looking at them for a while. When she reached the hermitage with water, Jamadagni had already returned a long while ago. He had returned weary and tired of the heat of the midday-sun. He did not see his wife in the hermitage. He had been sitting very angry when Reṇukā returned with water. She put the pot down and bowed before her husband and told him the reason for her being late. When he heard the reason his anger blazed. He called his sons one by one and ordered them to kill her. But the four elder sons did not dare to execute his order saying that slaughter of a woman was a great sin. But Parāśūrāma came forward and by a cutting-arrow cut off the head of his mother. The father called the four sons who disobeyed him and cursed them thus:

"Since you have disobeyed the order of your father, because of your ignorance, you shall become foresters and live in forest."

Being overwhelmed with sorrow at the death of his mother, Parāśūrāma swooned and fell down. When his anger subsided, discretion dawned on Jamadagni. He aroused his son and took him on his lap and asked him what boon he wanted for having accomplished the unaccomplishable task. Parāśūrāma's request was that his mother should be brought to life again. The hermit was pleased and he brought Reṇukā to life again. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 60).

7) The sun gate Jamadagni an umbrella and sandals. See under the word Cripīlu (Sandals).

8) The temptation of Dharma. See under the word 'Dharma' Para 6.

9) Jamadagni was killed. Once Kārtavīryārjuna, with his minister Candragupta and some attendants had been hunting in the forests on the banks of the river Narmadā. It was noon. The hunters grew tired of hunger and thirst. They came to the hermitage of Jamadagni. The hermit called his divine cow Susilā and ordered her to give food to the King and his party. Within a few seconds meals were got ready for thousands of people. The King and his attendants had a feast. On their return journey the wonderful cow Susilā was the subject of their talk. The King wanted to get the cow which possessed divine power. So he sent his minister Candragupta to the hermitage of Jamadagni with instructions to get the cow Susilā in exchange for a crore of cows or even half of the kingdom. But the hermit was not prepared to give the cow. The minister and his men caught the cow by force and went away. The hermit, filled with grief, followed the party a long way through the forest, and requested Candragupta to return the cow. Candragupta got angry and struck him to death, and took the cow to the palace, in the capital city of Mahismatī. After waiting for a long time, Reṇukā started in search of her husband. She saw Jamadagni lying almost dead, in a pool of blood. She fell down and beating her breast cried aloud. Parāśūrāma with Akṛtavragna and other disciples came there. When she saw her son Parāśūrāma, she beat her breast twentyone times and cried. Parāśūrāma, took an oath that since his mother beat her breast twentyone times and cried, he would travel around twentyone times and put an end to the Kṣatriya Kings. After that they took the dead body of Jamadagni and placed it on fire, and began to sing the song of Viṣṇu. Then the hermit Sukra came by that way and with the help of Mṛtasānujīvanī brought Jamadagni to life again. The lost cow Susilā also returned without her calf. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 69; M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 49).

10) Death of Jamadagni. Parāśūrāma and Akṛtavragna went to the city of Mahismatī with the intention of bringing the calf of Susilā back. They stood at the gate of the city and challenged Kārtavīryārjuna for a fight. Kārtavīryaṅjuna came out with his army. In the battle which ensued, Kārtavīrya and his sons and most of his warriors fell dead. Parāsurāma and Akravṛṭa returned with the calf. Jamadagni asked Parāsurāma to go to Mahendra-giri and do penance in order to mitigate the sin of killing a large number of people. When Parāsurāma had gone for penance, Sūrasena a son of Kārtavīryaṅjuna came with his men to the hermitage, cut off the head of Jamadagni and took it away. Parāsurāma and the disciples of Jamadagni placed the dead body of Jamadagni on the pyre and burnt it. Reṇukā jumped into that fire and died. After this Parāsurāma began his twentyone tours for the extermination of the Kṣatriyas. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 86).

1) Other information. (1) Udayana grew up in the hermitage of Jamadagni. (See under Udayana).

(2) Jamadagni was one of the hundred sons of Rṣiṅka. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Stanza 45).

(3) Jamadagni was one of the hermits, who visited Śrī Rāma on his return from forest life. The hermits who came to Ayodhyā from the North were, Kaśyapa, Bharadvāja, the Sanakas, Sarabhaṅga, Durvāsas, Mataṅga, Vibhāṅdaka, Tumburu and the Saptarṣis (the seven hermits). Uṭtara Rāmāyaṇa).

(4) Jamadagni was present at the Jāmnātavāna (birth celebration) of Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 51).

(5) This hermit is a luminary in the assembly of Brahmā. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 22).

(6) During the time of the battle of Mahābhārata, Jamadagni entered Kurukṣetra and advised Draṇa to stop the battle. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 190, Stanza 35).

(7) Jamadagni once delivered a speech on the bad sides of accepting rewards, to the King Vṛṣādarbha. (M.B. Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 93, Stanza 44).

(8) Jamadagni vowed that he was innocent in the affair of the stealing of Agastya’s lotus. (M.B. Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 94, Stanza 25).

12) The Names of Jamadagni. Ārcika, Bhāravā, Bhārgavānandana, Bhrūgārūḍdā, Bṛṅgūruṇēṣṭha, Bṛṅgūṛtāma Rṣikaputra are the names used by Vāyūṣa to denote Jamadagni, in Bhārata.

JĀMGHA. A King of the family of Yāyāti. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

JĀMBĀVĀN. A monkey of extraordinary might. He was the minister of Sugrīva.¹

1) Birth. When the troubles and hardships caused by the wickedness of Rāvaṇa became unbearable the goddess Earth and the Devas approached Brahmā for redress. Brahmā took them to the sea of Milk. Mahāviṣṇu heard everything and said that he would incarnate as the son of Daśaratha and would kill Rāvaṇa. Brahmā was directed to create monkeys to help him on that occasion. Accordingly Brahmā created Jāmbāvān and several other monkeys.

There are two stories about the birth of Jāmbāvān in the Purāṇas.

(1) Brahmā sat for a long time thinking about the creation of monkeys. Then he wanted yawn, for which he opened the mouth and instantly Jāmbāvān came out from inside Brahmā through the open mouth. “I have already created Jāmbāvān the noble bear, who jumped out of my mouth when I yawned.” (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāpīṇḍa, Sarga 17, Stanza 6).

(2) One day time of Brahmā ended and the night had advanced two yamas (six hours). The Madhuṅkāṭabhas born of the ear-wax of Mahāviṣṇu began to create trouble and commotion in the waters of the great flood. They saw a lotus on the surface of water. Seeing Brahmā in it they challenged him for fight. Hearing their shouting and the challenge Brahmā became afraid of the asuras. His middle face began to sweat. The sweat flowed through his cheeks and reached the loins. Jāmbāvān came into being from that sweat. So he got the name Ambujāta, (born from the water of sweat). As he was the first person who entered the country of Jambināda he was called Jāmbāvān. As he was born when there was no universe or time his age or date of birth could not be ascertained. At the time of Śrī Rāma Jāmbāvān was six Manvantaras (age of a Manu) and for hundred and sixtyfour Caturyugas (a period of four yugas) old. (The present age is the twentyeighth Caturyuga of the seventh Manu). Jāmbāvān had witnessed all the incarnations from Matsya to Śrī Rāma. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa Pūrva Kāṇḍa).

2) Jāmbāvān and the incarnation of Śrī Rāma. During the time of Śrī Rāma Jāmbāvān was the minister of Sugrīva. It is stated in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṣkindha Kāṇḍa, Sarga 41, that Nila, the son of Agni, Hanūmān, Jāmbāvān, Suhotra, Sarāri, Saragulma, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Suseṇa, Rṣabha, Mainda, Dwīvida, Vijaya, Gandhamādana, Ulkāmukha, Asaṅga, Aṅgada and others were the ministers of Sugrīva.

The monkeys who went to the south in search of Sītā, reached the sea shore. The question was how to jump over the sea to Lāukā. Each of them came forward to show his ability and admitted failure. Finally Jāmbāvān called Hanūmān to him and advised him to jump over to Lāukā. Hanūmān who was not aware of his own powers, refused. Jāmbāvān told him about his birth, self-power, attainment of boons etc. Hanūmān became convinced of his powers at the words of Jāmbāvān and jumped over the sea to Lāukā. (Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṣkindha Kāṇḍa).

3) Jāmbāvāna and the incarnation of Vāmana. Jāmbāvān walked round Mahāviṣṇu, who incarnated as Vāmana to curb the powers of Mahābali. At that time Jāmbāvān was immensely strong. But by the time of the incarnation of Śrī Rāma his strength had decreased much. Hear what he said to the monkeys who assembled on the sea shore to go in search of Sītā.

“My abilities in olden times were not what you see now. In the far old days, I had walked round that bear. In some of the Indian languages he is descri bed as a bear. In Vālmiki’s Rāmāyaṇa, which is the original work, Jāmbāvān is called Rṣapūṅgava in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa Bālākāpīṇḍa.

In the same chapter it occurs that, it was the aim of Brahmā to help Mahāviṣṇu in the incarnation of Śrī Rāma. So it is not wrong to consider Jāmbāvān either as a bear or as a monkey.

Eternal Being Viṣṇu when he measured three steps at the sacrifice of Mahāmbali. Now, I am very old and have not enough strength to jump over the sea.”

(Valmiki Rāmāyana, Kiśkindhā kānda, Sarga 65).

4) Jāmbavān and the incarnation of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The long-living Jāmbavān who had witnessed nine out of the ten incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu is seen in connection with the precious stone Syamantaka, in the incarnation of Kṛṣṇa. The Sun-god gave this jewel Syamantaka to King Sātrājīt. His younger brother Prasena wore it and went to the forest for hunting. A lion killed him and took the jewel in his mouth and was going along the forest when Jāmbavān killed it and took the jewel. It was rumoured that Śrī Kṛṣṇa had killed Prasena and taken the jewel. So Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in search of the jewel to the forest, defeated Jāmbavān and took the jewel, and returned it to Sātrājīt. Śrī Kṛṣṇa married Jāmbavati the daughter of Jāmbavān. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

5) Jāmbavān became old for ever. At the time of the incarnation of Vāmana, Jāmbavān was very strong and valiant. When Vāmana brought under control the three worlds by measuring three steps Jāmbavān travelled throughout the three worlds carrying the news everywhere. Within three moments Jāmbavān travelled eighteen times through the three worlds. In this travel of lightning-speed the end of the nail of his toe touched the highest peak of Mahāmeru, who considered it as an insult and said “You are arrogant of your speed and youth. Hereafter your body will not reach where your mind reaches and you shall be ever old.” Because of this curse Jāmbavān became old and unable to carry out what he wished. (Kamba Rāmāyana, Yuddha Kānda).

JĀMBAVATI. Daughter of the famous Jāmbavān. Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in search of the famous precious stone Syamantaka which was lost when Prasena wore it and went to the forest for hunting. Kṛṣṇa found it in the cave of Jāmbavān, who fought with him and was defeated. Finally he gave his daughter Jāmbavati to Śrī Kṛṣṇa as wife, and the jewel Syamantaka as dowry. Śrī Kṛṣṇa came to his capital Dvārakā with his wife Jāmbavati. When sons were born to the other wives of Kṛṣṇa she became sad and requested her husband that sons may be born to her also. On hearing this request Kṛṣṇa went to the mountain where the hermit Upamanyu was engaged in penance. With that hermit who was an ardent devotee of Śiva, as his teacher, Kṛṣṇa began a penance before Śiva, in accordance with his (Upamanyu’s) advice. The penance, holding yogadaṇḍa and Kapāla (devotee’s staff and skull) lasted for a month. In the second month penance was performed standing on one leg and drinking only water. In the third month he did penance standing on toes only and using air as food. After six months Paramāśiva appeared and blessed him that his wives would have ten sons each. Accordingly Jāmbavati gave birth to her first son who was named Śāmba. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 4).

JAMBHA. A Daitya (Asura). He was the chief among those who snatched away Amṛta from the hands of Dhanvantari. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 3).

In the Purāṇas several Asuras (demons) bearing the name Jambha are mentioned. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Dākṣiṇāyapaṭha, Chapter 38, that Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed an Asura named Jambha. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 98, Stanza 49 that the teacher Śukra refused to help a Jambha whom Indra killed later. It occurs in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 102, Stanza 24, that Mahāviṣṇu had killed an asura called Jambha. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 2, that a group of Jambhāsuras, who had undergone training under Rāvaṇa, once attacked Hanumān. Another Jambhāsura had been killed by Arjuna, as stated in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 49. All these Dānavas (Asuras) were sons of Kaśyapa born of his wife Danu.

JAMBHAKA. A Kṣatriya King. This King was killed in battle by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. He had a son who, later became King but was killed by Sañadeva in his conquest of the countries. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 7).

JAMBÖ. A tree which stands on the southern side of the mount Mahāmeru. This tree bears fruits and flowers throughout the year irrespective of the seasons. This tree is watered by the Siddhacāraṇas. The branches of this tree reach the realm of heaven. The place in which this tree stands is known as Jambūdvīpa. The ripe fruits as big as elephants fall down and are broken. The juice oozing from them flows as a big stream. This is called the river Jambū. It flows through the southern part of the country known as llāvṛttī. The goddess who lives on the bank of this big river is known as Jambvādī. She is very fond of Jambū fruit. This goddess who loves everything in the world, is worshipped by the gods, nāgas (snakes), the hermits and sages, Rākṣasas (giants) and every body in the world with devotion. Even by the mere thinking of her she could be pleased. She destroys the sins and increases the purity of people. She cures all the diseases and gives people, health, wealth, long life, prosperity and happiness.

The juice of the Jambū fruit when mixed with soil and acted upon by water, air and sun’s rays, turns into a kind of gold called Jambūnada. The devas, Vidyādhara and Kāleyādhara etc. use this gold to make ornaments for their women. This gold is superior to other kinds of gold. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 8).

JAMBŪDVĪPA. One of the Purānically famous Saptadvīpas (seven continents). These seven continents are embankments separating the seven seas. Jambūdvīpa, Krauṇḍadvīpa, Śākapadvīpa and Puṣkaradvīpa are included in the seven islands.

Jambūdvīpa has an area of one lakh of yojanas. The island is round like a lotus flower. There are eight long mountain ranges which divide the island into nine countries, which look like nine petals of the lotus flower. Each of these nine countries has an area of nine thousand yojanas. The two countries of the north and south extremities are bowshaped. Four of the remaining seven are longer than the rest. The central country is square. This country is known as llāvṛttī, at the centre of which there is the mountain Sumeru with a height of one lakh of yojanas. This is called Svarnaparvata (The mountain of gold). The top of this mountain is a great flat place with an area of thirty thousand yojanas. This great plain is ten thousand yojanas above the ground level. On the northern part of llāvṛttī lie the three mountain ranges of Nilagiri, Śvetagiri and Śrīgāvān, and midway between them the three countries called Rāmyaka, Hirāṃaya and Kuru. On the southern part of Ilvṛtta, there are these three mountains of Niṣadhā, Hemākāṭa and Himsālā and three countries Harivasā, Kimpurṣa and Bhārāta. The mountain Mālyavān lies to the west and Gandhamadāna to the east of Ilvṛtta. There are two such countries Kētuṃāla and Bhadrśēva having an area of two thousand yojanas each with the two mountains Nila and Niṣadhā as boundaries. At the foot of the mount Mahāmeru, there are the mountains of Mandara, Meru, Supārśvaka, Kumuda and many others. On those mountains big trees like nāval (syzygium jambolanum) Mākanda (Mango tree) Kaṭāmbu (Nauka Candrahama) banyan etc. grow in plenty. On the top of these mountains there are four lakes, full of milk, honey, juice of sugarcane and sweet water. The devas become prosperous by the touch of the water of these lakes. Besides these parks there are four heavenly parks known as Nandana, Cāitrarātha, Vaibhṛāja and Sarvabhadraka. The women folk of the devas (gods) and Gandharvas (demi-gods) play in these parks, which are convenient for couples to carry on lustful play. A river is formed there, by the juice oozing from the fallen mango fruits. The river is purple coloured and is called Aruṇānadi (river Arunā). The goddess named Aruṇā lives here. The famous Jambū tree is in this Jambūdvīpa. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skanda 8).

JAMBUKA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 74).

JAMBUKA. (JAMBUMALIKA). A Śūdra Sage. The child of a brahmin died when Śrī Rāma, after his twelve years’ exile in forest had returned to Ayodhya and was ruling the country in an ideal manner. The brahmin and his wife carried the dead body of their child to the palace with loud lamentations. Everybody felt surprised how there could be child-death in the land when the King was ruling it in the most dhārmic (righteous) manner. Then did Nārada, who was present in the assembly, point out that in a corner of Rāmarāya a Śūdra Sage was doing tapas and that it was the reason for the untimely death of the brahmin child. At once Śrī Rāma set out in search of the Śūdra Sage after directing Śatrughna to see that no enemy entered the country, and asking Laksmaṇa to take care of the dead body of the brahmin child. After a rather detailed search Śrī Rāma found Jambuka at the mountain called Sailam doing tapas hanging from the branch of a tree on his legs with head down. He told Śrī Rāma that he was the Śūdra Sage called Jambuka and was performing tapas thus so that he might ascend to heaven in his very body. Śrī Rāma at once cut off the head of the Śūdra Sage, who attained, as soon as Rāma’s sword fell on him, mokṣa (salvation), and the dead child of the brahmin returned to life again. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

JAMBUKESVARA. Name of an idol of Śiva (Liṅga) installed in Mysore. The Śivaliṅga installed in the Jambukesvara temple in Mysore, Jambū is a fruit tree. There is a story about how Śiva happened to come under this tree.

Once upon a time this place was full of Jambū trees, and a recluse performed a penance under a Jambū tree got a fruit of it. Attracted, so to say, by the sanctity of the fruit the recluse submitted it first as an offering to Lord Śiva, and only after that he ate it. As a result of that the fruit germinated in the stomach of the sage grew up into a tree and emerged into light and air bursting his head open. Elated at this the sage danced before God, who asked him to return to the place from where he got the fruit. Accordingly he returned to Tiruvānakkovil and continued his penance. Pleased so much with the Sage Śiva followed him and sat under the tree. From that day onwards Śiva came to be called Jambunātha. To this day Jambunātha sits under the Jambū tree.

Later, a temple came to be built there under the following circumstances. A controversy arose between Mālyavān and Puspadanta, two of the Bhūta gaṇas of Śiva, as to who cherished more devotion to the Lord. The controversy developed into a quarrel and Puspadanta cursed Mālyavān into a spider, and Mālyavān cursed Puspadanta into an elephant. Now, when the mutual curse took effect wisdom dawned on both Mālyavān and Puspadanta, and they took refuge in the Lord for redemption from the curse. The Lord sent both of them to the Cola country, and after wandering about in different parts of the country both of them came to Jambukeśvara, and lived there worshipping God. The elephant used to bathe daily in sacred tirthas, bring holy water in its trunk and make an offering of it to the Lord. As for the spider it wove a net above the head of the Lord, so that dried leaves did not fall on it. The elephant used to daily sweep off the net above the head of the Lord and make his offering of the water thence. But, the spider would again weave the net. Thus their quarrel continued. One day the spider, in great anger, got into the trunk of the elephant and bit it hard. Due to unbearable pain it smashed its trunk on a granite stone and fell down dead. At this God appeared and blessed both of them. The Lord also said that the sacred spot would come to be known as Tiruvānakkovil (āna=elephant; Kovil=temple) in memory of Puspadanta who had taken the form of the elephant. The spider was told that he would be born in the Cola dynasty and carry on for long years many good acts. Accordingly Mālyavān was born as the son of Subhadeva, the Cola king and Kamalavati, his queen, and ruled the land for many years under the name King Češakaṇṭha. He it was who built the Jambukeśvara temple. (Tiruvānakkāvū Purāṇa).

JAMBUMALI. A Rākṣasa (giant) who was the son of Prahasa. Hanumān killed this Rākṣasa in a fight, when he went to Laṅkā in search of Sītu. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa Sundarakāṇḍa, Sarga 44).

JAMBUMALIKĀ. See under Jambuka.

JAMBUMĀRGA. An ancient holy place. If one visits this place one will attain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Aśvamedha (horse sacrifice). (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 62).

JAMBUNADA I. A mountain. The river Ganges flows through the valley of this mountain which is connected with Mahāmeru. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 16).

JAMBUNADA II. A golden mountain which stands in the place called Uśirabija. A King named Marutta performed sacrifice on this mountain. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 111, Stanza 23).

JAMBUNADA. III. Gold is formed from the river Jambu which flows through Jambuvipa (the island Jambu). The gold is called Jambunada, according to Mahābhārata, Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 26.

JAMBUNADA IV. A son of Janamejaya, a King of the dynasty of Puru. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Stanza 56).

A MBŪNĀDI. A famous river. (See under Jambudvīpa).

JANADEVA. A Janaka King who ruled over Mithilā (Śānti Parva, Chapter 218, Verse 3).

(1) Mahāvisū, once in the guise of a brahmin, tested the King and pleased with him granted him certain boons. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 219).

(2) None of the 100 ācāryas in his court could answer his questions about salvation satisfactorily. But, Pańcaśikha, who casually came to the palace advised the King about the means to attain salvation. (Śānti Parva Chapter 211).

JANAKA.

2) Janaka dynasty. Daṇḍa, Vikukṣi and Nimi were the three prominent sons of Iksvāku. The dynasty of Vikukṣi earned reputation as the crane of such powerful Kings as Vikukṣi, Kratha, Māndhata. Trīśākula. Hariścandra, Sagara and Bhagiratha. Sri Rāma also was born in Vikukṣi's dynasty. It was Nimi, the younger brother of Vikukṣi who founded the Videha dynasty. There is a story about that dynasty getting the name, Videha. Nimi decided to conduct a yajña and requested Vasiṣṭha to act as high priest at the yajña. Vasiṣṭha, who then was busy with the affairs of another yajña asked Nimi to postpone his proposed yajña to a later date. To this Nimi made no answer, and Vasiṣṭha went away under the impression that his suggestion had been accepted by Nimi. Accordingly, as soon as he got free from other preoccupations Vasiṣṭha went to Nimi to conduct his yajña. But, Nimi had already performed the Yajña with Gautama as high priest. Enraged at this Vasiṣṭha cursed Nimi that he should lose his body and become Videha (without body). As a result of the curse Nimi fell down dead. As Nimi had no sons living the Rṣis churned out of his body a child. As the child was got by mathana (churning) he was named Mithi Janaka. After that all kings born in Mithi's dynasty began using the common name Janaka.

The actual name of Janaka, father of Sītā, was Śrīdāvadhava. Mithilā or Mithilāpurī was the city founded by Mithi. From the time of the curse pronounced on Nimi the Kings of that dynasty also came to be known as Śrīdāvadhavas, and the country they ruled Videha. (See Nimi. Devī Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

3) Brother of Śrīdāvadhava. Śrīdāvadhava, the father of Sītā had a brother called Kuśadāvadhava. While Śrīdāvadhava was the King of Mithilā the King of Sāmkāśya called Sudhanvan attacked Mithilā. Śrīdāvadhava killed Sudhanvan in the war and crowned his brother Kuśadāvadhava as the King of Sāmkāśya. Lakṣmāna's wife Urmilā was Kuśadāvadhava's daughter. Kuśadāvadhava had three daughters called Māṇḍāvī, Urmilā and Śrutakirti. Bharata married Māṇḍāvī and Satrughna married Śrutakirti. (Kamba Rāmāyana, Bālakāṇḍa; Vālmiki Rāmāyana. Bālākāṇḍa, Canto 71).

4) Birth of Śītā. At a time when Śrīdāvadhava had no issues a girl emerged from the furrows of the ploughed earth, and Śrīdāvadhava felt the desire to bring up the child as his own daughter. And, a celestial voice, “Oh! Śrīdāvadhava! it is your own daughter” clinched the issue for the King. That daughter was Śītā. Śrīdāvadhava—Janaka—accordingly brought up Śītā as his own daughter. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Ayodhya Kāṇḍa, Canto 10).

5) Janaka got Śāvasēga. See under Jamadagni.

6) Janaka and Kāholaka. See under Āstāvakāra.

7) Janaka and Āstānakara. See under Āstāvakāra.

8) Janaka in Yamaloka. King Janaka once, by his yogic powers cast off his physical body. A vimāna (aerial chariot) from Devaloka arrived to carry Janaka's soul there. On his way to Devaloka Janaka approached Kālāpurī where innumerable sinners were being tortured in the various hells. When they breathed the air which had come in contact with Janaka's body, they got much relief from their tortures and the fire of hell now became cool and pleasing to them. When Janaka was about to go away the inmates of hell begged him not to leave them in that condition. He thought to himself thus: “If these beings get some comfort or happiness from my presence I shall surely stay here in Kālāpurī, which will be my svarga (heaven).” Thinking thus, Janaka the most righteous of souls stopped there. And then Kālā arrived there to determine suitable punishments to the various kinds of sinners, and seeing Janaka there, asked why he, the most virtuous and the purest of souls, waited there, Janaka explained his reason for standing there and added that he would quit the place only if Kālā released all those people from hell. On hearing Janaka’s answer Kālā pointed out to him one by one the sinners who were being tortured in hell and explained things as follows:— “Look here, that fellow there had seduced the wife of his most intimate friend, and that is why he is tied to a red hot iron bar for 10,000 years. After those 10,000 years he would be born in a pig’s womb, and when he is born among human beings it would be as a eunuch. The other fellow there forcibly kissed another man’s wife, and so he has to be roasted in Raurava hell for hundred years. That other fellow is put into this vessel filled with blood and pus with both his hands cut off as he had stolen other people’s property. This fellow did not speak even a word of welcome to a tired and hungry man who sought his hospitality at night. That is why he has been thrown into thick darkness, and there, for a hundred years, he must undergo the additional suffering of wasp-bite. As for this man he had in a loud voice found fault with another man, and this other fellow is his friend who listened to those vitulations attentively. And, that is the reason why both of them have been pushed into this unused well. So, all those people have to suffer for their sins. You, King Janaka, who did only righteous acts will please go away from this accursed place.” Janaka asked Kālā how those sinners could be released from hell, and Kālā answered that if any good act of the King was transferred to them they could be set free. One early morning Janaka had, with a pure heart, chanted "Rāma, Rāma" and that good act was exchanged for the freedom of the sinners. After their release had been effected, Janaka asked Kāla: "You say that only sinners come here. What sin have I committed that I should come here?" Kāla's reply to the question was as follows:—"Oh! King, no one else in the whole world has so much punya as you have got. But, a small sin you have committed. Once you prevented a cow from eating grass, and, therefore, you had to come up to the gates of hell. Now, that sin has been atoned for. So you may go to svarga." Janaka saluted Kāla and in the divine vimāna went to Heaven. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapters 30 and 31).

9) Artificial Janaka. While Sītā was a captive in Lākhā Rāvaṇa, to bring her round, a very clever magician called Marutta to her, disguised as Janaka, her father. And Marutta, in the capacity of her father consoled her and advised her to yield to the wishes of Rāvaṇa. But Sītā did not yield, and the artificial Janaka assumed his original form of Marutta and went away. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa).

10) Other information about Janaka. (1) Bhūmasena defeated one Janaka, who was King of Mithilā during the time of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 13).

(2) King Janaka was a personification or incarnation of all good qualities. (Vana Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 37).

(3) Janaka, the father of Sītā, in his old age renounced his kingdom and became a recluse. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 18, Verse 4).

(4) Once the sage called Aśvatthāma imparted some pieces of advice to Janaka. (See under Aśvatthāmathyāṇa).

(5) Once in a war between Janaka and a king called Pratardana, the army of Janaka, in the presence of the army of Pratardana stood aghast, and Janaka incited them to fight by showing heaven and hell to them. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 4).

(6) Once in a war with a King called Kṣemadarśī when victory for Janaka was found to be an impossibility, he, as advised by Sage Kālakavyakṣaka gave his daughter to Kṣemadarśī in marriage. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 2).

(7) Once Māṇḍavya a great sage put many questions about Trṣṇā (desire) to Janaka and he, the great philosopher answered the questions quite satisfactorily (Śanti Parva, Chapter 276).

(8) On another occasion Janaka had a talk with Sage Parāśāra about the attainment of prosperity and welfare. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 296).

(9) There was a King called Karāla Janaka among the Janaka Kings. Once Vasistha gave some good advice to Karāla Janaka. (Śanti Parva, Chapters 302-308).

(10) Once a Sage advised a Janaka King called Vasmūṇa on subjects relating to Dharma. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 309).

(11) Vasumān Janaka, son of Devarāta put many questions to Yājñavalkya and they were answered to the full satisfaction of the King. (Śanti Parva, Chapters 310-318).

(12) The Janaka King called Janadeva had once a discussion with Sage Pañcaśīkha about the means to avoid death. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 319).

(13) There was once a Janaka King called Dharmadhvaja, and Sulabhā, an erudite woman in Mithilā wanted to test the King. By her yogic powers she assumed the form of a very beautiful woman and visited Janaka's palace. She was offered a seat by the King, and seated on the stool she took her soul into the body of Janaka, and the soul entered into a discussion on philosophic subjects with Janaka. Sulabhā was thus convinced about the unique scholarship of the King and left the palace ashamed about her attempt to test the King. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 320).

(14) Suka, the son of Vāśa not being fully satisfied by the study of Bhāgavata once visited Janaka at the instance of his (Suka's) father, and Janaka did so easily clear the doubts of Suka, which even Vāśa had not been able to successfully tackle. (Devī Bhāgavata, 1st Skanda).

(15) King Janaka did not eat flesh. (Aūṣāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 65).

(16) Dharma, once in the guise of a brahmin imparted many pieces of advice to Janaka. (Āsvamedha Parva, Chapter 32).

The above facts prove that the Janaka kings, as a rule, were great scholars and philosophers.

11) Synonyms of Janaka. Aindradyumni, Daivarāti, Dharmadhvaja, Karāla, Karālajana; Maitihā, Mithilādhīpa, Mithileśva, Vaidcā etc.

JANAKI I. A Kṣatriya king who was the rebirth of an asura named Candravināśana. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 20, that the Pāṇḍavas had sent to him a letter of invitation to take part in the battle of Bhārata.

JANAKI II. See under Sītā.

JANALOKA. One of the fourteen worlds. This world is situated three crores of yojanas (leagues) away from Dhruvapada (the region of Dhrūva—pole star) according to Visu Purāṇa, Ānīya II, Chapter 7) JANAMEJAYA I. A famous King of the Solar dynasty 1) Genealogy. Descended from Visu thus:—Brahmā- Atri - Candra - Buddh - Purūravas-Ayus-Nabha- Yāyatī-Pāru - Janamejaya - Prācinīvain - Pravrīna-Maṃsya-Vanavīsya-Sutah, Mahendra-Puṣṭaka- Bhumī- Bhuvās- Bhumī- Bhuvās- Bhumī- Bhumī- Bhumī-

3) Death of his father. Janamejaya's father, Parīkṣit ruled the country in a very distinguished manner for sixty years. While once hunting in the forest Parīkṣit became very tired and thirsty. While searching for water he came across a Sage named Śamika and asked him for some water. Samika being engaged in meditation did not hear the King's request. But, the King mistaking the sage's silence for haughtiness threw in anger a dead snake round his neck and went away. But, within seven days of the incident Parikṣīt was bitten to death by Taksāka, king of the Nāgas according to the curse pronounced on him by Gavījāta, son of sage Śamika.

Janamejaya was only an infant at the time of his father's death. So the obsequies of the late king were performed by his ministers. After that at an auspicious time Janamejaya was crowned King. Within a short time he mastered statecraft. Dhanurvidyā was taught by Kṛpaśārya. Very soon he earned reputation as an efficient administrator. He got married in due course. (Devi Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

4)  "His hatred towards snakes. In the course of a talk one day with Janamejaya Utaṅka the sage detailed to him the circumstances of his father's death. Only then did he understand the actual cause of Parikṣīt's death, and the information kindled in him intense feelings of revenge not only against serpents but also against the whole serpent dynasty. (Devi Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

5) Sarvasatra. (Serpent yajña). Janamejaya sought the advice of priests and Rtviks as to how best revenge could be taken against the serpents, and they advised him to perform the great Yajña called Sarpasatra. And, accordingly all necessary arrangements for the Satra were made, and the King began dikṣa (Initiation) for it (to live for a few days under severe routine to prepare the author of the yajña for it). But the priest who made the arrangements looked into signs about the successful conclusion of the yajña and opined that it would be obstructed by a brahmin, and, the King, therefore, ordered strict steps to be taken against the entry of strangers into the Yāgasālā. And, the Sarpasatra began. High priests wore black clothes, and chanting mantras they made offerings in the sacred fire, and this created a burning sensation in the hearts of serpents. They began, one after another to come and fall into the fire. All varieties of serpents got consumed by the fire thus.

Sages like Utaṅka, Caṇḍahārava, Sarṇārava, Vyāsa, Uddālaka, Ātreya, Pramata, Śvetaketu, Nārada, Devala, Kālaghāta, Śruṭaśravas, Kohala, Devaśarman, Maudgalyā and Samasaurabha acted as Rtviks at the Satra. Though almost all the serpents courted death in the fire, Taksāka alone did not come. Fear-stricken he had taken refuge with Indra.

As the chanting of mantras increased in intensity and volume Vāsuki began to feel the burning sensation. He requested his sister Jaratkaru to find out some means of escape from the Satra, and at the instance of Jaratkaru her son Āstika set out for the palace of Janamejaya to obstruct the Yajña.

Though the Rtviks invoked for a long time Taksāka did not appear. Enraged at his absence Utaṅka searched for Taksāka with his divine eyes and found him seated on the throne of Indra along with him, who had given him (Taksāka) asylum. This challenge of Indra kindled the wrath of Utaṅka all the more, and he invoked Indra, Taksāka and Indra's throne too so that all of them might together come and fall into the fire. And, lo! there came the whole lot of them. Only two minutes more and all of them would be reduced to ashes.

By now Āstika, the son of Jaratkaru had arrived at the Yajñaśālā. Janamejaya received the young Sage with all respect and promised to grant his desire whatever that be. Āstika's demand was that the Sarpa Sutra should be stopped. Though Janamejaya was not for stopping the yajña, he was reminded of his promise to grant any desire of Āstika and the latter insisted on the stopping of the Sutra. Janamejaya stopped it. Āstika blessed that the serpents which had died at the Sutra would attain salvation. (Ādi Parva, Chapters 52-58 ; Devi Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

6) Listens to the Bhārata story. While the Sarpa Sutra was being conducted Vyāsa came over there and related the whole story of the Mahābhārata at the request of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 60).

7) Saramā's curse. Janamejaya along with his brother once performed a yajña of long duration at Kurukṣetra. While the yajña was going on, a dog (son of Saramā the bitch of the Devas) came there. The three brothers of Janamejaya beat the dog which returned to its mother, Saramā, crying. The mother asked him whether he had done anything to deserve the beating, and he answered thus: "No, mother, I had done nothing wrong. I did not lick the havis, nor did I even look at it." Hearing her son's reply Saramā in deep anguish, went to Kurukṣetra and questioned Janamejaya as to why her innocent son was beaten by his brothers. Neither he nor his brothers replied to Saramā, and she cursed Janamejaya that he would be subjected to adṛṣṭaphala (unforeseen results). This curse upset Janamejaya so much that after the Sarpa Sutra was over and on his return to Hastināpura he made a search for a Purohit (priest) competent enough to redeem him from his sins, and at last he invited Somaśravas, son of the great sage Śrutasravas to be his Purohit, and thus did Somaśravas become the priest of Janamejaya (Ādi Parva, Chapter 3).

8) Successors of Janamejaya. Janamejaya had two sons, Candrapīṇḍa and Suryāpīṇḍa by his wife Kāśyā. Hundred sons, experts in archery, were born to Candrapīṇḍa. The eldest of them, Satyakarṇa, ruled the country after Janamejaya. Satyakarṇa had a son called Śvetakarṇa to whom was born a son called Ajapāśva by his wife Yādavī, the daughter of Sucāru. (Bhavīṣya Parva, Chapter 1).

9) Other Information
(1) Janamejaya defeated the King of Taksāsālā and subjugated the country. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 20).
(2) The Sage called Veda was the preceptor of Jana mejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 82).
(3) After the Sarpa Sutra, Janamejaya performed an Āsvamedha yajña at which Vyāsa delivered a lengthy discourse on life and salvation. As Janamejaya said that if he were to believe the words of Vyāsa his dead father Parikṣīt should be shown to him. Vyāsa brought Parikṣīt down from Svarga and showed him to his son. On the occasion were also present sage Śāmika and his son Śrīgī. (Āśramavāśika Parva, Chapter 35).
(4) Life time of Janamejaya. The great war at Kurukṣetra was fought in 3138 B.C. (See under Mahābhārata) After the war was over the Pāṇḍavas ruled the country for 36 years. Vyāsa took three years to compose the Mahābhārata. According to the Mahāprasāhānī Parva the Pāṇḍavas set out for the forest after handing over the government to Parikṣīt, who ruled the country for sixty years. From the above facts it becomes evident that Janamejaya became king in 3042 B.C.

JANAMEJAYA II. One Janamejaya, a prominent member of Yamarājā’s assembly is referred to in the Ādi and Sabhā Parvans of the Mahābhārata. This Janamejaya had once been defeated by Māndhātā. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 62, Verse 10). He conquered the world within three days. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 234).

JANAMEJAYA III. A Kṣatriya King who was Krodhavaśa, the Asura, reborn. He was killed by Durmukha, the son of Dṛḍharaśṭra. (Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 19).

JANAMEJAYA IV. A prince born to King Kuru by his wife called Vāhīni. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 51).

JANAMEJAYA V. Another King born in the dynasty of Parīkṣita. He had a son called Dṛḍharaśṭra. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 3). He once committed brahmahatya (sin of killing a brahmin) and so had been forsaken by his subjects. So he had to take to the forest. His search for means to get rid of the sin took him at last to sage Indrota, who made him perform Aśvamedhā yajña. Thus, he got redemption from the sin and he became Indrota’s disciple also. (Śānti Parva, Chapters 150-153).

JANAMEJAYA VI. A son of King Kuru by his wife, Kausalyā. He is also known as Praśītra. The King had a son called Praśītvān by a noble lady called Anantā of the Madhu Dynasty. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 95).

JANAMEJAYA VII. A serpent who attends the council of Varuṇa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 10).

JANAMEJAYA VIII. A King born in the family of Nipa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 174, Stanza 13).

JANAMEJAYA IX. A King who had been of help to Yuddhīṣṭhīra. He fought with Karna. This Janamejaya was the son of King Durmukha. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 23; Kṛṣṇa Parva Chapter 49).

JANAPADI. A celestial maid. This celestial maid was sent by Indra to hinder the penance of the hermit Saradāvān and the moment the hermit saw this celestial beauty seminal discharge occurred to him. Kṛpa and Kṛpī were born from that semen. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 129).

JANĀRDANA I. A synonym of Mahāvīṣṇu (Śri Kṛṣṇa). Because he made the Dasyus (Asuras—demons) tremble, Śri Kṛṣṇa was called Janārdana.

“He, who has lotus as his seat, who is eternal, imperishable, and unchangeable, he who has all these attributes is Puṇḍarikākṣa (lotus-eyed) and he who makes the Asuras tremble is Janārdana.” (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 6).

JANĀRDANA II. See under Dībaka.

JANASTHĀNA. This is a part of the forest Daṇḍaka, which lies in the basin of the Godāvāri. Śri Rāma had lived in this forest with Śītā and Laksmana for a long time during the period of his forest-life. It was at this place that Śri Rāma killed fourteen thousand Rākṣasas (giants) such as Khara. Dūṣṇa, Trisīras and others. (M.B. Dāśaṅgītya Pātha, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38). Mārica allured Śītā and Rāvaṇa kidnapped her in this place. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 147). Śūrpaṇakha tried to attract Śrī Rāma and Laksmana, and her nose etc., were cut off, in this forest. It was in this place that Śrī Rāma cut off the head of a Rākṣasasa (demon) and threw it away. That head fell in the lap of a hermit called Mahodara. (M.B. Sāya Parva, Chapter 39).

JANASILĀNA is regarded as a holy place. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 29, those who stay in this place and take bath in the Godāvāri will acquire imperial prosperity.

JĀNDAKĀRA. One of the eighteen Vinayaśakas, who stay near the Sun. In chapter 16 of the Śambhava Purāṇa it is mentioned that this Jāndakāra is engaged in carrying out the orders of Yama (the god of death).

JĀNGALA. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 56).

JĀNGĀRI. A brahmavādi son (interested in theories about Brahman) of Viśvāmitra. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 57).

JĀNGHĀBANDHU. A sage who was a member of Yuddhiṣṭhīra’s assembly. (Śābhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 16).

JANTU. 1) General information. A King of the Pāru dynasty. It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278, that he was the son of the King Somaka and father of the King Vṛṣṭanu.

2) Jantu born again. Somaka had hundred wives. But only one of them gave birth to a child. That child was Jantu. He was a pet of all the hundred wives. Once Jantu was bitten by an ant. All the hundred queens began crying and shouting and all ran to him. Hearing the tumult in the women’s apartment of the palace, the King and the minister ran to that place. When the tumult was over the King began to think. “It is better to have no sons at all, than to have only one son. There are hundred queens. But none of them bears a child. Is there a solution for this?” At last the King summoned his family-priests and consulted them. The decision of the priests was that if the King should sacrifice his only son, then all his wives would become pregnant and all would give birth to children, and that among the sons thus born, Jantu also would be reborn. The mother of Jantu did not look at this project with favour. “How can we be sure that Jantu also will be there among the sons to be born, after his death?” She was worried by this thought. The priests consoled her and said that there will be a golden mole on the left flank of Jantu. Finally the mother agreed to their plan. Sacrificial dais was arranged. Sacrificial fire for holy offerings was prepared. The priests tore the child into pieces and offered them as oblation in the fire. When the sacrifice was finished, all the hundred queens became pregnant. Each of them gave birth to a child. As the priests had predicted, there was a golden mole on the left flank of the child delivered by the mother of Jantu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 127 and 128).

JĀNUJANGHA. A King who is fit to be remembered every morning and evening. Mention is made about this King in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Stanza 69.
JAPA(S). A group of Gods (devas) of the third Manvantara (age of Manu). In that Manvantara the Manu was Uttama, Indra was Susânti, and the Deva-guṇas (groups of gods) were Sudharmas, Satyas, Japas, Pratardanas, and Vasavartins, the five groups, each consisting of twelve members. (See under Manvantara.)

JĀPAKA. A Brahmāṇa who was constantly engaged in uttering Gâyatri. Jāpaka was ordered to go to hell because certain mistakes were detected in the uttering of Gâyatri. But Devi Sāvitrī intervened. She appeared before him and gave him heaven. This Jāpaka was a contemporary of Ikvāku. (M.B. Sānti Parva, 3 Chapters from 197.)

JĀRA. A forester. It was this forester who shot an arrow at Śri Kṛṣṇa and killed him mistaking him for an animal. (See under Śri Kṛṣṇa.)

JĀRA. A harpy (Rākṣasī). Though she was a harpy she loved human beings. It is believed that if the picture of Jarā and her children is placed in the house and venerated, there will be no haunting of any other kinds of demons.

The figure of Jarā was sculptured on the wall of the Palace of Bṛhadrastra, the King of Magadha, and was being worshipped. Because the King worshipped her, she had been looking forward to an opportunity to reward the King. Bṛhadrastra had married two daughters of the King of Kāśi. They were twin sisters. For a long time they remained childless. The King was very sorry, and went to the forest with his wives. He saw the hermit Kakśvān or Candakauśika, the son of Gautama and requested that a son should be born to him. The hermit was sitting in meditation under a mango tree and a mango fell on his lap. The hermit took it and by prayer and meditation he invoked divine power into it and gave it to the King. The King divided it into two and gave it to his wives. The queens became pregnant and the three returned joyously.

In due course both delivered. But each of them gave birth to only half of a child. The horrified queens took the uncouth figures outside the palace and left them there. Jarā was watching this. She ran to the spot and placed the two portions together. Instantly it became a child of proper form. Hearing the cry of the child the mothers came out. Jarā appeared there and placed the child before the King Bṛhadrastra. As desired by Jarā the child was named Jarāśandha because he was joined together by Jarā. This child grew up and became the notorious King Jarāśandha of Magadha. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, 3 Chapters from 17.)

It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 182, Stanza 12 that when Arjuna fought with Jarāśandha this harpy had been staying in the weapon of Jarāśandha and was killed in that fight.

JARATKĀRU I. A hermit who is Purāṇically famous.

1) Birth. This hermit was born in a Brahmāṇa dynasty known as Yāyāvaras. He was the only son of Yāyāvaras. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 13.)

2) The name Jaratkaru. The meaning of the name Jaratkaru is given in Bhāsābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 40, as follows:—

"Jarā is consumption, Kāru is dārūṇa (awful). By and by his body became hard and awful and by penance he made his body to wear out, and so he got the name 'Jaratkaru'."

by means of penance he made his body lean and worn out and so got the name Jaratkaru.

3) Marriage. The calm and abstemious Jaratkaru remained unmarried for a long time. One day he happened to meet with his Manes. They were holding on to a grass and were about to fall into hell, and a rat was cutting the root of the grass which was their only hold. The moment the root is severed all the Manes would fall into the deep ravine of hell. It was at this juncture that Jaratkaru, met his Manes. The moment they saw him they said, "See Jaratkaru, we are your Manes. We have to obtain, heaven, life, contentment and happiness by the good deeds of your son. So go and get married quickly."

At first he did not like the talk about marriage. Still, in order to procure heaven for his ancestors he agreed to get married. But he made a condition that the name of the bride should be Jaratkaru and she should be given to him as alms. Saying these words, he walked away along the forest.

News reached the ears of Vāsuki, the King of the Nāgas (serpents) that the hermit Jaratkaru was wandering through the forests calling out that somebody should give him as alms a damsel named Jaratkaru. Vāsuki had a sister. Jaratkaru was her name. Vāsuki decided to give her to the hermit Jaratkaru. She was adorned with costly garments and ornaments and was taken to the hermit Jaratkaru. Jaratkaru said:—

"Hear my condition, I will not cherish her if she causes displeasure to me. If she does so I will send her away instantly."

On condition that if she did anything displeasing to him he would leave her at once, the hermit Jaratkaru married Jaratkaru the sister of Vāsuki. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 2; Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapters 13 and 47.)

4) Leaves his wife. Jaratkaru lived in the hermitage with her husband looking after him with love and loyalty. One day the hermit was sleeping with his head on the lap of his wife. Though it was sunset the hermit slept on. It was time for the evening worship of the hermit. If he is aroused he will get angry. The wife was in a difficult situation. Anyhow she aroused her husband. The hermit got up full of anger and shouted, "You have hindered my sleep, you wicked woman and teased me. So from today you are not my wife. I am going away."

She begged him for pardon with tears. But without paying any heed to the entreaties of his pregnant wife, he left her.

The helpless Jaratkaru gave birth to a son named Āstika who later stopped the famous sacrifice, Sarpa Satra meant for killing the serpents. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 47.) See under Jaratkaru II.

JARATKĀRU II.

1) General information. It occurs in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, about Jaratkaru, the sister of Vāsuki and the wife of hermit Jaratkaru as follows. This devī (goddess) is the daughter of Prajāpati Kaśyapa, born from his mind. So she got the name Manasādevī (goddess born from mind). Some think that she got the name Manasādevi because she is the deity of mind. There are some who imagine that she got the name Manasādevi because she held Śri Kṛṣṇa Paramātman (the Supreme Spirit) firmly in her mind. This devī had been meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā for three yugas (world-ages). She is known by twelve names.

1) Jaratākāru. Manasādevī had been performing penance, and meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātman for three complete yugas and her garments and body were worn out. So Kṛṣṇa gave her the name Jaratākāru.

2) Jagadgaurī. Because she was comely and beautiful and of fair complexion and was worshipped all over the world, she got the name Jagadgaurī.

3) Manasā. Because she was born from the mind of Kaśyapa, the name “Manasā” was given to her.

4) Siddhayoginī. As the fruits of her Tapas (penance), she got the attainments of Yoga (meditation, devotion, contemplation and other ways of union with the Universal Soul) and so she was given the name Siddhayoginī.

5) Vaiṣṇavī. Because she had constant devotion to Mahāviṣṇu she was called Vaiṣṇavī.

6) Nāgabhagini. Because she was the sister of Vāsuki the King of the Nagas, she got the name Nāgabhagini. (Sister of Nāga).

7) Śaśi. As she was a disciple of Śiva she got the name Śaśi.

8) Nāgēsvari. Because she saved the Nāgas (serpents) from the Sarpasatra (sacrifice for killing the serpents) of Janamejaya the son of the King Parikṣit, she got the name Nāgēsvari.

9) Jaratākārupriyā. Because she became the wife of the hermit Jaratākāru she was called Jaratākārupriyā.

10) Āstikamātā. Because she was the mother of the hermit Āśtikā she got the name Āstikamātā.

11) Visahāri. Because she was the goddess who destroyed poison, she was known by the name Visahāri.

12) Mahājñānavatī. Since she had the attainments of vast knowledge, yoga and the power of bringing the dead to life, she was given the name Mahājñānavatī.

2) Birth. Once the serpents became a plague to the men of the earth and they all went to Prajapati Kaśyapa and made their complaints. Kaśyapa and Brähmā consulted each other and at the instruction of Brähmā Kaśyapa created several Mantras (spells and incantations) and Manasādevī from his mind as the deity of these spells.

3) Power of her tapas (penance). When she was very young she went to Kailāsa and performed penance to Paramāsiva for a thousand years. At last Śiva appeared before her and gave her the divine knowledge, and taught her the Śāmaveda. He gave her the divine Śrī Kṛṣṇa mantra (a spell) called ‘Āstikāśari’ and the Śrī Kṛṣṇa Kavaca (the armour of Kṛṣṇa) called Trailokyamāṅga and taught her how to use them in worship. Wearing this armour and using the spell she performed penance in Puṣkara, meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā, for three yugas (world-ages). At the end of this period Śrī KṛṣṇaParamātmā appeared before her and gave her all the boons she wanted. Śrī Kṛṣṇa said that all over the world she would be worshipped and that she had power to give boons to her worshippers.

4) Marriage and rejection. Kaśyapa gave his daughter Manasādevī in marriage to Jaratākāru, a hermit. As they were living in the hermitage, once the hermit slept with his head on the lap of his wife. Seeing the setting sun she aroused her husband. The hermit became angry and decided to reject her. She thought of the Devas, who instantly arrived. Brähmā argued that it was not meet and right to reject his wife before a child was born to her. The hermit touched the groin of his wife and prayed with the power of yoga (meditation, contemplation etc.) she became pregnant. The son born to her is the famous hermit Āśtikā.

After giving birth to Āśtikā she went to Kailāsa, where Paramāsvara and Pārvatī received her.

5) The mantra (incantation) of worship. To get the attainment of Manasādevī one has to utter the spell (mantra) “Orī Ṣrīm-Ṣhrīm-Kliṇī-Aṁih-Manasādevyai svāhā” five lakh times. He who has got the attainment of this mantra as given above will be equal to Dhanvantari (the physician of the Gods) and to him poison will be Amṛta (ambrosia). This goddess could be invoked into a secluded room on the day of Saṅkrānti (Transit of the Sun). If offerings of oblations and worship are carried on, he would be blessed with children, wealth and fame.

JARĀŚANDHA I. A terrible King of Magadhā.

2) Birth. Jaratāsandha was created by joining together two halves of a child, by a giantess called Jarā, and so this child got the name Jarāsandha. (For detailed story see under Jarā).

3) The first battle with Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Asti and Prāpti, the two wives of Kaima, were daughters of Jarāsandha. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed Kaima, the two daughters went to their father and shed tears before him. Jarāsandha became angry and with a mighty army surrounded the city of Mathurā. A fierce battle was fought between Jarāsandha and Kṛṣṇa. At last Balabhadrdarāma caught hold of Jarāsandha and was about to kill him, but an ethereal voice said that Balabhadradarāma was not the person to kill Jarāsandha. Accordingly Rāma and Kṛṣṇa set Jarāsandha free.

4) Other information.

(1) It is mentioned in Bhāgavata, Skanda 10, that Jarāsandha was the teacher of Kaima.

(2) Jarāsandha had four sons, Soma, Sahadeva, Tūrya and Sruṭāśrū of whom Sahadeva became King of Magadhā, after the death of Jarāsandha.

(3) Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, that Jarāsandha had been present at the Svayahvāra (marriage) of Pāncāli.

(4) Once there arose a battle between Jarāsandha and Karṇa, in which Jarāsandha was defeated and so he made a treaty with Karṇa. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 6).

5) The death of Jarāsandha. The enmity between Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Jarāsandha was life-long. These two mighty powers confronted each other eighteen times. Śrī Kṛṣṇa decided to kill Jarāsandha, the King of Magadhā, in a duel. Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa with Arjuna and Bhima, reached the city of Magadhā in the guise of Brahmās. They started from the kingdom of Kuru.
travelled through Kurujāṅgala and passed by Padmasaras and Kāla-kūṭa, visited the holy places of Gāṇḍakī, Mahāśoṅga, Sadānāra and such others, crossed the river Sarayū and reached the opposite bank. Then they travelled through the countries of East Kosala and Mithilā. Touring through the countries they crossed the rivers Cārnajavati, Gaṅgā and Soṅa. Wearing matted hair and barks of trees they reached Giri-vṛaja, the capital city of Magadha. There were three big drums, which were used only on special occasions. The hide of elephant was used for making them. Seeing all these sights they reached the presence of Jarāsandha, who welcomed them with necessary formalities and talked with them. But they kept silence. At last Śrī Kṛṣṇa told him that his two friends were having the vow of silence, which would terminate only at midnight. So the King left them in the sacrificial hall and went to the palace. He came to them at midnight and asked them who they were. Śrī Kṛṣṇa revealed to him that they were Kṛṣṇa, Bhimā and Arjuna, who had come to fight a duel with Jarāsandha, who had unreasonably put many innocent Kings in dungeon, and challenged him to select any one of them for duel. Jarāsandha, trembling with fury, selected Bhima. In that duel Jarāsandha was killed. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, 3 Chapters from 20).

6) Names given to Jarāsandha. Bāhradratha, Māgdha, Magadhādhipa and Jarāputra are some of the names used in the Mahābhārata by Vyāsa as synonyms of Jarāsandha.

Jarāsandha II. (Śatrusaha). One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāśtra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 137, Stanza 30 that this Jarāsandha was killed by Bhūmasena.

Jarāsandha III. In Karna Parva of the Mahābhārata, Chapter 5, Stanza 30, we see a King Jayatsena who fought on the side of the Kauravas and had been killed by Abhimanyu. The father of this King Jayatsena was one Jarāsandha, a Kṣatriya of Magadha.

Jarāsandhavadhaparva. A sub-section of Sabhā Parva, of the Mahābhārata. This sub-section comprises of Chapters 20 to 24 of Sabhā Parva.

Jarayu. An attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Stanza 19).

Jaritā. A mother bird with four young ones, who suffered much in the burning of the forest Khāṇḍava. (For detailed story see under Khāṇḍavadāhā, Para 8).

Jaritāri. A son of the mother bird Jaritā. (See under Khāṇḍavadāhā, Para 8).

Jarjarānā. An attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 19).

Jarāṭika. A tribe of Vāhikas. They are considered to be the lowest of the tribes. (M.B. Karna Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 10).

Jarudhi. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

Jārūthi. An ancient city. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 30, that Śrī Kṛṣṇa, with his friends Āhuṭi and Kṛatha defeated Śītupāla, Jarāsandha, Śaibya and Śatadhanvan in this city.

Jātādhara. A warrior of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

1. See under Bṛhadratha IV to know about the sound of this big drum.
reach up to the top of the head, for Kṣaṭṭiyas up to the forehead and for Vaśyas up to the nose. Before going for alms, the celibate should take his stick, bow before the sun, go round the fire and only then set out. The alms received should be offered to the teacher as oblation, then he should turn to the east and wash hands and mouth and eat it. Brāhmaṇas should wear the upper garment or their sacred thread (Yajña-sūra) on the left shoulder and under the right arm and then it is called ‘Upavita’; if it is on the right shoulder and under the left arm it is called “Prācināvita” and if it is round the neck it is called “Nivita”.

These Jātakarmans may be done for the female child also at the stipulated times by tantrās, without reciting mantras, for the purification of the body. The rituals performed without reciting Vedamānas (spells) are called tantrās. For women marriage is to be considered as Upanayana, looking after the needs of husband to be considered as learning at the house of the teacher, and housekeeping as samādpāna (gathering fuel of Butea frondosa). (Manusmṛti, Chapter 2).

JĀṬĀLĪKA. A female attendant of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 23).

JĀṬAŚĀṬA. See under Ghanapātha.

JĀṬARŪPAŚILA. A mountain. This mountain stands in a place having an area of thirteen yojanas, on the opposite shore of the sea where the water-creatures fall with tremendous cry at the mouth of the submarine fire (Bāḍavāṅgi). The monkeys sent by Sugrīva to search for Sītā, made a search in this mountain also. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Kiskindhā Kānda, Sarga 40, Stanza 50).

JĀṬĀṢūRA I. A King, who was a member of Dharmaputra’s assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 24).

JĀṬĀṢūRA II. A Rāķṣasa, Jāṭasura, disguised as a brahmin lived with the Pāṇḍavas in the forest. His aim was to carry off Pāncālī and the arrows of the Pāṇḍavas as and when he got an opportunity for it. One day taking advantage of Arjuna’s absence Bhima was out hunting Jāṭasura caught hold of the others as also the arrows and ran away with them. Sahadeva alone managed to slip away from his clutches. Dharmaputra pledged his word that Jāṭasura would be killed before the sunset. Hearing all the hubbub (Bhima hurried to the scene, killed the Asura and saved his brothers and Pāncālī from difficulties and danger. (Vana Parva, Chapter 157).

JĀṬĀṢūRA III. This Jāṭasura had a son called Alam- būṣa who was killed by Ghaṭotkaca in the great war. (Drona Parva, Chapter 174).

JĀṬĀṢūRA PARVA. A sub-Parva of Mahābhārata. (See under Mahābhārata).

JĀṬADEVĀ (S). Three sons of Purūravas, born from Agni (fire). They are called the Jāṭavedas. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

JĀṬĀYU. A bird famous in the Purāṇas.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viśuṇ as follows, Brahma—Marici—Kaśyapa—Aruṇa—Jāṭāyu.

2) Birth. Two sons called Sampāti and Jāṭāyu were born to Aruṇa. Their mother, a bird, was Śyenī. Śyenī, wife of Aruṇa, delivered two children, Sampāti and the great Jāṭāyu (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 71). “Know that I am the son of Aruṇa and Sampāti is my elder brother: My name is Jāṭāyu, and I am the son of Śyenī.” (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Canto 14, Verse 32).

But, according to Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, the name of the mother of Sampāti and Jāṭāyu was Mahāśvetā. (Kiskindhā Kāṇḍa). Perhaps, Śyenī was also known as Mahāśvetā.

3) Jāṭāyu flies towards Śūrya. Sampāti and Jāṭāyu, once under a bet flew up towards the sun. Jāṭāyu outflew Sampāti, and in the exuberance of youth entered Śūrya’s orbit at noon time with the result that, due to the excessive heat his wings were scorched. At this Sampāti, to save his brother, flew up higher than Jāṭāyu and spread out his wings like an umbrella over Jāṭāyu with the result that Sampāti’s wings were burnt, and he fell down somewhere on the Vindhya mountains. He spent the rest of his life under the protection of a sage called Nīśākara who was performing penance on the mountains. After their tragic meeting in Śūrya-mandala Sampāti and Jāṭāyu never again met in their life. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Kiskindhā Kāṇḍa, Chapter 58; Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Kiskindhā Kāṇḍa).

4) Fought with Rāvana. Jāṭāyu clashed with Rāvana, who was carrying away Śītādevi in his vimāna, and in the fierce fight that they fought in the air, Rāvana cut off Jāṭāyu’s wings and thus felled him on the earth, almost dead. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Chapter 51).

5) Death. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa during their search in the forest for Śītā came upon Jāṭāyu lying without wings almost dead and reciting Rāma’s name. Jāṭāyu described to Rāma how Rāvana had carried away Śītā and how he had tried to stop him and fought with him. After giving this account he died. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa lit a fire and cremated Jāṭāyu. The great bird’s soul attained salvation. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

JĀṬĪ. A warrior of Subrahmanyas. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

JĀṬI. See under Gāturvarpya.

JĀṬILA. The name assumed by Śiva when he played the part of a Brahma-carin. Pārvati began rigorous penance to obtain Śiva as her husband, and Śiva visited her disguised as Jáṭila, a brahma-carin to test her. (Śiva Purāṇa, Satāradrasanīhītā).

JĀṬILĀ. A righteous and generous woman who was born in the Gautama dynasty. She once sought the help of the saptarśis. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 195; also See under Gātama II).

JĀṬISMARĀ. A holy bath. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 128 that the body and mind of the person who bathes in this tirtha (bath) will become pure.

JĀṬISMARĀHRADA. A holy place. In the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Stanza 3, mention is made that if a man gives alms at this holy place, he will be able to remember his previous birth and life.

JĀṬISMARĀKĪṬA. A worm which got emancipation through the advice of Vyāsa. Once while Vyāsa was roaming about in the country, by chance he saw this worm. It was running through the road, seeing a cart coming very fast. Vyāsa stopped it and asked, “What are you running from?” The worm replied that he was running in fear that the wheel of the cart coming from behind might crush him. In the previous birth this worm was a Śūdra. Jealousy, resentment, arrogance, selfishness etc. were the traits of his character in his previous life. Only twice in his life had he done good deeds. Once he honoured his mother and on another occasion he respected a Brāhmaṇa. Because of these two good deeds, in his present life as worm he had the remembrance of his previous life. Vyāsa gave the worm necessary advice. Instantly the worm was crushed under the wheel of the cart.

In the next rebirth this Jātismarakīti was born as a Kṣatriya King. As he was leading the life of a powerful King he met with Vyāsa. He received advice from the hermit. In his next life he became a Brāhmaṇa and finally he attained bliss. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, 3 Chapters from 117).

JĀTHARA I. A very crude brahmin scholar in Vedic lore, Jathara was a prominent figure at the serpent yajña held by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Verse 6).

JĀTHARA II. A mountain within the ranges of Mahāmeru. On the eastern side of Mahāmeru there exist two mountains called Jathara and Devakītu, 18,000 yojanas in extent and 2000 yojanas high. On the western side of Meru are the mountains called Pavaṇā and Pāriyātra, on the southern side Kailāsa and Karavira, and on the northern side Trīṣṇa and Makaragirī. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

JĀTHARA III. An urban region in ancient India.

JĀTHĀRA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 128).

JATUGRHAPARVA. See under Arakkillam (lac palace).

JATUGRHA-Parva. A particular section of Ādi Parva.

JĀTUKRAYA. An ancient hermit with control over his senses. He was a member of the council of Yudhīṣthira. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 14).

JAVA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 75).

JAVA I. A son of Dhrtrāśtra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 119). He fought with Arjuna at the time of the stealing of cows. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 54). This Jaya fought with Nila and Bhima in the battle of Bhārata. Bhima killed him. (Droṇa Parva, Chapters 25 and 135).

JAVA II. A deva (god). At the time of the burning of the forest Khāṇḍava, this deva came with an iron pestle to fight with Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 226 Stanza 34).

JAVA III. A King in ancient India. He sits in the Durbar of Yama (God of death) and worships him. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 3, Stanza 15).

JAVA IV. A synonym of the Sun. (M.B. Parva, Chapter 3, Stanza 24).

JAVA V. The pseudo name taken by Yudhīṣṭhira at the time of the pseudonymity of the Pāṇḍavas in the country of Virāṭa. Bhima was known as Jayanta, Arjuna by the name Vijaya, Nakula by the name Jayatena and Sahadeva by the name Jayadala at that time. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35). At that time Pāṇḍāli addressed all her five husbands by the name Jaya. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 23, Stanza 12).

JAVA VI. A nāgā (serpent) born in the family of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 16).

JAVA VII. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156, that both Śakuni and this warrior fought with Arjuna.

JAVA VIII. A warrior of the country of Pāṇḍāli. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Kaṇha Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 44 that this warrior fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas and that Karṇa wounded him in the battle.

JAYA IX. One of the attendants given to Subrahmanya by Vāsuki, the King of the Nāgas (serpents). Vāsuki gave Subrahmanya two attendants named Jaya and Mahājaya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 52).

JAYA A. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 67).

JAYA XI. (JAYAVIJAYAS). They were gate-keepers of Vaikuṇṭha. As these two sons of devas were engaged in the service of Mahāviṣṇu guarding the gate, the hermits Sanaka and others came to see Mahāviṣṇu to pay him homage. Jaya and Vijaya stopped them at the gate. Sanaka got angry and cursed them to take three births on the earth as Asuras (demons). The sorrowful Jaya and Vijaya requested for absolution from the curse. The hermit said that they had to take three births as Asuras and that they would be redeemed by the weapon of Mahāviṣṇu. Accordingly Jaya and Vijaya were born in the earth as Hīranyakṣa and Hīranyakāśipu. They were killed by Mahāviṣṇu. In the second birth they were Rāvana and Kumbhakarna. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Śri Rāma killed them. In the third birth they were Śiṣuśāla and Dantavakra. They were killed by Śri Kṛṣṇa, an incarnation of Bhagavān Viṣṇu.

JAVA XII. Father of the rākṣasas (giants) Virāṭa, who was killed by Śri Rāma at the forest Daṇḍaka. Virāṭa was born to the giant Jaya by his wife Śatadhāra. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyana Kāpa, Sarga 3).

JAVA XIII. The original name of the Mahābhārata written by Vyāsa. Many of the scholars are of opinion that Vyāsa was not the author of the whole of the Mahābhārata that we see in its present form now. They say that the Bhārata written by Vyāsa consisted only of eight thousand and eight hundred stanzas. That work was named Jaya. To those eight thousand and eight hundred stanzas Vaśīmpāyaṇa added fifteen thousand, two hundred stanzas and this great book was given the name Bhārata or Bhārata sarhihitā (Bhārata collection).

When Sūta recited this book to other hermits in Naimiśāraṇya the book had a lakh of stanzas. Henceforward the book was called Mahābhārata, (History of classical Sanskrit Literature; Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 62, Stanza 20).

JAYĀ I. A daughter of the hermit Gautama. Gautama had two daughters by his wife Ahalāya named Jayantī and Aparājītī besides Jayā. While Dakṣa was performing a yāga, (sacrifice) this Jayā informed Pārvatī of it. Pārvatī fell down when she heard that Dakṣa had not invited Śiva to the sacrifice. Śiva got angry at Dakṣa's negligence and from his wrath the Bhūtaγaṇas such as Virabhadrā and others (attendants of Śiva) arose. (Vāmanā Purāṇa, Chapter 4).

JAYĀ II. Wife of Puspadanta, a gaṇa (attendant of Śiva). See under Puspadan’a.

JAYĀ III. Another name of Pārvatī. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 16).

JAYĀ IV. A daughter of Dakṣa. Two daughters named Jayā and Suprabhā were born to Dakṣa. To Suprabhā and Jayā fifty sons each were born. These hundred sons wore various kinds of arrows and such other weapons. (Vālmiki Rāmâyana, Bālakāṇḍa, Sarga 21).

JAYA V. A maid of Pārvatī. It is seen in Skanda Purāṇa that this Jaya was the daughter of Prajāpati Kṛpāsva.

JAYA. Wife. The husband enters the wife in the form of semen and takes birth as the foetus and then is born from her as son and so the wife is called Jaya.

Garbho bhūtvā jayate /
Jājayāstaddhi jāyatvaṁ
Yadasyāṁ jayate punah” //

(Manusmṛti, Chapter 9, Stanza 8).

JAYA (M) I. The name of an auspicious moment. This has the name Vijaya also. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 17).

JAYA (M) II. The name given to the story of Vidulā. See under Vishulā.

JAYADBALA. The false name assumed by Sahadeva at the time of the incognito life of the Pāṇḍavas in the city of Virāta. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

JAYADEVA I. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 13th century A.D. He is the author of the play 'Prasannarāgavam'. As far as the story of Śrī Rāma is concerned, some changes have been made in this play from that given by Bhavabhūti in his 'Mahāvīraracita'. According to this play Śrī Rāma and Bāṇāsura both were lovers of Stū. The famous work 'Candrālokā', a treatise on rhetorical figures, was written by this poet Jayadeva. His most important work is 'Gītgovinda', the theme of which is the early life of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, especially the love between Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā, which is very touchingly described. This book consists of 12 sargas and each sarga contains 24 octaves. This poet was a devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He used to sing lyrics before the image of Kṛṣṇa while his wife danced according to the beat.

JAYADEVA II. See under Dvēśasana II.

JAYADHVAJA. The fifth of the hundred sons of Kārtavīryāruja. It is stated in Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 46 that, of the hundred sons of Kārtavīryāruja, Śūra, Śūrasena, Dhiṣaṇa, Madhu and Jayadhvaja were the mightiest warriors. This Jayadhvaja was the father of Tālājaṅgha.

JAYADRATHA I. A mighty warrior King who ruled over the kingdom of Śindhu.

2) Birth and attainment of boon. Jayadratha was born as a result of severe fasts and vows taken by his father. There was an ethereal voice at the birth of Jayadratha, "This child would become a very famous King. The head of him, who puts down the head of this child on the earth would break into a hundred pieces within a moment". His father was filled with joy when he heard this ethereal voice, and so he made Jayadratha King at a very young age and went to Samantapaṇcaka to perform penance. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 146).

3) Marriage. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 116, Stanza 17, that Jayadratha married the princess Dussaṇā.

4) Jayadratha and Pāṇcāli. From the very beginning Jayadratha was a bitter enemy of the Pāṇḍavas. It is not difficult to find out the root of this enmity. It is stated in Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 21 that Jayadratha was present at the svayamvara of Pāṇcāli. The fact that he did not get Pāṇcāli, might have laid the foundation of this enmity.

From this moment Jayadratha was looking forward to a chance to carry off Pāṇcāli. The forest life of the Pāṇḍavas began. They wandered through many forests and finally reached the forest, Kāniyaka. Once the Pāṇḍavas left Pāṇcāli alone in the hut and went to the forest for hunting. Jayadratha came to know of this. He came with his men to the place where the hut stood. At the very first sight of Pāṇcāli, he fell in love with her. He sent Koṭikāsya, the King of Trigarta, who was the son of Suratha as a messenger to Pāṇcāli. Koṭikāsya told Pāṇcāli about the superior qualities of Jayadratha and requested her to accept Jayadratha, leaving the Pāṇḍavas. But she rejected his request. The messenger returned to Jayadratha and told him what had happened. Jayadratha himself came in a chariot and tried to entice her. Pāṇcāli did not yield. Jayadratha caught her by force and took her away in his chariot. Dhaumya the priest of the Pāṇḍavas followed them with tears. Shortly afterwards, the Pāṇḍavas returned to the hut. They searched for Pāṇcāli here and there. They heard everything from a maid, and instantly followed Jayadratha, whose army confronted the Pāṇḍavas. The heads of almost all the warriors of Jayadratha fell on the ground. Jayadratha fled from the battlefield. The Pāṇḍavas followed him and caught him and scourged him. Bhīma shaved his head letting only five hairs to stand on the head. They took him as a prisoner before Dharmanputra. Finally at the instruction of Yudhiṣṭhira and Pāṇcāli, he was released. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 264 to 272).

5) Other details.

(1) In the sacrifice of Rājastra (imperial consecration) performed by Yudhiṣṭhira, Jayadratha took part as a tributary King. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Stanza 8).

(2) Jayadratha was present at the game of dice between Duryodhana and Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 58, Stanza 28).

(3) It was while going to Śālva to marry a damsel that Jayadratha attacked Pāṇcāli at the forest of Kāniyaka. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 264).

(4) Feeling ashamed at the result of his attempt to carry off Pāṇcāli, Jayadratha went direct to Gaṅga-dvāra and pleased Śiva by penance. Śiva gave him the boon that he would be able to defeat all the Pāṇḍavas except Arjuna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 272).

6) Jayadratha in the battle of Bhārata. In the battle of Bhārata, which lasted for eighteen days between the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas, Jayadratha took the side of the Kauravas and fought against the Pândavas. The part played by him in the battle is given below:

(1) On the first day there was a combat between Jayadratha and Drupada. (M.B. Bhíṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Stanzas 55 to 57).

(2) Attacked Bhímasena. (M.B. Bhíṣma Parva, Chapter 79, Stanzas 17 to 20).

(3) Fought with Arjuna and Bhímasena. (M.B. Bhíṣma Parva, Chapters 113 and 115).

(4) Engaged in a combat with the King Virāṭa. (M.B. Bhíṣma Parva, Chapter 116, Stanzas 42 to 44).

(5) Jayadratha and Abhimanyu fought with each other. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 14, Stanzas 64 to 74).

(6) Fought with Kṣatravarman. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 25, Stanzas 10 to 12).

(7) Arjuna vowed that he would kill Jayadratha, who tried to flee from the battle-field when he came to know of this. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 74, Stanzas 4 to 12).

(8) He began to combat with Arjuna. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 145).

7) The death of Jayadratha. When a fierce fight began between Arjuna and Jayadratha, Śrī Kṛṣṇa came to Arjuna and said, “Arjuna, there was an ethereal voice at the birth of Jayadratha. The head of the person who puts down the head of Jayadratha on the earth, would be broken into a hundred pieces. So send an arrow in such a way that his head falls on the lap of his father.” Hearing this, Arjuna sent an arrow which cut off the head of Jayadratha and the head fell in the lap of Jayadratha’s father who had been sitting in deep penance and meditation in Samantapaṇḍaka. Instantly the father awoke from the meditation and stood up and the head of his beloved son, with ear-rings on both ears fell on the earth and the head of the father was broken into a hundred pieces and he died. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 146, Stanzas 104 to 130).

8) The names of Jayadratha. Saindhavaka, Saindhava, Sauvīra, Sauvīraja, Sauvīraṣṭra, Sūvīra, Sauvīraṣṭrapa, Vardhaksatri and such other names are used as synonyms of Jayadratha in the Mahābhārata.

JAYADRATHA II. In Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 36 we see another Jayadratha who sits in the durbar of yama (the death-god) and meditates upon him.

JAYADRATHAVADHĀPARVA. A sub section of Droṇa Parva in Mahā Bhārata. This consists of Chapters 85 to 152 of Droṇa Parva.

JAYADRATHAVIMOśakaṇa Parva. A sub section of the Vana Parva, in Mahābhārata. Chapter 272 is in this section.

JAYĀNIKA I. A grandson of Drupada. Mention is made in the Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156 Stanza 18, that this Jayānīka was killed by Āśvatthāmā. JAYĀNIKA II. A brother of the King of Virāṭa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Stanza 42).

JAYANTA I. Son of Indra.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viśu in the following order: Brahmā — Marici — Kaśyapa—Indra—Jayanta. Jayanta was the son born to Indra by his wife Śacidevi. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 112, Stanzas 3 and 4).

2) Jayanta lost one eye. During his forest life, Śrī Rāma lived with Śitā and Laksmaṇa on the mountain Citra-kāṭa for some days. Once Śrī Rāma, being very tired of walking in the forest fell asleep with his head in the lap of Śitā. Taking this chance Jayanta came in the shape of a crow and scratched the breast of Śitā with his claws. Śitā cried and Śrī Rāma woke up and saw Jayanta in the shape of a crow. Rāma got angry and shot the Brahmāstra (a divine arrow) against Jayanta. Fear of life made him fly throughout the whole of the three worlds. Even Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara were unable to protect him. All the while the divine arrow followed him. Finally having no go he came and fell at the feet of Śrī Rāma. Śrī Rāma said that the Brahmāstra could never become futile and so the arrow must hit his right eye. Accordingly the arrow struck at his right eye and thus Jayanta lost his right eye. In Adhyātma Rāmāyaṇa this story is stated with some slight changes. According to Adhyātma Rāmāyaṇa, this incident took place when Śitā had been drying raw flesh. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa, Sarga 38).

3) Jayanta hidden in the ocean. After getting the boons Rāvana became arrogant and with a big army went to the realm of the gods. Rāvana engaged Indra in a fierce battle. In that fight Megahanāḍa the son of Rāvana attacked Jayanta, who swooned and fell down. Immediately Pulomā, the father of Śacidevi, gathered Jayanta in his hands unseen by anybody and hid him in the sea. After the disappearance of Jayanta the battle entered the second stage. Thinking that his son Jayanta had been killed, Indra began to fight with Rāvana with more vigour than before. In the battle which followed Megahanāḍa subdued Indra and made him a captive. Taking Indra and the celestial maids as captives, Rāvana and his men went to Laṅkā. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

4) Jayanta became Bamboo. Once Agastya came to Indra’s durbar. Indra arranged for the dance of Urvāsi in honour of Agastya’s visit. In the midst of the dance Urvāsi saw Jayanta before her and she fell in love with him. Consequently her steps went out of beat. Nārada who was playing his lute called Mahāti went wrong. Agastya got angry and cursed Jayanta and changed him to a bamboo. Urvāsi was cursed to become a woman with the name Mādhavi. Agastya cursed Nārada that his lute Mahāti would become the lute of the people of the world. (Vāyu Purāṇa).

5) Other information.

(1) In the stealing of the Pārijātapaṇḍa (the flower of a paradise tree) Jayanta fought with Pradyumna the son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and was defeated. (Viśu Parva Chapter 73).

(2) Jayanta was defeated by Śūrupadma, an Asura, in a battle. (Skanda Purāṇa, Asura Kāṇḍa).

JAYANTA II. During the time of his life incognito in Virāṭa the name assumed by Bhīmasena was Jayanta. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

JAYANTA III. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 171, Stanza 11, mention is made about one Jayanta of Pañcāla.

JAYANTA IV. One of the eleven Rudras. (M.B. Śaṃti Parva, Chapter 208, Stanza 20).

JAYANTA V. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 98).

JAYANTA VI. One of the twelve Adityas. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 150, Stanza 15).
JAYANTA VII. One of the ministers of Daśaratha. The three ministers of Daśaratha were Jayanta, Dhrṣṭi, Vijaya, Asiddhārtha, Arthasādhaka, Aśoka, Mantramalaka and Sumantra. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Rāla Kāṇḍa, Sarga 7).

JAYANTI I. A holy place on the bank of the river Sarasvatī. There is a tīrtha (bath) here known as Somatīrtha. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 19 that those who bathe in this tīrtha would obtain the fruits of the sacrifice of Rājasūya. (Imperial consecration).

JAYANTI II. Daughter of Indra and sister of Jayanta. In Bhāgavata, Skandha 4, there is a story stating how Jayanti was the wife of Śukra for ten years. Śukrācārya was the teacher-priest of the Asuras (demons). Once the devas (gods) had completely defeated the Asuras. With the intention of procuring new powers from Śrī Paramesvara, Śukrācārya went to Kailāsa. When the penance of Śukra became more and more severe the gods and Indra began to be flurried. Indra told his daughter Jayanti to become the servant of Śukra and to break his penance somehow or other. Jayanti did not like this procedure of her father. Still she did not like to disobey her father. So she went to Kailāsa and became the attendant of Śukra and stayed with him. She served him dutifully and with chastity. She would fan him with plantain leaf. She would prepare cold and fragrant water for him to drink. When the Sun became hotter she would hold her upper garment as an umbrella so that he should be in the shade. She would gather fully ripened good fruits for him to eat. She would gather good variety of darbha grass, cut them into the length of a span and with good flowers she would give them to the hermit for his morning obligations. She would gather soft sprouts and make bed for him and would stand near him fanning till he slept. She would get water ready for him to rinse his mouth when he woke up. Thus she did the work of a dutiful disciple. She did not, in any way by speech or action, try to entice him so that his vow of penance might be broken. She spoke only words which would be pleasing and helpful to him. This continued for thousand years and then Paramāśīva appeared before him and gave the boons he requested for. After that Śukrācārya talked with her. In accordance with her request the hermit Śukra allowed her to live with him for ten years as his wife. He gave her a boon that during that period of ten years they both would be invisible to the world. Thus Śukrācārya married Jayanti and they lived in the house very happily for ten years.

JAYANTI III. The queen of the King Rśabha who was born in the dynasty of King Agnidhra. Hundred children were born to Rśabha of Jayanti (See under Rśabha II).

JAYAPRIYA. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salva Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 12).

JAYARĀTA. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Bhīmasena killed this warrior, who was a prince of Kaliṅga, in the battle of Bhārata. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 155, Stanza 28).

JAYARATHA. A Sanskrit poet who lived in Kāśmīra in the 12th century. He was a Saivite. His important work is Haracaritacintāmaṇi. (History of classical Sanskrit literature).

JAYĀSARMAN. A Brāhmaṇa who became wealthy by taking the vow of Kamalā (Kamalāvarta). Kamalā is the eleventh day of 'Adhimāsa'. It is believed that this day is better than other days. If a man fasts on that day Goddess Kamalā will be pleased with him.

The devotee should awake in the Brāhma muhūrta (forty-eight minutes before sunrise) and take bath thinking of Puruṣottama and begin the fast. If the prayer and meditation is conducted at the house he will get double the fruits. If it is at a river it will yield four times the fruits. If it is at a cow-shed the fruits will be thousandfold and if it is conducted at a freshened or Śaivite temple, at a holy bath or in the presence of God the fruits will be a thousand and one hundredfold and if it is near a tulasī (holy basil) the fruits will be a lakṣhṇfold and if it is done in the presence of Viṣṇu the fruits obtained will be unlimited.

This Jayāsārman who took the fast was the son of a noble Brāhmaṇa named Sivaśarman of Avanti. He was the youngest of five sons. He became a wicked man. So he was avoided by his relatives. Being driven away from home, he went to a distant forest and lived there. Once, by luck, he happened to reach the holy place of Triveṇi Mahātīrthā. He was very tired of hunger and thirst. So he bathed in the tīrtha and searched for some hermitage. By chance he saw the hermitage of Harimitra. As it was the month of Puruṣottama many people had gathered there. Brāhmaṇas were telling stories of mitigation of sins. He heard the story of the vow called Kamalāvarta and its fruits. So Jayāsārman stayed in that hermitage with them and took the vow of Kamalāvarta. That night Devī appeared before him and said: "I have come from Vaikunṭha, because I am greatly pleasing with you. Since you have taken the vow of Kamalāvarta on the eleventh day of the dark lunar fortnight called Kamalā of the month of Puruṣottama I will grant you boons. Because you have taken the vow at Triveṇi, I am immensely pleased with you. The noble Brāhmaṇas of your future generations also will be blessed by me". Saying these words the Devī gave him boons and disappeared. From that day onwards Jayāsārman became a great wealthy man and he returned to his father's house (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 64).

JAYASENA I. Father of the famous Caṇḍamahāśena. (See under Caṇḍamahāśena).

JAYASENA II. A prince of Magadha. He was a member of the council of Yuddhiṣṭhīra. (M.B. Śabha Parva Chapter 4, Stanza 26).

JAYASENA III. A King of Avanti. To this King was born a son named Vindānuvinda and a daughter named Mitrāvindā by his chief wife Rājādhīve. Mitrāvindā was married by Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

JAYĀSAVA I. A son of King Drupada. It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156, Stanza 181 that Jayāśva was killed by Āśvatthāmā in the battle of Bhārata.

JAYĀSAVA II. A brother of the King of Virāṭa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Stanza 142).

JAYATSENA I. A King of the kingdom of Magadha. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67 that this King, who was the son of Jarāsandha, belonged to the family of Kālakaṇya. This King was a friend of the Pāṇḍavas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 8, that Jayatsena was present at the svayamvara (marriage) of Draupadi. Towards the end of the battle of Bhārata, the Pândavas sent a letter of invitation to this King and accordingly he came to the help of the Pândavas with an aśau-līṇi of army (21870 Chariots, 21870 elephants, 65610 horses and 109350 infantry). (M.B. Udyaṇa Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 8).

JAYATSEN A. A King of the Pāru dynasty. His father was Sāravhaun France and his mother was the princess Sunandā of Kekeya. Jayatsena married Śravas, the princess of Vidaubla. A son named Arvācina was born to them. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 35).

JAYATSEA III. The name assumed by Nakula in his life incognito. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

JAYATSEA IV. A King who took the side of the Kauravas. He was son of Jārāsandha. This King came with an aśau-līṇi of army and helped the Kauravas in the battle of Bhārata. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 16, Stanza 10). It is mentioned in Karṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 30 that this King was killed by Abhimanyu.

JAYATSEN A. A son of Dhrstarāśtra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 69, that this Jayatsena was defeated by Satānika and in Śalya Parva, Chapter 26 that he was killed by Bhīmsena.

JAYATSENA. An attendant of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 12).

JAYAVIJAYAS. See under Jaya XI.

JHA. This syllable means ‘famous’ (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

JHAJHA. The father of Sunda an Asura who was the father of Mārica, whose mother was Tāthākā. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Sarga 25).

JHILLI. A Yādava of the house of Vṛṣṇi. He was one of the seven chief ministers of Śrī Kṛṣṇa in Dvārakā. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 14, Dākṣinātaya pātha).

JHILLI I. (Jhīllipīnḍāraka). A warrior of the Vṛṣṇis. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 20, that this warrior was present at the svayamvara (marriage) of Draupadi. It is also seen that this Yādava carried the dowry of Subhadrā to Khaṇḍavaprabha from Dvārakā. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 120, Stanza 32). This warrior took part in the Bhārata battle. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 28 that this warrior played a laudable part in the battle of Kurukṣetra.

JHILLI II. (Jhīllipīnḍāraka) (Jhilika). A worm. This worm has another name Jhūkku. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 1).

JHILLIKAM (M). An ancient town in South India. Mention is made about this town in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 59.

JHĪNKU. See under Jhilli II.

JHVĀ. A servant woman who stole ornaments from the palace. For the detailed story of how she was caught with stolen goods see under Harīsvarman.

JIMŪTA I. A King born of the family of Yayāti. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

JIMŪTA. II. A wrestler (Pahalvān). While the Pāṇḍavas were living incognito in the city of Virāṭa, once Brahmotsava (Brahmā festival) was celebrated all over the country. Wrestling was an important item of the Brahmā festival. Jimūta was the most famous of the wrestlers who took part in the festival. He struck several wrestlers down. At last King Virāṭa asked Bhīma to wrestle with Jimūta. Bhīmasena accepted the invitation. In the wrestling Jimūta was killed. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 16).

JIMŪTA III. A hermit. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Udyaṇa Parva, Chapter 111, Stanza 23 that this hermit got a treasure of gold called Jaimūta from the Himālayas.

JIMŪTA IV. The horse of the King Vasumanas. See under Vasumanas.

JIMŪTAKETU I. A synonym of Śiva. There is a story about how Śiva got the name Jimūtaketu.

When summer season began Pārvatī told her husband Śiva: “My Lord, Summer has set in. What are we to do without a house to protect us from the hot sun and the strong wind?” Śiva replied. “Dear! It is because I have no house that I walk about in the forest always.”

Because Śiva said so, the loyal wife Satīdevi spent the summer with her husband in the shade of trees. When the summer was over rainy season began. People stopped walking about. The sky became black with clouds. The roaring sound of thunder was heard everywhere. Seeing that the rainy season had begun Pārvatī again requested her husband to erect a house. Hearing her request Śiva replied. “I have no wealth at all to build a house. You see that I am wearing the hide of a leop- ard. The serpent Seṣa is my Brahma-string. Padma and PŪgala are my ear-rings. One of my bracelets for the upper arm is Kambala and the other one is the nāga (serpent) Dhanadhiyāja. My bracelet on the right hand is Āsvatara and on the left hand is Taksaka. The string that I wear round my waist is Nila, as black as antimony. So let us go up the clouds and spend the rainy season there. Then rain will not fall on your body.”

Saying thus, Śiva got into a lofty cloud with Pārvatī and sat there. That cloud looked like the flag of Śiva, Thenceforward Śiva came to be known by the name Jimūtaketu. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter).

JIMŪTAKETU II. See under Jimūtavāhana.

JIMŪTAVĀHANA. A Vidyādhara. ( demi-god). He was the son of Jimūtaketu, who was the ruler of a city named Kāśīcanapura in a valley of the Himālayas. Being childless he had been sad for a long time. At last he approached the divine tree Kalpaka (a heavenly tree that yields every wish) that stood in his garden and requested it to bless him with a child. Thus a son was born to him. The famous Jimūtavāhana was that son. When Jimūtavāhana came to know of the divine powers of the Kalpaka tree, from the ministers, with the permission of his father he went to the Kalpaka tree, bowed before it and said to it, “Oh noble tree! You have granted all the wishes of my forefathers. But I have one wish. No body should be miserable in the world. So I wish to give you to the world with that purpose in view". Instantly an ethereal voice said from the tree. "If you are forsaking me I am going away. But I will fulfil your wish." Thus according to the wish of Jīmutāvāhana the Kalpaka tree yielded all the wishes in the world and then went to heaven and disappeared. The earth became wealthy and prosperous. The fame of Jīmutāvāhana spread throughout the three worlds, and all the Vidyādhāras grew jealous of him. As the heavenly tree Kalpaka, which yielded all the wishes, had returned to heaven, they thought it the most propitious time and arrayed their army against Jīmutāvāhana. His father Jīmutaketu had completed all preparations to meet the enemy. But Jīmutāvāhana approached his father and said, "Father! I am perfectly sure that no body could defeat you in battle. But see how mean it is to destroy so many lives and win the country merely for the pleasures of this fragile body. So let us go away from here. Leave the kingdom to them."

Jīmutaketu, who was pleased at this generous nature of his son, respected his wish and went with his family to the Malaya mountain and lived there. Mitrāvasu, the son of Viśvāvasu, the King of the Siddhas and Jīmutāvāhana became close friends. One day Jīmutāvāhana was wandering about in the forest when he saw in the middle of a garden a temple dedicated to Devī and a young woman of exquisite beauty, surrounded by her maids, singing hymns and worshipping Devī. Jīmutāvāhana was attracted by her extra-ordinary beauty. Love budded in her heart also. On enquiry it was understood that she was Malayavatī, the sister of Mitrāvasu. After that both of them engaged in a little talk of love-making. Hearing her mother calling, Malayavatī instantly went home. Being fallen head-long in love, Jīmutāvāhana spent the night somehow or other and at dawn reached the temple with a hermit boy. While the hermit boy was consoling Jīmutāvāhana Malayavatī also came there. Jīmutāvāhana and his friend hid behind a tree. She was alone, and since she could not bear separation from her lover she decided to commit suicide and standing at the steps, she said "Devī! If it is impossible to get that Jīmutāvāhana as my husband in this birth, let it be so. But bless me that I may have my wish granted in the next birth at least!" Saying this she tied one end of her upper garment on the tree and tried to commit suicide. Instantly there was an ethereal voice which said, "Daughter, don't do such rash things. Jīmutāvāhana will become your husband. He will become the emperor of the Vidyādhāras also." Jīmutāvāhana came and untied the knot of the upper garment with his own hands and saved her from death. Her maid appeared and said with delight. "Friend! you are very lucky. Today I heard what prince Mitrāvasu said to his father Viśvāvasu. Thus he said 'Father! Jīmutāvāhana who gave away his own Kalpaka tree for the welfare of others has come to this place. It will bring prosperity to us, if we show our hospitality to this noble guest by giving our Malayavatī to him. It is very difficult to get such a noble man for my sister anywhere else.' The father consented. The prince instantly went to the abode of this gentleman. I think the marriage will take place today. So come, let us go home." With his heart overflowing with joy, Jīmutāvāhana went to his house. Mitrāvasu was there. He revealed the purpose of his coming. Jīmutāvāhana, who had the remembrance of his previous births told Mitrāvasu that in the previous birth also they had been friends and that Malayavatī had been his wife. Thus their marriage took place. Delightful songs of the married life passed one by one. One day Jīmutāvāhana and Mitrāvasu went for a walk. They reached a forest on the seashore. Seeing some bones there Jīmutāvāhana asked Mitrāvasu about them. Mitrāvasu said: "In ancient days Kadrī, the mother of Nāgas (serpents) made Vānītā, the mother of Garuḍa, her slave by some trick. Garuḍa liberated his mother from slavery. But the hatred increased day by day and Garuḍa began to eat serpents, the children of Kadrī. Seeing this, Vāsuki the King of Nāgas entered into a contract with Garuḍa, so as to prevent the nāgas from being destroyed altogether. The arrangement was that Vāsuki would send a serpent everyday to Garuḍa. Garuḍa ate all those serpents sent by Vāsuki in this place. These are the bones of those poor snakes."

When Jīmutāvāhana heard this story his heart was filled with pity. He decided to save the life of at least one serpent by giving his body instead. But the presence of Mitrāvasu was an obstacle to carry out his wish. At that particular moment a minister of Viśvāvasu appeared there and took away Mitrāvasu saying that he was wanted by his father. Left alone, Jīmutāvāhana stood there when he saw a young man coming with an old woman who was crying bitterly. On enquiry Jīmutāvāhana learned that in accordance with the agreement with Garuḍa, the old woman was bringing her only son Sānkhacudā to give him as food to Garuḍa. Jīmutāvāhana told them that he would take the place of Sānkhacudā that day. The mother and the son reluctantly agreed to his desire. The old woman went away crying and Sānkhacudā went to the temple.

Hearing the sound of Garuḍa's wings Jīmutāvāhana laid himself on a stone and Garuḍa taking him in his beaks flew to the top of the Malaya mountain. On the way the jewel of Jīmutāvāhana known as 'Cūdāratna', which was soaked in blood fell down, in front of Malayavatī. Knowing that it was the jewel of her husband, with a terrible cry she ran to her father. Because of his knowledge of arts and sciences, Jīmutaketu also knew everything and with his wife and daughter he went to the top of the Malaya mountain.

In the meanwhile, Sānkhacudā, having done obeisance to 'Gokarpanātha' (God), came back to the stone where he had left Jīmutāvāhana and seeing a pool of fresh blood, became sad and silent. Then determining that he would save Jīmutāvāhana at any cost, he went up the mountain following the track of the blood drops.

Garuḍa took Jīmutāvāhana to the peak of the mountain and began to peck at him. Jīmutāvāhana grew more and more delightful as the pecking became harder. Garuḍa looked at him with wonder and thought, "Surely, this is not a nāga. It must be a Gandharva or somebody else." Not knowing what to do he sat looking at his prey, who invited him to finish off his meal. By this time Sānkhacudā had reached the spot. Soon Jīmutaketu with his wife and Malayavatī also arrived.
They all cried aloud. Garuḍa was in great confusion. When he knew that he was about to eat the famous Jīmūṭavāhana, who had given away even the Kalpaka tree for the good of others, Garuḍa was filled with remorse. Instantly Jīmūṭavāhana died. The parents and Śaṅkhacūḍa cried beating their breasts. Mahālāvatī fell on the ground and cried. Then looking up she called out with tears. ‘Ha! Devī! Jagadambikā! You have told me that my husband would become the emperor of the Vidyādhāras. Has your boon become futile because of my misfortune?’ Devī appeared and said ‘Daughter! My words will not become futile.’ Then Devī sprinkled Amṛta (ambrosia) on Jīmūṭavāhana and brought him to life. He sprang up more radiant than before, and was anointed as emperor of the Vidyādhāras by Devī. When Devī disappeared Garuḍa who was much pleased, told Jīmūṭavāhana to ask for any boon.

Jīmūṭavāhana requested for the boon that Garuḍa should stop eating the Nāgas and that all the serpents who had been reduced to bones should be brought to life again. Garuḍa granted him that boon. All the serpents which had been killed by Garuḍa came to life again. All the gods and hermits came there with joy. After all had gone, Jīmūṭavāhana went with his relatives to the Himalayas as the emperor of Vidyādhāras.¹ (Kathaśaritsagara, Saṅkīkavatī Lambaka, Tāranga 23).

Jīrṇoddhāra. Erection and consecration of images fixed in temples which have fallen into dilapidation, is called Jīrṇoddhāra. Mention is made in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 67, about the principles of Jīrṇoddhāra, as follows:

The priest should adorn the image with ornaments and perform ‘Stāvana’. If the idol is very badly ruined by age it must be abandoned. Broken image and that with any part of the body severed or disfigured should also be abandoned, even if it is made of stone or any other material. When the image is renovated the priest should make burnt offerings thousand times with Narasimhamantra (spell or incantation). If the ruined image is made of wood it should be burned. If it is made of stone it should be placed at the bottom of deep water, either in the sea or anywhere else. If it is made of metals or jewels, it must be put into water. The ruined image should be placed in a carriage and covered with a cloth. With instrumental music and so forth the image should be taken to water in a procession and then submerged in water. After this the priest must be given a gift. Only after this should the new image be erected and consecrated. On a good day in an auspicious moment a new image of the same material and measurement as of the old image should be erected and consecrated by the priest.

Jītāri. Son of Avikṣit born of the family of Pūru. Avikṣit was the son of King Kuru. Mention is made about Jītāri in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva Chapter 94, Stanza 53.

Jītātmā. A Vīvadeva (A class of gods) concerned with Śrāddha (offerings to the Manes). (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Stanza 31).

Jītavatī. A daughter of King Uṣāmara. She was the most beautiful woman in the world. She was the friend of the wife of a Vāsū named Dyau. It was because of the words of this Jītavatī that the Aṣṭavasus (the eight Vasus) stole the cow Nandini of Vāsiṣṭha, and by the curse of Vāsiṣṭha had to take birth in the womb of women on earth. (See under Gaṅgā, Para 7).

Jīṣṇu I. A name of Arjuna. (See under Arjuna).

Jīṣṇu II. A synonym of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. As Śrī Kṛṣṇa had won all the battles he fought, he got the name Jīṣṇu. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 13).

Jīṣṇu III. A warrior who fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas against the Kauravas. This warrior who was a native of Cedi, was killed by Karna (M.B. Karna Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 48).

Jīṣṇukarman. A warrior who stood on the side of the Pāṇḍavas and fought against the Kauravas. He was a native of the country of Cedi. (M.B. Karna Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 48).

Jīvaṇivāka. A King of birds. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 6, about this bird.

Jīvala. A charioteer of R̐tuparṇa, the King of Ayodh- yā. Nala who had been living there under the name Bāhuka had accepted Jīvala as his friend. (See under Nala).

Jīvatman (The individual life or soul). The Apara- brahman (which is next to the highest Brahman) that is so minute and subtle is called Jīvatman. Parabrahman is God almighty. It is mentioned in Taittirīyopanisad about this aparabrahman as follows:

‘Tasmād va etasmādātmana ākāśaṃ sambhūtah, ākāśaṃ vāyuḥ vāyorgnīḥ, agnerūpāḥ abhyāḥ prthvī prthivyāḥ oṣadhiyāḥ oṣadhihīyāḥ annam annam prakṛtāḥ sa’vā ca prāṇo annamayāḥ.’

‘From this Atman came into existence ether possessing the quality of sound. From ether air, possessing the qualities of sound and touch, came into existence. Fire with the qualities of sound, touch and colour came into being from air. From fire, water having the qualities of sound touch, colour and taste came into being. From water earth with the qualities of sound, touch, colour, taste and smell came into existence. Vegetation grew from earth, and from vegetation food, from food semen, and from semen Puruṣa came into existence. The materialized form of aparabrahman is the body. Its subtle form is the soul. Jīvatma or the individual soul is the subtle form of soul dwelling in the materialized form of the aparabrahman. This soul sits in the miniature lotus of heart in the miniature ether. The body which is made of the five elements is the dwelling place of this Jīvatma. The individual life exists in every living being. The body originated from food is the outer covering of the Jīvatma. This materialized body is also called Annamayakośa (the cask of food). Inside this annamayakośa there is the Prāṇamayakośa (the chest of the life breaths). It is stated in the Taittirīyopanisad that this Prāṇamayakośa is separate from and existing inside the annamayakośa. The Prāṇamayakośa which exists inside the annamayakośa has the shape of man. The life breath which appears as the inhaling and exhalation breath is the head of the Prāṇamayakośa. The life breath Vāyuṇa is the right wing and Apāna is the left wing, ether its soul and Prthvī (the earth) its tail.² Inside the Prāṇamayakośa, there exists the Manomayakośa (the chest of mind),

but it fills the entire interior of the Prāṇamayakośa. The Vijñānamayakośa (the chest of knowledge or understanding) exists inside the Manomayakośa. The Jivātmā or the individual life dwells inside this Vijñānamayakośa and pervades the entire body. It is by the activity of Vijñānamayakośa that the Jivātmā feels its individuality. Inside the Vijñānamayakośa there exists a fifth kośa (chest) called the Ānandamayakośa, which is the immediate covering of Jivātmā, and which has no sense of individuality. The three Kośas, Ānandakośa, Vijñāna-kośa and Prāṇamayakośa together is called Sugāmaśārīra (the subtle body). It must be remembered that Sūkṣmaśārīra is different from Susūkṣmaśārīra (the minute subtle body).

Heart is the abode of the Jivātmā. Hṛdi (in heart) ayam (this being—Jivātmā exists). So the name ‘Hṛdaya’ (heart) is meaningful.1 The Puruṣa (male being), which sits inside the heart or the Jivātmā is as big as the toe according to the Kathopanishad.

The Jivātmā or the Aparabrahman is without beginning. Even from the past which is beyond our thinking and cores of Jīvātmans had got into individuals and when the Annamaya Kośas of the individuals decayed due to death, they abandoned them and entered into new individuals. The author of the Bhādarānyaka gives an explanation to the question why this Jivātmā which is as free as air enters the body of man, beast, bird, tree, rock etc. and subjects itself to misery and hardship. “Where does the Jivātmā originate from? how does it enter this body?” Jivātmā originates from Paramātmā (the soul of the universe). As the shadow pervades the body of a man this Jivātmā overshadows this body.” Śrī Saṅkaraśārya expounds it in another way; he says that the Jivātmā is tied to the body by the imagination or desires of the mind.

Jñānapāvanatīrtha. An ancient holy bath. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 3 that those who visit this holy place will attain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Agniśoma.

Jrmbhādevi. Sec under Koṭṭuvā (Gape).

JrmbhiKA. Yawning or gaping. For the Purānic story of how gape came into existence in the world, see under Koṭṭuvā (Gape).

Juhu. A King of the family of Yāyati. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

Jvalā I. A daughter of Tākṣaka. The King Rṣa married her. Matināra was the son born to the couple. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 95. Stanza 25).

Jvalā II. The wife of Nīlahvaja. There is a story about this Jvalā in the “Jaimini Aśvamedha Parva”, Chapter 15, as follows:

The Pāṇḍavas began the sacrifice of Aśvamedha. Arjuna led the sacrificial horse. He continued his victorious march defeating all Kings and reached the city of Nīlahvaja. Nīlahvaja was not prepared for a fight. Seeing this his wife Jvalā tried various ways to push her husband to war. Seeing them to be futile she approached her brother Unmūka and asked him to fight with Arjuna. He also was not prepared to fight with Arjuna. Jvalā became very angry and walked to the bank of the Ganges. When the Ganges-water touched her feet she stopped and said, “Dear me! I am become sinful by the touch of Ganges-water.” The amazed Gaṅgā took the form of Sūmaṅgalādevī and stood before Jvalā and asked her the reason for saying so. Jvalā said “Gaṅgādevī submerged her seven sons and killed them. After that she took the eighth son from Santanu. That son too was killed by Arjuna in the Bhārata-battle. Thus Gaṅgā is childless and sinful.” Hearing this Gaṅgā Devi cursed Arjuna “Let his head be cut off in six months’ time.” Jvalā was satisfied. (For the result of the curse see under Arjuna, Para 28).

Jvalājīhva I. One of the two attendants given to Subrahmanyam by Agniceva. (Fire god). Jyoti was the other attendant. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 33).

Jvalājīhva II. A warrior of Subrahmanyam. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 61).

Jvālesvara. See under Tripūra.

Jvāra. (Jvaram) (Fever).

1) General information. A fearful being. It is stated in the Purāṇas that living beings catch fever owing to the activities of this monster.

2) The origin of jvāra. Once Śiva and Pārvati were talking with each other in the Holy Bath called Jyotiś-kam on mount Mahāmeru. On that day Daksā had performed a sacrifice at Gaṅgādārā, Śiva alone was not invited. Seeing the Gods Brahmā and the others going to that place through the sky, Pārvati asked Śiva what the matter was. Śiva explained everything to Pārvati, who became very sorry because her husband had not been invited. Śiva grew uneasy at the sorrow of his wife. A drop of sweat fell down from his third eye. A fearful monster with the lustre of fire arose from that drop of sweat. That figure is described as follows:

“With three legs, three heads, six hands and nine eyes, comes Jvāra the terrible monster, as fierce as Yama the god of death and fearful like a thousand clouds with thunderbolt, gaping and sighing, with tight body and horrible face, rendered so by many eyes.” (M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 122).

To this uncouth figure Śiva gave the name Jvāra, who dashed away and entered into all devas (gods). Brahmā and the others caught fever and were laid up. At last they all came to Śiva. Hearing their request Śiva divided Jvāra into several parts and separated them from devas and entered them into other living beings, and ordered that, headache for elephants, green coverings for water, shedding of skin for snakes, hoof-rot for cows, sore-throat for horses, feather-sprouting for peacocks, sore-eye for cuckoo, hiccup for parrot, weariness for tigers and fever for men will be caused by Jvāra.

It was the time of the terrorization of Vṛtrāsura. Jvāra caught hold of that Asura also. It was at this time that Indra used his thunderbolt and killed Vṛtrāsura. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 283 ; M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 122).

1 Ayaḥ puruṣah bhāḥ satyaḥ tasmin antarhrdaye yathā vrthir vā, yavo vā, sa eṣa sarvasyaśāh sasrayādhipatiḥ. (Bhādarānyaka)
JYÂMAGHA. A King born in the dynasty of Ikṣvâku. (Harivansha, Chapter 36).
Five sons, who were equal to gods, named Sahasrasrada, Payoda, Kṛṣṭa, Nila and Ajika were born to Yadu of the family of Ikṣvâku. Several noble persons were born in the family of Kṛṣṭa. A noble and broad-minded son named Vṛjinivān was born to Kṛṣṭa. Śvāhi was born to Vṛjinivān, Ruṣeku to Śvāhi, Cītarathra to Ruṣeku and Saśābindu to Cītarathra. Thousands sons were born to Saśābindu who was an emperor. Important among those thousand who were blessed with radiance, fame, wealth and beauty, were Prthuśravas, Prthuṣayas, Prthutejas, Prthuḥbhava, Prthukṛti and Prthumati. Uṣanas was the son of Prthuśravas. Śincu was the son of Uṣanas and Rukmakavaca the son of Śincu. Rukmakavaca killed all the archers and conquered the countries and performing aśvamedha (horse sacrifice) gave away all the countries he conquered, as gift to Brāhmaṇas. Five sons were born to Rukmakavaca. Jyâmagha was one of them. His brothers were Rukmeṣu, Prthurukma, Parigha and Hari. Of them Parigha and Hari were made Kings of foreign countries. Rukmeṣu was given the country ruled by his father. Prthurukma served Rukmeṣu. They drove Jyâmagha away from the country.
Jyâmagha went to the forest and erected a hermitage for him. Then according to the advice of a Brahmin, he who was an old man took bow and arrow and got into a chariot flying a flag and went to the bank of the river Narmadā. He had neither wealth nor attendants. He stayed on the mountain Ikṣavâṇ eating fruits and roots. His wife Saibyā also had become old. They had no children. Still Jyâmagha did not marry anybody else. Once Jyâmagha came out victorious in a fight in which he got a girl. Jyâmagha took the girl to his wife and told her, “This girl shall be the wife of your son.” She asked him how that could be when she had no son. He said, “She will be the wife of the son who is going to be born to you.” As a result of severe penance a son named Vidarbha was born to Saibyā. The damsel who became the wife of Vidarbha gave birth to two sons named Kratha and Kaiśika. (Padma Purâṇa, Chapter 13).

JYEŚṬHÂ I. A deity of inauspicious things. In Kamba Râmâyâna, Yuddha Kânda, it is observed that Jyeṣṭhâ was a goddess obtained by churning the Sea of Milk. As soon as she came up from the sea of Milk, the Trimûrti (Viṣṇu, Brahmâ and Śiva) found her and sent her away ordering her to sit in inauspicious places. The Goddess Jyeṣṭhâ came out of the Milk-Sea before the goddess Lakṣmî. So this deity is considered the elder sister of Lakṣmî. As she is the elder she is also called Mûdhâvī (Mûdevi). The mode of worshipping this goddess is given in Boddhâyana Sūtra. Tondiraṭipoti-âlvâr, who was a Vaïṣṇava Ālvâr, who lived in 7th century A.D. said that it was useless to worship this Goddess. Ancient images of this Goddess have been found. But worship of Jyeṣṭhâ was completely discontinued after the 10th century.
In Saiva Purâṇas it is mentioned that this Goddess is one of the eight portions of Parâśakti. It was believed that the powers of this Goddess regulated human lives in various ways.

JYEŚṬHÂ II. A star. It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Anuśâsana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 24 that if Brâh-
The astronomers have divided the sky that surrounds the earth into twelve parts called rāsis (zodiacs). All the stars of the first zodiac appear in the shape of a goat (Meṣa) so that zodiac was called Meṣa. Thus the zodiac in which the stars took the shape of an ox was called Ṛṣabha (ox). In the zodiac Mithuna the stars took the shape of a young couple. Karkaṭaka means crab. In that zodiac the stars appear in the shape of a crab. In the same way Sinha means lion and Kanyā means a damsel. Tulā means balance and Vṛścikā means scorpion; Dhanus means bow and Makara means Makara matsya (horned shark). Kumbha is a water pot and Mina means fish. The name of the zodiac is according to the sign of the zodiac. That is, in what shape the stars in that particular zodiac appear to the people of the earth. The figure of the twelve zodiacs with the earth as centre is given below:

In Kerala and some other places the zodiacs are marked to the right in order beginning with Meṣa, whereas it is marked to the left in the same order in some of the other parts of India.

The earth completes one rotation in 60 Nādi (24 minutes) i.e. 24 hours. In each rotation these twelve zodiacs face the earth. For a man standing at a particular point on the earth it will take 60/12 i.e. 5 nādi (two hours) on an average, for a zodiac to pass him. But it may vary in different places according to the difference of the shape of the earth. A month is the time the sun remains in a zodiac. The planet Jupiter takes a year and Saturn two years and a half on an average to pass a zodiac. The calendar shows which are the planets standing in each zodiac and how far they have travelled at a particular time in that particular zodiac. When a particular zodiac is in a particular region of the earth, a man born in that region is said to be born in that zodiac. When a particular place faces the zodiac of Meṣa the child which takes birth in that place is said to be born in the zodiac of Meṣa. The zodiac of birth is given the name Lagna by astronomers. Those who are well-versed in the results of astrology are of opinion that the life, fortune etc. of living beings depend upon the position of the planets in relation to their lagnas.

JYOTISKA. A famous serpent born to Kaśyapa by his wife Kadrū. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 203, Stanza 15).

JYOTISKA(M). A peak of mount Sumeru. (M.B. Śaniti Parva, Chapter 283, Stanza 5).

JYOTISMĀN. An ancient King of Kuśadvipa. This King had seven sons, called Udbhida, Venuṇā, Vairatha, Lambana, Dhiṭi, Prabhākara and Kapila. Each division of that country is given the name of each of these sons. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anīśa 2, Chapter 4).

JYOTISNAKĀLI. The second daughter of Candra. In Mahā Bhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 98, Stanza 13, it is mentioned that this daughter was extremely beautiful and that the Sun married her.

KA. This letter has the following meanings:
(i) Prajāpāti. (Śloka 32, Chapter 1, Adī Parva, M.B.)
(ii) A name of Dakṣa-prajāpāti. (Śloka 7, Chapter 208, Śaniti Parva, M.B.).
(iii) A name of Viṣṇu. (Śloka 91, Chapter 149, Anuśasanā Parva, M.B.)
(iv) Brahmā (Viṣṇu, Maheśvara). (Chapter 348, Agni Purāṇa, M.B.).

KABALABARHISA. A King of Vṛṣṇivānika. (See under VRṢṆIVAMŚA).

KABANDHA.

1. General information. The demon who attacked Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa while they were wandering in Daṇḍakāranya after the abduction of Sītā by Rāvana.
2. Previous history of Kabandha. There was a King of Gandharvas called Śri. He had a son named Danu. Danu was known as Viśvavasu also. Viśvavasu once performed a penance to propitiate Brahmā for long life and Brahmā appeared before him and blessed him with immortality. Arrogant of this acquisition he roamed about as he pleased.

One day he attacked Indra and the latter furious at his impudence used the Vajrāydha on him and the head and thighs of Viśvavasu were squeezed into his body. Viśvavasu pleaded that he should be given some way to take his food. Indra then granted him two very long hands and a mouth on his belly. Then Viśvavasu spent his days in a forest near the Matarigārama in Krauṇcāranya bearing the name Kabandha (Headless trunk). Indra added that he would attain his real form when Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa cut his hands.

A favourite pastime of Kabandha was to frighten the sages. One day he attacked a sage called Stūlaśīras and that sage cursed him saying that he would retain his ugly figure for ever. The demon pleaded for relief and the sage said that he would regain his original figure when Rāma cut his hands and left him in the desolate forest. From that day onwards Kabandha lived there waiting for Śri Rāma. (Sarga 70, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

3. Kabandha meets Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Jāṭāyu was lying half dead by a blow from the sword of Rāvana and Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa went to him and talked to him. He gave them some information regarding Sītā before he died. After burning the body of Jāṭāyu in a funeral pyre Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa went westwards. They entered the Krauṇcāranya and reached Mataṅgāvana. There they saw a great cave. A huge demoness attacked them near that cave and seeing the beautiful form of Lakṣmaṇa she invited him for amorous plays. Lakṣmaṇa cut off her ear, nose and breasts. Then they entered deep into the forests. Bad omens greeted them.
Before long they saw Kabandha rushing towards them. He is described thus in the Mahâbhârata:

"He was as big as a mountain, dark as a black cloud, with pointed hairs all over his body and looked fierce with a voice as loud as thunder. He had an eye on his stomach, round and yellow, emitting a glare like a fire-flame. Looking wicked he thrust his big tongue out of his huge mouth licking the sides."

The demon stretched out his big hands and caught hold of Sri Râma in his right hand and Lakshmana in his left hand. Finding themselves helpless in his hands Lakshmana implorled Râma to flee away from the demon leaving him alone. Sri Râma cut off Kabandha's right hand and Lakshmana cut off the left hand. Kabandha then asked them who they were. Kabandha told Râma and Lakshmana his previous story and then fell dead. Râma and Lakshmana burnt the dead body in a funeral pyre.

He rose up in the air as the Gandharva King of old and advised Sri Râma to go to Sugriva for knowing more about Sitâ. (Sargas 70 to 72, Aranyka Kanda, Vâlmiki Râmâyana).

KACA. The first son of Brhaspati. That extremely beautiful boy was a great favourite of the devas. 1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Visnu—Brahmâ—Angiras—Brhaspati—Kaca. 2) How he studied the secret of Mrtasanjivani. The Devas and Asuras always quarrelled with each other. Devas accepted Brhaspati as their guru and the asuras made Sukrâcarya their guru. Sukrâcarya knew an art which Brhaspati did not know, the secret of Mrtasanjivani. When the devas cut the Asuras to pieces, Sukrâcarya used to bring them back to life by his knowledge of Mrtasanjivani. Mrtasanjivani is the art of reviving the dead. Devas were at a loss to know what to do. They wanted to learn the secret of Mrtasanjivani from Sukrâcarya somehow. It was imperative that they should learn it. Then they found out a way. They sent Kaca, son of Brhaspati, to Sukrâcarya.

Kaca went to Sukrâcarya and told him that he was the son of Brhaspati and had come to him to be his disciple for a period of a thousand years doing service to him. The modesty of the boy appealed to Sukrâcarya and he accepted Kaca as his disciple. Devayâni, daughter of Sukrâcarya, fell in love with Kaca. They were always together as an inseparable couple. Asuras did not like the advent of Kaca to the Aśrama of Sukrâcarya. They knew that he had come to study the secrets of the Asuras. Once Kaca went alone to look after the cows and the Asuras followed him stealthily. When Kaca entered deep into the forest the Asuras killed him and gave him to the wolves.

It became dusk. The cows returned to the Aśrama without the cowherd. Devayâni waited for a long time for Kaca to come. Not seeing him Devayâni went weeping to her father and said, "Oh, father, the sun has set. You have performed your nightly fire sacrifice. The cattle have come back by themselves and still Kaca has not returned home. I fear he is dead or has been killed. I cannot live without him." The affectionate Sukrâcarya could not bear the sight of his dear daughter weeping and so he went to the forest with Devayâni and employing the art of Sanjivani he invoked the dead youth to appear. At once Kaca came back to life and stood before them. All the three then returned to the aśrama happily.

The anger of the Asuras against Kaca knew no bounds. On another occasion the Asuras seized him and after killing him pounded his body into a paste and mixed it up in sea-water. This time also, at the request of Devayâni, Sukrâcarya brought him back to life.

The third time the Asuras burnt the body of Kaca and mixed the ashes in wine and served it to Sukrâcarya to drink. The disciple thus went inside the belly of the guru. Dusk came, the cattle came and still Kaca did not return and Devayâni reported the matter to her father. Sukrâcarya sat for some time in meditation and then he knew that Kaca was in his own stomach. If he got Kaca out, he would burst his stomach and Sukra would die and if he did not get him out his daughter would burst her heart and die. Sukrâcarya was in a fix. He asked Kaca how he got in and he replied that it was through the wine. Sukra imparted to Kaca the art of Mrtasanjivani and Kaca lying within the stomach repeated it. Then Sukrâcarya called Kaca by name and Kaca came out bursting the stomach of his guru. The preceptor lay dead and by employing the art of Mrtasanjivani he had learnt, Kaca brought his guru to life. Sukrâcarya eschewed wine from that day onwards and declared it as a forbidden drink to brahmins. Sukrâcarya said that because Kaca was born from his stomach he must be deemed his son.

3) Kaca was cursed. Kaca remained for some more time under the tutelage of Sukrâcarya and when his education became complete he took leave of his preceptor and also Devayâni. Devayâni followed him for a long distance from the hermitage and requested him to marry her. Kaca replied he could not do so because he had become a brother to Devayâni. Devayâni got angry and cursed him saying that he would not be able to use the art of Mrtasanjivani he had learnt from her father. Kaca cursed her back saying that none of the sons of sages would marry her. Kaca however felt relieved that though he would not be able to practise the art, his disciples would be able to do so. He went back to Devaloka and was heartily welcomed by all the Devas. He then imparted the art of Mrtasanjivani to the devas. (Chapters 76 and 77, Âdi Parva, M.B.).

4) Kaca visits Bhiṣma. Kaca was also one among the several people who visited Bhiṣma while the latter was lying on a bed of arrows awaiting death. (Sloka 9, Chapter 47, Sânti Parva, M.B.).

KACCHAM. An ancient place of habitation. (Sloka 19, Chapter 54, Sâlyâ Parva).

KACCHAPI. Name of the harp of Nârada. (Sloka, 19, Chapter 54, Sâlyâ Parva, M.B.).

KADALÎGARBHĀ. Daughter of the great sage Mañâkaṇaka. There is a story about her in Kathâsarat-sâgara. There was once a city called Iksumati. It was on the banks of the river Iksumati. It was Viśvâmitra who set up that river and city. In a hermitage in the thick forest on the shore of Iksumati lived a sage, Mañâkaṇaka performing penance. One day the beautiful nymph Menakâ, came there from above. As a wind blew, her upper garment was displaced. Seeing her bare body, Mañâkaṇaka had emission. The semen of the sage fell into a Kadali (plantain) tree and from there arose a maiden, extremely beautiful. Because she was born from Kadali she was called Kadaliagarbha. Kadaliagarbha grew up into a beautiful lady and one day a King named Dr̥gavarmā came that way while hunting and seeing Kadaliagarbha he fell in love with her and married her with the permission of Maṅkaṇaka. The Devas advised her to scatter mustard seeds on the way to her husband's house and in case her husband abandoned her she should be guided by the mustard plants to return home. She did so.

One day by the evil advice of a barber the King divorced her and she returned to the Aśrama by following the young mustard plants. But Maṅkaṇaka took her back to the King. (Taranāgī 6, Madanamaṇja-kālamāba, Kathāsarasāgara).

KADALIVANA. This grove is situated on the banks of Kuberapuṣkaṅī which abounded in Saugandhika flowers. There were different kinds of plantain fruits of golden hue in this grove. Hanūmān resided in it. Chapter 146, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KĀDAMBARĪ I. A river flowing westwards in Jambūdvīpa. In Bhagavata 5th Skandha it is said that this river got its name "Kādambara" because it had the hollow trunk of a Kadamba tree as its source.

KĀDAMBARĪ II. An excellent story book in prose written in Sanskrit by the great Sanskrit poet Bānabhata. Kādambarī is the heroine of the story.

KADHMOR. A saintly King. He is worthy of being remembered in the morning. (Chapter 163, Anuṣāsana Parva).

KADRŪ. Wife of Kaśyapa and daughter of Dakṣaprajāpati.

2) Kadrū—Wife or daughter of Kaśyapa? Whether Kadrū was the wife or daughter of Kaśyapa is a question which remains unanswered still in the Purāṇas. Chapter 65 of Bhāṣā Bhārata states like this.

The six spiritual sons of Brahmā are: Marici, Anigres, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kṛatav. Marici got a son named Kaśyapa and he married the thirteen daughters of Dakṣa, namely, Aditi, Diti, Kalā, Danāyus, Danu, Śrīphāla, Krodhā, Pradhrā, Viṣvā, Vinatā, Kapilā, Muni and Kadrū. So according to this, Kadrū was the wife of Kaśyapa.

But the 14th Sarga of Aranyakāṇḍa of Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa states:

Dakṣaprajāpati got sixty illustrious daughters and of these Kaśyapa married—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālikā Tāmrā, Krodhavāsa, Muni and Surasā. Krodhavāsa gave birth to eight daughters. They were: Mrgī, Mrgamandā, Hari, Bhadrmatā, Mātāngī, Sārdrū, Śvetā; Surabhī, Surasā and Kadrū.

Tāmrā another wife of Kaśyapa gave birth to five daughters, namely, Kraunḍī, Bhaṣī, Śyenī, Dhṛtarāṣṭri and Sukī. Kraunḍī gave birth to owls, Bhaṣī to Bhaṣās, Śyenī to eagles and vultures, Dhṛtarāṣṭri to swans and Sukī to Nātā. Nātā gave birth to Vinatā.

Thus, according to the Rāmāyaṇa Kadrū was the daughter of Kaśyapa born of his wife Krodhavāsa. Again Vinatā who is spoken of as the elder sister of Kadrū in Mahābhārata is the daughter of the grand-daughter of Kaśyapa. This means that Kadrū's mother and Vinatā's grand mother's mother were sisters. But both of them looked after Kaśyapa as if they were direct sisters.

3) Kadrū, mother of serpents. Kadrū and Vinatā lived serving Kaśyapa. Kaśyapa was pleased with them and asked them what boon they wanted. Kadrū asked for a thousand serpents to be born of her and Vinatā asked for two sons who would be braver and more brilliant than the sons of Kadrū. Kaśyapa granted them what they asked for and when Kadrū and Vinatā became pregnant he left for the forest.

After some time Kadrū delivered a thousand eggs and Vinatā two eggs. Both of them kept the eggs in warm jars and after five hundred years the thousand eggs of Kadrū burst letting out a thousand serpents. Vinatā became impatient and broke open an egg of hers. Out came from it a half developed being and that was Aruṇa. Aruṇa cursed her for being impatient and said "You let me out half developed because of your over-anxiety and you will, therefore, become a servant of Kadrū. Keep the other egg for another five hundred years. Then a very powerful son will come out of it and that son will relieve you of your servitude to Kadrū". So saying he rose up in the air and became the charioteer of the sun. After five hundred years the other egg of Vinatā broke and Garuḍa came out. (Chapter 16, Ādi Parva, M.B.)

4) Sons of Kadrū. Names of the prominent sons of Kadrū are given below:

All the serpents in the world have been born from these prominent serpents. (Chapter 35, Ādi Parva, M.B.)

5) Kadrū curses her sons. Once Kadrū called Vinatā to her side and asked her the colour of Uccāśravas, the horse of Indra. It was purely a white horse and Vinatā told so. But Kadrū said its tail was black. Each stood firm in her statement and then Kadrū made a bet. She who was defeated in the bet should serve the other as her slave. Vinatā agreed. Kadrū wanted to cheat Vinatā and so asked her sons to remain suspended from the tail of the horse in such an artful way that the tail would look black from a distance. Some of her sons refused to be a party to this deceit and Kadrū cursed them saying that they would all be burnt in the Sarpa-sattara of Janamejaya. Kaśyapa did not like the curse. But Brahmā came there and said that the serpents as a class were injurious to society and as such a curse of that nature was necessary. Brahmā then taught him Viśasanāhāravīdī (Treatment of snake-poisoning). (Chapter 20, Ādi Parva, M.B.).
6) Kadrů and children go to Rāmanyāka. Once Kadrů told Vinatā, “Vinatā, take me to the island of Rāmanyāka in the middle of the ocean. It is a beautiful place to stay. Let your son, Garuḍa, take my sons to that place.” Vinatā took Kadrů and Garuḍa took her children during the journey. Garuḍa rose high up in the air near the sun and the serpents began to feel the heat unbearable and began to get charred. Kadrů then prayed to Indra and the latter then sent a heavy downpour of rains. This saved the serpents from being burnt to death and they reached the island of Rāmanyāka safe. (Chapters 25 and 26, Ādi Parva, M.B.). 7) Other details.

(i) Kadrů lives in the court of Brahmā worshipping him. (Chapter 11, Sahā Parva, M.B.).

(ii) Kadrů taking the form of Skanda—graha in an infinitely minute size enters the wombs of women and eats the embryo. (Chapter 230, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAHODA (KAHOĐANA — KHAGODAKA). A sage the disciple and son-in-law of Uddālaka. He was the father of the sage Āstāvakra.

Uddālaka had another name “Śvetaketu”. He was a sage who had personally seen and talked to the goddess Sarasvati. It was at that time that Kahođaka became his disciple. Kahođaka who was of a gentle nature served his preceptor for a long time and won his favour. He was immensely pleased and after teaching the necessary things gave his daughter Sujātā in marriage to Kahođaka. In due course, Sujātā became pregnant.

One day, the child in the womb cried out that there was a mistake in his father’s recitation of the Vedas. Kahođaka was displeased at this. He cursed the child that he would be born with a body having eight bends (curves). So the boy was named “Āstāvakra” (one who has eight bends). Sujātā who was poor, once sent Kahođaka to King Janaka for some money. Kahođaka who was defeated in a dispute was immersed in water. Āstāvakra rescued his father. (See under Āstāvakra).

KAHOLA. An ancient sage who flourished in Indra’s assembly. (Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 7).

KAIKASI. Mother of Rāvana.

1) Birth. From the wrath of Brahmā the giant Praheti was born and from Brahmā’s hunger the demi-god Heti was born. The son Vidyuteśa was born to Heti, of Bhayā the sister of Kāla (God of death—Time). Vidyuteśa married Sālakaṇṭākā the daughter of Sandhyā. A son named Sukeśa was born to them. Sukeśa married Devavati daughter of Manimayā, a Gandharva. Three sons Mālavān, Sumālī and Mālī were born to them. Three brothers Mālavān, Sumālī and Mālī married Sundari, Ketaumati and Vasūdhā respectively, the three daughters of Narmadā, a Gandharva woman. To Sumālī, by his wife Ketaumati, were born the ten sons, Prahastra, Akampana, Vīkaṭa, Kālaśa, Dhūmkṛṣṇa, Daṇḍa, Śrīśā, Śrīharā, Prākṣvīta and Bhāsakarna and four daughters Vekā (Bhā), Puspotkaṭā, Kaiśasi and Kumbhvaniśa.

2) Marriage. As Sumālī was walking through forests with his wives and daughters, he saw so many Yakṣas (demi-gods) going in planes to pay homage to Viśravas. Sumālī understood that Viśravas became worthy of homage because he was the son of Viśravas. So he took his daughter Kaiśasi and left her in the house of Viśravas. After a while, being pleased with her services, Viśravas took her as his wife. Once she requested her husband for children. Accordingly she got Rāvana, Kumbhakarna and Viśiṣṭa as sons.

KAKEYI I. 1) General information. One of the wives of Daśaratha, who had three wives, Kausalyā, Kaikeyi and Sumitrā. It is mentioned in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Ayodhyā Kāṇḍa, Sarga 70, Stanza 28 that Kaikeyi was the sister of Yudhājīt, the King of Kekaya. Kekaya was seven days’ journey away from Ayodhyā. 2) Getting boons. In days of old there was a battle between the devas and the asuras and Daśaratha went to the world of Devas, with Kaikeyi, in a chariot to help Indra against the Asuras. The devas were in a sorry plight due to the illusive and sorcerous mode of fighting of Śambara the Asura and his men. Daśaratha faced the Asuras in ten directions at the same time and fought with them. In this fight his chariot had to be turned to every direction and up and down so swiftly that the bolt of the wheel slipped out and the wheel was about to come off when Kaikeyi inserted her thumb in the hole of the bolt and kept the chariot safe and steady. The King was not aware of this bravery on the part of his wife. At last when he came to know of this he promised to give her two boons. The queen said that she would ask for those two boons later, as she didn’t want anything there. After this the King and the queen returned to their country. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sarga 9; Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa).

3) Request for the boons and the forest life of Śrī Rāma. As the celebration of anointing Śrī Rāma as the Heir apparent in Ayodhyā was going on, the humpy Mantharā approached Kaikeyi and advised her on the ways of making her son Bharata King and sending Śrī Rāma to forest. At first Kaikeyi refused to agree to this, but at last she succumbed to the repeated advice of Mantharā. Daśaratha came to see Kaikeyi who was lying in grief. Making use of this opportunity Kaikeyi requested for the granting of the two boons promised earlier. One boon was that Bharata should be anointed as heir apparent making use of the preparations made for Śrī Rāma and the other boon was that Śrī Rāma should live in forest, wearing bark of trees and matted hair for fourteen years. When Daśaratha heard these requests he became unconscious. But he granted her wishes.

KAKEYI II. Wife of Ajamidha, a King of the Pūru dynasty. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 37).

KAKEYI III. Sudeśṇā, the wife of the King of Viśrāta was known by the name Kaikeyi also. She was the daughter of Kekaya, the King of Sūta, born of his wife Mālavī. As she was the daughter of Kekaya, she got the name Kaikeyi. (M.B. Viśrāta Parva, Chapter 16). Besides, it is stated in the Purāṇas that all the princesses of the kingdom of Kekaya were called by the name Kaikeyi.

KAILĀSA (KAILĀSĀKA). A serpent belonging to the Kaśyapa family. Mention is made about this serpent in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 11.

KAILĀSA. 1) General information. The mount Mahāmeru has an area of eighteen thousand nāzhikas (Indian mile of ¾ Kośa) and a height of two thousand nāzhikas. On the eastern side of this mount there are two mountains called Jaṭhara and Devakūṭa. Pavamāna and Pāryāṭra are the two mountains on the western side. On the south there are the two mountains of Kailāsa and Karāvīra. The two mountains on the north are called Trīṣṇiga and Makaragīrī. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapters 109 and 141 that the abodes of Śiva and Kubera are on the mount Kailāsa. Once, to please Śiva, Mahāviṣṇu performed penance on Kailāsa. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 222, Stanza no. 38 to 40). It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 3 that the mountain Māṁkā stands to the north of Kailāsa. Once Vyāsa went to Kailāsa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 43, Stanza 17). In Vana Parva, Chapter 106, mention is made that the King Sagara, with his two queens, once went to Kailāsa for penance. It was on the Kailāsa that Bhagiratha performed penance to propitiate Śiva to bring down Gaṅgā. Kailāsa is hundred yojanas high. The devas come to this place daily and return. It is mentioned in Sabhā Parva, Chapter 141, that in the place where Kubera lives on Kailāsa there live a large number of Yakṣas (demi-gods), Rākṣasas (giants) Kinnaras (heavenly musicians), Garuḍas (hawks) Mātāṅgas (elephants) and Gandharvas (semi-gods). The lake of lotus of Kubera which was reached by Bhīmasena once, was in Kailāsa. In Vana Parva, it is mentioned that the Pāṇḍavas visited Kailāsa during their forest life. It could be understood from Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 83 that Kāmadhenu performed penance on the Kailāsa, once.

KAISINGA. See under Jyāmagha.

KAISINGA (M). An ancient country in Bhārata. It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 14 that Bhīṣmaka the King of Vidarbha conquered this country.

KAṬṬABA. 1) General information. Kaṭṭaba was the brother of Madhu, an Asura (demon). These two brothers are known in the Purāṇas as Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas. 2) Origin. In the Purāṇas, two stories slightly different from each other, occur about the birth of Madhu and Kaṭṭaba. One story occurs in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 10 and the other in Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva. In Devī Purāṇa, Chapter 1, it is stated as follows:—

In the beginning there was no earth or any other planet. There was only water. Mahāviṣṇu slept on the surface of the water. From the navel of Mahāviṣṇu the stalk of a lotus grew up and there was a lotus flower at the end of the stalk. Brahma was born in the lotus flower. Brahma stayed in the flower in deep meditation reciting the Vedas. Ear-wax flowed out from both the ears of Mahāviṣṇu. From the ear-wax two Asuras Madhu and Kaṭṭaba were born. The following occurs in the Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 348 about the birth of Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas.

A lotus flower grew up from the navel of Mahāviṣṇu and Brahma was born in the flower. In the flower there were two drops of water created by Mahāviṣṇu. One drop was as sweet as honey and from that drop was born the Asura Madhu with the attributes of tamas (darkness). The other drop was hard and from it Kaṭṭaba was born with the attribute of Rajas (activity).

3) Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas' acquiring boons. Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas were born in water, grew up in water and walked on the surface of water, haughty and arrogant. They began to think about how the big flood of water came into existence. Then Devī appeared before them and taught them the mantra or incantation of Vāgīṣṭha (origin of logos). Reciting this mantra, Madhu and Kaṭṭaba worshipped Devī for thousand years. Devī appeared and asked them what they wished. They wanted the boon that death should befall them only as they desired. Devī granted them the boon. After this they became haughtier because of the boon, and lived in the water playing with the creatures in water having nobody to confront them (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 1).

4) The theft of the Vedas. Madhu Kaṭṭabhas saw Brahma lying in the lotus flower reciting the four Vedas which he had created. They caught hold of all the Vedas and went to Pāṭāla, (the nether world) and hid themselves there. Brahma grew sad at the loss of the Vedas and followed Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas, who began to attack Brahma. At this Brahma became terribly afraid of the Asuras and ran to Mahāviṣṇu who was lying in a deep sleep of contemplation. Brahma praised him. Mahāviṣṇu woke up. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

5) The death of Madhu and Kaṭṭaba. According to the request of Brahma, Mahāviṣṇu confronted Madhu and Kaṭṭaba. Madhu engaged Viṣṇu in fighting while Kaṭṭaba took rest and when Madhu became tired, Kaṭṭaba engaged Viṣṇu in fighting. Thus the fight went on for a long time and Viṣṇu became tired of continuous fight. Viṣṇu understood that owing to the boon given by Devī the Asuras would die only if they wished for death, and that no body could kill them. So Viṣṇu began to meditate on Devī, who said “It would never be possible for you to kill Madhu and Kaṭṭaba because of my boon. They could be killed only by deceit. So you may kill them deceitfully”. Hearing these words Mahāviṣṇu approached the Asuras and said to them, “I am much pleased with you. So you may ask for any boon.” Hearing this they laughed and said that they were more powerful than Viṣṇu and that he might ask of them any boon. Taking that opportunity Mahāviṣṇu said “Oh! powerful persons. I ask you to grant me this boon. Give me the boon to kill you.” This request shocked them. They were willing to be killed at any place except water. They thought that Viṣṇu would not be powerful enough to kill them. Mahāviṣṇu instantly raised his thighs which were enlarged to a great extent over the water as solid earth seeing which the Asuras enlarged their bodies to the extent of a thousand yojanas. But Mahāviṣṇu enlarged his thighs further, caught hold of Madhu and Kaṭṭaba, laid them on his thighs and cut off their heads with his discus. All the surface of the sea was covered with the medas (fat) of these Asuras. This medas of Madhu and Kaṭṭaba collected itself into a lump and became the earth. So the earth got the name ‘Medini’. As the earth was the fat of the Asuras it was not fit for food. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 1).

6) The son of Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas. A horrible son named Dhundhu was born to Madhu-Kaṭṭabhas. He lived under the sand in a wilderness called Ulījālkam. A King of the Iksvāku family named Kuvalayāśva killed Dhundhu. So Kuvalayāśva got the name Dhumadhumāra. See under Dhundhu. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 202). (Khara and Atikāya are the rebirths of Madhu and Kaitabhā. See under Atikāya).

KAITAVA. Another name of Ulūka, the son of Śakuni.

KAITAVA (M). A country in ancient Bhārata. Mention is made about this country in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 18, Stanza 13).

KĀKA A son of Kārīsa (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KĀKAM. A town in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma, Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 64, contains a reference to this).

KĀKI I. Original mother of the crows. (See under CROW).

KĀKI II. One of the seven mothers who suckled Subrahmanya at his birth. The seven mothers were—Kāki, Halimā, Brahmiča, Mālinī, Palālā, Ārīya and Mitrā. (M.B. Aranya Parva, Chapter 228, Verse 10).

KĀKA (CROW).

1) Origin. Kaśyapa was the son of Marici, who was the son of Brahman. Kaśyapa's wife Tāmra had many daughters like Kāki, Syenī, Bhāṣṭ, Gṛdhrā, Śukī and Grīvā. From Kāki were born the crows in the world. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

2) Crows—the symbol of sin. There is a reference in Siva Purāṇa to this. Long ago the King of Kāsi had a daughter named Kalavatī. Even in her youth, she received the "Saiva pañcakṣara mantra." After that, she was married by Dāśārha, King of Mathurā, who was a sinner. When he touched Kalavatī who was a holy woman, he experienced unbearable heat. Kalavatī said that it was because of the King's sin. So she took Dāśārha to the sage Garga, who purified Dāśārha with his mantras (incantations) and made him stand in water. At once the King's sins came out of his body in the shape of crows. Some of them flew away. Many of them fell down with their wings burnt. Seeing this, the sage Garga said that all those crows were the volumes of sins accumulated in the course of the innumerable births through which he had passed. (Siva Purāṇa, Pañcakṣara Māhātmya).

3) T e Crow and Rice-offerings. In Uttara Rāmāyaṇa there is a story about the crow's right to eat the offering of rice to Piṭru. Once a King named Marutta performed a Maheśvara sattra. Indra and other gods attended the sattra. Hearing about this, Rāvana came that way. The frightened gods fled away assuming the forms of different birds. Yama escaped in the form of a crow. From that time, Yama was pleased with crows. He gave a blessing that in future, when human beings worship the piṭrus by offering rice to them, the crows will have the right to eat that rice. Thus the right of the crows to eat offerings of rice, originated from that time. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KAKSA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 49, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAKSĀKA. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janaṃejaya. (Sloka 6, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

KAKṢASENA I.

1) General information. (i) A King who was the grandson of Avīkṣit and son of Parīkṣit. For genealogy see 'Parīkṣit'.

(ii) Ugrasesa, Citrasena, Indrasena, Śuṣeṇa and Bhīmascena were his brothers. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

2) Other details.

(i) Kakkasena was a member of the court of Yama. (Chapter 8, Sahlī Parva).

(ii) Kakkasena was considered to be one among the pious souls, like Śibi, Pratardana, Rantideva, Ambariṣa, Janamejaya, Vṛṣārdhī, Parāśurāma, Śrī Rāma, Karandhama and Mitrasa has who had attained salvation by their charity and righteousness. Mahābhārata states that Kakkasena the saintly king attained salvation by presenting gifts to the great Vasiṣṭha. (Sloka 14, Chapter 137, Anuvāsana Parva).

KAKṢASENA II. There was another King called Kakkasena in the court of Dharmaputra. (Sloka 22, Chapter 4, Savbhā Parva).

KAKṢASENĀSAM. An Āsrama situated on the top of the mountain, Asita. Perhaps this was constructed by Kakkasena. (Sloka 12, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).

KAKŠEU (KRŠEU). Son of Raudrāvīna born of a nymph called Mśrakeśi. He had nine brothers, named Rūṣeya, Sannateyu, Gṛhṛteyu (Kṛteyu), Citėyu, Štanḍelėyu, Dharmeyu, Sammiteyu, Rteyu and Matināra. For genealogy see under 'Pūruvamsa'. (Sloka 10, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

KAKŚIVĀN I. This was a Rṣi well praised in the Rgveda.

1) Birth. King Kaliṅga did not have children for a long time. The King, therefore requested the sage Dirghatamās (Gautama) to get a son for him by his queen. The sage consented. But the queen did not like to stay with the old sage. She therefore requested her servant maid, Uṣī, to lie with the sage. Kāksivān was born to Dirghatamās of Uṣī. (Sūkta 125, Anuvāka 12, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

2) Other details.

(i) He was of the family of Aṅgiras and he lived in a hermitage in the east. (Chapter 208, Śanti Parva, and Chapter 135, Anuvāsana Parva).

(ii) He praised Viṣṇu by reciting the Rks with deep concentration and acquired many virtues. (Chapter 292, Śanti Parva).

(iii) Mahābhārata states that Kāksivān was the preceptor of Indra and also the creator of the world with Rudrajejas (majesty equal to that of Śiva). Yavakrīta, Raibhya, Arvāvasu, Parāvasu, Kāksivān, Aṅgiras and Kaṇva are seven Barhiṣads (a set of men born of Brahmā) who are also gurus of Indra living in the east. (Chapter 150, Anuvāsana Parva).

(iv) Kāksivān was famous among the Yajvans. (Sūkta 18, Anuvāka 5, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(v) To test the strength of Kāksivān he was once given a hundred pitchers of liquor by the Āsins. (Sūkta 116, Anuvāka 17, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(vi) Kāksivān who was returning home from the Āsrama of the preceptor after completing his education spent one night at a place on the way. In the morning when he awoke he saw Svanyāsa son of King Bhāvayava before him. The beautiful boy had strayed to that place by accident while playing with his friends nearby. Kāksivān was attracted by the enchanting features of the boy and decided to make him the husband of his daughter. Svanyāsa on knowing the details regarding Kākṣīvān took him to his father's palace and the King received the sage with respect and gave him many presents. (Śūkta 125, Anuvāka 18, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

KĀKṢĪVĀN II. A King of ancient India. He was the father of Bhadrā, wife of Rṣi Śātāsva. (Śloka 17, Chapter 120, Adi Parva).

KĀKṢĪVĀN. A son of Mahārṣi Gautama. Mahābhārata, Sabha Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 3 states that at the time when Gautama was living in Girivraja, he had connection with a Śūdra woman of Uṣīnara land and as a result of it Kākṣīvān was born to her. This Gautama was not the husband of Ahalyā.1

Kākṣīvān had a son named Caḍakaukika and two daughters named Bhadrā and Ghoṣā. Mahābhārata, Sabha Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 17 states that Kākṣīvān flourished in Yudhīṣṭhira's assembly.

KĀKṢĪVATAŚUTA. A female sage named Ghoṣā who was the daughter of the sage Kākṣīvān. As she was suffering from the disease of leprosy, no one was prepared to marry her. She composed a mantra in praise of the Aśvinīdevas. They cured her of her disease. After that she got married. Besides Ghoṣā, Kākṣīvān had another daughter named Bhadrā. (See under Bhadrā).

KAKUTSTHA. A son of Śaśāda, a King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He was the father of Anenas. (See under Kākṣutsthā).

KAKUTSTHA. Śri Rāma got the name Kakutstha because he was born in the dynasty of Kakutstha. (See under Kakutsthā).

KĀLĀ I. A measure of time. See under Kālamāṇa.

KĀLĀ II. Art. The sixtyfour arts are as under ;—

KĀLĀ I.2 (YAMA). The god of Death. When the life span of each living being allotted by Brahmā is at an end, Yama sends his agents and takes the soul to Yama-puri (the city of Yama). From there, the holy souls are sent to Vaikuṇṭha (Heaven, the abode of Viṣṇu) and the sinful souls to Hell.

1) Genealogy and birth of Yama. From Mahāvīru were descended in the following order—Brahmā, Marici, Kṛṣṇa, Sūrya (Sun), Yama (Kāla).

Sūrya married Śanijā, daughter of Viśvakarmā. They had three children, Manu, Yama and Yamī. Of them, Yama has the task of taking away the souls of those whose life-span is at an end. Once Śanijā who was unable to bear the dazzling brilliance of Sūrya, ordered her maid Chhāśā to attend on him and went to the forest for performing penance. Mistaking her for his wife Śanijā, Sūrya took her three sons namely, Śanijā, Manu and Tapati. Once Chhāśā cursed Yama for disobedience. Then Sūrya and Yama understood that she was not Śanijā. After that the Āvīnī-kumāras, Revanta and Bhāya were born to Sūrya and Śanijā. Thus Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2 says that Yama was the brother of Manu, Yamī, the Āvīnī Kumāras, Tapati, Śanijā and Bhāya. Yama’s sister Bhāya was married by the Aśvīna, Heti. Sūntiḥā was the eldest daughter of Yama. Aṅgā married her. The famous King Vena was her son. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 13).

2) Yama is a Dikṣālaka. Once Kuber offered penance to Brahmā for ten thousand years in water, head downwards and in the middle of Pafēgnī. Brahmā who was pleased, appeared before him and Kuber prayed to him that he should be made one of the Lokāpālakas. A cordially Brahmā ordered that thenceforth, Indra should rule in the East, Yama in the South, Varuṇa in the West and Kuber in the North. Yama’s city is called Saṃyāmīnī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Curse on Yama. Yama was once cursed by the sage Anī Māṇḍavāya. It was as a result of it that Yama was born as Vidūra. (For details see under Anī Māṇḍavāya).4

4) Yama became Mahārṣi. Śri Rāma who returned after his forest life became king of Ayodhyā. He ruled over

1. It is also stated elsewhere that Kākṣīvān was the son of Dirghatamas, the father of Gautama. See under Dirghatamas.

2. Kāla and Dharma are not the same person. See under Dharma.
the country for 11,000 years. Then it was time to recall Mahāvīśuṣu who had incarnated as Śrī Rāma, to Vaikūṇṭha. Brahma sent Yama to the earth to bring back Śrī Rāma. Yama who assumed the guise of a young Maharsi, went to Ayodhya and visited Śrī Rāma. He said that he was the disciple of the sage Aśīvala and had come to tell him a secret. So Laksmana was posted at the entrance to prevent anyone from entering the room. It was announced that anyone who tried to enter would be slaughtered. After that, while Śrī Rāma and Yama were having their secret talk, Durvāsas, the sage, who was hungry after a fast of 1,000 years, arrived at the door, asking for food. Laksmana told him humbly that he could not be allowed to enter just then. Durvāsas, who became furious, was about to curse the whole race of Kings. So Laksmana entered the room and informed Śrī Rāma of the arrival of Durvāsas. At the same time, in fulfilment of the order, he was ready to be slaughtered. Vasiṣṭha suggested that it would be enough if Laksmana was banished from the palace. Accordingly he was expelled and he went and drowned himself in the depths of the river Sarayu. Śrī Rāma who was broken-hearted at his separation from Laksmana went to the same river and drowned himself there shortly after. Yama then took their souls to Vaikūṇṭha. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

5) Yama became crow. In Uttara Rāmāyaṇa there is a story that at Marutta's Yāga, Yama who was frightened at the sight of Rāvana, escaped in the form of a crow. (For details, see under Crow).

6) An Age without Yama. In the Purāṇas there are references to three periods when there was no Yama.

(1) One such period was in Kṛtyaayuga. At that time there was no death on earth which became overcrowded with living beings. Unable to bear their weight, the earth sank down to a depth of 100 yojanas. The goddess of Earth offered tearful prayers to Mahāvīṣuṣu, who incarnated as Varāha (pig) and lifted up the earth 100 yojanas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 142).

(2) When Mārkandeya reached the age of sixteen, Yama went to him to take away his life. Mārkandeya hid himself behind the idol of Śiva. Yama threw his noose at him but it fell round Śiva's neck. Śiva opened his third eye and glared at Yama who was burnt to ashes in its fire. (See under Mārkandeya).

(3) See under Pāncārī, Para I, Sub Para 2.

7) Yama returned Satyava n's Life. (See under Satyavān).

8) Yama and King Nrīga. See under Nrīga.

9) Yampurī (the city of Yama). Yampurī is thousand yojanas in extent. There is an entrance on each of the four sides. On one side of the city stands Citragupta's mansion. The fort surrounding the city is made of iron. There are a hundred streets in Yampurī. They are all decorated with banners and festoons. There is a group of people in Citragupta's mansion. They are engaged in calculating the life-span of living beings. They take into account the vices and virtues of human beings. To the south of Citragupta's residence is situated "Jvaramandira" (the abode of diseases). Adjacent to it are the abodes of all kinds of diseases, each disease having its own abode. Yama's home is situated at a distance of twenty yojanas from the abode of Citragupta. It has an area of two hundred yojanas and a height of fifty yojanas. It is supported by one thousand columns. On one side of it there is an extensive assembly hall. It is here that those who have led virtuous lives in the world, find their abode after death. They lead a life of eternal heavenly bliss there. (Garuda Purāṇa, Chapter 14).

(10) Naraka (Hell). There is a world called Pitṛloka in the middle of the three worlds, on their southern side below the earth and above the Atala loka. The Agniśvātās and other piṭras stay there in meditative trance for securing prosperity to those who come to pitṛloka. Yama is the ruler of pitṛloka. Since he is scrupulous in imparting justice, Yama is also called Yamadharmas. He administers justice with an even hand to all living beings brought there by his agents, according to their virtues and vices during their earthly lives. He has power to assess the virtues and vices of people and to assign suitable punishments to them, but not to alter the laws or methods of punishment. Sinners are sent to the different Narakas by Yamadhama according to the nature and seriousness of their sins. The Purāṇas refer to twentyeight Narakas in all. They are:—

(1) Tāmīsram. Those who rob others of their wealth, wives, children etc, are bound with ropes by Yama's servants and cast into the Naraka known as Tāmīsram. There, they are given sound beating until they faint. After they recover their senses, the beating is repeated and those who try to escape are bound hand and foot and pushed again into this hell. This is repeated as long as Fate has ordained.

(2) Andhataṁsrama. This hell is intended for the wife who takes food after deceiving the husband or the husband who takes food after deceiving his wife. The punishment there is the same as that of Tāmīsram except the beating. But the excruciating pain suffered by the victims on being tied fast with Yama's rope by his servants, makes them fall down senseless.

(3) Raurava. This is the hell into which those who have persecuted other living beings are cast. Those who seize and enjoy another man's property or resources, also come under 'Persecution'. When such people are thrown into this hell, those whom they had persecuted or cheated while on earth, assume the shape of "ruru" and torment them severely. "Ruru" is a kind of dreadful serpent. This hell is known as "Rauravam" because of the abundance of lurus there.

(4) Mahārauravam. Here also there are lurus serpents. Only they are of a fiercer type. Those who deny the legitimate heirs, their inheritance and possess and enjoy others' property, are squeezed to death by these terrible serpents coiling round them.

(5) Kumbhitāgam. This is the hell for the punishment of those who kill and eat birds and animals. Here, oil is kept boiled in huge vessels. Yama's servants plunge sinners into this oil. The period of their torture extends to as many years as there were hairs on the bodies of the birds or animals which they killed and ate.

(6) Kālaśūlram (Yamāśūtra). This hell is terribly hot. It is here that those who do not respect their father, mother, elders, etc. are cast. They rush about in the unbearable heat of this hell and drop down exhausted, from time to time.

(7) Asīta patram. This is the hell in which those sinners who abandon svadharma (one's own duty) and accept Paradharmas (others' duty) are flogged by Yama's servants with whips made of asipatra (sharp-edged sword-shaped leaves). When they run about under the flogging they trip over stones and thorns and fall on their faces. Then they are stabbed with knives made of asipatra. They drop down unconscious and when they recover their senses, the same process is repeated.

(8) Šākaramukham. Kings who neglect their duties and oppress their subjects by misrule, are punished in this hell. They are crushed to a pulp by beating until they fall down unconscious and when they recover, they are again subjected to the same treatment.

(9) Andhakāpam. This is the hell for punishing those who oppress Brāhmaṇas, gods and the poor. In this Kāpa (well) there are wild beasts like tiger, bear etc. carnivorous birds like eagle, kite etc. venomous creatures like snakes and scorpions and insects like bugs, mosquitoes, etc. The sinners have to endure the constant attacks of these creatures, until the expiry of the period of their punishment.

(10) Kṛmbhojanam (Food for worms). Depraved Brāhmaṇas who take their food without worshipping gods and honouring guests, are thrown into this “Kṛmbhojana” Naraka which is one lakh yojanas in extent. Worms, insects and serpents sting them and eat them up. Once their bodies are completely eaten up by these creatures, they are provided with new bodies, which are also eaten up in the above manner. They have to continue there in this manner, till the end of their term of punishment.

(11) Taptamātri. Those who plunder or steal other people’s gold, jewels, ornaments or money are cast into the furnaces of this Naraka, which is built of iron and always remains red hot with blazing fire.

(12) Śālamātī. This Naraka is intended for men and women who have committed adultery. A figure made of iron, heated red-hot is placed there. The victim is urged to embrace it. Yama’s servants flog the victim from behind.

(13) Vajrapātakaśāti. This Naraka is for the punishment of those who have unnatural intercourse with cows and other animals. Here, the guilty people are made to embrace iron images full of diamond needles.

(14) Vaitaraṇī. This is the Naraka for Kings who have violated all ordinances of Śāstras and for adulterers. It is the most terrible place of punishment. Vaitaraṇī is a river filled with human excreta, urine, blood, hair, bones, nails, flesh, fat and all kinds of dirty substances. There are various kinds of fierceous beasts in it. Those who are cast into it are attacked and mauled by these creatures from all sides. The sinners have to spend the term of their punishment, feeding upon the contents of this river.

(15) Pāyodakam. This is a well, filled with excreta, urine, blood, phlegm etc. Brāhmaṇas and others who have intercourse with women of low caste against customs, ordinances etc. vagabonds who wander about irresponsibly like animals and birds and other such sinners are cast into this Naraka.

(16) Prāgarodham. This Naraka is for the punishment of Brāhmaṇas who keep dogs, asses and other mean animals and constantly hunt and kill animals for food. Here the servants of Yama gather round the sinners and cut them limb by limb with their arrows and subject them to constant insult.

(17) Vīṣaṇana. This Naraka is for the torture of those who perform Yāga by killing cows to display their wealth and splendour. They will have to remain there during the whole term of their punishment under the constant flogging of Yama’s servants.

(18) Lālādbhaksam. This is the Naraka for lustful people. The lascivious fellow who makes his wife swallow semen, is cast into this hell. Lālādbhaksam is a sea of semen. The sinner lies in it feeding upon semen alone.

(19) Sāraṇeyāsanam. Those guilty of unsocial acts like incendiaria, poisoning food, mass slaughter, ruining the country, etc. are cast into the Naraka called Sāraṇeyāsana. There, nothing but the flesh of dogs is available for food. There are 700 dogs in that Naraka and all of them are as ferocious as leopards. They attack the sinners who come there from all sides and tear their flesh from their bodies with their teeth.

(20) Aćī. This Naraka is for those guilty of bearing false witness, false swearing or assuming false names. They are hurled into Aćī from a mountain which is 100 yojanas in height. The whole region of Aćī is always shaken like an ocean with turbulent waves. As soon as the sinners fall into it they are utterly smashed into dust. They are again restored to life and the punishment is repeated.

(21) Ayatāpānām. Those who belong to the first three castes viz. Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiyāya—who indulge in drinking Soma, Surā etc. are bound and thrown into this hell. They are forced to drink melted iron in liquid form.

(22) Kṣaṭrakām. Braggarts and those who insult people of noble birth are cast into this hell. Here, Yama’s servants keep the sinners upside down and torture them in various ways.

(23) Raksabhaksam. This Naraka is for the punishment of meat-eaters. There are separate compartments in this hell for those who perform human sacrifice, eat human flesh or the flesh of other creatures. All the living beings they had killed before, would have arrived here in advance. They would all join together in attacking, biting and mauling these sinners. Their shrieks and complaints would be of no avail there.

(24) Śulāprota. People who take the life of others who have done no harm to them, by deceiving them or by treachery, with weapons like the trident, are thrown into the “Śulāprota” hell. Yama’s servants fix each of the sinners of the above class, on the top of a trident. They are forced to spend the whole term of their punishment in that position, suffering intense thirst and hunger, enduring all the tortures inflicted on them by Yama’s servants.

(25) Dandaśākam. Sinners who persecute fellow creatures like venomous serpents are cast into this Naraka. There are many wild beasts and many hooded serpents here. They eat alive, the sinners who fall into this hell.

(26) Vatarodham. This hell is for those who persecute the creatures living on mountain-peaks, dense forests, hollow trunks of trees, etc. It resembles mountains, caves, forests etc. After throwing them into this hell the sinners are tortured with fire, snake, poison and weapons, just as they had tortured other creatures, while on earth.

(27) Paryāvaranakam. One who denies food to a person who happens to come at meal-time and abuses him, is thrown into this Naraka. The moment he falls into it, his eyes are put out by being pierced with the beaks of cruel birds like the crow, eagle etc. It is the most painful experience for them.

(ii) Sūcinukham. Proud and miserly people who refuse to spend money even for the bare necessities of life, find their place in this hell. Those who do not repay the money they have borrowed, will also be cast into this hell. Here, their bodies will be continually pricked and pierced with needles. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha; Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 2, Chapter 6).

12) Mantra (incantation) to invoke Tāma.

"Mahāsvātha Yāmāgaccha danḍahasta mahābāla/
rakṣa tvāni đakṣinadvārāṁ Vaivasvata namoṣ tu te". //

After invoking Yama with this mantra, one should worship with the mantra "Vaivasvatama Sarigamanam". (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 56).

13) Tāma Defeated by Rāvaṇa. Once the sage Nārada went to Rāvaṇa and expatiated on the glory and splendour of Yama. Immediately Rāvaṇa set out to Sariyānani with the intention of subduing Yama. Accepting Rāvaṇa's challenge, Yama came out. After a terrible battle between them, which lasted for seven days neither of them was able to defeat the other. Both of them had received Brahmā's boon. In the night of the seventh day, Yama rushed forth with his staff to beat Rāvaṇa to death. Then Rāvaṇa took his Brahmāstra. At that critical moment, Brahmā came to the battle-field and persuaded Yama to withdraw from the fight. Yama retreated to his city and closed the gate. Rāvaṇa went back with a triumphant shout. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

14) Other details concerning Yama.

(i) Yama attended Draupadi's Śvayamāvara. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 6).

(ii) It was Yama who performed "Śāmitra" (killing of animals) at the yāga done by devas in the Naimiśāranya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 1).

(iii) In the fight between Indra and Arjuna in Kāññalavādāya, Yama joined the side of Indra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 226, Verse 52).

(iv) Once in a thousand years, Yama comes to Binduṣaravāra and performs a yāga. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 15).

(v) Yama is a member of Brahmā's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 51).

(vi) When Arjuna performed tapas and received Pāṣupatāstra from Śiva, Yama was pleased and presented Daṇḍāstra to Arjuna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 41, Verse 25).

(vii) Yama was one of the devas who tested and then blessed Nala who went to Damayanti's Śvayamāvara. (See under NALA).

(viii) Indra made Yama, the King of Pītris. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 14).

(ix) Mahābhirata, Drona Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 26 says that when Devas milked Bhumidevi, Yama took the form of a calf. (See under Vena).

(x) In Tripuradāhana (burning of Tripura) Yama remained in Saivabāna (the arrow of Śiva, (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 202, Verse 77. See also under TRIPURA).

(xi) Yama presented two warriors, Ummātha and Pramātha to god Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 30).

(xii) Once Yama gave advice to the sage Gautama on the subject of Dharma. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 192).

(xiii) Yama once gave a boon to a Brahmāna named Jāpaka. (See under JĀPAKA. M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 199).

(xiv) Once Mahāviṣṇu taught Yama, Śiva-Sahasranāma. Yama taught it to Nāciketa. (See under ŚIVA and NĀCIKETA. Also M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17).

(xv) Yama sent his special agents to bring a Brahmāna named Sārmi. (See under ŚĀRMI. Also M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 68).

(xvi) Yama once lectured on the efficacy of giving "tīla" (gingelly seed) "jala" (water) and anna (rice) to a Brahmāna. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 68).

(xvii) Yama once explained the secrets of Dharma. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 130).

(xviii) Yama used to worship Śiva on the mountain Muṣjāvān. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 8).

(xix) Dhūmornā is the name of Yama's wife. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 9).

(xx) There is a temple in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva about the condition of the world in the absence of Yama. Once Yama started a prolonged yāga at Naimiśāranya. At that time there was no death in the world. All living beings continued to live indefinitely. The Devas all joined together and approached Yama with a request to solve the problem. Yama concluded his yāga and resumed his duties and death came to the world again. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 199).

KĀLĀ II. A Mahārśi. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 14, refers to this sage as offering worship to Indra, in Indra's assembly.

KĀLĀ. A daughter of Dakṣaprājapati. (See under Kālikā).

KĀLĀ. See under the word Kālamāṇa.

KĀLĀ (S) A group of Manes. This group lives in the Brahmāsabhā. (Chapter 11, Śānti Parva).

KĀLABANDHAKA. An adviser of Mahiṣāsura. Cīkṣura was his war-minister, Tāmra his finance minister, Asiloman, Prime Minister, and Udarka, Chief of the army. Kālabandhaka, Bāskala and Trinetra were the advisers of Mahiṣāsura. (Devī Bhāgavata 5th Skanda).

KĀLABHĪTTI. A devotee of Śiva. As his father Māṇti performed penance for the sake of a son for a thousand years his wife conceived, but did not deliver. Māṇti asked the child in his mother's womb why he did not come out to which the latter replied that he did not come out as he feared the Asura called Kālamārga. (As the child feared Kālamārga it came to be called Kālabhīttī). As advised by Śiva, Māṇti created in the child knowledge about dharma, renunciation etc. and thus made him conscious about higher knowledge. The child came out of the mother's womb. In due course of time Kālabhīttī took to the worship of Śiva, who blessed him as follows: "Since you have outlived Kālamārga, in future you will become famous as Mahākāla," (Skanda Purāṇa).

KĀLABRĀHMĀNA. A brahmin, who defeated Kāla. A great effulgence that emanated from his head two hundred years after his continuous Japa (Chanting of mantras) blocked the passage of sky-walkers (Devas) and spread to the three worlds. When Brahmā and others asked him to choose any boon, he said that he wanted nothing but chanting the Lord's name and mantras. Again, Brahmā insisted on the brahmin's choosing some boon or other, and then he removed himself to the northern planes of the Himālayas, where also he continued chanting mantras. There too his ef-fulgence became so powerful that Indra deputed celestial women to obstruct his Japa, but they could do nothing in the matter. Then Indra deputed Kāla to end the brahmin's life, but he failed in the attempt. Ultimately King Ikṣvāku came to the brahmin and asked for half the power he had earned by his tapas, which the brahmin readily granted. And, Ikṣvāku became thus famous all over the worlds. (Kāthāsāritsāgara, Sūrya-prabhālambaka).

KĀLADA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

KĀLADANTAKA (KĀLADANTA). A serpent born in Vāsuki's dynasty. It was burnt to death by the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57).

KĀLADVĪJA. A serpent, which attained salvation. The story of this nāga, which was at first a Śrīdra is told in chapter 16 of the Padma Purāṇa as follows:—Once upon a time there lived in Karavljrapura a very selfish Śrīdra called Kaladvija, who was sentenced by Kāla to live in hell for four Manvantaras. After living in hell the whole of the period, he was born as a nāga and suffered much in the crevices of a stone. While living thus, on an Āśvina pūrṇimā (Full moon day in the month of Āśvina), it threw out some fried paddy and Kaudi (shells) which fell before Viśṣu. At once the Lord redeemed it from all its sins, and on its death, in due course, the attendants of Viśṣu took him in a divine chariot to the Lord.

KĀLAGHĀTA. A brahmin scholar in the Vedas. He was a member of the assembly at the serpent yajña conducted by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 53).

KĀLAHĀ. Wife of a brāhmaṇa named Bhiṣku who was an inhabitant of the city of Saurāśtra. This woman used to do only just the opposite of what her husband asked her to do and so Bhiṣku kept it a rule to ask her to do the opposite of what he wanted her to do. But one day he asked her to float the śrāddha pīṇḍa in the river Gaṅga, and she threw it in Śaucya-kūpa. As a result of that she was born in a demoniac womb. But Dharmadatta got her purified by the Dvādaśakṣari mantra and giving her half the virtue accrued by him. By virtue of this they were reborn as Daśārath and Kausalyā. (Ānanda Rāmāyaṇa, Sārakāṇḍa; Utarakaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa). See also under Dharmadatta.

KĀLAJÑA(S). A synonym of the Kālakēyas. (See under Kālakēya;)

KĀLĀK (KĀLĪK). One of the daughters of Dakṣa. Kaśyapa married her. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 183 states that Kālakēya and Narakāsura were born to Kālāk by Kaśyapa. (Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Chapter 14). In Mahābhārata Aranya Parva, Chapter 174 we find that Kālāk once received from Brahmā, a boon that her sons would never be killed.

KĀLA. An Asura born to Kālīk by Kaśyapa. (Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Chapter 14).

KĀLAKĀṢA. A warrior of Skanda deva. (M.B. Sālya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 69).

KĀLAKĀṢA. An Asura. He was killed by Garuḍa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103).

KĀLAKĀMUKHA (KĀLAKĀMUKHA). A Rākṣasa. He was the brother of Prahastra, Rāvaṇa's Minister. (For Genealogy, see under Prahastra). During Śrī Rāma's life in the forest Kālakāmukha was also among Khara, Dūṣaṇa and others. The other eleven members of that group were—Śyenagāmī, Pṛthugriṅga, Yajñāsruṣu, Vihaṅ-gama, Durjaya, Karavārākṣa, Paruṣa, Meghamālī, Mahāmālī, Sarpāṣaya and Rudhrāṣaṇa. (Vālmikī Rāmāyana, Aranya Kāṇḍa, 26th Sarga).

KĀLAKANYĀ. Daughter of Kāla (Yama). (See under Puruṣāṇa).

KĀLAKAVRKSYA. An ancient Saint. During the reign of the King Kṣemadarśin in the country of Kosala, his subjects were put to great sufferings under the misrule and corruption of his courtiers. At that time, Kālakavrksya who was a friend of Kṣemadarśin and a reputed sage, came to Kosala with a caged crow. The sage went about the country claiming to know Kālavidyā” (Vāyaśi vidyā) by which a crow could be made to tell past events. Actually, the sage was going round the country in order to gather first-hand information about the corrupt practices of the King's men. After acquiring knowledge of the exact state of affairs in the country, Kālakavrksya reached the palace. Under the cloak of the crow's words he exposed some of the improprieties of the King's Minister. Naturally, the Minister was furious and by his secret instructions his servants shot the crow to death that same night. On the next day, the sage himself went to the King and convinced him of the Minister's guilt. The King accepted the sage's suggestions and brought about a thorough over-haul of the administration by punishing or dismissing the culprits. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 82). In Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 106 we find that this sage once advised Drupada to make a treaty with King Kṣemadarśin. Kālakavrksya was a sage who flourished in Indra's assembly. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7).

KĀLAKETU. A renowned Asura Emperor who was the son of Danu, the wife of Kaśyapa. Once he abducted Ekāvali, the wife of Ekaśira and went to Pātāla (under-world). Ekāvala fought a fierce battle with Kālaketu and recovered Ekāvali. (See under Ekāvala).

KĀLAKEYA(S). (KĀLAKHAṆJAS).
1) Birth. The Asuras who were born to Kālā (Kālīkā) by Kaśyapa Prajaṇati, the son of Maṛci and Brahmā's grandson.
2) General. “Kālakaṇḍa” is not the proper name of a particular Asura. The sons of Kāla (Kālīkā) are all collectively called Kālakēyas. They number about 60,000. Sometimes they fought under the leadership of Vṛtrasura and at other times under other Asura leaders.
3) Agastyā and the Kālakēyas. Once the Kālakēyas started a campaign of hatred against Brahmānas. At nightfall they used to enter Brahmāna premises and commit murders, disturb their yāgas, etc. The Brahmānas complained to the sage Agastya. Agastya set out to capture the Kālakēyas, who were alarmed and hid themselves in the ocean. Agastya dried up the ocean by drinking it. But some of the Kālakēyas escaped and fled to Pātāla. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 101).
KALAKIRTI

4) Arjuna and the Kalakeyas. The headquarters of the Asuras was Hiraṇyapura, situated near Devaloka. Once they allied themselves with thousands of other Asuras called “Nivātakavacas” and launched an attack on Devaloka. Indra sent his charioteer Mātali and brought Arjuna to Devaloka. Arjuna defeated the Nivātakavacas and Kalakeyas in battle. A large number of Kalakeyas were killed in the battle. (M.B. Vana Parva Chapters 172-175).

KALAKIRTI. A Kṣatriya King. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 67 says that this King was born from the limb of Suparṣu, the younger brother of the Asura, Mayūra.

KALAKOTI. A sacred place in Naimiṣāranya. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 3).

KALAKUTA. The virulent poison that came up during the churning of the Ocean of Milk. Śiva swallowed and retained it in his throat, and so he came to be called Nilakaṇṭha. “And Kālaṇṭha arose like fire burning all the worlds. The smell of it sent the three worlds into a swoon. At the request of Brahmā Śiva swallowed the poison to save the world from absolute destruction. And, he (Śiva) retained it in his throat”. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 18).

KALAMĀNA. (Calculating time). In ancient days in India time was calculated in the following manner. Time taken (needed) to pierce a leaf with a needle

- Alpakaḷa
- 1 Truṭi
- 1 Kalā
- 1 Kaśṭhā
- 1 Nimiṣa (mātrā)
- 1 Gaṇita
- 1 Netuvirpu (time for a deep sigh)
- 1 Vināzhikā
- 1 Gaṭākī
- 1 Day (Ahorātra)
- 1 Paṅsa (Fortnight)
- 1 Cāndramāsa (A day for the Pisṛs)
- 1 Rtu.
- 1 year for men (A day for the Devas)

300 Years (Men’s) — 1 Divyavarsā (Divine year)
4800 Divyavarsās — 1 Kṛtayuga
3600 Divyavarsās — 1 Tretāyuga
2400 Divyavarsās — 1 Dvāparayuga
1200 Divyavarsās — 1 Kaliyuga
12000 Divyavarsās — 1 Caturyuga
71 Caturyugas — 1 Manvantara
14 Manvantaras — 1 Pralaya (Kalpa)
1 Pralaya — Brahmā’s one day.

(Bhāgavata Trīṭya skandha)

 Fifteen Nimiṣas make one Kāṣṭhā. Thirty Kāṣṭhās make one Kalā and thirty Kalās make one Mukhūrta. Thirty Mukhūrtas make one day (man’s) and thirty such days, divided into two fortnights form a Māsa (month). Six months form an Ayana; there are two ayanas called Dakṣiṇa and Uttarā. Dakṣiṇāyana is night, and Uttarāyana is day for the Devas, 12,000 Divyavarsās—Devā varṣas—form a Caturyuga consisting of the Kṛta—Tretā—Dvāpara and Kali yugas, consisting respectively of 4000, 3000, 2000 and 1000 Divyavarṣas. Before the commencement and after the end of every one of the above four yugas there is an interval respectively of 400, 300, 200, and 100 years. The interval before the commencement is called Sandhyā and that at the end is called Sandhyānāma. The period between Sandhyā and Sandhyānāma is called Kṛta yuga etc. One thousand Caturyugas form one day for Brahmā, and it (Brahmā’s one day) has 14 Manus. Again, Chapter 8, Part 2 of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa has the following to say about Kālamāna.

Fifteen nimiṣas make one Kāṣṭhā, thirty Kāṣṭhās one Kalā, thirty Kalās one mukhūrta and thirty mukhūrtas one day and night. Day is long or short according to the length or shortness of parts of the day, like morning, noon and evening. Despite the above variation evening or dusk time is always (2 nāzhikās) the same. The three mukhūrtas from the sun’s ardhodaya (when half of the sun has arisen) is called Prāṭahākā, (morning) and it is 1/5th of day time. The three mukhūrtas following are known as sarhagava. Madhyāhāna (noon) is the three mukhūrtas after sarhagava. The time after madhyāhāna is aparāhāna (afternoon). Aparāhāna lasts for three mukhūrtas. The time after this is dusk. Thus, a day-time of fifteen mukhūrtas is divided into five parts of three mukhūrtas each. On Viṣṇu day the day will have full fifteen mukhūrtas. Then during Uttarāyana and Dakṣiṇāyana the day will be longer or shorter. During Uttarāyana the day will be longer than night, and during Dakṣiṇāyana vice versa. Viṣṇu occurs when the sun enters the Tula (Libra) and Meṣa (Aries) houses. Dakṣiṇāyana is when the sun enters Cancer, and Uttarāyana when it enters Capricorn.

Fifteen days and nights constitute a Paṅsa (fortnight), and two Paṅsas one month. Two solar months constitute a Rtu (season), three ṛtus one ayana and two ayanas one year. Since there are four kinds of months, i.e. Saura, Śāvana, Candra and Nākṣatra, years are considered to be of five different kinds. The first is called Saimvatsara; the second parivatsara; the third idvatsara; the fourth, anuvatsara and the fifth, vatsara. This period of five years is called a yuga. In a yuga of five years there are 60 saura months, 61 śīvana months, 62 Candra months and 67 nākṣatra months. At the beginning of the sixth year the sun and moon meet in the same house and that period of five years also is called yuga. (Śrīdhariyami).

KALAMRA. See under BHADRAŚĀLĀ.

KALAMUKHA (S) A hybrid race born from the union of men and Rākṣasas. Sahadeva defeated the Kalamukhas also during his conquest of the southern region. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 67).

KALANEMI I. A great Asura. In later years he was born as Karsha, the son of Ugrasena. (See under Karsha).

KALANEMI II. A brahmin from Mālava. His father
Kālanemi III

Kālanemi III. A Rākṣasa. During the Rāma-Rāvana war, when Lakṣmīna swooned, Hanumān started for Drona mountain for medicine. Rāvana deputed Kālanemi to obstruct the path of Hanumān. Well acquainted with the trickeries of the Rākṣasas Hanumān killed Kālanemi who appeared before him disguised as a sage. (Adhyātma Rāmāyana, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Canto 67).

Kālanirṇaya. (Calculating time). See under Kālamāṇa.

Kālānjaraṇī. A famous mountain at Medhāvika tīrtha. He who bathes in Vedihrada on this mountain will get the benefits of gifting away 1000 cows. (Anuvāsaṇa Parva, Chapter 25). Spread on the four sides of mount Mahāmeru are twenty mountains. They are:—Kuraṅga, Karaga, Kuṣumbha, Viṅkati, Triṅkata, Śīśira, Patangā, Rucaka, Nila, Nisadha, Śītivāsa, Kapila, Śāṅkika, Vaiḍūrya, Cārudhī, Hanśa, Rṣabha, Nāga, Kālanjara and Nārada. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

Kālāpā. A powerful sage of great majesty. Yudhiṣṭhira worshipped this sage at the end of the Rāja-sūlayaṇa. (Chapter 83, Sabha Parva).

Kālāpa. A great sage, who was a member of Yudhiṣṭhira's assembly. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 4).

Kālaparvata I. A mountain on the sea coast near Laṅkā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 277).

Kālaparvata II. A mountain seen by Arjuna on his way to Śiva with Śrī Kṛṣṇa during their dream-journey. (Drona Parva, Chapter 80).

Kālapatha. A son of Viśvamitra. He was a scholar in philosophy and a Brahmavādī. (Anuvāsaṇa Parva, Chapter 4).

Kālapīṇga I. A holy place. (Śloka 43, Chapter 25, Anuvāsaṇa Parva).

Kālapīṇga II. A kind of bird. See under Kapinjala.

Kālaprśṭha. A serpent. It was with this serpent that the hair on the necks of horses attached to the chariot of Śiva at the burning of the Tripuras, was tied. (Karna Parva, Chapter 34).

Kālarātri. The Devatā presiding over the night on the eve of death. The fierce aspect of the Devatā is described in the Mahābhārata as follows:—

Coal-black in colour, with swollen mouth and eyes and wearing red garlands and cloths—thus appeared the woman (Devatā) presiding over the death-night. With the fierce cord in her hand she drags away the souls of the dead. (Sauntika Parva, Chapter 9).

Kālasā. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 11, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

Kālasaila. A range of mountains in Uttarakāndha in ancient India. (Vana Parva, Chapter 139).

Kālasapotaka. A serpent. (Śloka 7, Chapter 35, Adī Parva).

Kālaśi. A holy place. If one sips water from a pond in that place one will acquire the benefit of conducting an Agniṣṭoma Sacrifice. (Śloka 80, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

Kālasodara. A soldier of Skanda. (Śloka 72, Chapter 85, Śalya Parva).

Kālasutra. A hell. (See under Kāla).

Kālatirtha. A sacred place in Ayodhyā. A bath here is as good as making a gift of eleven cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 85).

Kālatoyaka. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

Kālavati I. A daughter of the King of Kāśi. This gem of a woman worshipped the sage Durvāsas and became a saint by obtaining the Saiva Pančakṣara (five letters pertaining to Śiva—Sivāya namā). Afterwards, Dāsārha, King of Mathura, married her. The King felt very hot whenever he approached her and he questioned her about it. She said she had received the Pančakṣara Mantra even from childhood and sinners would feel the heat if they touched her. The King was greatly disappointed and Kālavatī took him to Sage Garga to redeem him from all his sins. The sage dipped the King in the river Kālindī and when the King rose up all his sins flew away from his body as tiny birds. The King reaching the palace, embraced Kālavatī and then he felt her body very cool and pleasant. They got a son also. (Pančakṣaramāhīmya, Siva Purāṇa).

Kālavatī II. Mother of Mrgāvatī, a queen. Mrgāvatī was the mother of Udayana. See under Mrgāvatī).

Kālavatī III. A nymph. See under Tīrṇākaraśāla.

Kālavega. A serpent born in the Vāsuki dynasty. It was burnt to ashes during the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 7).

Kālayāvana. A powerful Asura born out of the effulgence of Gargācarya. He was killed by Śri Kṛṣṇa. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

Kālehika. A female attendant of Skandadeva. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46).

Kāleya (S). A set of Asuras born to the great sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kaśā. Some scholars hold the view that the Kālekeyas and the Kāleyas are one and the same. Kāleyas destroyed the Āśramas of sages like Vaśiṣṭha, Čyavana and Bhāradvāja. (Vana Parva, Chapter 102). Devas killed some of the Kāleyas; the others ran away to Pātāla.

Kāli I. Incarnation of sin, the Sin-god.

1) Birth. Kaśyapaprajapati, son of Brahmad, begot of his wife Muni sixteen sons and Kāli was the fifteenth son. He was a deva-gandharva. The other sons of Kaśyapa were: Bhīmasena, Ugrasena, Suparṇa, Varuṇa, Dhyānṛṣṭa, Gopati, Suvaceras, Satiyavāk, Akaparṇa, Prayuta, Viṣvuta, Gītarathra, Śālisīra, Parjanya and Nārada. (4 Ślokas from verse 43, Chapter 63, Ādi Parva).

2) How Parīkṣit controlled Kāli. When Śri Kṛṣṇa went to Vaikunṭha, the Pāṇḍavas entrusted the administration of the state to Parīkṣit, son of Abhimanyu and started for the Mahāprasthāna. King Parīkṣit was travelling the continent conquering places when he saw Kāli in the garb of a Śūdra King teasing a cow and bull couple. Parīkṣit aimed an arrow at him and then Kāli came and bowed down before the King. The King did not kill him. He let him go free but ordered him to go away from his state. Kāli was nonplussed because all the land belonged to Parīkṣit and there was no place for him to go. So Kāli begged of the King to give him some space to live. Parīkṣit then declared that Kāli could live in the following five places: Gambling: Drinking, Woman, Murder and Gold. From that day onwards the free movements of Kāli were thus restricted (Chapter 17, 1st Skandha, Bhāgavata).
3) Kali, Lord of Kaliyuga. There are fourteen Manvantaras during the life of Brahmā. The life time of a Manu is a Manvantara. This present period is the seventh Manvantara. In each Manvantara there are four yugas, Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali. Kṛtayuga consists of 17,28000 years, Tretāyuga consists of 12,-96000 years, Dvāparayuga 8,61000 years and Kaliyuga 4,32,000 years. The Christian era started in the Kali era 3102 and after another 4,26926 years Kaliyuga will come to an end and the present universe will enter the eighth Manvantara. From the beginning of the Kaliyuga acts of sin predominate and Kali, sin-god, will lord over the world.

Kali was born on the day Śrī Kṛṣṇa ascended heaven. When Bhagavān Mukunda abandoned his body and went to his place in Vaikuṇṭha. Kali came into being binding all on earth. (Śloka 66, Chapter 1, Bhāgavata Māhātmya).

4) Kali and Nala. Kali and Dvāpara were going to the Swayanvar of Damayanti when they met Indra and others returning from the Swayanvarīva. They told Kali and Dvāpara that Damayanti was married to Nala. Kali and Dvāpara felt it an outrage that Damayanti should have married a man of the earth and not a deva. Kali decided that Nala should be sent out of his country and his matrimonial life made most unhappy. Dvāpara consented to be his accomplice in this attempt. Kali followed Nala waiting for an opportunity to enter his body. One day, by an oversight Nala, without doing the ācamana after passing urine, performed his sandhyā-avadana. Taking that opportunity Kali entered the body of Nala. Kali went to Puṣkara, brother of Nala in the guise of a bullock and made Nala challenge his brother to a game of dice putting that bullock as a wager. Puṣkara accepted the challenge. Nala wagered and lost all his movable and immovable possessions and went to the forests with Damayanti. Nala, prompted by Kali, abandoned Damayanti in the forests and went his way. Damayanti cursed Kali. It was at this time that the great serpent Karkotaka was entrapped in a wild fire. Nala saved him from the fire but in return the cobra bit him turning Nala into one of blue hue and said "Oh Nala, let Kali who cheated you and is now inside your body suffer with the poison I have injected into your body."

Nala roamed about and reached Ayodhya and there became the charioteer of Rtuparṇa, King of Ayodhya. When Rtuparṇa went to the second marriage of Damayanti to Vidarbha, Nala went with him as his charioteer. On the way Nala taught Rtuparṇa the science of Aṣvabhādya and Rtuparṇa in return taught him the science of Aṣkṣarādya. When Nala learnt the secret of Aṣkṣarādya he vomited all the poison inside him and Kali left him. Nala was about to curse Kali but refrained from it at the request of Kali. At once Kali climbed on a Tāmī tree (Beleric Myrobalan) and went down from the tree when Nala left the place. Tāmī is from that day onwards considered a cursed tree. (Chapter 58, Vana Parva).

5) The world in Kaliyuga. The celebrated sage Mārkaṇḍeya had prophesied about the happenings in Kaliyuga thus: In Kaliyuga all will be dishonest. Charity and Sacrifices will be only for a name. Brāhmaṇas would do the duties of Śūdras. Śūdras will become prosperous. There will be sinners as kings. People will be short-lived and the stature of the people also will diminish. Beastly type of men will be on the increase. Taste and smell will vanish. Women will be 'Mukhebhaḍis'. Men will sell rice and Brāhmaṇas, the Vedas. Women will sell their vaginas. The yield of milk from cows will decrease. Flowers and fruits will become less. Crows will be on the increase. Brāhmaṇas would become beggars. Sages will be merchants. Brāhmaṇas would without any reason grow hairs and nails. None will observe the four āśramas correctly. Students will defile the bed of their preceptors. Rains will be in and out of season. Trees and plants will refuse to grow in many places. There will be murder of people everywhere. Merchants will be cheats and they will use false measures. Righteous persons will decrease and sinners will increase. Girls of seven or eight years will become pregnant and boys will become fathers. Young men at the age of sixteen would be grey-haired. Old men will continue practising the habits of young men. Wives will lie with their servants. Wives will be prostitutes even while their husbands are alive. People will die in lots of hunger." (Chapter 188, Vana Parva).

6) Kaliyugatitha. The greatest tirtha of Kaliyuga is the river Ganges. (Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

7) Duryodhana was the incarnation of Kali and Śakuni, that of Dvāpara. (Chapter 31, Āśrama Parva).

KALI II. A synonym of Śūrya. (Śloka 20, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).

KALI III. A synonym of Śiva. (Śloka 79, Chapter 17, Anuśasana Parva).

KALI I. A synonym of Śatayavati, mother of Vyaśa. (See under Adirkā and Satyayati).

KALI II. An aspect or form of Pārvati. (See under Pārvati).

KALIDĀSA. The greatest poet and dramatist in Sanskrit. Some scholars opine that Kālidāsa flourished in the 8th Century B.C. while others place his date up to the period 11th Century A.D. At any rate most of the scholars consider the period between 1st Century B.C. and 5th Century A.D. as the most probable date of the great poet. Some of the main theories in this regard are as follows:—

(1) Eighth century B.C. Towards the close of Raghuvirāṇa Mahākāvyā Kālidāsa has referred to the son of King Aṅkṣirmitra. Therefore the poet must have lived in the 8th Century B.C. This is the view of the scholar Hippolyte Fanche.

(2) Second Century B.C. According to Dr. Kuṇjan Rājā Kālidāsa lived in the second Century B.C., the reasons for the belief being as follows. The poet was a contemporary of King Aṅkṣirmitra of the Śunga dynasty. This Aṅkṣirmitra is eulogised in Kālidāsa’s Mālavikāngīmitra. Aṅkṣirmitra is referred to in the Bharatavākyā (epilogue) of the drama also.

(3) First Century B.C. The traditional belief is that Kālidāsa was a member in the assembly of poets and scholars of the court of emperor Vikramāditya, who started the Vikrama era in B.C. 56.

Vetāla-Bhāṭṭa-Ghāṭakarpā-Śaikū

Dvāparacūrānāśvamārti

4) Fifth Century A.D. According to Dr. Keith, Kālidāsa lived in the fifth Century A.D. One Candra-Kālikā, a female attendant of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 14).

Kālika. One of the attendants given to Skanda by Pūṣan, the other being Pāṇitaka. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 43).

Kālikāśaṅga A holy place. Bathing here is as good as that at Kālikāśrama.

Kālikāśrama. A holy place. If one bathes and spends three nights here one will be released from the sorrows of life and death. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25).

Kālikēya. A son of King Subala. He was killed by Abhimanyu. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 49).

Kāliṇḍi (Yamūṇā).

1) General. Kāliṇḍi alias Yamūṇā is one of the holy rivers in India. The presiding deity of the river is Kāliṇḍidevi. Kāliṇḍi, the daughter of the sun has her source in Kalinda mountain, and hence the name Kāliṇḍi for the river. Kāliṇḍi joins the Gaṅgā at Prayāg, and this confluence of the two rivers is called Saṅgama, which is a sacred place.

2) Gave way for Śrī Kṛṣṇa. As soon as Kṛṣṇa was born Vasudeva stealthily removed the child to Ambādī. Due to heavy rains the Kāliṇḍi was overflowing, and Vasudeva begged Kāliṇḍi for a passage, and the river gave way for Vasudeva to take Kṛṣṇa to Ambādī. (Bhāgavata 10th Skanda).

3) Balabhadra dragged Kāliṇḍi. Balabhadra and Kīrthidevi once stayed in Ambādī for two months. One day he was picnicking on the banks of Kāliṇḍi with the Gopis. Under the influence of liquor he desired to play with his companions in the waters of Kāliṇḍi. He called Kāliṇḍi to his side, but the chaste Kāliṇḍi refused to oblige him. So he dragged her by his plough hooking her to it. In great fear Kāliṇḍi saluted him, and he enjoyed with the gopis for some time on its waters. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

4) Kāliṇḍi, Śrī Kṛṣṇa's wife. After Maya had built Indraprastha for the Pāṇḍavas, Śrī Kṛṣṇa spent a few days there with them. One day while Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were strolling on the banks of Kāliṇḍi the latter saw there a beautiful woman performing penance and he approached her. She told Arjuna that the object of her penance was to get Kṛṣṇa as husband, and when Arjuna passed on the information to Kṛṣṇa he took her in his chariot to Dvārakā and duly married her. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

5) Sons of Kāliṇḍi. Ten sons, were born to Kāliṇḍi by Kṛṣṇa. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

6) Hainasa and his son in Kāliṇḍi. Once Kṛṣṇa attacked Jarāsandha and the son of his minister, Hainasa, being told that his father had been killed, committed suicide by jumping into Kāliṇḍi. But, Hainasa had not been killed, and when he returned from the battlefield and knew about the death of his son, he too jumped into Kāliṇḍi and committed suicide. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 14).

7) Other information.

(i) Kāliṇḍi is one of the seven tributaries of the Gaṅgā.

One who drinks its water will be released from all sins. (Īdī Parva, Chapter 139, Verse 19).

(ii) The Pāṇḍavas, during their life in exile in the forest drank Yamunā water, got over their weariness and continued their sojourn. (Vana Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 2).

(iii) Sahadeva, son of Śṛiṇjayā, gave Agni Deva 1000 golden emblems on the banks of the Yamunā. (Vana Parva Chapter 90, Verse 7).

(iv) Bharata performed thirty-three Aśvamedhas on the banks of the Yamunā (Vana Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 8). On another occasion he conducted six Aśva-medhas at the same spot. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 68).

On yet another occasion he conducted three hundred Aśvamedhas. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 29).

(v) Ambarīṣa, the son of Nābhāga conducted a yajña on the planes of Kāliṇḍi. (Vana Parva, Chapter 129).

(vi) Agastya the great sage performed penance on the planes of Kāliṇḍi. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161).

(vii) King Santanu conducted seven yajñhas on the banks of the Kāliṇḍi. (Vana Parva, Chapter 162).

(viii) The colour of Kāliṇḍi is black. Kāma (Cupid) shot arrows of flower at Śiva, who was lamenting over the death of Satī, and he (Śiva) thus excited to a condition of sinanity jumped into Kāliṇḍi with the result that its water turned black in colour. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 6 and also see under Yamunā).

Kāliṇḍidvipa. It was on this island that Vyāsa was born as the result of the intercourse between Parāśara and Satyavatī. (Īdī Parva, Chapter 60).

Kaliṅga I. Rātu, King of Kaliṅga was present at the swayānmvara of Draupadi. (Śloka 13, Chapter 185 Ādi Parva). Rukmi played a game of dice with Balabhadra with the help of Kaliṅga (for details see under Rukmi). The sage Dirghatamas begot a son of the wife of the aged and senile Kaliṅga and the boy was named Kākṣīvān (Sūkta 125, Anuvāka 18, Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

Kaliṅga II. A warrior of the god Skandha. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 64).

Kaliṅga III. A Daitya who lived in Kṛtayuga. In Skanda Purāṇa there is a story that he conquered heaven, drove away the Dīkṣālakas, posted his own forces in their place and was finally killed by Devī.

Kaliṅga. Śrutiyās, King of Kaliṅga, and a member of Yudhiṣṭhira's assembly. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 4).

Kaliṅga (M) (Kaliṅga). An ancient place in the south of Bhārata.
KALINGADATTA  376  KALPA III

Other details.
(1) Arjuna visited this place while he was on a pilgrimage. (Sloka 9, Chapter 214, Ādi Parva).
(2) Kāliyāga was also included in the countries conquered by Śahadeva while he was on his victory march. (Chapter 31, Sahāśa Parva).
(3) People from Kāliyāga presented Yuddhiśthira with gifts for the Rājasūya. (Sloka 18, Chapter 52, Sahāśa Parva).
(4) Yuddhiśthira visited Kāliyāga while he was on a pilgrimage. (Sloka 4, Chapter 114, Vana Parva).
(5) Karna conquered Kāliyāga while he was on a victory march. (Sloka 8, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).
(6) Śahadeva defeated the King of Kāliyāga. (Sloka 24, Chapter 23, Udypa Parva).
(7) Śrī Kṛṣṇa slaughtered the people of Kāliyāga. (Sloka 76, Chapter 48, Udypa Parva).
(8) The people of Kāliyāga took part in the war between the Pāṇḍavas and Kāública. (Sloka 6, Chapter 20, Droṇa Parva).
(9) Paraśurāma conquered this place. (Sloka 12, Chapter 70, Droṇa Parva).

KALINGASENA. See under Madanamanjūkā.

KALIPRIYĀ. A prostitute. She attained svarga by observing the Kārttikavrama. (Chapter 21, Brahmanhanda, Padma Purāṇa).

KĀLIYA.
1) Birth. Kāśyapa, grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici begot of his wife Kadrū powerful nāgas like Śeṣa, Airāvata, Taksaka, Kārkotaka, Kāliyāga, Maniṁnāga, Purāṇāṅgā etc. and from them were born all kinds of nāgas on earth. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35). Kāliyāga possessed one thousand heads. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).
2) Kāliya took his abode in Kālindī. Vīnātā and Kadrū were wives of Kāśyapa. The former was the mother of Garuḍa and the latter of the nāgas. In a wager Vīnātā was defeated and had to become the slave of Kadrū. Garuḍa brought Amṛta from Devaloka and redeemed his mother from slavery. Yet Garuḍa and the nāgas continued to be enemies, Garuḍa killing and eating nāgas whenever he got a chance for it. At last the nāgas entered into an understanding with Garuḍa agreeing to give him the havis (offering) which they got on certain days, and thus Garuḍa stopped eating the nāgas. But Kāliyāga did not subscribe to the above agreement; he treated Garuḍa with contempt. But, in an encounter with Garuḍa Kāliyāga was put to so much of hardships that he, along with his family, shifted his residence to a particular sector in Kālindī.
3) Admission denied to Garuḍa. Owing to the curse of a sage called Saubhārī, who was performing penence on the banks of Kālindī, that Garuḍa would die broken-headed if he entered Kālindī, it was a prohibited area to Garuḍa.
4) Suppression of Kāliyāga. Owing to the virulent poison of Kāliyāga, the waters of Kālindī became poisonous and the trees on its banks dried up. Once, while Kṛṣṇa and his companions, the Gopālas came to the banks of the river grazing their cows. The Gopālas drank water from the river and fell down dead. Then Kṛṣṇa jumped into the river from the top of a tree on its bank and danced upon the hoods of Kāliyāga who had rushed to attack him. Kāliyāga vomited blood and saluted Kṛṣṇa. His wives and children also saluted the Lord. Kṛṣṇa sent all of them away to Ramanāka island assuring Kāliyāga that Garuḍa would not attack him on seeing the marks of his (Kṛṣṇa’s) feet on Kāliyāga. Thus did Kāliyāga and his family shift their residence to Ramanāka island. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KALIYUGA. See under Manvantara.

KALKI. The tenth avatar (incarnation) of Mahāviṣṇu. The ten avatars are called Daśavatāras. Kalki is the last of them. Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 16 says as follows about the incarnation of Kalki:—
Towards the end of Kaliyuga, all people will lose their faith in God and become irreverent. They will accept presents from the wicked. At that time, there will be intermixture of castes. People will become thieves and evil doers. Fifteen divisions of the Veda Vaiṣṇavas alone will become the authoritative document. People, wearing the garb of righteousness, will indulge in unrighteousness. Mlecchas (lowest class of people) assuming the form of Kings will begin feeding upon human beings. At that time Lord Viṣṇu will incarnate as Kalki, the son of Viṣṇuvaśas and the priest of Yājñavalkya and exterminate all mlecchas. He will restore people to castavāya and the four āramās and maintain proper standards of conduct. Afterwards the Lord will renounce the form of Kalki and ascend Heaven. Then Kṛtayuga will begin again. Chapter 190 of Bhāṣa Bhārata supports almost all the above statements. In the light of them, we can gather certain features of Kalki’s incarnation when Kaliyuga reaches its zenith. Mahāviṣṇu will be born as a Brāhmaṇa with the name Viṣṇuvaśas, in the village called Śambhala. Viṣṇuvaśas will become famous under the name Kalki. He will be the priest of Yājñavalkya. He will create arms and soldiers by his will itself and destroy the wicked. With that Kṛtayuga will commence.

There is difference of opinion as to whether Kalki’s incarnation has passed or is yet to come. But in the light of the statements in the Purāṇas, Kalki has not yet come. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, says that Kaliyuga extends over a period of 4, 32,000 years. It is now only a little over 5,000 years since it began. Still, more than 4, 26, 900 years have to pass before the end of Kaliyuga. Therefore lakhs of years have still to pass before the incarnation of Kalki.

KALMASAŃGHARI. See under the word KALMAŚA-PĀDA.

KALMAŚAPĀDA. (KALMAŚAŃGHRI, MITRASAHA, SAUDĀSA). A famous king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He wandered about in the forest as a Rākṣasa for twelve years.
2) Name. His actual name was Mitrasaha. Since he was the son of Sudāsa, he was called Saudāsa also.
he cooked some human flesh and offered it as food for Vasistha. The enraged sage cursed the King to become a man-eating Rakṣasa who would roam about for twelve years in the woods. Thus Mitrasaha became a Rakṣasa. (Siva Purāṇa, Sivarātri Māhātya).

7) How Mitrasaha got the name "Kalmāṣapāda." Mitrasaha became very angry when he was cursed by Vasistha. He decided to pay back in the same coin by cursing Vasistha also. He took water in his hand and was about to throw it down with the words of curse. But his queen Madayanī stopped him. She reminded him that it was not right to curse a Brāhmaṇa and requested him to sprinkle that water on his own feet. The King’s anger cooled down and he sprinkled the water on his own feet. Since his feet were polluted by the water of sin Mitrasaha came to be called “Kalmāṣapāda”, and Kalmāṣaṅghiri’ from that day. (Siva Purāṇa, Sivarātri Māhātya).

8) Kalmāṣapāda’s life as Rakṣasa. The curse-ridden Kalmāṣapāda began to look upon Vasistha and his sons with invertebrate hatred. He roamed the country-sides and forests in the form of a Rakṣasa. He started man-eating by feeding upon Sakti, the eldest son of Vasistha. After that he ate all the remaining 99 sons of Vasistha. Distressed at the loss of his children, Vasistha left his Āśrama, bent on committing suicide. He tied his own hands and feet securely with a rope and jumped into the river to drown himself. This attempt, like several other attempts to commit suicide, failed and he did not die. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 177). In the Mahābhārata there is a story which says that once Uttānka, a disciple of the sage Gautama went to beg the Kundañallas (ear ornaments) worn by Kalmāṣapāda’s (Saudasa’s) queen, for the sake of Gautama’s wife. (For details, see under the word “Uttānka”).

9) Brāhmaṇi’s curse on Kalmāṣapāda. In the course of his wanderings through the forest as a Rakṣasa, Kalmāṣapāda happened to come across a Brāhmaṇa youth engaged in amorous pleasures with his wife Aṅgirasī. The King caught hold of the youth and killed him. His wife, the Brāhmaṇi wept loudly and after cremating her husband’s body in a funerary pyre, jumped into it and burnt herself to death. Just before her death she pronounced a curse on Kalmāṣapāda that if he touched any woman in future he would die immediately.

After the death of the Brāhmaṇa couple, the sin of Brahmathiyā (killing of Brāhmaṇa) continued to pursue Kalmāṣapāda in the form of a terrible monster. He fled for life from it and at last reached the presence of King Janaka. There, he happened to see the sage Gautama who taught Kalmāṣapāda Divyajñana (Divine wisdom). As advised by the sage, he went to the temple at Gokarna and spent some years in deep meditation. (Siva Purāṇa, Sivarātri Māhātya).

10) Sāpamokṣa. (Liberation from Curse). Towards the close of the twelve years which Mitrasaha (Kalmāṣapāda) spent as a Rakṣasa, Vasistha saw him. The sage sprinkled holy water on Mitrasaha and at once the Rakṣasa (the spirit of the Rakṣasa) left his body and he resumed his original figure of the King. He accepted Vasistha as his preceptor. They went back together to Ayodhya.

Although Madayanī, queen of Mitrasaha was there, the King was not able to touch her owing to the Brāhmaṇi’s curse. So he requested Vasiṣṭha to beget children by her. Accordingly Madayanti became pregnant by Vasiṣṭha. But she did not deliver the child even after twelve years. At last she hit the embryo in her womb with a stone and the child was born. Since he was born with the help of a stone (A'sman), the child was named “A'maka”. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 167).

KALMĀŚI. A river. It was while travelling by the side of this river, that King Drupada reached a Brāhmaṇa village where he happened to meet Upāyāja. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 166). Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 78, Verse 16 says that it was on the bank of this river that the sage Bṛgū blessed Yaduhiṣṭhira. (Modern scholars believe that Kannmāśi is the same as the present river Yamuna).

KĀLODAKA. A sacred place. The sin of causing abortion of those who bathe in the tīrtha here will be washed away. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 60 and Sānti Parva, Chapter 152, Verse 12).

KALPA I. A son of Dhruva. See under DHRUVA.

KALPA II. A period of one thousand Yugas or fourteen Manvantaras. See under MANVANTARA.

KALPA III. The customary proceedings of Yāgas. These proceedings are made in the form of Śūtras. The Śūtras describe how the Brāhmaṇas and mantras are to be used. For each Śāhīṭha there are separate Śrāuta Śūtras. The Śrāuta Śūtras for Rgveda Śāhīṭha are Āvalāyana, Śānkṣāyana and Saunaka. Those for Śāmaveda are Maśaka, Lātīyāyana and Drāhyāyana. Those for Kṛṣṇa Yajurveda are Āpastamba Baudhāyana, Satyāśādha, Hiranyakesī, Mānava, Bhāradvāja, Vādhūla, Vaikāhāsana, Laugāksi, Maitra, Kāthā and Vārāha. For Suklayajurveda it is Kātyāyana Śrāuta Śūtra. For Athravaveda it is Kauśika Śrāuta Śūtra. All these Śūtras contain only brief symbolic words and are difficult to understand without explanation.

KALPAKA. Śiva's garden. It is situated in Kailāsa. (Kathāsārasāgara, Kathāpāṭhakalambaka, Part I).

KALPAVRKṢA. A tree in Devaloka. It has the power of giving any object that one wishes to get. There are five Kalpavrksas in Devaloka. Their names are: Mandāra, Pārijāta, Santāna, Kalpavrksa and Haricandana.

Agni Purāṇa, third Chapter mentions that among the wonderful things obtained by the churning of the ocean of milk, there was Kalpavrksa also. So Kalpavrksa was born from the ocean of milk.

KALYĀṇA (KĀL). Mother of Vyāsa. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KALYĀṇA. A sage. Once certain Ātigiras including this sage observed sattra (sacrifice) for the attainment of Heaven. But nobody was sure about the Devayāna path which leads to Heaven. So they selected Kalyāṇa to find out the path. He went in search of the Devayāna path and on the way he met Uṛṇāyu, a Gandharwa who was in the company of some apsārā women. The gandharwa disclosed the Sāma which would enable Kalyāṇa to find out the Devayāna path. On his return, Kalyāṇa told the other Rṣis that he had received the Sāma, but he refused to disclose from whom he obtained it. With the help of that Sāma known as Aurnāyuva, the Aṭigiras attained Heaven, but because of his failure to disclose the whole truth, Kalyāṇa was denied access to Heaven. Besides that, he became a victim to the disease of leprosy. (Paṇca-viṁśa Brahmaṇam).

KALYĀṇI. A female follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 6).

K MA I. God of beauty in Indian mythology.

1) General. A Prajāpati named Dharma was born from the right breast of Brahma. Dharma was very handsome. Three sons, Śama, Kāma and Harṣa who were exceedingly handsome, were born to him. Of them, Kāma became the god of beauty. His wife was Rāti. Śama became the husband of Prāpti. Harṣa had Nandā for his wife. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verses 31-33).

In Kālikā Purāṇa we see another story about Kāma's birth. Brahma created ten Prajāpatis. After that, the woman Sandhyā was created. At the very moment of her birth, Brahma and the Prajāpatis were irresistibly fascinated by her charm and they sprang up from their seats. All their thoughts converged on the same object. At this time a handsome youth emerged from Brahma's mind with a floral bow in his hands. Immediately after his birth, he asked Brahma "Kain darpayāmi" (Whom should I make proud ?) Brahma replied—Let the minds of living beings be the aim of your arrows”. He suggested Rāti the daughter of Dakṣa, to be Kāma's wife. Since he stirred the mind of Brahma, he got the name "MANNATHA", and since he was extremely attractive in appearance he came to be called "KĀMA". (For further details, see under "RATI.")

2) How Kāmadeva got the name "KANDARPA". As soon as Kāma was born, he went to Brahma and asked him "Kāṁ darpayāmi"? (Whom should I make proud?) Therefore he got the name "KANDARPA". (Kathāsārītsāgara).

3) Brahma cursed Kāma. Once Brahma was meditating upon Para Brahman for the purpose of creation. He felt carnal thoughts rising in his mind. At once a girl was born from his mind. She appeared before him and did obeisance to him. This girl was Sarasvatī. Brahma fell in love with her. He declared that she should stay in the tongues of all living beings, and particularly at the tip of the tongues of all scholars. After that he made Sarasvatī his wife. Soon he felt repentant for his weakness of mind. His anger blazed at Kāma who was the cause of all this. He cursed that Kāma would be burnt to ashes in the fire from Śiva's third eye. After that Brahma gave his carnal desire to the great sage Atri who transferred it to his wife Anasūyā. It hardened itself within her and took the form of Candra, who was thus born to her. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 43).

4) Kāma was burnt up in fire. Long ago an Asura named Tāraka, who was proud of his invincible might, was causing much havoc and terror in the whole world. Even the gods were afraid of him because he had received a boon that Śiva's son alone was capable of killing him. It was the time when Pārvati, the daughter of Himavān, was performing a penance praying that Paramesvarā should become her husband. Taking advantage of this opportunity, Indra sent Kāma to rouse the passion of love in Śiva's mind. Kāma reached Śiva's seat and tried to stir up his passions. Śiva who was enraged at this, opened his third eye blazing with fire. Kāma was burnt to ashes in that fire. The place where Kāma's body (Āṅga) fell, came to be called "Āṅgarājya". Since he lost his body, Kāmadeva got another name "Āṅgaga". (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa. Bala Kāṇḍa, Chapter 23).

5) Kāma’s Next Birth. When Śiva burnt up Kāma, the latter’s wife Rati prayed to Śiva to restore her husband to life. Śiva was pleased and said that Rati would be born in the world and Kāma would take birth as her son." (Kathāśaritāśagara). According to Śiva’s blessing Rati was born in the world under the name of Māyāvati. She became the kitchen-maid of an Aṣura named Śambara. At that time Śrī Kṛṣṇa approached Śiva with a request that he should be blessed with a son. Śiva blessed him saying that Kāma who was burnt up in the fire of his eye would be born as the son of Rukmiṇi, Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s wife. Accordingly, Rukmiṇi, conceived and a handsome child was born to her. Śambara, who employed Māyāvati as his kitchen-maid had received a boon from Śiva. A condition laid down in it was that Śambara would die not long after Kāmadeva’s birth in the world. So Śambara was making careful inquiries to ascertain whether Kāma was born anywhere in the world. It was during this period that Śambara received the news that Kāma had been reborn as Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s son. At once he went secretly to Rukmiṇi’s house and stole the little baby and threw it into the sea. A sea-fish swallowed the child and a fisherman who caught it presented it to Śambara. When Śambara cut it open, lie saw a lovely baby inside the fish. He entrusted the child to Māyāvati to be brought up.

At this stage, the sage Nārada happened to come there and he explained to Māyāvati in secret, that the baby was Kāmadeva and she was Rati. From that time, she brought up the child with great affection and tenderness. As years passed and Kāma grew up into a youth, Māyāvati began to make amorous advances towards him. Looking upon her with regard due to a mother, Kāma was displeased with these advances. Then she told him what Nārada had disclosed to her about their relations in the past life. She advised him to kill Śambara and to leave the place for Dvārakā as soon as possible. As advised by her, Kāma killed Śambara and both he and Māyāvati went to Dvārakā in a Vimāna and paid their respects to their parents there. In the presence of a large number of sages, Kāma was christened “Pradhumma”. Aniruddha, the husband of Uṣa, was the son of Pradhumma. Besides Aniruddha, Pradhumma had a daughter Trśa.

6) Other names of Kāma. The following names have been used for Kāma in the Purāṇas:—Madana, Manmatha, Māra, Pradhumma, Minaketana, Kandarpa, Darpaka, Anaṅga, Kāma, Pāṇcaśara, Śambarāri, Manasiṣa, Kusumena, Ananyaja, Puspadhavā, Rati-pati, Makaradhvaja, Aṭambhī, Trāja, Iṣma, Kiniṅka, Abhirūpa, Gaṛdhukālakēli, Kālaṇja, Ramaṇa, Dipaka, Madhuhidā, Samāntaka, Muhira, Rūpāstra, Vāma, Puspaketana. Makaraketu, Ratiniyaka, Rāgavrnta, Samśāraguru, Gadayitum, Māpatya, Māyi.

7) Kāma’s weapons. Kāma has a bow made of sugar-cane, its string is made up of beetles, and the tips of his arrows are flowers. His vehicle is the parrot and the sign on his banner is fish. The five flowers of his arrows are:—Aravinda, Aśoka, Gātu, Navamālīka, Nilotpala. Besides these, he has five more arrows which are—Unāśa, Tāpana, Soṣaṇa, Sambhana and Sammo-hana. (Amara Rōta).

KĀMĀ I. An Agni who was the son of Svāhādevī. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva. Chapter 219, Verse 23 says that this agni was of inimitable beauty.

KĀMĀ II. Another name for Paramēsvara. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 42).

KĀMĀ III. Another name for Maḥāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 45).

KĀMĀ V. A great sage. There is a reference to this sage in Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 41.

KĀMĀ. Daughter of Pṛthuśravas. She was the wife of Ayutanāyī, a king of the Pūru dynasty and mother of Akrodhana. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 177).

KĀMĀṬHA (KĀMĀṬHAKA). A serpent born in Dhararāṣṭra’s family. This serpent was burnt up in Janamejaya’s sarpasattra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 16).

KĀMACARĪ. A woman follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 23).

KĀMADĀ. Another woman follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 27).

KĀMADEVA. See under Kāma.

KĀMADHENU. (SURABHĪ—NANDINI).

1) General. She is the first mother of cattle. She is a goddess with marvellous powers and attainments who gives milk whenever needed by gods and sages. The Purāṇas declare that all the cattle in the world today are descended from Kāmadhenu.

2) Three different names. This sacred cow is sometimes called “Kāmadhenu”; at other times, “Surabhi” and also “Nandini”. They are not three different cows, as some people suppose. See Bhāṣā Bhārata, Aranyā Parva Chapter 9, Verses 7 and 17. There Surabhi and Kāmadhenu are names used for referring to the same cow. Again, in the Bhāṣā Bhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 14, we find the name Nandini applied to Kāmadhenu. Thus we may conclude that Kāmadhenu had two other names, viz. Surabhi and Nandini. But since the term “Surabhirgavi” occurs in Amarakośa, it follows that even ordinary cows may be called “Surabhi”.

3) Birth and family. In the Purāṇas Surabhi is described variously as Dakṣa’s daughter, Kaśyapa’s wife, Kaśyapa’s daughter, etc. Although at first sight there may appear some discrepancy in these statements, in the light of them we may clearly arrive at the ancestry and birth of Surabhi. Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, 14th Sarga says that Kaśyapa, the son of Marici and the grandson of Brahmā married Dakṣa Prājapati’s daughters—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālikā, Tāmrā, Krodha-vāsā, Manu and Analā. From verses 20 and 21 in the same Sarga we understand that Surabhi was the daughter of Krodhavāsā, Dakṣa’s daughter, by Kaśyapa. In the same Sarga we find that two daughters, Rohiṇī and Gandharvī were born to this Surabhi and from Rohiṇī were born all the cows in the world that we see today. and from Gandhari were born all the horses. It was by her own father Kaśyapa himself that Surabhi's offsprings were born. Therefore, the reference to Surabhi as the wife of Kaśyapa may also be justified. 2 Since Krodhavāsī, the daughter of Dakṣa was the mother of Surabhi, actually Surabhi was the grand-daughter of Dakṣa. But in a broad sense, a grand-daughter may be considered as a daughter. So the reference to Surabhi in Bhāṣā Bhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 28 as Dakṣa's daughter is correct in that sense.

4) How Kāmadhenu Received Divine Powers. Long ago Aditi, wife of Kaśyapa, conceived Mahāviṣṇu in her womb and began an austere penance standing on one leg. At that time Surabhi went to Kailāsā and offered worship to Brahmā for ten thousand years. The gods who were pleased, came to Surabhi taking Brahmā with them.
Brahmā said to her:—Surabhi I have made you a goddess. You are now above the three worlds—Heaven Earth and Hell. Your world, “Goloka” will become famous. All people will worship you and the cows who are your off spring.”

From that day on which Brahmā blessed her, Surabhi became a goddess with marvellous spiritual powers.
(M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 83).

5) More than one Kāmadhenu. There are references to several Kāmadhnus in the Purāṇas. There is one Kāmadhenu in Vaiśiṣṭha’s Āśrama. At Varuṇa’s yāga we see another Kāmadhenu. There is no ground for believing that there is only one Kāmadhenu and that it was borrowed by each Deva in turn for some particular occaision. It is possible that there were many Kāmadhnus in the family of Kāmadhenu and they were owned by different Devas. Moreover it is stated that several Kāmadhnus take their origin from sources other than the family of Kaśyapa. One of them is from the ocean of milk. In Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 18, we find that when the Devas and Asuras churned the ocean of milk, along with many other precious things, Kāmadhenu also came up to the surface.

There is a reference to another Kāmadhenu in Bhāṣā Bhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, There, it is said, Brahmā who got Amṛta swallowed it beyond limit in his avidity and when he vomited, a Kāmadhenu came out from his mouth. That Kāmadhenu is said to be living in the world known as Rāśātala. The above-mentioned passage also says that there are four other Kāmadhnus living on the four sides of the Kāmadhenu which lives in Rāśātala. They are Saurabhā in the east Hāṁśikā in the south, Subhadrā in the west and Dhenu in the north.

The next Kāmadhenu is the one which was born from the side of Śrī Kaṛṣṇa. Once Śrī Kaṛṣṇa and his consort Rādā were amusing themselves by amorous pleasures in a remote and secluded place. When they were tired they wished to drink some milk. At that time, Śrī Kaṛṣṇa created by his will power, the cow Saurabhā and the calf Manorathā, from the left side of his body. Śrī-dāman milked that cow into a new earthen pot and when Śrī Kaṛṣṇa was drinking it, the pot fell down and the milk was spilt all over the floor. The milk which spread over an area of 100 yojanas, became a lake called “Kṣīrāgārā” for Rādā and her maids to bathe and enjoy water-sports. Numerous cows were born from the pores of Saurabhā and they were presented to the Gopas by Śrī Kaṛṣṇa. (Devī Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

Like this, several Kāmadhnus are seen in the Purāṇas.
Therefore there is no discrepancy or contradiction in statements declaring that there were many Kāmadhnus in different Āśramas. But since Kāmadhenu had achieved divine powers by Brahmā’s grace, it is but reasonable to believe that the different Kāmadhnus are really the different forms of the original Kāmadhenu, the daughter of Kaśyapa.

6) Theft of Kāmadhenu by Satyavrata (Trīśāṅku). Satyavrata (Trīśāṅku) was the son of Aruna, a King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He was a vicious and immoral fellow.
Once he abducted a Brāhmaṇa girl just at the time of her marriage in her bridal dress. Enraged at this his father drove him away from his palace. Satyavrata wandered about aimlessly in the country and in the forests.

Soon after this there was a famine in the land. Human beings and animals began to die of starvation. At that time Viśvāmitra was performing penance in the forest after leaving behind his wife and children in the county.
When he saw that the whole family was in danger of death by starvation, he decided to make some money by selling one of the sons, in order to save the lives of the rest of the family. Satyavrata who came to know of this, met Viśvāmitra and dissuaded him from selling his son. He promised to supply some flesh every day to the family by hunting animals in the forest and keeping the flesh suspended from the branch of a near-by tree.
Accordingly, he began leaving the flesh regularly hanging from the branch of the tree. One day he could not get any flesh by hunting. That night he went to Vaiśiṣṭha’s āśrama and stole Kāmadhenu. He killed the cow and ate some of its flesh. The rest he gave to Viśvāmitra’s family.

The next morning when Vaiśiṣṭha woke up, he did not see his cow. But he came to know of the whole affair by his intuition. In his fury he cursed Satyavrata and said that the world would brand him with the name “Trīśāṅku” because he had committed three heinous sins viz.
killing of cows, abducting another man’s wife and incurring his father’s displeasure. After that Vaiśiṣṭha restored Kāmadhenu to life. (Devī Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

7) Viśvāmitra attacked Kāmadhenu. Once while Viśvāmitra was a ruling King, he went into a forest to hunt.
In the course of his rambles through the forest, he happened to arrive at Vaiśiṣṭha’s āśrama with his retinue.
Vaiśiṣṭha called Kāmadhenu and ordered her to provide food for Viśvāmitra and his party. Kāmadhenu, by her divine powers, prepared food within a short time and gave them a sumptuous meal; Viśvāmitra was greatly pleased with this amazing feat of Kāmadhenu and he asked Vaiśiṣṭha to give her to him. He even offered to give cормes of cows in return for her. But Vaiśiṣṭha refused to comply with his request. Then Viśvāmitra tried to seize and take her away by force.

At once Kāmadhenu assumed the form of a terrible monster of destruction. From the different parts of her body emerged fierce warriors who clashed with Viśvāmitra’s followers. All the arrows shot by Viśvāmitra were caught by Vaiśiṣṭha with his hand. In the end Viśvāmitra admitted that the might of a Brāhmaṇa is superior to the might of a Kṣatriya. (Vaiśiṣṭha was a Brāhmaṇa and Viśvāmitra a Kṣatriya). Viśvāmitra, soon gave up his kingly duties and began penance, thus turning himself into a “Rājaśī” (Royal saint). (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kānda, 52nd Sarga; M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40; M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 175).

8) Kāmadhenu was attacked by the Aṣṭa Vasus. (See under the word “Aṣṭavasus”, Para 2).

9) Kāmadhenu cried. (See under the word “Indra”, Para 16).

10) Kāmadhenu revived King Baka. (See under the word “Gautama”).

11) Other details.
(i) Kāmadhenu gave birth to Ajāsa, Ekapāt, Ahirbudhnya, Tvaṣṭā and Rudra. Viśvarūpa was the son of Tvaṣṭā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).
(ii) Kāmadhenu said that she had no part in the theft of Agastya’s lotus. (M.B. Anuśāsaṇa Parva, Chapter 94).
(iii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa turned Govardhana mountain into an umbrella and defeated Indra when Kāmadhenu came to Gokula and bathed Śrī Kṛṣṇa with her milk according to Bāhāgavata, 10th Skandha.
(iv) Once the sage Jāmadagni went to Goloka and propitiated Kāmadhenu by his tapas. Kāmadhenu gave her sister Suśilā to Jāmadagni. The sage presented that cow to his wife Renukā. (Brahma-nāṇa Purāṇa, Chapter 61).

KAMALĀ I. Mother of Prahlāda. (Padma Purāṇa).

KAMALĀ II. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 9, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva, M.B.).

KAMALĀKṢA I. A great warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Duryodhana sent this warrior along with Śakuni to attack Arjuna. (Chapter 156, Drona Parva, M.B.).

KAMALĀKṢA II. A son of Tārākāsura. He was one of the famous trio of demons. For details see under ‘Tripura’.

KAMALĀKṣI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KAMALĀVRATA. See under “Jayaśārman”.

KAMANDAKA. A great sage of ancient times. (Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 123) states that this sage once taught Rājadharma (kingly duties) to King Aṅgirās.

KĀMĀPALA. A Yādava dependant of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KĀMĀTRA I. A King of a country called Kāmba. This King was a prominent member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Śloka 22, Chapter 4, Śabha Parva).

KĀMA I. A great sage. He became a realised soul by his penance. (Chapter 296, Śānti Parva, M.B.).

KAMĀTRīTHERA. A sacred place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 105 says that a man who takes his bath in this holy tirtha will have all his wishes fulfilled.

KAMBA. A prominent serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Chapter 33, Ādi Parva, M.B.). The Prayāga tirtha was the abode of this serpent.

KAMBA. A part of Kuṣāṇḍa, (Island of Kuṣā), (Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva, M.B.).

KAMBAR. A celebrated Tamil poet. He was born in a poor family. At the orders of the King many poets wrote the story of Rāmāyana in Tamil. But Kambar’s work was accepted as the best. This is the renowned Kamba Rāmāyaṇa. Kambar has written many other poems of which the important ones are Sarasvati Antādi and Kānci Purāṇa. It is said that unintelligent children of Tamil nādu are even now given sand from the burial ground of Kambar to induce intelligence into them. (The (—r) suffix in Kambir is plural denoting respect. (See under ‘Bhadradāl’).

KĀMBOJA I. Sudākṣiṇa, the King of the country, Kāmba. He was present at Draupadi’s swayamvara. In Mahābhārata, Karpa Parva, Chapter 156 we read that his younger brother was killed by Arjuna. The Kings of Kāmba were all known as Kāmbojas. Long ago, this country was ruled by a King named Kāmba. In Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 166, Verse 77, we see that this Kāmba was given a sword by the King Dhundhumāra. Perhaps it was from this King Kāmba that the country came to be called ‘Kāmba’.

KĀMBOJA II. This kingdom was situated in the north western part of India. It is the modern Kabul. We get the following information from Mahābhārata.

1) From Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27, Verse 23, we see that Arjuna had subdued this Kingdom.

2) The horses which were tied to Yudhiṣṭhīra’s chariot were brought from Kāmba. (M.B. Sabha Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 5).

3) The Mlecchas (a tribe of low-class people) of Kāmba will become Kings in Kaliyuga. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 188, Verse 36).

4) There were Kāmbojas in Duryodhana’s army. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 160, Verse 130).

5) At the time of Mahābhārata the King of Kāmba was the brave and heroic Sudākṣiṇa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 166, Verses 1-3).

6) In the battle between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas, the Kāmbojas took their position in some places in the “Garuda Vṝ̄uha”, a phalanx in the shape of an eagle made by Bhīma. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 7).

7) The horses of Kāmba were beautiful in appearance and of the colour of parrots. The horses which were tied to Nakula’s chariot, were of this kind. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 7).

8) When the horses of Kāmba ran, their tails and cars remained motionless. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 36, Verse 36).

KAMBUGRIVA. Son of Sudhanvā, King of the country of Madra. Candrasena, King of Sinhala, tried to get his daughter Mandodari married to this King. But Mandodari did not consent to it. (5th Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

KĀMODĀ. A goddess who came out of the churning of the ocean of milk. (For further details see under ‘Vihunḍa’).

KAMPA. A prince of Vṛṣṇivaniśa. He became a Viśvadeva after his death. (Chapter 5, Svaragārohaṇa Parva M.B.).

KAMPANA I. A mighty King. He was a prominent member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Chapter 4, Śabha Parva, M.B.).

KAMPANA II. A demon. (See under Nāhuṣa).

KAMPANĀ. A river. If one bathes in this river one will get the benefit of doing a Puṇḍarīka yajña. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KĀMPILYA. An ancient town in South Pāñcāla. It was the capital city of King Drupada. Sikhandi had come to this city after his marriage. Once the King Dāṣārtha came near this place and sent a Brahma messenger to Kāmpilya. In olden days, a King named Brahmadatta used to rule over this city. (M.B. Udyoga Parva). See under the word ‘Brahmadatta’.

Kāṃśa 1. Son of Ugrasena, King of Mathurā, and an incarnation of an Asura called Kāḷānemi.

2) Kāṃśa, an incarnation of Kāḷānemi. In the svāyambhūvanavantara Marici had a wife named Uṛnā and they had six mighty and powerful sons. One day they ridiculed Brahmā saying ‘A father who has married his own daughter’ (Brahmā married Sarasvatī, his own daughter). Brahmā became angry and cursed them to be born as demons on earth. All the six sons were, therefore, born as sons of a demon called Kāḷānemi on earth. In their next birth they were born as sons of Hiranyakāsīpu. They led a pious life and pleased at this Brahmā asked them what they wanted and they demanded that they should not be killed by anybody. Their father, Hiranyakāsīpu, did not like his sons getting a boon behind his back and so he cursed his sons ‘May you all six go to Pātāla (nether-world) and sleep there for a long time under the name of Saḍarbhakas. The sons begged for relief and Hiranyakāsīpu said that they would after sleeping for a long time be born to Devaki, wife of Vasudeva, as their children and that Kāḷānemi, their father in their previous birth would then be born as Kāṃśa and kill the children of Devaki by striking their heads on the ground.

Accordingly Kāḷānemi was born as Kāṃśa and he killed the six children of Devaki by striking them on the ground. (Skandha 4, Devi Bhāgavata).

The 10th Skandha of Bhāgavata states “killing Kāḷānemi born as Kāṃśa” when it refers to the killing of Kāṃśa.

3) Another story regarding the birth of Kāṃśa. Kāṃśa was not actually the son of Ugrasena. It was Nārada who revealed to Kāṃśa the story of his birth. It is as follows.

Once when the wife of Ugrasena was in her menses she went to the garden with her companions. Then a Gandharva named Drahila disguised as Ugrasena went to her but she knew the trick and cursed him that he would go to hell. But Drahila committed rape on her and then left the place making her pregnant. When the child was born Ugrasena’s wife greatly hated the child got of an evil deed and cursed it saying that the child would be killed by a member of the family of Ugrasena. Thus Kāṃśa was the son born to the wife of Ugrasena by the Gandharva, Drahila. It was because Kāṃśa was aware of it that he behaved very badly to Ugrasena and Kṛṣṇa. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) How Kāṃśa got Mathurāpuri. In olden times there was a famous place called Madhuvana in the river-base of Kālindī. The place got the name of Madhuvana because the demon Madhu was residing there.

Madhu had a son named Lavaṇa. Lavaṇa was a very wicked demon always ill-treating the devas. Satrughna, son of Dāṣaratha, killed him and lived there establishing a beautiful kingdom there. He named that place Mathurā. After the death of Satrughna two of his sons ruled that country. Then when the Sūrya dynasty became extinct the city of Mathurā came into the possession of the Yadu dynasty. It was ruled then by a very brave and valiant ruler named Sūrāsenā. Vasudeva father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa was the son of Sūrāsenā. After the death of Sūrāsenā another King of the Yadava dynasty, Ugrasena, became the ruler of the place, Vasudeva accepting cow-rearing as his profession. Kāṃśa became King keeping Ugrasena as a prisoner. (Skandha 4, Devi Bhāgavata).

Hearing this voice from heaven Kāṃśa got furious and dragging his sister by the hair raised his sword to kill her. Vasudeva then pleaded weeping not to kill Devaki. Only the eighth child of Devaki was going to kill him. Vasudeva would hand over all the children to him as soon as they were born. Such arguments pacified Kāṃśa and he left off Devaki without hurting her.

Devaki delivered a son. He grew up under the name of Kṛtīmāṇ and one day Nārada visited Kāṃśa and told him that he was the incarnation of an Asura named Kāḷānemi and the son who would be born to Devaki to kill him was Nārāyaṇa. Kāṃśa, blind with fury, killed Kṛtīmāṇ by striking him on the earth and imprisoned both Devaki and Vasudeva.

6) Man-hunt of Kāṃśa. Pralamba, Cānūra, Tṛṇāvarta, Muṣṭika, Arīṣṭaka, Keśi, Dhenuka, Agha, Vivida and Pūtāṇa were born in the Asura family as servants of Kāṃśa. He sent them to different sides of the country to torment the Yadavas. Many Yadavas left the place. Even Kāṃśa’s father Ugrasena, a great devotee of Viṣṇu was teased.

In the meantime Devaki delivered six sons including Kṛtīmāṇ and all of them were killed by Kāṃśa by smashing their heads against the ground below. The seventh foetus of Devaki was aborted. (Instructed by Mahāviṣṇu, Māyādevi invoked the seventh foetus of Devaki and transferred it to the womb of Rohini, another wife of Vasudeva. The child thus born to Rohini was Saṅkarṣaṇa or Balabhadrārāma. Mahāviṣṇu then entered the womb of Devaki instructing Māyādevi to enter that of Yāsodā, wife of Nandagopa of Ambāḍi at the same time. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was then born in the figure of Viṣṇu. The watchmen were sleeping. Following directions from the new-born child Vasudeva took the child to Gokula and leaving the child there brought back the child of Yāsodā and placed it near Devaki. When the watchmen awoke and knew about the delivery of Devaki they immediately ran to Kāṃśa to tell him. Boiling with rage Kanîsa rushed to the side of Devaki and taking the child by the legs raised it for smashing it against the ground. The child to the frightened dismay of Kanîsa slipped from his hand and rising up in the air said “His, ill-mannered wicked Kanîsa, do not waste your valour on women. Your killer has already been born on earth. Do search for him quickly.”

Kanîsa went pale with fright on hearing this and went away to his palace.

7) Conspiracy of Kanîsa. The thought that his killer was born somewhere made him restless. He let off Vásudeva and Devaki finding them innocent. Then he sat sadly pondering over the future. The courtiers then advised him to kill all the children who had been born within the past ten days and that would include the killer also. Kanîsa accordingly sent to different parts of the country his secret agents to kill all children, ten days old.

During this campaign Pūtanâ, Śakâta, Tûñâvarta, Aritṣa and Kesî tried to kill Śrî Kṛṣṇa also but Kṛṣṇa killed them all easily. (For details see under each head separately. (10th Skandha, Bhağavata).

8) Kanîsa is slain. Aritṣa was one of the prominent Asuras sent to kill Kṛṣṇa. He attacked Kṛṣṇa in the form of an ox. Śrî Kṛṣṇa killed it without any difficulty. Nârada who saw this incident informed Kanîsa about it saying that Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma were the sons of Vásudeva only and the child who slipped out of his hands was the child of Yasodâ. Kanîsa got furious and he again imprisoned Vásudeva and Devaki and brought to Mathurâ Śrî Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrârâma and started thinking of ways and means to kill them. Kanîsa arranged to conduct a grand celebration of Ayudhapûja (worship of the weapons) and invited Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma for the same among many other gopas from Ambâdi. He sent his chariot with Akrûra to fetch Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma from Ambâdi. Akrûra privately informed Kṛṣṇa of the bad intentions of Kanîsa. Nandagopa and many others from Ambâdi started for Mathurâ. When Śrî Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrârâma started their journey in the chariot the gopas and gopikis assembled there cried loudly. Some blamed Akrûra.

Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma reached Mathurâ. There they slew a huge wild elephant and the five Asuras, Cûrûra, Mûśîka, Kûta, Sala and Kosala whom Kanîsa had kept ready to kill Kṛṣṇa and Râma. Sitting on a platform watching this, Kanîsa became frightened and restless and roared with rage thus “The sons of Nandagopa should be instantly sent away from this palace. All their wealth and all that of the gopas should be confiscated. Bind with ropes the rogue Nandagopa, and kill the wicked Vásudeva. Throw my father, Ugrasena, into the river Kâlindi bound hand and foot. Even a father should be killed if he was a relative of one’s enemy."

Śrî Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma boiled with rage when they heard the orders of Kanîsa and Kṛṣṇa, jumping on to the platform pushed Kanîsa down and jumping down along with him killed him. (10th Skandha, Bhağavata).
benefit of performing an Ā́śvamedha sacrifice. (Śloka 30, Chapter 84, Vana Parva). Kālidāsa speaks about this place in his famous work ‘Mehadūta’. At the behest of Vasiṣṭha, Taksaka, son of Lakṣmana, conquered the foresters of Kānakhaḷa and then established a city there called Agaṭī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KĀNCANA I. One of the two warriors given to Skandadeva by Mahāmeru. The other warrior was named Meghamālī. (M.B. Śālīya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 47).

KĀNCANA II. A King of the Pūru dynasty. See under the word PŪRUVAMŚA.

KĀNCANĀKṢA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śālīya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 57).

KĀNCANĀKṢṬI. A river which flows through Naimiśāranya. This is a part of the river Sarasvatī. (M.B. Śālīya Parva, Chapter 38, Verse 19).

KĀNCANAMĀLĀ. A lady attendant of Vāsavadattā, wife of Udayana.

KĀNCĪ (KĀNCĪPURA). This was the capital city of the Cola Kings. This city was also called “Kāncīvaram”. It is mentioned among the holy cities. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 21).

KANDARĀ. Another follower of Skandadeva. (Chapter 46, Śālīya Parva).

KANDARPA. Another name for Kāmadēva. Kāmadēva was born of the mind of Brahmā and as soon as he was born he turned to Bṛhadā and asked “Kāh darpayāmī?” (Whom should I make proud?) So Bṛhadā gave him the name Kandarpa alias Kandarpa. (Lāvāṇakalamba, Kathāsārītisāgara, Taranga 6).

KANṆU. A great sage of ancient Bhrārata. He was the father of Mārīṣā (Vṛksī) wife of the Pracetas.

1) Birth of Mārīṣā. Mārīṣā, daughter of Kanḍu, took her birth from a tree. There is an interesting story about this in Viśṇu Purāṇa.

Sage Kanḍu, chief of the devajīnas, was performing penance in a hermitage on the banks of the river Gomati. Devendra sent Pramlocā, an enchanting nymph, to Kanḍu to distract him from his penance. Pramlocā by her sweet words and enticing manners won the heart of the sage and Kanḍu accepting her as his wife went to the valley of Mandara and lived there happily for a hundred years.

One day Pramlocā went and bowed before her husband and sought his permission to go back to Devaloka.

“Dear, stay here for some time more” replied the sage. Another hundred years went by. Again one day she went and sought permission to go home. Again the sage asked her to stay for a while more. Centuries passed without the sage losing even a little of his amour. On the other hand every day it found different channels of expression. One evening the sage stepped out of his Āśrama and on seeing that Pramlocā enquired where he was going.

Sage: The sun is going to set. I am going to do my sandhyāvandana. I do not want to bring a break in my daily ablutions and duties.

Pramlocā: Oh, Righteous one, did the sun set for you only today? The Sunset of hundreds of years has gone by without your knowing.

Sage: Dear, you came to this holy river-shore only this morning. It was only this morning that I saw you coming to my Āśrama for the first time. Now the day is over and dusk is coming. Why this ridicule? Please do tell me the truth.

Pramlocā: That I came to you one fine morning is quite true. But since that several centuries have elapsed.

Sage: How many years have gone by since I started enjoying with you?

Pramlocā: Nine hundred years, six months and three days have passed since I came to you.

The great sage became very angry and scolded Pramlocā much. That beautiful maiden heard it all standing bathed in perspiration. The sage in rage commanded the trembling nymph to go away from his presence. Pramlocā, thus reprimanded and sent away, rose up in the air and travelled by it. As she flew, the perspiration of her body was absorbed by the tender leaves of trees on the way. She was pregnant at that time and the embryo which went forth along with her perspiration was absorbed in bits by the tender leaves and sprouts. Wind gathered them from the different trees and made everything into one. Moonlight gave it development and gave it the form of a woman. She was named Mārīṣā. That was how Mārīṣā was born of trees (Chapter 15, Anīṣa 1. Viśṇu Purāṇa).

2) Curse of Kanḍu. Kanḍu’s dear son aged sixteen died in a forest. Grief-stricken, the sage cursed that forest and made it a desert. There was no water there and all the trees became dried and dead. Hanumān and party who went in search of Śītā came to this place. (Chapter 48, Kiśkindhā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Kanḍu in the presence of Śrī Rāma. When Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhyā after his exile many sages from all the four different parts came to visit him. Those who came from the south were Kanḍu, Dattātreya Namuci, Pramuci, Vālmiki, Sona and Agastya. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KĀṆḌUTI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 14, Chapter 46, Śālīya Parva).

KĀṆIKA I.

1) General information. One of the ministers of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was a brahmin well-learned in Kūṭāṅñī (Diplomacy). The bad advice he gave to Dhṛtarāṣṭra became well-known as “Kāṇika’s Kūṭāṅñī”.

2) Kāṇika’s Kūṭāṅñī. Once Dhṛtarāṣṭra asked Kāṇika how to conquer one’s enemies by using the four methods of Sāma, Dāna, Bheda and Daṇḍa. Kāṇika replied: “Threaten the timid ones. Give respect to the brave and kill them by trickery. Give gifts to the greedy ones. If any one becomes your enemy kill him even if it be your father, preceptor, son, brother or friend. Never speak insulting words about others even when you are extremely angry. Never believe the faithful and unfaithful alike.”

3) Kāṇika’s story. Kāṇika justified his policy by means of the story of a fox who put into practice the four tricks to gain his end.

Once there was a very selfish fox in a forest. He felt a desire to eat the flesh of a lion. For that end he made friends with a tiger, a rat and a mongoose. The fox advised the rat to gnaw the paws of the lion and make it lame. The tiger should then kill the lion. The lion was killed and the fox suggested that they could have a hearty meal of the lion after a bath. Everybody excepting the fox went for his bath and the fox stood watch over the carcass of the lion. First came the tiger after his bath. The fox looked worried and the tiger asked him the reason why. The fox said "Comrade, the rat says with arrogance that he it was that killed the lion. My pride does not allow me to eat what the rat claims to be his kill." Hearing this the proud tiger left the place saying "Let me see whether I can kill my prey without the help of anybody."

Sometime later the rat came after its bath. The sly fox said "My friend, the mongoose says that the flesh of a lion is poison. It says "Let the rat eat it and die." Hearing this the rat went its way.

Then came the mongoose. The fox threatened it and it went away. The fox then ate the flesh of the lion by himself and was contented.

Kānika then said that the Kings should use such tricks against their enemies. (Chapter 139, Ādi Parva).

KĀNIKA II. There is a statement in Mahābhārata about another brahmin of the Bharadvāja family who was also well-versed in Kūṭānti. He was an adviser to Satruñjaya, King of Sauvira. (Chapter 140, Sānti Parva).

KĀNĪNA. A child born to an unmarried woman. Vyāsa, Karna, Śibi, Aśṭaka, Pratardana, and Vasūman were Kānīnas.

KĀNJALI. See under Dharmaśārmā.

KĀKKA I. One of the seven famous archers of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. The seven are: Kṛtavarmā, Anādhṛṣṭi, Śamika, Samit śįjaya, Kānika, Śaṅku and Kunti. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva).

KĀKKA II. A King of ancient India. (Śloka 233, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

KĀKKA III. A bird, son of Suraśā. (Śloka 69, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

KĀKKA IV. The name which Dharmaśārmā bore when he spent his life incognito at the palace of the King of Vīrāṭa. (See under Dharmaśārmā).

KĀKKA V. A place of habitation of ancient India. This place was given to Dharmaśārmā as a gift by the inhabitants of the place. (Chapter 51, Sābhā Parva).

KĀKKAṆĀ. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 16, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KĀṬJAKINI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 16, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KĀṬṬĀRKĀ. A city in South India. There is a reference in Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 16, about the conquest of this place by Sahadeva. Modern scholars are of the opinion that Kāṭṭāraka is situated on the banks of the river Vēnā.

KĀṬṬARIKĀ. An ancient sage. He was a worker of his gotra. It was in this family that the pre-eminent Brahmadattā was born. (Chapter 342, Sānti Parva).

KAKTANDRA. A city in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 40).

KĀṆTIVRATA. A Vrata observed in the month of Kārttika. It consists in offering worship to Balarāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa and taking food only at night. By observing this Vrata for one year, beauty, longevity and health can be obtained. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 177).

KĀVYA I. (KĀSYAPA).

1) General information. Kāvya attained Purāṇic fame as the father who brought up Śakuntalā. From Rgveda it can be gathered that the Kāvya family was very prominent among the Rṣi families of ancient India. Because he was born in the family of sage Kaśyapa, son of Bṛhaspati, Kāvya was known as Kāṣyapa also. Kāvya's father was Medhātiśthi as can be shown by a reference to him in Śloka 27, Chapter 208 of Sānti Parva as Medhātiśthiśura. Kāvya was staying in a hermitage on the banks of the river Mālinī, with a number of disciples.

2) Kanvaśrama. Vana Parva of Mahābhārata states that Kanvaśrama was on the northern shore of the river Praveti. According to certain critics Kanvaśrama was situated on the banks of the river Cambal, four miles to the south of Kota in Rājputānā.

3) How Kāvya got Śakuntalā. Once Viśvāmitra started a severe penance and Indra desiring to obstruct the attempt sent the enchanting Menakā to entice him. They fell in love with each other and soon Menakā bore a girl. The parents left the child in the forest and went their way. Birds (Śakuntas) looked after her for some time and so she was named Śakuntalā. Accidentally Kāvya came that way and took the child to his Āśrama.

4) The Yaga of Bharata. Bharata, son of Dusyanta, performed a peculiar type of Yaga called 'Govitata' with Kāvya as the chief preceptor to officiate. (Śloka 130, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva).

5) Kanva and Duryodhana. Once Kāvya narrated to Duryodhana how Mātali and his wife Sudharmā went to him in search of a suitable husband to their daughter Gunaśeśi. (Chapter 97, Udyoga Parva, M.B.).

6) Kanva, a sage of the east. When Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhya after his exile many sages from many different parts came to visit him. Kāvya was one of those who came from the east. The others who came along with him were, Vasīṣṭha, Atri, Viśvāmitra, Gautama, Jamadagni, Bharadvāja, Sanaka, Sarabhaṅga, Durvāsas, Mataṅga, Vibhāṇḍaka and Tumburu.

7) Kāvya and Rgveda.

(i) There are ten Maṇḍalas in Rgveda. The Maṇḍalas from two to seven are written by different Rṣi families. The second Maṇḍala was written by the Bhārgava family of rṣis, the third by the Viśvāmitra family, the fourth by that of Vāṃadeva, the fifth by Atri, the sixth by that of Bharadvāja and the seventh by the family of Vasiṣṭha. Fifty Śūktas of the first Maṇḍala and the whole of the eighth Maṇḍala were written by Kāvya.

(ii) Kāvya had a son named Medhātiśthi. Śūkta twelve of Anuvāka four in the first Maṇḍala of Rgveda is written making Medhātiśthi a sage.

(iii) Kāvya had a daughter named Indivarapurabhā by Menakā. (Kathāsaritāgāra). (See under Candrāvaloka and Kasyapa I).

KĀVYA II. A King of Pūrvavani. (Pūrū dynasty).

He was the brother of Saṅturodhā, father of Dusyanta. His father was Prītriṣṭha and he also had a son named Medhātiśthi. (Agni Purāṇa).

KĀVYASIRAS. A caste. Originally they were Kṣatriyas. In Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 17 we find that they were reduced to low caste because of their being jealous of the superiority of the Brāhmaṇas.

KANVĀRADA. A sacred place. If one stayed in this place for a while one would attain Devaloka. (Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).
KANYAKAGÜNA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

KANYAKUBJA. (KANYAKUBJA).

1) General information. A city of Purănic fame on the banks of the river Gângâ. This is the same place which is now known as Kanaūj. Viśvāmitra was the son of Gâdhi, King of Kanyakubja.

2) Origin of this city. Once there was a great sage named Ku' who was the son of Brahma. He had of his wife Vâidarbhî four sons named Kuśâmba, Kuśânâbha, Aśûrataraja, and Vasu. Ku' asked them each to rule a country and so each of them built a city of his own. Kuśâmba named his city Kauśâmbî, Kuśânâbha gave his city the name of Mahodayapura, Aśûrataraja called his city Dharmañjanyâ and Vasu called his city Girivrajâ. Of these Mahodayapura, city of Kuśânâbha, became later famous as Kanyakubja. (Bâla Kanda, Vâlmiki Râmâyana).

3) How Mahodayapura became Kanyakubja. Kuśânâbha begot a hundred daughters of the nymph Ghrîtâcî. Those beautiful girls were once playing in the forests when the wind-god fell in love with them. The girls rejected his love and Vâyu getting angry with them cursed them and made them hunchbacks. Because the hundred Kanyakás (girls) became Kubjas (hunchbacks) at that place, the place became known as Kanyakubja. When the daughters returned to the palace as hunchbacks Kuśânâbha was greatly distressed. Weeping, the girls told him what had happened. At that time a sage named Gûlit was performing penance in a forest nearby. Somadâ, daughter of Urmiâ, a gandharva lady, married Gûlit and they got a son named Brahmadatta. This Brahmadatta married the hundred hunchbacks of Kuśânâbha and the very touch of Brahmadatta transformed the hunchbacks into beautiful girls. After having given his daughters in marriage Kuśânâbha conducted a Putrakâmeṣṭi yâga to get a son. In that Yâga Brahma appeared in person and blessed Kuśânâbha and he got a son. The son was named Gâdhi.1 Gâdhi got a son and a daughter. The son was named Viśvāmitra and the daughter, Satyavati. Rciika married Satyavati. Gâdhi and Viśvāmitra were the rulers of Kanyakubja. See under 'Rciika, Viśvāmitra'—(Sargas 32 to 34, Bâlakânda, Vâlmiki Râmâyana).

4) Nârada and Kanyakubja. There was a very big lake in Kanyakubja. Mahâviṣṇu once showed Mâya to Nârada at that place. (See under 'Nârada').

5) Viśvāmitra and Indra take wine together. Viśvāmitra and Indra took wine together at Kanyakubja. (Sloka 17, Chapter 87, Vana Parva).

KANYÂKUMÂRÎ (KANYÂKÎPA; KANYÂTÎRTHA)

1) General information. Mahâbhârata makes references in many places to Kanyâkumâri, the southern extremity of former Kerala and Gokarna, the northern boundary. It must, therefore, be surmised that these two holy places were very ancient ones. Vana Parva, praises Kanyâkumâri at many places. If any one that bathes at this place one will become very famous. (Anûsasana Parva, M.B.).

Chapter eighty-five of Aranyak Parva, of Bhaṣâ Bhûrata speaks praisingly of Kanyâkumâri and Gokarna among other places. It says thus:

"If you visit Râshbhâcalâ of Pândyadeśa you will get the benefit of conducting an Âśvamedhayâga. Then you must go farther south and take a dip in Kanyâtîrtha. The touch of that water absolves you of all sins. Then visit Gokarna situated in the ocean famous in all the three worlds and worshipped by all." From this it is to be understood that at the time of Mahâbhârata Kanyâkumâri was part of Pândyadeśa and that Gokarna was an island.

2) Purânic stories about Kanyâkumâri. There are several stories regarding the origin and renown of Kanyâkumâri in the Purânas. The most important ones are given below.

1) Absolver of sins. The wife of a brahmin named Apanicâ living in Kâśi became unchaste and to wash away her sin she came to Kanyâkumâri walking all the way and did penance there, daily bathing in its waters. She attained Salvation and it is believed that a bath in its waters would absolve anybody of all his sins. (Maîmîkhalâ).

2) Cakva tirtha of Kanyâkumâri. Pûnâyâkâśi, daughter of Mayâsura, once went to Kailâsa and worshipped Siva. After three yugas Siva appeared before her and asked her what she wanted. She replied that she wanted to be merged in Siva always. Siva then said 'Three hundred and sixty-five days would make a year. Four lakhs and thirty-three years would make a Kali Yuga. Kṛta, Tretâ, Dwâpara and Kali are four Yugas and when two thousand such Yugas are over Brahma finishes a day. Such thirty days make one month and twelve months, a year for Brahma. When such hundred years of Brahma are over the great deluge comes. Such ten deluges make a nâzhîkâ (twentyfour minutes) of Viśnu. Counting thus when you pass ten Viśnu deluges Siva passes a second. Then is the time for the fulfilment of your desire. Tilt that time you sit in meditation on the shores of the south seas. Your hermitage would be known as Kanyâkṣetra or Tapaḥ Sthala. During your stay there you must kill all the wicked people like Bânâsura and give relief to the people. I will also come and stay with you there then.' Pûnâyakâśi after prostrating before Śiva went to the south seas. Taking a Japamallâ (necklace for prayer) in her hands she assumed the name Kanyâkumâri, and started her penance. After conquering all the three worlds demon Bânâ was having a wicked rule over his people when he saw Kanyâkumâri and asked her to be his wife. He approached her with his wicked servants Durmukha and Durdarâna. But Kanyâkumâri flatly refused and in the battle that ensued, Bânâsura fell dead by the Cakrâyudha (Discus) of Devi and at that spot is the Cakraṭîrtha. (Skanda Purâna).

3) The Phantom child which escaped from the hands of Kâma at the time of the birth of Śrî Kṛṣṇa was that divine lady, Kanyâkumâri. (Padma Purâna).

3) The Geographical view. It is said that there was an extension of the present continent to the south and that expansive land called Lamûriba was later submerged in waters. There is a description of such an extended land in some of the old literature like Čilâppadikâram. Kanyâkumâri which was called 'Kumâri-ambalî' also was the first setu; Dhanuskovi the middle setu; and Koṭīkkara, last setu. (Setu Purâna)
4) In History, Kanyakumārī had attracted the attention of foreigners long before Christ. Herodotus who lived in the third century B.C. has written about Kanyakumārī in one of his books. In the book ‘Periplus’ written in 60 A.D. there is a mention of Kanyakumārī. It says: “Pious persons at the age end of their lives dedicate their lives to God and go to Kanyakumārī on a pilgrimage and stay there accepting an ascetic life. A divine lady bathed in the holy waters there grants you ‘darśana’.” Ptolemy another traveller who lived two thousand years ago refers to Kanyakumārī in his book as ‘Komaria Akron’. He had bathed in those waters and worshipped in the Kanyakumārī temple.

Marco Polo of Venice who had travelled these parts in 1243 A.D. has written of his worshipping in the Kanyakumārī temple. He has also recorded having seen thirty miles from Kanyakumārī a glittering figure like that of the Pole-star.

Ibn Batūtā who lived in 1203 A.D. has referred to Kanyakumārī in his book as Rāskumāri.

KANYĀSAMVEDYATĪRTHA. An ancient holy place. It is believed that those who visit this place will attain the world of Prajāpatiśāra (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KANYĀŚRAMA. A holy place. If a man spends three nights at this place he would attain Svarga (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

KAPA(S). A company of Asuras. The Mahābhārata gives a story of how the brahmins killed these demons. The Āśvinidevas once came to the earth and gave eyesight to the blind sage Cyavana. It was the time when Indra had denied Soma juice to the Āśvinidevas. Sage Cyavana got back his eyesight and promised the Āśvinidevas that he would lift the ban on wine for them. Cyavana conducted a Yāga to which the Āśvinidevas were also invited. Indra and the other devas refused to take the sacrificial wine and butter along with the Āśvinidevas. Cyavana got angry and he produced from the sacrificial fire an Asura named Māda. With a huge mouth and long teeth the demon went round eating all the Devas. All at once Cyavana conquered the earth and the Kapas subdued heaven. When they lost both heaven and earth the Devas approached the brahmins for help. The brahmins started a war against the Kapas. The Kapas sent Dhani to the brahmins for peace-talks. Dhani said “The Kapas are equal to you, Oh brahmins, and so why do you fight them? They are well-versed in Vedas and are very wise men who are entitled to conduct Yāgas. They are righteous persons similar to Brahmārsīs. Prosperity lives in them. They never keep unchaste wives nor do they eat stale meat. It is not proper to fight against such virtuous persons.”

But the brahmins did not pay heed to what Dhani said and they killed all the Kapas in bulk. The Kapas, though they were born Asuras, were good-natured persons. (Chapter 157, Anuśasana Parva)

KAPĀLA. See under Brahmā, 5th Para.

KAPĀLAMOCANA. A holy place on the shores of the river Sarasvatī, in Kurukṣetra. (Chapter 88, Vana Parva; See under Rahodara and Siva).

KAPĀLĪ I. One of the eleven Rudras. This Rudra was the son of Sthānū, son of Brahmā. (Chapter 66, Adi Parva). According to the Mahābhārata the eleven Rudras are the following: Mrgavyādhā, Sarpa, Nirṛti, Ajaikapāṭi, Ahirbudhnya, Pīnāki, Īvara, Kapālī, Sthānū, Bharga and Dāhana. (See under Kapardi). The eleven Rudras are referred to in different ways in Agni Purāṇa and Viṣṇu Purāṇa.

KAPĀLĪ II. Śiva. The Mahābhārata gives the following story regarding the reason for Śiva’s getting the name of Kapālī. Once a great controversy arose regarding the supreme sovereignty of the three worlds between Brahmā and Viṣṇu. Then there came to their midst an effulgence of Śiva and a voice from heaven said “He who finds the source of this brilliance is the real sovereign of the three worlds”. Brahmā went up to find the upper end and Viṣṇu went down to find the lower end. They travelled for a very long time without finding the end when Brahmā saw a Ketaki flower coming down. On enquiry the flower said it was coming from the origin of the brilliance and that three Brahmā deluges had elapsed since its starting from there. Brahmā took that flower and went to Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu asked Brahmā whether he had seen the end of the effulgence and Brahmā said ‘yes’. Immediately the flower in the hand of Brahmā turned into the figure of Śiva and cut off one of the heads of Brahmā making five-headed Brahmā into four-headed. The angered Brahmā cursed Śiva “May you go begging with a Kapālā (human skull) in your hand.” Thus Śiva became a Kapālī. Śiva cursed Brahmā back saying “You will not be worshipped by anyone” (See under Śiva, Brahmā).

KAPARDĪ. One of the eleven Rudras. According to Agni Purāṇa the Ekādaśa Rudras (eleven Rudras) are the following: Hara, Bahuṛūpa, Tryambaka, Aparājita, Ṛṣākapi, Śambhu, Kapardi, Raivata, Mrgavyādhā, Sarpa and Kapālī. (Chapter 18, Agni Purāṇa).

KAPĀTA. A demon. He was Kaisyapa’s son born of his wife Danu. (Chapter 65, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAPĀṬABHIKṢU. A false sage. To illustrate the fact that if a man fails in his deceit he will be subjected to ridicule, a story of a false sage occurs in Kathāsaritsāgara. Since this Character has earned a place in the Indian literature his story is given below:

There was once a city called Mākandī on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. In that city lived a sage who observed silence as a Vrata. One day when he went begging he saw a beautiful girl in a Vaiśyā’s house and the false ascetic was attracted by her. Breaking his silence he said “What a pity!” and left the place. The Vaiśyā was worried why the sage said so and approached him and asked why he broke his silence to say so. The sage said: “Your daughter is ill-omened. If you give her in marriage all of you remaining will perish. So pack her in a box and with a torch burning on the top of it set it afloat on the river.” The Vaiśyā did so.

The sage coming to his Āśrama called his disciples to his side and said “To-night a box with a torch burning on the top of it will come floating on the river. You must take it and bring it to me without opening it.”

The disciples went to the river and seeing the box coming floating caught it and took it to their preceptor. But from a point high up in the river a prince had seen the box coming floating and had opened it. He had then released the girl from the box and had floated the box again filling it with a black monkey. When the disciples got the box to the guru he said “Take it upstairs and keep it there. There is a Pūjā to be conducted with the recital of sacred verses. It should not be seen by others. You can all go to sleep."
The false sage went up eager to enjoy the girl in the box and opened the box with pleasant thoughts. But to his utter horror there jumped from the box a ferocious black monkey who mauled him terribly. The Kapata-bliksu was fooled. (Haradnya 1. Lavanakalambaka, Kathasaritsagara).

KAPI. A river. (M.B. Bhisma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KAPIDHVAYA. Arjuna.

KAPILA I. A fierce sage.

1) Genealogy and birth. Kapila was the son of Kardama-prajapati, son of Brahma, born to him of his wife Devahuti, grand-daughter of Brahma and daughter of Svayambhuva Manu. Svayambhuva Manu got two sons named Priyavara and Uttanapada and three daughters named Akuti, Devahuti and Prasuti. The daughters were married to Ruci, Kardama and Daksa respectively. To Ruci was born of Akuti a boy named Yajña. He was an influential part in the incarnation of Visnu. To Kardama was born of his wife Devahuti Kapiliacarya, a great sage and the celebrated exponent of the Sankhya philosophy. Prasuti got many daughters (8th Skandha, Devi Bhagavata).

Sage Kapila was known as Cakradhanus also. (Skloka 17 Chapter 109, Udyoga Parva).

Kardama married the daughter of Vaivasya Manu called Devahuti. They spent their honeymoon in the air travelling throughout the world. Devahuti delivered nine daughters and a son named Kapila. Kardamaprajapati gave his daughters in marriage to Marici and the other sages.

2) Kapila—incarnation of Visnu. The Brahmanda Purana states that Kapila was the incarnation of Visnu. In Chapter 93 there is this statement: 'Bhagavan Narayana will protect us all. The Lord of the universe has now been born in the world as Kapilacaryas.'

3) Kapila imparts spiritual knowledge to his mother. Kapila started a severe penance. At that time Kardamaprajapati died and Devahuti wife of Kardama and mother of Kapila approached Kapila and asked him to instruct her on the path of Bhakti Yoga. Kapila imparted to her spiritual knowledge and gave her instructions to follow the path of Bhakti Yoga for Salvation. She entered into a life of austerities and attained Samadhi. (3rd Skandha, Bhagavata).

4) How Kapila burnt to ashes the Sagaraputras. Once there was a king called Sagra in the Solar dynasty. He had two wives named Keśini and Sumati. Keśini got a son named Asamajāsa and Sumati got sixty thousand sons. Once Sagra conducted an Asvamedha Yāga at a place where the rivers Sindhu and Gaṅgā meet. Amśumān, son of Asamajāsa led the sacrificial horse. Indra disguised as a demon stole the horse when it came to a mountain side and hid it in the nether worlds. Sagra sent his sixty thousand sons in search of the horse. They dug the whole continent of Jamśādīvāpa surrounded by mountains. Devas, Gandharvas and Bhujaṅgas complained to Brahma. Then Brahma said: 'The whole of this world belongs to Visnu. He has incarnated himself as sage Kapila to kill the sons of Sagra and is now in the nether-world bearing this world. In the fire of his anger the Sagaraputras will be burnt to death'. On hearing this all of them came back. The Sagaraputras returned to their father when they could not find the horse. But Sagra ordered 'Go and dig again till you find it'. They went to the nether world. After circling the eight elephants who carry the world they dropped down to the nether world through the north-east corner of the earth. There they saw sage Kapila engaged in penance and the sacrificial horse grazing by his side. The sons of Sagra made a great hubbub there and Kapila produced a big sound of rebuke and stared at them. All the sixty thousand sons of Sagra were reduced to ashes. For more details see under Bhagiratha. (Sargas 39 and 40, Bālakāndā. Valmiki Rāmāyana).

5) Kapilayogasāstra. Kapila made the renowned Kapilasāstra sitting in his Aśrama and taught it to his mother Devahuti. Kapila was a great yogin. The Yoga Sāstra itself is based on the Sānkhya philosophy of Kapila. His Sānkhya Sāstra, known as Kapila Sāstra also, contains the distinctive yoga of meditation and it creates in you spiritual knowledge removing your ignorance totally. After teaching his mother his 'Kapila' he went to the Aśrama of Pulaha and lived there. (8th Skandha, Devi Bhagavata).

6) Other details regarding Kapila.

(i) Kapila was the preceptor of the King of Sindhu. 5th Skandha, Bhagavata).
(ii) Kapila visited Bhīma while the latter was lying on his bed of arrows before his death. (Skloka 8, Śanti Parva, M.B.).
(iii) There occurred a discussion once between Kapila and a Sage named 'Gau' on the subject whether Gṛhas-thadharma (doing one's duty as a house-holder) or yogadharma (doing yoga practices) was superior. (Chapter 236, Śanti Parva).
(iv) Kapila was a sage of great brilliance of body. When the sons of Sagra went to the nether world in search of the horse they saw the sage Kapila sitting there radiating a brightness equal to that of fire. (Chapter 107, Aranya Parva).
(v) Kapila was an authority on Sāṅkhya and Veda and was a worshipping of Śiva. (Skloka 4, Chapter 18, Anuśasana Parva).
(vi) He has written two books, namely, Sāṅkhya-pravacana and Tattvasamāsa.

KAPILA II. Another name of Śūrya. (Skloka 24, Chapter 3, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAPILA III. A serpent king. It is believed that Kapila is one of the seven serpent Kings who hold the earth in its position. The others are: Dhāma, Kāma, Kāla, Vasu, Vāsuki and Ananta. (Skloka 41, Chapter 150, Anuśasana Parva).

KAPILA IV. Son of an Agni named Bhānu. He was his fourth son and was believed to be another incarnation of sage Kapila (Skloka 21, Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

KAPILA V. Another sage who was the father of Śālīhotra. He officiated in a yajña conducted by Uparicaravasu. (Chapter 336, Śanti Parva).

KAPILA VI. A son of Viśvāmitra who was a brahma-vādī. (Chapter 4, Anuśasana Parva).

KAPILA VII. A synonym of Śiva. (Chapter 17, Anuśasana Parva).

KAPILA VIII. A synonym of Viṣṇu. (Chapter 149, Anuśasana Parva).

KAPILĀ II. A holy place of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a sacred pond there one will get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (giving away cows as gifts). (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀ III. A river. (Chapter 9, Bhiśma Parva).

KAPILĀ IV. The mother of Paṇḍu. (Chapter 218, Sānti Parva).

KAPILA (M). Seventh division of Kuṣadviṣa. (M.B. Bhiśma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 14).

KAPILĀHRADA. A sacred place in Kaśi. If one bathes there one will get the benefit of performing a Rājastīya yājña.

KAPILAKEDĀRATĪRTHA. A holy place of ancient India. Sage Kapila stayed here for some time. If one bathes in a pond there one will acquire the art of becoming invisible to others. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAPILĀŚĀTRA. The Śāstra made by Kapila, the sage. After making this Śāstra Kapila communicated it to his mother Devahūti. (Devī Bhāgavata 8th Skandha).

KAPILĀSVĀ. Son of a King called Kuvalāśva. A sage named Dhandhu destroyed him. (Sloka, 40 Chapter 204, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀ TĪRTHA. A sacred pond owned by a King called Kapila. (Sloka 32, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀVĀTA. A sacred place. If you stay there and observe fasting you will get the benefit of giving away in charity a thousand cows. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KAPILĒYA. Son of Viśvāmitra. After saving Šunaśeṣa from death, Viśvāmitra was fondling the child on his lap. At that time, the child's father Ajigarta came to him and wanted Viśvāmitra to return the child to him. Viśvāmitra then told him 'Like Kapileya and Bābhrevya, this is also my son.' From this we may infer that Kapileya must have been Viśvāmitra's son. (Aitareya Brāhmaṇa).

KAPINJALĀ. A river of ancient India. (Sloka 26, Chapter 9, Bhiśma Parva).

KAPINJALA. A bird. There is a story about the origin of this bird in the Mahābhārata. Once Tvaṣṭṛ created Triśiras to kill Indra. Triśiras had three heads. When by one head he recited the Vedas by another head he drank wine and by the third he looked at the world wickedly. Indra envious of the growing strength of Triśiras felled him down by his Vajrāyudha. A person called Taṅkaka carrying an axe came that way then and by orders from Indra he cut off the heads of Triśiras. When the heads fell down there emerged from them birds called Kapinjala, Tiṭṭirī and Kalapiṅgala. From the head which recited the Vedas came the birds Kapinjala; from the head that drank the wine came the birds Kalapiṅgala; and from the head that looked at the world with wickedness came the birds Tiṭṭirī. (Chapter 9, Udyoga Parva).

KAPISKANDHIĀ. A soldier of Skandadeva. (Sloka 57, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

KAPOTA. A son of Gruḍa. (Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

KAPOTA. A sage. Citrāṅgadā, the daughter of Kakutstha and Urvasī, was his wife. She had two sons named Tumburu and Suvarcas. Kāpota received much wealth from Kubera and gave it to his sons. Once Kāpota cursed Tārāvati, the queen of Candra, that she would bring forth two sons with monkey-faces. (Kalikā Purāṇa, Chapter 56).

KAPOTAROMĀ (KAPOTALOMĀ). Son of the emperor Śibi who was greatly devoted to his dependants. (For genealogy see under Śibi). He had another name Audbhida. (Chapter 197, Vana Parva). He was a prominent member of the court of Varuṇa. (Śaṅti Parva).

KARABHA. A King who bowed before Jaraśandha, King of Magadha. (Sloka 13, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva M.B.).

KARABHĀJANA I. A King of ancient India.

KARABHĀJANA II. One of the nine celebrated sons of Rśabhadeva. He was a yogin of divine wisdom. He imparted spiritual knowledge to these present at the yajña of the King of Videha. (Skandhas 4 and 5, Bhāgavata).

KARABHANJAKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Sloka 69, Chapter 9, Bhiśma Parva).

KARABHI. Son of Sakuni. (Matsya Purāṇa).

KARAHĀṬAKA. A country of south India. Sahadeva conquered this country. (Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARAKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhiśma Parva).

KARAKARSĀKA. A brother of the Rājā of Cedi. Śarahba is the other brother. The Rājā of Cedi along with his brothers, Karakarsaka and Śarahba, helped the Pāndavas in the great battle. (Sloka 47, Chapter 50, Udyoga Parva).

KARAKĀŚA. A soldier who fought on the side of the Kauravas. He stood and fought at a strategic point in the Garuda Vyūha formed by Droṇa. (Sloka 6, Chapter 20, Droṇa Parva).

KARĀLĀ. A Deva Gandharva. He took part in the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva, M.B.).

KARĀLADANTA. A great Sage. He was a bright member of the court of Indra. (Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARĀLĀJANĀKA. A King of Mithilā. Vasiṣṭha imparted to him spiritual knowledge. (Śaṅti Parva).

KARĀLĀKŚA. A soldier of Skandadeva. (Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

KARĀMALĀSAMPRAḌĀYA. The method of counting the number of recitals of a prayer by using the fingers of the hand. (See under Gāyatrī).

KARAMBA. Brother of Rāmbha, father of Mahiṣāsura. See under Mahiṣa.

KARAMBHĀ. A princess of Kaiśīgadā. She was married to Akrođha, a King of the Puruvaśīya. She was the mother of Devātithi. (Sloka 22, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

KARĀṢA. Another name of Yuyutsu. See under Yuyutsu and Varuṇa.

KARANDHAMA.

2) How he got his name Karandhama. Once there came a famine in the country of Suvarcas. The treasury became empty. Taking that opportunity the enemies attacked his country. There was no army for him to fight against his enemies. Meditating upon God he blew his hands and then an army sufficient to fight his enemies appeared before him and using that he defeated them. Because he arranged an army by Karadhamana (blowing of hands) he was given the name of Karadhamana also.
KĀRANDHAMANA 390

3) Other details.

(i) The celebrated King Aviśkit was the son of Karandhama. (Chapter 4, Āsvamedha Parva).

(ii) Karandhama was a prominent member of the court of Yama. (Śloka 16, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

KARANDHAMANA. See under the word Karandhama.

KARANDHAMANA (M). A tirtha situated near the southern ocean. The five holy places in the southern ocean, viz. Agastya tirtha, Saubhadra tirtha, Pauloma tirtha, Karandhamana tirtha and Bhāradvāja tirtha were called Pañca tīrthas. In the course of Arjuna’s pilgrimage, he visited these Pañca tīrthas. At that time, the Sages never used to go there. There was a special reason for it. The five celestial women, Vargā, Saurabheyyi, Samīci, Budbudā and Lātā used to live in them in the form of crocodiles as a result of a sage’s curse. Arjuna liberated all of them. (For details see under the word “Vargā”).

KARAṆJANILAYĀ. Analā, the mother of all trees. She was the daughter of Daḵsa and the wife of Kaṣyapa. She is known as Virudhā also. That was how Virut became a synonym of tree. It is believed that Analā stays in the tree Kārāṇja. To obtain blessings from Analā people worship the Kārāṇja tree. (Ślokas 35 to 36, Chapter 230, Vana Parva).

KARAPARVAN. A holy place in the Sarasvati river valley. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 54).

KĀRAṢKARA. A despoiled country of ancient times. There is a reference to this country in the Mahābhārata, Karna Parva, Chapter 44.

KARAṬA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 63, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARATOYĀ. A holy river. This river worships Varuṇa sitting in his court. (Śloka 22, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva). If one stays on the shores of this river and observes fasting for three days one would get the benefit of performing an Āsvamedha yāga. (Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

KARAVIRA I. A prominent serpent. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

KARAVIRA II. A mountain on the southern side of Mahāmeru. See under Mahāmeru.

KARAVIRA III. There was once a country named Karavira on the base of the mountain Gomanta. That country was being ruled by a King called Sṛgālavāsudeva. He was killed by Śrī Kaṇḍa and Balarāma together as per instructions from Paraśurāma.

(KARANDHAMANA, Bhāgavata).

KARAVIRA IV. A mountain in the neighbourhood of Dvārakā. (Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

KARAVIRAṢA. A demon. He fought against Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa along with Khara, Dūṣaṇa and Trīśiras. (Śloka 24, Chapter 26, Aranyaka Kaṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

KARAVIRAṆAPURA. A holy place. If one bathes in this place one will attain the form of Brahmā. (Chapter 25, Anuśasana Parva).

KARDAMA I. A Prājāpati. Pulaha, son of Brahmā, begot of his wife Kaṃā three sons named Kardama, Urvirīyān and Saḷiṣṭhu. (Chapter 10, Aśva Jī, Viśṇu Purāṇa). Of these three Kardama married Devahūti. Devahūti was the daughter of Śvāyambhuva Manu and sister of Akūṭi and Prāṣūṭi. (5th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Devahūti was an ideal wife and served her husband with great devotion. Kardama was pleased with his wife and presented her with an aeroplane. Kardama and Devahūti conducted then a tour of the worlds in that plane. Devahūti delivered nine daughters and a son. The daughters were married to Marici and other sages and the son grew into the celebrated Sage Kapilācārya. Kardama then entered into Samādi. (Sitting in yoga and courting death of one’s own accord). (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

KARDAMA II. A virtuous serpent. (Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

KARDAMA III. This Sage sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARDAMA IV. A celebrated sage who was the grand-son of Viraja. He had a son named Anāṅga. (Śloka 90, Chapter 59, Sānti Parva).

KARDAMILAKSETRA. A temple near the mountain of Sāmaṅga. Bharata was crowned King at this temple (Śloka 9, Chapter 135, Vana Parva).

KARENUMATI. Daughter of Siṣupāla, King of Gedi. Nakula married her and they got a child named Niraṁitra. (Śloka 79, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

KARĪṢA. A son of Viśvāmitra. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 55).

KARIṢAKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva, M.B.).

KARIṢINĪ. A river. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARIṬI. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARKAṆHANḍA. A place of habitation in ancient India. This place was conquered by Karṇa for Duryodhana. (Vana Parva).

KARKANṆJU. A saintly King mentioned in Sūktā 112, Anuvaṇka 16, Maṇḍala 1 of Kṛgyeda.

KARKARA. A prominent serpent. See under Kadrū.

KAKATI. See para 12 under Brahmā.

KARIṆ. The son of the sage Āpastamba by his wife Aksāśūṭrā.

KARKOṬAKA. A terrible serpent.

1) Birth. This serpent was born to Kaṣyapa, by his wife Kadrū.

2) The curse. Once Karkoṭaka cheated the sage Nārada. The angry sage cursed him and said that he would have to remain without the power of movements in the forest till Nala came to rescue him. From that day Karkoṭaka lived in that forest, awaiting the arrival of Nala.

3) Nala and Karkoṭaka. Once a wild fire spread all over the forest. Karkoṭaka whose power of movement was destroyed by Nārada’s curse, cried aloud, calling upon Nala to come and save him. It was at this time that Nala arrived at the spot after leaving Damayantī in the forest. Nala came to him, on hearing his cries. The serpent informed Nala about the story of Nārada’s curse and reducing himself to the size of a thumb sat on the ground. Nala removed him to a safe spot away from the fire. The serpent asked Nala to walk a few steps counting his footsteps. Nala did so and at the tenth step, Karkotaka struck him and his whole body was turned blue. Suddenly Karkotaka assumed his own original shape and spoke to Nala as follows:—“I have changed your appearance so that people may not be able to recognize you. Kali who is troubling you, still lives within you. It is he who is affected by my poison. You need not fear danger from poison any more. You will never be defeated in battle. Go and engage yourself as the charioteer of Ruparna, King of Ayodhya. You will teach him Asvabhava’s mantra. In return for it he will teach you Akshahdaya mantra. Here are two garments which I give you. If you put them on, you will be restored to your own shape. May you be blessed again with a happy family life.”

After saying this, Karkotaka vanished. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 66).

KARKOTAKA. A land beyond the eastern ocean. It is not far from there to the river Śitodā. The Udaya mountain is just across it. (Kathāsārītāgāra).

KARMABHŪMI. The land of Bhārata. How this continent got the name of Karmabhūmi is given below. All those born in this land enjoy a life in Svarga, on earth or in hell according to the class to which their actions belong namely Sattvic, Rājasic or Tāmasic. It is possible for only this land to obtain for its people life in other worlds. Therefore this land got the name Karmabhūmi. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

KARMAJIT. A King of the family of Arjuna. He was the son of Bṛhatena and the father of Srutaśīvaja. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

KARṇA I. The eldest son of Kuntī. Though he was the brother of the Pāndavas he joined sides with the Kauravas and became the King of Āṅga. So the name of Karna comes in the genealogy of the Āṅga royal family.

2) Birth of Karna. Pāndu, a King of Candravamsa, married Kunti, daughter of King Śrūṣenas. This girl was brought up even from childhood by a King called Kuntibhoja. She grew up in the palace of the king. She was once put in charge of attending to the welfare of those engaged in religious duties. The sage Durvāsas came there then and stayed for four months as the king’s guest. Kunti served the sage during his stay there with so much care, patience and devotion that the sage was immensely pleased and gave her at the time of his departure a divine mantra. If she called upon any god repeating that mantra once, that god would manifest himself to her and bless her with a son equal to him in glory. The mantra was to be used only five times. Kunti was young and wanted to test the power of the mantra. So she recited the mantra meditating on the Sun. Instantly she felt she saw a divine person coming to her from the sun. She was perplexed. But the divine form embraced her and consoled her saying that she would never lose her virginity even if she bore a son from him. None excepting her step-mother knew about this. In due course Kunti delivered a male child and with the help of her step-mother she put that child in a box and floated it on the river Aśvā. That box leaving the river Aśvā entered the Yamunā river and leaving Yamunā it entered the river Gaṅgā. Drifting slowly the box reached Campāpūrī, a country of Sūtas. Adhiratha born of the Sūtavāṅsa and an ally of the Kauravas, saw a box floating on the river while he went for his bath and took it home. Rādhā, wife of Adhiratha, who was childless was greatly pleased to see a baby inside the box and they adopted it and brought it up. The boy was named Vasuṣeṇa. It was this babe that became the celebrated Karna afterwards. (Four chapters from 305, Vana Parva).

3) Education of Karna. Karna grew up in the house of Adhiratha in the country of Āṅga bearing the names Vasuṣeṇa and Vṛṣa. Kunti knew this through spies. When the time came for imparting education to Karna Adhiratha sent him to Hastināpura to the presence of Drona for teaching him archery. Karna studied under Krpa and Parāśūrāma also. After his education he entered into a treaty with Duryodhana. (Chapter 309, Vana Parva).

4) Karna is cursed. Karna was cursed by a brahmin and Parāśūrāma. The story is given below.

Even while they were studying archery Arjuna and Karna vied with each other. Karna once requested Drona to teach him in private the secret of the Brahmā missile to fight against Arjuna. But Drona did not accede to his request. Karna then went to Mahendragiri and bowed before Parāśūrāma and represented himself as a member of the Bhrigu family. He said he had come to him to be his disciple and learn the secret of the Brahmā missile from him. Parāśūrāma believed him and accepting him as his disciple taught him many new techniques in archery. Once Karna was wandering in the vicinity of the āśrama when he saw a lonely cow grazing there and Karna without knowing that it belonged to a brahmin sent an arrow and killed it. The brahmin got furious and cursed Karna thus “Oh, sinner, the wheel of your chariot would go down in the mud when you face the enemy to fight against whom you are now taking training. Then, when you stand perplexed, your opponent would cut off your head.” Karna requested for a removal of the curse but the brahmin refused to show any mercy.

Parāśūrāma taught Karna the secret of the Brahmā missile. One day tired after a day’s fast and a walk around the āśrama with his disciples Parāśūrāma slept resting his head on the lap of Karna. Then a beetle named Alarka attacked Karna and started sucking blood from his thigh. Blood was oozing from his thigh and still Karna did not stir from his position lest it should disturb his guru in his nap. Suddenly Parāśūrāma awoke and stared at the beetle and the beetle fell dead. It then took the form of a demon and rising up in the air said “Śvāmin! I was once a demon called Darśā. Once I carried away by force the wife of the sage Bhrigu and the angered sage cursed me and made me a bācch. When I craved for pardon he said that I would be given my original form by Paraśurāma.”

When the demon disappeared saying so much Paraśurāma turned to Karna who stood with respect, his dress all covered with blood. Paraśurāma said: “No brahmin can bear so much pain with such patience. Surely, you are not a brahmin. Let me know the truth.” Trembling with fear Karna revealed his identity and then Paraśurāma cursed him saying “You will forget the secret of the Bhrāmā missile at the time when you want to use it against your enemy.” (Chapters 2 and 3, Sānti Parva).

5) How Karna became the King of Aīga. The Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas were studying archery under Dronācārya together and Karna also was among them. When their education was complete a day was fixed to exhibit the skill of the students. The public also was invited to see the skill of the princes. Everybody showed his best and Arjuna displayed super-human skill so that the vast assemblage was lost in wonder and admiration. Then strode Karna to the scene and not only did he duplicate with ease Arjuna’s feats but he did show something more. The assemblage was dumbfounded. Arjuna turned pale. At this moment Kṛṣṇa stood up and questioned the right of Karna to compete with those with royal blood in them. Then rose Duryodhana and said: “If the combat is not in order simply because Karna is not a prince it is easily remedied. I crown Karna as the King of Aīga”. Then there came to the scene the aged Adhiratha, the foster-father of Karna, and as Karna saw him coming he went and bowed before him and Adhiratha embraced him with tears in his eyes. (Chapters 134 to 136, Adi Parva, M.B.)

6) Karna’s armour and ear-rings. Karna was born with an armour on his body and rings in his ears. Chapter 99 of Adi Parva says thus: “To Kunti was born of Śūrya the mighty Karna. Even at his birth he was adorned with an armour over his body and rings in his ears.” Śūrya had ordained that as long as Karna wore the armour and ear-rings he would be unconquerable. Indra knew this and wanted to get Karna rid of these so that Arjuna, his son, might gain a victory over Karna. Karna was reputed for his charity and Indra under the garb of a brahmin went to Karna and begged of him his ear-rings and armour. The Sun god had already warned him in a dream that Indra would thus try to deceive him. Still Karna could not bring himself to refuse any gift that was asked of him and so he cut off the ear-rings and armour with which he was born and gave them to the Brāhmana. The only request that the noble Karna did make was that in separating the ornaments from his body no wound should be made. Indra did it with great skill neither hurting him nor making even a scratch on this body. Indra bade Karna ask for any boon he wanted. The Sun god had also advised him to ask for a good weapon in return in case he gave away his assets and so he requested Indra the best of the weapons he possessed. Indra gave him his weapon, the Śakti, called Vaijayanti also. Karna had to use that weapon to kill the great Ghaṭotkaca in the Mahābhārata battle.

7) Other details.
(i) Karna was present at the Svayāmvara of Draupadi. (Sloka 4, Chapter 185, Adi Parva).
(ii) Bhīma defeated Karna once in a single combat. (Sloka 20, Chapter 34, Sābhā Parva).
(iii) Karna took part in the Rājasya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 7, Chapter 34, Sānti Parva).
(iv) Karna defeated Jarāsandha once in a single combat. Chapter 44, Sābhā Parva).
(v) Karna defeated in his victory march many kings like Drupada, Bhagadatta and Kerala. (Chapter 254, Aranyā Parva).
(vi) Karna conquered the cities of Mālinī and Campā and annexed them to the country of Aīga. (Chapter 5, Karna Parva).
(vii) Karna prompted Duryodhana to tease the Pāṇḍavas living in the forest. (Chapter 7, Vana Parva).
(viii) Karna swore that he would kill Arjuna. (Chapter 257, Vana Parva).
(x) Kāndapāṛśṭham is the name of Karna’s bow.

8) Karna and the Kurukṣetra battle. The great battle of Mahābhārata lasted for eighteen days and some of the incidents touching Karna during that period are given below:
(i) Before the great war started Kunti went alone to the shores of Gaiśī and met Karna. She then confessed to him that she was his mother and that the Pāṇḍavas were his brothers. She advised Karna to join sides with the Pāṇḍavas and the Sun god approved of it. But Karna refused to do so. He said he would never forsake Duryodhana who had brought him up from his childhood at a time when he was in peril. But he promised his mother that he would never kill any of her other four sons but would kill Arjuna in the battle-field. (Chapter 146 Udyoga Parva).
(ii) Karna started his fight against the Pāṇḍavas after taking blessings from Bhīṣma. (Chapter 3, Droṇa Parva).
(iii) Karna fought against the princes of Kekaya, Arjuna, Bhīma, Dhṛṣṭadyumna and Sātýaki in single combat. (Chapter 32, Droṇa Parva).
(iv) Abhimanyu defeated Karna in a single combat. (Chapter 40, Droṇa Parva).
(v) Karna made Bhīma unconscious. (Chapter 139, Droṇa Parva).
(vi) Karna once withdrew a bit when hit by the arrow of Arjuna. (Chapter 139, Droṇa Parva).
(vii) Karna insulted Kṛpācārya at one time. (Chapter 158, Droṇa Parva).
(viii) Karna killed Ghaṭotkaca with the weapon Śakti which Indra had given him in exchange for the armour and ear-rings which he had given Indra. (Chapter 180, Droṇa Parva).
(ix) Karna ran away from the battlefield when he heard that Droṇa was dead. (Chapter 193, Karna Parva).
(x) Karna was made the Generalissimo of the Kaurava army when Droṇa died. (Chapter 10, Karna Parva).
(xi) Saśīya became the charioteer of Karna (Chapter 86, Karna Parva).
(xii) The beautiful headwear of Arjuna fell down to the ground by the snake-faced arrow of Karna. (Chapter 90, Kaṁṇa Parva).

(xiii) When Arjuna was fighting against Karna the chariot-wheels of Karna sank into the ground. (Chapter 90, Kaṁṇa Parva).

(xiv) Arjuna slew Karna. (Śloka 50, Chapter 91, Kaṁṇa Parva).

(xv) Karna had three sons named Citrasena, Satyasena and Suṣeṇa. All the three were killed at Kurukṣetra by Nakula. (Ślokas 19 to 50, Chapter 10, Śalya Parva).

9) Karna goes to heaven. After his death Karna went to heaven and merged with his father, the Sun god. (Śloka 20, Chapter 5, Śvargaṛoḥana Parva).

10) Names of Karna.

(i) Because Karna was born with an effulgence (Vasu) he was first given the name Vasuṣeṇa.

(ii) Because he was born with Kundalas (ear-rings) in his Kaṁnas (ears) he was called Karna. (Chapter 302, Aranya Parva).

(iii) Besides these two he had many other names. A few are given below:

- Adhirathī, Adityanandana, Adityatanaya, Aṅgarāja, Aṅgeṣvara, Arkaputra, Bharataraṣba, Goputra, Kaunteyā, Kutśiṣṭa, Kurvāhā, Kurupṛtanāpi, Kuruvīra, Kuruvodya, Pārtha, Vṛṣṭajmā, Rādhāvya, Rādhamāja, Rādheya, Ravisīṇu, Sauti, Śavitra, Śavya, Śuryaputra, Śuryaśambhava, Śūta, Śūtanandana, Śūta-patra, Śūtasūru, Śūtasutasva, Vaikartana, Vaivasa, and Vyāsa.

KARNAVII. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. Bhimasena killed this Karna. (Chapter 67, Bhiṣma Parva).

KARNIII. Younger brother of Ghanṭa. See under Ghanṭākarna.

KARNAKA. A barber who lived in Kāśi. (Chapter 29, Harivānaśa).

KARNANIRVĀHA. A sage who attained Svarag after observing correctly the duties of Vānaprastha. (Śloka 18, Chapter 244, Śānti Parva).

KARNAPARVA. One of the Parvans of Mahābhārata. See under Mahābhārata.

KARNAPRĀVARANA. A country of South India. The army of Duryodhana contained soldiers from this country. (Śloka 13, Chapter 51, Bhiṣma Parva).

KARNAPRĀVARANA(S). An ancient tribe of people who inhabited the shores of the sea in the south. The one distinctive feature of this tribe was that their cars were extraordinarily long, drooping down to the feet. Sahadeva conquered and subdued this tribe. (Śloka 67, Chapter 31, Śabhā Parva). They once brought to Yudhiṣṭhira many valuable presents and paid their respects to him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 52, Śabhā Parva).

KARNAPRĀVARANA. A follower of Skandadeva, (Chapter 46, Śloka 25, Śalya Parva).

KARNĀŚRAVAS. A sage who was a member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 23, Chapter 26, Vana Parva).

KARNĀṬAKA. A country of South India. Mahābhārata says like this: "There are a few more countries to the south and they are: Drāviḍa, Kerala, Prācyā, Musīka, Vanavāsika, Karnāṭaka, Māhiṣaka, Vīkalpa and Muṣaka." (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARNAYEŞTA. A Kṣatriya King. He was the incarnation of an Asura named Kroḍhavaśa. (Chapter 67, Adi Parva).

KARŚIKA. One of the eleven Devakanyakās who sang and danced in the Jamotsava of Arjuna. The others are: Menakā, Sahajayā, Pujājīkaṭhālā, Rūṣṭhalā, Gṛḥṭa-, Viśvā-, Pūrva-, Ullōca, Prāmloca and Urvaśī. (Chapter 123, Adi Parva).

KARŚIKAṆĀṆANA. A forest to the north of the mountain Sumeru. All the six seasons appear there at the same time and so this forest is always filled with flowers. (Chapter 6, Śloka 24, Bhiṣma Parva).

KARPARKA. See under Ghata.

KARPĀŚIKA. A country in ancient India. The maids of this country served in the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 8).

KARŚĀṆĀṆANA(M). (KARSIKAM). A measure of weight for gold and silver in ancient India.

KARŚIÑI. A Deva Gandharva. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 56 says that he participated in the celebrations connected with Arjuna's birth.

KARTĀ. A Viśādeva, (Śloka 35, Chapter 91, Anu-śāsana Parva).

KARTASVARA. An Asura. Once this Asura became world emperor. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 52).

KARTAVĪRĀJUNA (KARTAVĪRYA). A renowned King of the Hehaya dynasty; 1) Genealogy. From Mahāviśnu were descended in the following order: Brāhma—Atri—Candra—Buddha—Parurravas—Ayus—Yayati—Yadu—Sahasrajit—Satajit—Ekāva—(Hehaya)—Dharma—Kasi—Bhadrascena—Dhanakara—Kṛta—Kartavīrya—Kartavīrya. 2) Hehaya Dynasty and Bhārgava Dynasty. The Hehayas were Kṣatriyas and the Bhārgavas were Brāhmaṇas. The Bhārgava sages were the family preceptors of the Hehaya Kings. The Hehayas who were generous and charitable, used to give plenty of wealth to the Bhārgavas. Consequently in course of time, the Bhārgava grew wealthy while the Hehayas gradually declined. In order to tide over their difficulty, the Hehayas decided to borrow some money from the Bhārgavas. But the Bhārgava refused to oblige, on the plea that they had no money. The enraged Kṣatriyas (Hehayas) began to persecute the Bhṛgas (Bhārgavas). The Bhṛga left for the Himalayas after burying all their treasures under the floor of their Āśramas. The Kṣatriyas pursued them and hunted them even there. At last a Brāhmaṇi who belonged to the Bhārgava race, gave birth to a sage named Aurva through her thigh. With his birth the Hehayas began to lead a less aggressive life. After the lapse of many years, the mighty Kārtavīrājuna was born in the Hehaya dynasty and the mighty sage Jamadagni was born in the Bhṛga dynasty. Both of them nourished their hereditary feud. With his capital in the city of Māhiṣmati on the banks of the river Narmadā, Kārtavīrājuna began his reign. (See under Aurva I).

3) Thousand Hands of Kārtavīrājuna. Once when Kārtavīrājuna was living in his capital Māhiṣmati, the sage Nārada happened to come there. The King greeted him with due reverence and asked him what course of action was to be followed for attaining mokṣa (salvation) and at the same time for enjoying worldly pleasures. Nārada replied that by performing the rite known as "Bhadradipa Pratiiṣṭha", both these objects could be achieved. Accordingly, Kārtavīrājuna went to the banks of the river Narmadā with his wife and began the observance of Bhadradipa Pratiṣṭhā. Kartavirya's guru was Dattatreya, the son of Atri. At the conclusion of the Yāga rites, Dattatreya who was pleased, asked Kartavirya to give him what boon he wished to have. Kartavirya with joined palms asked him many boons one of which was that he should have a thousand arms. Dattatreya granted him the boon, and Kartavirya who became proud of his new possession, ruled at Māhistamī for 86,000 years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 44).

4) Vāyu's Warning. Kartavirya who returned triumphant after receiving the boon from Dattatreya heard a mysterious voice warning him in the following words:—"You fool! Don't you know that a Brāhmaṅa is superior to a Kṣatriya? A Kṣatriya governs his subjects in alliance with the Brāhmaṅa". On hearing this, Kartavirya became angry. He understood that Vāyu, the divine messenger was behind the mysterious voice. He despaired Vāyu and argued that a Kṣatriya was superior to a Brāhmaṅa. Vāyu gave him a warning that a Brāhmaṅa would curse Kartavirya. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 152).

5) Kartavirya cursed by the sage. Once Agni (fire-god) approached Kartavirya and begged for food. The King allowed him to feed upon mountains and trees from any part of his Kingdom. So Agni began to devour the woods and hills. This led to the burning down of an Āśrama owned by a sage called Āpava. The enraged Sage came to know that Kartavirya was responsible for the havoc and pronounced a curse that Paraśurāma would chop off all the thousand hands of Kartavirya.

6) Kartavirya and Rāvana. In the course of his triumphal march, after conquering the whole world, Rāvana once arrived with his forces on the bank of the river Narmadā. Enjoying the smooth flow of the crystal clear stream of the Narmadā and the pleasant sand banks in the river-bed, he spent a night there with his followers. Early next morning he took his bath in the river and setting up the idol of Śiva on the sand bank, began to worship it. Just then Kartavirya and his wives came to the place and began their water sports, a few yards down the river from the place where Rāvana was sitting. As part of his amusements, Kartavirya stopped the flow of the river by making a dam with his thousand arms. This caused the level of the water to rise and Rāvana with his materials of worship was submerged in the flood. Enraged at this disturbance to his worship, he sent two of his men down the river bank to find out what was happening. They traced the source of the trouble to Kartavirya and his water-sports and reported the matter to their master. At once Rāvana armed himself with his bow rushed to Kartavirya and began a fierce fight. At last Rāvana fell down under the heavy stroke of Kartavirya's mace and was bound in chains and imprisoned. He lay there for one year. Rāvana's father sage Pulastya came to know of this and he went to Kartavirya's palace. He was received with due respect and at his request, Kartavirya released Rāvana and after that they remained friends for life. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

7) Kartavirya and Renukā's Death. One day when Paraśurāma was fourteen years old, his father sage Jamadagni went to the forest to fetch some Samitis (sacrificial twigs). Jamadagni's wife, Renukā swept and cleaned the Āśrama and went to the river Revā to fetch water and Paraśurāma was left behind in the Āśrama. When she reached the river bank, she saw Kartavirya indulging in amorous pleasures with his wives in the water. She waited unobserved on the bank for some time and after they had left the place, she stepped into the river. But since the water was muddy, she had to go to another place in the river to get clear water. There also she lingered for a few minutes, looking at the amorous amusements of Citraratha, King of Sālva, with his wives. It was only after they had departed that she was able to return to the Āśrama with water. Meanwhile Jamadagni who had returned to the Āśrama earlier was angry at her delay and was waiting impatiently for her arrival. As soon as she reached the Āśrama, the sage, in a fit of fury, ordered Paraśurāma to cut off her head and the latter obeyed him. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 58).

8) The Triumphant March of Kartavirya. All the Kings in the world acknowledged the supremacy of Kartavirya. In Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16, we find that Kings of the Solar dynasty like Trayāyāraṇa, Hariścandra, Rohitāśa and Cuncu were defeated by Kartavirya. In his golden chariot he went about defeating Devas, Yakṣas, Rīṣis and others. He challenged even Viṣṇu. He insulted Indra in the company of Indraṇī. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 115).

Intoxicated by his successes, Kartavirya went to the sea-shore and challenged the ocean and began to destroy the animals in the sea by shooting them with his arrows. God Varuṇa appeared before him and asked him what he wanted. Kartavirya asked the god to name a man who had the capacity to fight with him. Varuṇa answered that Jamadagni's son Paraśurāma was the person who satisfied that condition. Kartavirya accepted the challenge and went in search of Paraśurāma. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 29).

9) Killing of Jamadagni. Once Kartavirya went to hunt in the forest with his followers. They were roaming in the Vindhya forests in search of game. At noon after a refreshing bath in the clear waters of the river Narmadā when they were preparing to return, they saw Jamadagni's Āśrama. After asking his men to wait at the river-bank, Kartavirya went alone to the Āśrama. He paid his respects to the sage and after their usual greetings, Jamadagni asked him to call his followers also to the Āśrama. When all of them arrived the sage gave them a sumptuous feast. Kartavirya wondered how the sage managed to do it. They spent the night there and when they returned home next morning Kartavirya's minister Candragupta told him that he saw a cow in Jamadagni's Āśrama and that it was from that divine cow that the sage was able to get all the rare articles of food which he supplied to the guests. He also offered to get the cow from the sage. So the King sent Candragupta to the Āśrama to beg the cow from the sage for him. Candragupta accordingly went with a few followers to the Āśrama and begged for the cow. At that time Paraśurāma was not in the Āśrama. Jamadagni told them that the cow was Kāmadhenu's sister, Susīlā and that it was not possible to give her. Candragupta tried to seize the cow by force but she suddenly vanished into the sky. The King's men tried to capture her calf. Jamadagni who came forward to prevent them, was beaten to death by Candragupita. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 67 to 70).

10) Jamadagni's Restoration to Life. Parasurāma returned soon to the Ātraṇa with the disciple Akṛta-vraṇa. At the sight of his father lying dead on the floor, Parasurāma cried aloud, Reṇukā beat her breast twentyone times. Seeing this, Parasurāma took a solemn vow that he would go round the world twentyone times and extirpate the Kaśyapī Kings. The sage Śukra appeared there with Suśilā who had vanished. After restoring Jamadagni to life Śukra went back.

11) Death of Kārtavirya. Paraśu Rāma who had turned himself into the very embodiment of Revenge, accompanied by Akṛta-vraṇa, took his stand at the gates of the city of Mahīṣmatī and challenged Kārtavirya to a fight. Kārtavirya came out with a huge army. In the terrible fight that followed, Parasurāma himself with his axe (paraśu) chopped off all the thousand arms of Kārtavirya. All his sons were killed. Kārtavirya himself fell down beheaded. This was the end of the pillar of Hehaya dynasty. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 81).

12) Kārtavirya's sons. Kārtavirya had one hundred sons. All of them were killed in the battle by Parasurāma. Their names, as given in Chapter 76 of Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, are given below:—

KĀRTTIKEYA. Skanda, the son of Śiva. For details see under Skanda.

KĀRŪṆA. See under Dhanaśajya.

KĀRŪṆA I. A King of Kārūṇa. A lady of name Bhadrā was performing penance to get this King as her husband when Śīṣupāla carried her away. (Ślokā 11, Chapter 45, Sabhā Parva).

KĀRŪṆA II. One of the nine sons of Vaivasvata Manu.

The other sons are: Iksvāku, Nābhāga, Drṣṭa, Śaryāti, Nāriṣyanta, Prāṇānāga, Diṣṭa and Prṣadha. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

KĀRŪṆA III. A Yāṣa. This Yāṣa accompanied by his brothers performed penance on the shores of the river Kālindo, to propitiate Devī, taking in only air. Devī was pleased and appearing before him in person said "You will become the lord of Manvantara." (Skandhas 10 and 13, Devī Bhāgavata).

KĀRŪṆA I. The sixth son of Vaivasvata Manu. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 75).

KĀRŪṆA II. An ancient land. (The King of this land used to suppress robbers and plunderers. He was present at Draupadī's Svayamvara. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 183).

KĀRŪṆA (M). A place in ancient India. Historians arc of opinion that it is the Bundelkhand of modern India. The sin of Brahmahatyā (killing of brahmins) of Indra was washed away by brahmins at this place. The place where Kārīṇa (cowdung) from Indra fell was called Kārīṇa and it gradually became Karūṇa. (See under Aśigamalaja).

KĀRVATĀ. An ancient country of India. The King of this land was slain by Bhīmasena. (Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

KĀSERAKA. A Yāṣa. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 15 says that Kaśeraka continues to attend on Kubera as a member of his assembly.

KĀSERU. A lovely daughter of Tvaṣṭā, the Prajāpati. Narākṣaṇa abducted Kaśeru when she was fourteen years old. She was one of the virgins married by Śrī Kṛṣṇa who won a victory over Narākṣaṇa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38, Dāksināya Pāthā).

KĀSERUMĀN (KĀSERUMĀN). An Asura who was a Yāvana. He was slain by Śrī Kṛṣṇa according to Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 32.

KĀŚI I. (VĀRĀṆASI. BANARĀS). (See under Divodāsa also).

1) General. One of the oldest and most popular sacred centres in India, Kāśi is reputed for its Viśva-nātha temple of hoary traditions, according to one of which the Śivallīgā in the temple was installed by Brahmā himself. (Hālāsya Māhātmaya).

2) Pilgrimage on foot to Kāśi. Devotees from many parts of India go on pilgrimage to Kāśi on foot, bathe in the holy waters of the Gaṅgā and thus earn spiritual satisfaction and release from worldly attachments. The reason for the above is stated in the Agni Purāṇa as follows:—Once, at Kapilāśa Śiva told Pārvatī that the temple at Kāśi was called 'Avimukta' (unreleased) as it never perished, and all Japa, tapa, homa and dāna made there never cease to give auspicious results. One should walk on foot to Kāśi and live there. Having gone there one should never leave the place. There are eight great tīrthas at Avimukta, i.e. Hārīcandra tīrtha, Āvīrāteka vārā tīrtha, Jayesvara tīrtha, Śrī Parvati tīrtha, Mahālayatīrtha, Bhūgu tīrtha, Cauḍēśvara tīrtha and Kedaratīrtha. These tīrthas extend to two yojanas to the east of the Kāśi temple and half-a-yojana to the west of it. The river Varanāśi is also there, and Varanāśi is at the centre of all these. Whatever is done at Vārāṇaśi like bath, Japa, homa, worship of Devas, dāna, obsequies for the dead, oneself living there etc. is productive of devotion and salvation. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 112).

3) References to Kāśi in the Mahābhārata.
(i) Pāṇḍu once conquered Kāśi. (Bhūṣa Parva, Chapter 9).
(ii) Bhīma married Balandhara, daughter of the King of Kāśi. (Adi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 77).
(iii) Bhīmasena conquered Kāśi. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 6).
(iv) Sahadeva conquered Kāśi. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 31).
KĀŚI I

(v) In the war between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas, the King of Kāśi fought on the side of the former. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 2).

(vi) Arjuna conquered Kāśi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 40).

(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa conquered Kāśi. (Draupā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 15).

(viii) Karṇa once conquered Kāśi on behalf of Duryodhana. (Karnā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19).

(ix) Kāśi had been ruled by the Kings called Haryāśva, Sudeva, and Divodāsa. (Anuśāsa Parva, Chapter 30, Verses 12 to 15).

(x) King Vṛṣadārtha and Uśīnara had ruled over Kāśi. (Anuśāsa Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 9).

(xi) Bhīṣma conquered Kāśi during the Svayamvara of Ambā. (Anuśāsa Parva, Chapter 44, Verse 38).

(xii) The horse sent out in connection with Yudhishṭhira’s Āśvamedha passed through Kāśi also. (Āśvamedha Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 14).

(xiii) For the origin of the name Kāśi see under Divodāsa.

KĀŚI I. An inhabitant-citizen-of Kāśi. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 18).

KĀŚI III. A son of Kavīprajāpati. (Anuśāsa Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 133).

KĀŚIKA. A famous charioteer on the Pāṇḍava side (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 171, Verse 15).

KĀŚISVARA TĪRTHA. A sacred place on the banks of river Ambu-mati on the borders of Kurukṣetra. A bath in the river redeems one from all sins and raises one to Brahmaloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 57).

KĀŚMIRA (KĀŚMIRAKAM). A state in North India, Kāśmira was famous during the Mahābhārata period also. Once Arjuna conquered this state (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27). People from the state had attended Yudhishṭhira’s Rājasūya with many articles of presentation. Śrī Kṛṣṇa once defeated its ruler. (Draupā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 16). Paraśurāma also once defeated its ruler. (Draupā Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 11).

KĀŚMIRAMĀNDALAM. A particular place in Kāśmira where once a conference of sages was held. (Vana Parva, Chapter 203). Besides all the prominent sages of North India, distinguished persons like Nahuṣa, Yayāti, Aśi and Kāśyapa attended the conference. Rivers Jhelam and Chenab flow through this place, and it is a holy centre. Those who bathe here will become like sages.

KASTURĪGANDHĪ. Another name for Kāli (Matsya-gandhi) or Satyavati, the mother of Vyāsa. To know how she got this name, see under Satyavati.

KĀŚYA I. A famous King of Kāśi; father of Ambā, Ambikā and Ambālikā. He was also called Krodha-vāsa. According to Chapter 171 of Udyoga Parva, Kāśya’s real name was Senābindu.

KĀŚYA II. One of the great sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).

KĀŚYAPA I. Chief among the Prajāpatis.

1) Kāśyapa—Son or Grandson of Brahmac? It is impossible to give a definite answer to this question. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, we see that six spiritual sons—Marici, Aṅgīras, Atri, Pulastya, Puṣṭaka and Kṛatu—were born to Brahmac. Kāśyapa was born as the son of Marici and that all living beings in the world took their origin from Kāśyapa. According to this statement, Kāśyapa is the grandson of Brahmā.

But in the 14th Sarga of Aranyaka-ṇanda in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa there is an account of the creation of all animate and inanimate objects in this world. According to a statement in that passage, we find that Kāśyapa was the youngest brother of Marici, Atri, Pulastya and others. This means that Kāśyapa was the son of Brahmā. Therefore there is nothing wrong in regarding him either as the son or as the grandson of Brahmā. In the Purāṇas we find references to him in both ways.

2) Original Gotra or Clan. Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 297, verse 17 says that all living beings belong to the four original Gotras—the gotra of Aṅgīras, Kāśyapa gotra, Bṛgū gotra and Vasishṭha gotra and that all the other gotras came into existence subsequently.

3) Kāśyapa’s wives. Kāśyapa had 21 wives who were:—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Arisṭa, Surasa, Khaṣa, Surabhi, Vinaṭa, Tāmṛa, Krodha-vāsa, Ira, Kadrū, Muni, Pulomā, Kālaka, Nātā, Danayus, Siṁhiṅka, Pradhā, Viṣvā, and Kapila. Of these, the 13 wives, Aditi, Diti, Kālaka, Danayus, Danu, Siṁhiṅka, Krodhā, Pradhā, Viṣvā, Vinatā, Kapila, Muni and Kadrū, were the daughters of Daksā. Of these the first wife Aditi had 12 sons. These 12 sons namely Viṣṇu, Śakra, Aryanā, Dhātā, Viṣṇu, Puṣā, Viṣvasān, Savitā, Mitra, Varuṇa, Aṇīṣa and Bhaga are called Adiyas (sons of Aditi). In the sixth Manvantara these 12 Adiyas belonged to the tribe known as Tujītas. (The present Manvantara is the seventh one). The 33 crores of Devas came into being from the twelve Adiyas.

The Daiyas were born from Kāśyapa’s second wife Diti. The chief Daiyas are Hiranyakāṣipu, Hiranyākṣa and Siṁhiṅka. All the other Daiyas were born from them.

The Dānavas were the children of Danu, another wife of Kāśyapa. Dvimūrdhā, Śambara, Ayomukha, Saṅkuśiras, Kapila, Saṅkara, Ekaçakra, Mahābhu, Tāraka, Mahābala, Svarbhānu, Vṛṣaparva, Pulomā, and Vipracitī are the famous Dānavas. The other Dānavas were the children of the people mentioned above.

Another wife of Kāśyapa, Surabhi gave birth to Aja, Ekapād, Ahiruddha, Tuṣṭa and Rudra and also the Ākādaśa Rudras namely:—Hara, Bauhurūpa,TRYAMBAKA, APARAJITA, Vṛṣakapi, Śambhu, Kapardi, RivaVata, Mrgavyādha, Sarpa, and Kapāli. Vinatā gave birth to Garuda and Kadrū was the mother of the nāgas. The Purāṇas proclaim that all living beings that we see in the world today, sprang from Kāśyapa’s offsprings by his different wives. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Chapter 29; Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapters 15-21; Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapters 16 and 65 and Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

4) Brahmac taught Kāśyapa cure for snake poison. The serpents (Nāgas) were born to Kadrū, one of the wives of Kāśyapa. Once Kadrū asked her children to hang down like hair from the tail of Uccaiśravas. They refused to do so. Kadrū became angry and cursed them that they would be burnt alive at Janamejaya’s Sarpa Sattrā (snake-sacrifice). After the curse, the Nāgas became dangerously venomous. At this stage, Brahmac taught Kāśyapa the art of curing snake-poison to protect other creatures that might be bitten by the Nāgas. Cure of snake-bite in this world dates from that time. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 20).

KAŚYAPA
5) Kaśyapa and Garuḍa. Garuḍa is a mighty son of Kaśyapa by his wife Vinatā. Vinatā made a bet with her sister Kadru. Kadru won the bet. Vinatā became Kadru's maid-servant as a result of the bet. To be relieved of this bondage Vinatā's son Garuḍa had to bring Amṛta from Devaloka and give it to Kadru and her Nāga-sons. Garuḍa agreed and flew up to Heaven to fetch Amṛta.

On the way, he visited his father Kaśyapa who was performing penance on the Gandhamadāna mountain. He asked his father to give him some food, as he was very hungry. Kaśyapa told him the following story:—

"Long ago a sage named Vibhāvasu lived near this place. He and his younger brother named Supratikā began to quarrel over the sharing of their father's wealth. The elder brother transformed the younger brother into an elephant by a curse and the younger brother turned the elder into a tortoise by his curse. They are still living in yonder lake as elephant and tortoise and continue like enemies. If you eat both of them, you will be strong enough to fight against the Devas and get possession of Amṛta for yourself."

On hearing this, Garuḍa went to the lake and caught the elephant and tortoise in his claws and flew up into the sky. The mountains began to tremble and a whirlwind swept the Heavens when Garuḍa beat with his wings. He flew about here and there unable to find a convenient place to sit and enjoy his meal. On the way, his eye caught sight of a huge banyan tree spreading its branches far and wide, to a distance of 100 yojanas around it. When he perched on one of its branches with the elephant and tortoise, the branch broke and fell down. From that branch certain sages known as Bālākhyās were hanging with their heads downwards. So, to prevent them from falling to the ground, Garuḍa lifted it in his beak and began to fly up again. Unable to find a suitable spot where he could deposit the branch with the sages, Garuḍa returned to his father again. At the request of Kaśyapa, the Bālākhyās went to the Himālayas. He showed Garuḍa a vast, snow-clad mountain on which he could deposit the broken branch he was carrying. Garuḍa flew to that mountain and ate up the elephant and tortoise and thus gained strength to fight with the Devas for Amṛta. After that he proceeded to Heaven. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapters 29-31).

6) Other Birth of Kaśyapa. In Cākṣuṣa Manvantara, the sage Sutapas performed a penance along with his wife Pṛṣnī for 12,000 years. Lord Viṣṇu appeared to them and asked what boon they wished to ask. They prayed that the Lord should take birth as their son. Viṣṇu granted their prayer and was born as their son.

In the next Manvantara (the period of Vaivasvata Manu) Sutapas and Pṛṣnī were re-born as Kaśyapa and Aditi respectively. At that time also Mahāviṣṇu was born to Aditi as Vāmana. (See under Vāmana).

In this birth, Kaśyapa had many other wives besides Aditi. Surasā was one of those wives. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

It was this Kaśyapa himself who was re-born as Vasudeva and Aditi became Devaki. Surasā was born as Rohini, another wife. There is another reason for Kaśyapa and Aditi to take birth for the third time. Once Kaśyapa had prepared to perform a Yāga. All arrangements were complete. But the sacrificial cow alone was not available. Kaśyapa solved the problem by stealing a cow from Varuṇa's cattle-shed. Aditi and Suraśā concealed it in the Āśrama. Enraged at the theft of his cow, Varuṇa complained to Brahmā. A curse was pronounced by Brahmā and Varuṇa that as a punishment for stealing and hiding the cow, Kaśyapa should be reborn as a cowherd and Aditi and Suraśā should be reborn as the cowherd's wives. It was by this curse that Kaśyapa, Aditi and Suraśā were reborn as Vasudevā Devaki and Rohini respectively. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

7) Paraśurāma's gift of land to Kaśyapa. Paraśurāma performed a Yāga after exterminating all Kṣatriya Kings. At that Yāga he gifted all the lands he had conquered till then to Kaśyapa. In Mahābhārata, Aranya Parva, Chapter 117, there is a reference to this gift.

8) Kaśyapa and Kerala. After Paraśurāma went round the world eighteen times and exterminated the Kṣatriya Kings he performed a Yāga. At that Yāga he gave the whole world as dakṣinā to Kaśyapa. After that, Kaśyapa drove away Paraśurāma from the earth to the south. Taking pity on Paraśurāma, the ocean gave him the region known as "Sūrparaṇa". Kaśyapa seized Sūrparaṇa also from Paraśurāma and gave it to Brahmaṇas. Paraśurāma went to the forests after it. Later on, intermixture of castes took place in this region and anarchy prevailed there. At one time, Sūrparaṇa sank down into Pātalā (lower world). Kaśyapa who saw this held the earth up, brought Kṣatriyas from the north and made them rulers of the country. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 49). This "Sūrparaṇa" is believed to be Kerala.

9) Other Details about Kaśyapa.

(i) Kaśyapa arrived at the place of Arjuna's birth accompanied by other sages. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122).

(ii) Kaśyapa flourished in Brahmā's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11).

(iii) Once there was a dispute between Virocana, the son of Prahlāda and Sudhanvā, the son of Aṅgiras. It was Kaśyapa who settled this dispute. (See the 5th Para under the word Aṅgiras).

(iv) Once Kaśyapa went on a pilgrimage in the company of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 85).

(v) Once Brahmā gifted the entire earth to Kaśyapa at a Yajña. Bhūmidēvi (Goddess of the earth) who was distressed at it, went to Pātalā and began to lament. At that time Kaśyapa propitiated the goddess by his austere penance. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 114).

(vi) After Paraśurāma had given the entire earth to Kaśyapa, Kaśyapa drove away Paraśurāma from the earth. Paraśurāma then shot an arrow into the sea and converted that portion of the sea into land. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 70, Verses 18 and 19).

(vii) When the war between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas was in progress, Kaśyapa approached Droṇa and wanted him to bring the battle to a close. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 190).

(viii) Kaśyapa was also present with other sages at the time of Skanda's birth. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45).
(ix) Kasyapa once gave some pieces of advice to Pururavas. (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 73).

(x) In the 8th verse of Chapter 206 of Santi Parva, in Mahabharahata, we find that Kasyapa had another name Arijaumani.

(xi) Kasyapa once related to Bhishma, the story of Mahavi§u's Varahavatara. (Incarnation as Boar). (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 209, Verse 6).

(xii) Bhag§a Bharata says that gingelly seeds were first introduced into this world from sage Kasyapa's body. (M.B. Anu§asana Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 10).

(xiii) Kasyapa explained to Vrs§darbhi, the evil of receiving pratigraha (prescunts). (M.B. Anu§asana Parva, Chapter 93).

(xiv) Kasyapa once spoke to Arundhati about the weakness of his body. (M.B. Anu§asana Parva, Chapter 93, Verse 65).

(xv) At another time, Agastya suspected that Kasyapa had stolen his lotus. But Kasyapa swore that he was innocent. (M.B. Anu§asana Parva, Chapter 94).

(xvi) In Bhag§a Bharata it is said that Kasyapa was one of the Sapta Gurus (seven Preceptors) of Kubera. The other six Gurus were—Vasis§a, Atri, Gautama, Bharadv§a, Vis§vamitra and Jamadagni. (M.B. Anu§asana Parva, Chapter 150).

(xvii) In Bhagavata we see that Kasyapa and other sages were instrumental in bringing about the destruction of Yadu Varn§a. (For further details see under SAMA).

KASYAPA II. A serpent. In Mahabharahata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, we read that this serpent was present at the time of Arjuna's birth.

KASYAPA I. (KASYAPAL). 1) General. Two sages Kasyapa and Kasyapa are mentioned in the Pur§nas, and due to the close similarity in the names in some Pur§nas the two names are used one for the other. There is, therefore, considerable difficulty in distinguishing the one from the other and unerringly hitting upon the right person in certain contexts.

There is a very ancient sage the first cause or the original father of all living beings in the universe. He is described, in most of the Pur§nas, as the grandson of Brah§a and the son of Maric£. He was the husband of the original or first mothers of living beings, called Diti and Aditi. The interpretation that he was called Ka§yapa as he used to drink Ka§yam (liquor) is not founded on facts. No Pur§na refers to him as a drunkard.

The sage called Kasyapa was the foster father of Sakuntal$. The statement that he was called Kasyapa as he was born in the dynasty of Kasyapa is also not correct. Ka§va was not born in the dynasty of Kasyapa.

The genealogy of Kasyapa is as follows:

2) Genealogy. Descended from Vis§u thus: Brah§a—Atri—Candra—Buddha—Puru§ras—Ayus—Nahua—Yayati—Puru—Jana§jaya—Prac£van—Pra£r£a—Namasya—Vfibh§aya—§i£a—Bahuvidha—Sanyati—Rahov§a—Raudra—Matinara—Prithiratha—Medha§i§a—Ka§va (Kasyapa), Medha§i§a was Ka§va's father. (Santi Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 27). According to the Agni Pur§na a son called Ka§va was born (Kasyapa) to Medha§i§a, son of King Prithiratha of the Pur§ dynasty. But, nothing about the family matters of Ka§va is mentioned therein. In the Mahabharahata itself the name Kasyapa is often used instead of Ka§va.

From the above facts it may be understood that Ka§va was born as a prince, and that later on, he became a sage. Moreover, the Agni Pur§na says that Santurodha, the brother of Ka§va's father, was the father of Dusyan§a. According to that Kasyapa and Dusyan§a were the sons of brothers, Kasyapa being that of the elder one. For the time being the above are the only reasonable inferences, and the truth has to be found out by further researches. But, one thing is certain according to the genealogy, that Kasyapa was born twenty generations after Ka§va.

3) Kasyapa and Tak§aka. The story is told in the 2nd Skanda of Devi Bhagavata and in the Adi Parva of Bharahata that Tak§aka set out to bite King Par£sit and Kasyapa to cure him of Tak§aka's poison, but that Tak§aka bribed Kasyapa off his mission to save the King. But, the story as such is unfounded. It was Kasyapa and not Kasyapa whom Brah§a had taught the science of the treatment and cure of poison (see under Kasyapa) and, therefore, it should be Kasyapa whom Tak§aka bribed.

4) Kasyapa and Sakuntal$. See under KA§. VA.

5) Kasyapa and Rsya§rga. Father of Rsya§rga was one Kasyapa; may be Kasyapa or Kasyapa. The greater possibility is for Kasyapa to be the father. (See under RSYASRGA).

6) After a Yajña Vis£vakarman made a land-gift to Kasyapa once. (See under KASYA).

KASYAPA II. Priest of Vasudeva; this Kasyapa lived for years as a good friend of the P§ndavas. He is considered to be a very distinguished ascetic. (A§vamedha Parva, Chapter 16).

KASYAPA III. Son of Sage Kasyapa. This Kasyapa was member of Indra's assembly. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 7). He was present at the Yajña conducted by emperor Pithu.

KASYAPA IV. An Agni, the son of Kasyapa. P££cjan£a was born from the five Agnis, Kasyapa, Vasis§a, Pra§a, A§giras and Cyavana, all of whom were sons of Kasyapa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 220).

KASYAPA V. A haughty Vaisya once felled to the ground a brahmin youth called Kasyapa by hitting him with his chariot. (See under Indra, Para 36).

KASYAPA VI. Sons of Kasyapa like Vfibha§daka. Rs£darman, Vfibvasu, Indra, Aditya and Vasu, other Devas and other living beings born in Kasyapa's dynasty—all these are also called Kasyapas.

KASYAPADVIPA (ISLAND). An island in the shape of a hare visible in the moon. (Bh§ma Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 55).

KASYAPI. (Earth). The earth came to be known as Kasyapi as it had been given as a gift to Kasyapa by Par§urama.

"The whole of the earth was given to Kasyapa and thus it came to be called Kasyapi". (Brahma§da Pur§na, Chapter 89).

KATHAKA. A soldier of Skanda. (Sloka 67, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

KATHASARTSAGARA. See under BRHATKATHA.

KATHOPANISAD. See under NACIKETAS.

KATVAKU (KATVAKU). A son of Vaivasvata Manu. Brahma§da Pur§na states that he was an ancestor of Ik§vuku.

In the beginning Manu, alias Vaivasvata, had a son named Kayvuku. He was the first of kings and he ruled the world for a long time. On the banks of the river Sarayū he constructed a city called Ayodhya. Ayodhya was celebrated for its beauty and wise men of the eight guards of the universe or the city of even Brahā, the Creator.

KĀTYĀYANA I. A grammarian who wrote a commentary on Pāṇini's grammatical work entitled Āṣṭādhyāyī. He has also written Śrauta Sūtras and a book on "Dharma Sāstra".

KĀTYĀYANA II. Kathāsārītāgara says that "Kātyāyana" was another name of Vararuci.

KĀTYĀYANA III. A great sage who flourished in Indra's assembly. We see a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 19.

KĀTYĀYANTI. One of the two wives of Yājñavalkya. After withdrawing completely from worldly activities, Yājñavalkya asked his wives to divide his worldly assets equally between them. But Maityrāī the other wife, being of a deeply spiritual nature, Kātyāyāni herself had to undertake the burden of all the material affairs. (Kṛdāranyakopānīṣad).

KAUKHĀKATA. An ancient country in South India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

KAUKULIKĀ. An attendant of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 15).

KAUMODAKI. The club of Śri Kṛṣṇa. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 224, Stanza 23, that this club was given to Śri Kṛṣṇa by Varuṇa the god of water, at the time of the burning of the forest Khaḍḍava.

KAUNAPA. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death in the Sarpa Sattra (sacrificial fire to kill serpents) of Janamejaya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Stanza 6).

KAUNAPĀŚANA. A famous serpent born in the family of Kaurava. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Stanza 14).

KAUNDINYA I. See under Mitrabheda.

KAUNDINYA II. A hermit who lived in the Palace of Yudhīṣṭhirā. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16). See under Dṛṣṭabuddhi.

KAUNDINYA III. A hermit. This hermit had erected his hermitage in Hastimātāsahāramatīsāgama and lived there. Once due to excess of rain the river flooded and his hermitage was washed away. So the hermit cursed the river. "Let the river be dried up". Then he went to the realm of Vaiśuktī. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttara Khanda, Chapter 143).

KAUNIKUTSYA. A noble Brahman. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 25, that this Brahmin visited Pramadvarā who died of snake-bite.

KAURAVA (S).

1) General Information. Those who were born in the family of the famous Kung Kuru. Descended in the order from Viṣṇu := Brahmā—Atri—Candra Budha—Puruṣaras—Āyus—Nahuṣa—Yayāti—Puru—Janamejaya—Pracīnvarī—Pravīra—Namasyu—Vitabhayya—Śūndu—Bahuviḍa—Sainyātī—Rahovādi—Raudrāśva—Matināra—Santurodha—Dusyanta—Bharastra—Suhotra—Suhotā—Gaḷa—Garda—Suketu—Brhatksétrā—Hasti—Ajamidhā—Rkṣa—Saṅvāraṇa—Kuru. This is the genealogy of Kuru. From Kuru the genealogy continues as follows:—Jaṅhu—Suratha—Viḍūra-tha—Śārvabhauma—Jayatena—Ravaya—Bhāvuka—Cakroddhata—Devātithi—Rkṣa—Bharata—Pratcca—Santanu. Santanu had two wives Gaṅga and Śatya-vati. Bhīṣma was born of Gaṅga. Vyāsa was born to Śatya-vati before her marriage, from the hermit Parāśara. After the marriage, from Santanu, two sons Gitrāngada and Viṣṭrīvijaya were born to her. A Gandharva killed Gitrāngada. Bhīṣma brought the three daughters of the King of Kāśī, Ambā, Ambikā and Ambāḷika as wives of Viṣṭrīvijaya, but on the way knowing that Ambā was in love with the King of Śālva, she was sent back. Ambikā and Ambāḷika became the wives of Viṣṭrīvijaya. Shortly Viṣṭrīvijaya also died. With a view to continue the royal family, Śatya-vati sent for Vyāsa, so that he might beget children of Ambikā and Ambāḷika. At the time of coition Ambikā closed her eyes to avoid seeing the uncouth face of Vyāsa. So she got as son Dhrtraśtra who was blind from birth. Seeing the ugly figure of Vyāsa Ambāḷika turned pale and so the son born to her was pale in colour. He was called Pāṇḍu. From Dhrtraśtra, Duryodhana and his brothers were born and from Pāṇḍu were born the Pāṇḍavas. All members born in the family of Kuru were known as Kauravas. But later, the sons of Dhrtraśtra came to be known by the name ‘Kauravas’.

2) The origin of Kauravas. (Duryodhana and his brothers). Dhrtraśtra married Gāndhārī the daughter of Suhala the King of Gāndhāra. Once Vyāsa reached the palace weary with hunger and thirst. Gāndhārī gave Vyāsa food and drink. Vyāsa was pleased with her and told her that she might ask for any boon. She said that she wanted to get hundred sons from Dhrtraśtra. Vyāsa granted the boon. Gāndhārī became pregnant. Even after two years she did not deliver. She heard that Kuntī, the wife of Pāṇḍu had given birth to a child. Gāndhārī became sad. She crushed her womb and gave birth to a lump of flesh. Understanding this, Vyāsa came there and cutting the lump into hundred and one pieces kept them in ghee-pots. Advising Gāndhārī to keep the pots in secret, Vyāsa went to the Himālayas. The pots were broken at the proper time and hundred sons and a daughter came out. Besides them Dhrtraśtra had another son named Yuyutsu by a Viśāya woman.

The hundred and one sons of Dhrtraśtra beginning with Duryodhana are the Kauravas.

3) Names of the Kauravas.

Aramathin, Dirgharoman, Suviravān, Dirghhabhu, Suvarmā, Kāñcanadhva, Kujādśin, Virajas, and Yuyutsu. Duṣsalā (daughter). (Mahābhārata. Adī Parva, Chapters 67 and 117). (For further details about the Kauravas see under Duryodhana and Duṣśāsana).

KAURAVYA. A noble serpent which was born of Airāvata. (M.B. Adī Parva, Chapter 218, Stanza 18).

KAUSALYA (KAUSALA). Skandadeva once changed the shape of his face to that of the face of goat. Then he got the name Kausala. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 228, Stanza 4).

KAUSALYA I. A queen of King Daśaratha and mother of Śri Rāma. Daśaratha had three wives Kausalyā, Kaikēyī and Sumitā. Kausalyā gave birth to Śri Rāma, Kaikēyī to Bhārata and Sumitā to Laksmana and Śatrughna. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kauḍa, Sarga 16).

KAUSALYA II. Queen of the King of Kāśi. Ambā, Ambikā, and Ambālikā were daughters of this Kausalya. Of these daughters Ambālikā also was called Kausalyā. After the death of Pāṇḍu she went to the forest with Ambikā. (M.B. Adī Parva, Chapter 129).

KAUSALYA III. The queen of a Yādava King. She was the mother of the Yādava named Keśin. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

KAUSALYA IV. Wife of Puru, the son of King Yayātī. Janamejaya was born to Puru of his wife Kausalyā. (M.B. Adī Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 11).

KAUSALYA V. The queen of Janaka, the King of Mithilā. Once King Janaka decided to sell his palace and everything he possessed and to go begging for alms. But his brave wife Kausalyā convinced her husband by her reasonable arguments that he should not venture to do so. Thus she prevented her husband from carrying out his decision.

KAUSALYA. A teacher, who belonged to the line of disciples of Vyāsa. Jāminī was the disciple of Vyāsa. Sumantu was the son of Jāminī. A son named Sutvā, was born to Sumantu. Sukarman was the son of Sutvā. Sukarman had two disciples Hiranyanābha, and Paus-piṇījī. Kausalya was another name of Hiranyanābha. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Aitītā 3, Chapter 6).

KAUSĀMBI. Four sons, Kuśamba, Kuśanābha, Asūtārajas and Vasu were born to Kuśa, the son of Brahmā, of his wife the princess of Vidarbha. According to the order of their father each prince built a city and began to rule over it. Kuśāmbī is the city built by Kuśamba. Kuśanābha built the city of Mahodayapura; Asūtārajas, the city of Dharmarāyaṇa and Vasu the city of Girivraja. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kandā, Sarga 32).

It is mentioned in Kathāsarasīgara that the city of Kuśāmbi stood in the middle of the kingdom of Vatsa and that Udayana born of the family of the Pāṇḍavas had once ruled this country with Kuśāmbī as his capital.

KAUSIKA I. (Viśvāmitra). See under Viśvāmitra.

KAUSIKA II. A hermit who lived in the palace of Yudhiṣṭhira. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, that while going to Hāstināpura, Śrī Kṛṣṇa met this hermit on the way.

KAUSIKA IIII. A minister of Jārāsandha. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Stanza 22, that he had another name Haśisa also.

KAUSIKA IV. While the Pāṇḍavas were leading forest life, the hermit Mārkandeya told the story of a noble Brahmā named Kausika, to Dharmaputra. Once this Brahmin sat under a tree and performed penance. A small crane which sat on a branch of the tree passed excreta on the head of the Brahmin. He became angry and looked at the bird, instantly the bird was reduced to ashes. The Brahmin sincerely repented and went to the countryside to live on alms. Once he reached the house of a Brahmin. The wife of the Brahmin came to the door and requested him to wait a bit. Immediately her husband arrived, and she, being engaged in looking after the needs of her husband forgot the Brahmin Kausika, who became angry and spoke cruel words to her. She argued that the noblest deed was looking after one's husband and that it was not meet and right for Brahmins to get angry. She advised Kausika to go to Mithilāpura and to receive advice from the famous Dharma-vaṭha. Kausika repented his rash nature, went to Dharma-vaṭha and received advice from him. He returned home and lived peacefully with his parents. (M.B. Vana Parva, ten chapters from 206).

KAUSIKA V. A King of the Puru dynasty. Kapila was his father and Gṛtsapati was his brother. The four castes Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, Vaiṣya and Śūdra originated from Gṛtsapati. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KAUSIKA VI. A hermit. This ancient hermit lived in Kurukṣetra. His sons Śvaspa, Krodhana, Himśra, Piṭāna, Kavi, Vāgḍusta, and Piṭvartū lived with hermit Garga for learning under him. Their names indicated their character. Their father died. The sons were in poverty. At this time rain ceased altogether. Garga asked his disciples to take his milch cow to the forest for grazing. Owing to hunger the brothers decided to kill and eat the cow. But the youngest said: "If you are bent on killing the cow, we had better make use of it as an offering to the Manes, and no sin will visit us."

All agreed to this and Piṭvartū killed the cow and began the sacrifice. Two elder brothers were employed in worshipping the gods and three were detailed to give offerings to the manes. One was asked to be the guest. Piṭvartū was the sacrificer. Remembering the ancestors with reverence he began the sacrifice in accordance with the rites. Thus the seven hermits ate the cow and told Garga that the cow was caught by a tiger.

In due course the seven of them died, and took rebirth as rude low-caste people in Dāśapura. Because of the sacrifice and offerings to the Manes they had the remembrance of their previous birth. So they feared god and took fast and vow at a holy bath and in the presence of a multitude cast off their lives and were born again as animals in Kālanjara hills. Because of their abstinence due to knowledge they cast off their lives by Prapatana (jumping down from the top of the mountain) and were born again as Ruddy geese in the Mānasasaras whentheir names were Sumanas, Kusuma, Vasu, Citrārṣi, Sudarśi, Īṣāṭa and Īñanāpāraga—names conforming to their character. The seven brothers became pure and sinless by their union with God the Supreme Spirit. But three of them fell out of the union because of their desire. They saw the pleasurable life led by Anuha the King of Pāñcāla who was immensely wealthy with many beautiful wives. At the sight of this, one of the geese—the Brahmin Piśṭavṛtti, who performed the sacrifice of offering to the Manes because of his love for his father—wished to become a king. Seeing the two wealthy ministers who led luxurious lives, two of the ruddy geese wanted to become ministers. Accordingly Piśṭavṛtti was born as Brahmadatta the son of Vaiśāhāja and the other two as sons of ministers with names Pundarīka and Subālaka. Brahmadatta was anointed as King of Pāñcāla in the great city of Kāmpīlya. That King was mighty, loving his father well, always desirous of giving offerings to Manes and harmonious with God, having the ability to read the hearts of every living being. He married Sannāti the daughter of Sudeva. This woman in her previous birth was the cow of Garga. As this cow was used as offering to the Manes she got rebirth as a religious-minded woman and became the queen of Brahmadatta, who ruled over the kingdom well for a long time.

Once the King and the queen were walking in the garden when they saw two ants which were quarrelling with each other. They were husband and wife. After a time the quarrel ended and they grew more loving than before and the she-ant pressed closely against her husband. Brahmadatta hearing their conversation stood smiling. He could understand the language of every living being because of the merits of his previous births. When the King smiled his wife asked him for the reason. He described to his wife the quarrel of the ant-couple. The queen did not believe his words. She thought that the King had been making fun of her. She asked him how he learned the language of birds and beasts. But the King could not give an answer and he became thoughtful. The remaining four of the ruddy geese took rebirth as the sons of a poor Brahmin in the same city of Kāmpīlya. They had the remembrance of previous births. Their names were Dhṛtimān, Sarvādaṇī, Vidyācandra and Tapodhika, names befitting their character. They decided to perform severe penance to attain Supreme bliss, and were about to get away from the house when their father, the poor Brahmin cried bitterly, being helpless. They taught their father the following poem and advised him to recite the poem before the King the next morning, in order to get plenty of wealth.

“Noble Brahmins in Kurukṣetra
   The seven foresters in Dāsāpura
   Deer in Kālāñjara and in Māṇasa
   Ruddy geese, the same now are men.”

Brahmadatta who was not able to give answer to the question of his wife, was about to go out from the palace for a walk with his wife and ministers, when the old brahmin made his appearance and recited the poem taught by his sons, to the King. When the King heard the stanza he remembered the previous births and fainted and fell down. The two ministers, Subālaka son of Bābhhravya the author of the science of love and Pundarīka son of Pāñcāla the author of the science of medicine and treatment, also remembered about their previous births and fell down with grief. The three of them lamented about their fall from the union with the Supreme Spirit. Brahmadatta gave that old Brahmin plenty of wealth and villages and sent him away contented.

After anointing his son Visvaksena as King, Brahmadatta and his retinue went to Mānasasaras for penance. For a while they lived in the forest engaged in penance and then cast off their lives and entered the world of Supreme bliss. (Padma Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 10).

KAUSIKĀ. (GOMATI). A river. The hermitage of Viśvāmitra stood on the bank of this river. The modern name of river Kausikā is Kōśī. The river Kōśī flows through Bihar. Those who bathe in this river will obtain remission of sins. See under Gomati. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84).

KAUSIKĀÇĀRYA. The king Ākriti. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 21, that this King ruled over Saurāstra and was known also by the name Kausikācārya.

KAUSIKAKUNDA. A holy place. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, that Viśvāmitra got his attainments in this place.

KAUSIKĀSRAMA. A holy place. It was at this place that Ambā, the daughter of King of Kāśī performed a severe penance. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 156, Stanza 27).

KAUSIKYARUṆĀSAṅGAMA. A holy place. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 that if a man fasts in this place, the confluence of Kausiki and Arunā rivers he will be absolved of all his sins.

KAUSTUBHA. A brilliant precious stone. It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 3; Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa Bālakanda Sarga 45, Stanza 39 and Mahābhārata, Adi Parva that this precious stone floated up at the time of the churning of the sea of Milk. This jewel which originated from the ghee in the sea of Milk, was worn on the breast by Viṣṇu.

“This divine jewel called Kaustubha came up in the middle of ghee and stayed in the breast of Viṣṇu, spreading its rays everywhere.” (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 18, Stanza 37).

KAUTHUMI. Son of a Brahmin named Hiranyanābha. Once this Brahmin youth went to the hermitage of King Janaka and entered into a controversy with the Brahmins there. In the argument Kauthumi became angry and killed a Brahmin. From that day he became a leper. The sin of Brahmahatyā (murder of Brahmin) also followed him. Finally according to the advice of his father he worshipped the sun God, with Śrāvya-saṁjñakaśūkta (a spell or incantation) and by the blessing of the Sun God he got deliverance from the sin of Brahmahatyā and the disease of leprosy. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, Brāhma Parva).

KAUTILYA. See under Cāṇakya.

KAUTSA. A noble Brahmin scholar. He was present at the sarpa-sattra (sacrificial fire to kill serpents) of Kautsyā (Kautsa). A hermit who was the disciple of Varatantu. When he had completed his education he asked his teacher what gift he desired. The teacher said that he wanted fourteen crores of gold coins as gift. Kautsyā approached the emperor Raghu. The emperor had just finished a sacrifice called Visvajit and had emptied his treasury by giving away all the wealth he had as alms. Only pots made of wood were left as his wealth. When the emperor heard about the need of Kautsyā he decided to conquer the capital city of Kubera. That night Kubera filled the treasury of Raghu by a shower of gold. The emperor Raghu gave Kautsyā fourteen crores of gold coins. (Raghubhāma).

Kavaca. A sage in the assembly of Indra. (M.B. Śantī Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 30).

Kavaci. One of the sons of Dhartrāstra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 103). In Mahābhārata, Karṇa Parva, Chapter 84, it is said that he was killed by Bhīmasena.

Kāverī. A holy river in South India. Famous sacred places like Śrīraṅga and Kumbhakonā are on its banks. The Devī of the river lives in Varuṇa's assembly worshiping him. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20).

The Skanda Purāṇa has the following story as to how Kāverī came down to earth:

Once Agastya propitiated Śiva at Kailāsa and sought the boon of some water for him to find a sacred place on earth. At the same time Kāverī also was worshiping Śiva. Śiva filled Agastya's bowl with Kāverī water. Agastya, on his way back from Kailāsa cursed the Rākṣasa called Kauṭsa and kicked the Vindhya mountain down. (See under Agastya). After overcoming various difficulties Agastya at last reached South India. He sat in meditation with the bowl of Kāverī water before him, and then, at the request of Indra, Gaṇapati, in the guise of a crow came and sat on the brink of the bowl and upset it. The water in the bowl flowed as a river, and that river is the present Kāverī. (Asurakāṇḍa, Skanda Purāṇa).

Kavi I. A son of Vaivasvata Manu. Vaivasvata Manu was the son of Śivasvāna. Manu had sixteen sons who were—Manu, Yama, Yamī, Āśvinikumāras, Revanta, Suduyumna, Ikṣvāku, Nṛga, Saryāti, Diśta, Dhṛṣṭa, Karuṇa, Nārisyaṇa, Nābhāga, Prśadhra and Kavi.

Kavi II. There is a reference to a sage named Kavi who was the son of the sage Bṛhgu, in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 42. 'He was among the sages who stole the lotus of Agastya. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 32).

Kavi III. An agni who was the fifth son of Bṛhaspati, is named Kavi. This agni is situated in the sea in the form of Bādvāgni. This agni has two other names also—Udāha and Įrdādbhakā. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 219, Verse 20).

Kavi IV. In Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Verse 132, Chapter 83, we find that three persons, namely, Kavi, Bṛhgu and Āṅgiras took their birth from the sacrificial fire at the famous Yāga of Bṛhma. Of them Bṛhma made Kavi his own son. This Kavi had eight sons known as the Āruṇas. One of them was named Kavi and another was named Kavyā.

Kavi V. Rgveda, 1st Mandala, 17th Anuśāvaka. 116th Sūkta refers to a blind sage named Kavi.

KaviRāja. A Sanskrit poet who lived in India in the 12th Century A.D. His chief works are "Rāghavapāṇḍaviya" and "Pārijātāharana". His real name was Mādhavabhāṭa.

Kaviśa. A sage. There was a person named Kaviśa among the sages who came to visit Śrī Rāma when he returned after his life in the forest. The sages who came there from the western country were, Vṛṣaṅga, Kavisa, Daumya, Raudreya, Nārada, Vāmadeva, Saubhā, Aṅtvākra, Śuka, Bṛhgu, Lomāsa, and Maudgalya. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

Kavya. Son of Kavi, one of the Prajāpatīs. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 85). Also, a synonym of Śuka.

Kavya (M.). Agni Purāṇa, Chapters 390 to 400 contain a discussion on poetry, which is the basis for literary criticism in India. The above discussion in Agni Purāṇa, comprehends the forms and features of poetry, rasa (sentiment), style, the art of acting and the drama, and other matters related to poetry and art.

Kāvyamātā. Mother of Śuka, the preceptor of the Daitiyas. Kāvyamātā possessed extraordinary powers of penance. In the Devī Bhāgavata the following story is given; how she cursed Viṣṇu and how she made Viṣṇu and Indra powerless.

Once a fierce war was fought by the Devas and the Asuras in which the latter got defeated, and they sought the help of Śukrācārya. But, as the Devas enjoyed the support of Viṣṇu, Śuka could not do anything for the asuras, and he therefore advised them to get on somehow or other for some time. After that Śuka went to Kailāsa and performed penance, hanging head downwards, for a thousand years to secure rare and exceptional mantras. During this period the Devas again attacked the Asuras, who ran up to Kāvyamātā for succour, and she, by one glance, sent the Devas to long sleep. She reduced Viṣṇu and Indra also to a state of paralysis. Then Viṣṇu meditated upon the Sudarśana Cakra, which arrived immediately and with the Cakra he cut off Kāvyamātā's head. Sage Bṛhgu then appeared on the scene and brought back Kāvyamitā to life, and she, in furious rage cursed that Viṣṇu should take many births. As a result of the curse Mahāviṣṇu had to incarnate himself on earth many times. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

Kavyavāhā (S). A group of Pitṛs. The Devī Bhāgavata, Skandhas 11 and 15 state that this group of Pitṛs were born from the drops of sweat which came out of the bodies of Dakṣa and others when they were fascinated by the charm of Sandhyā, the spiritual daughter of Bṛhma.

Kāyādhū. Wife of Hiranyakasipu. Prahlāda was born to her.

Kāyaśodhanatīrtha. A holy place in Kurnā. According to Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, 1

Śuka is also known as Kāya. Certain Purāṇas claim Śuka as the son of Bṛhgu, while certain others refer to him as the son of Kavi son of Bṛhgu. Pulomā was Bṛhgu's wife. But, the Purāṇas call the mother of Śuka Kāvyamātā. No mention is made about the wife of Kavi the son of Bṛhgu. Pulomā and Kāvyamātā are different persons. Therefore, Śuka might be the son of Bṛhgu by another wife, or he might be the son of Kavi.
Chapter 86, by taking a bath at this place the body would be purified.

KAYAVYA. A Caṇḍāla. He was born to a Caṇḍāla woman as the son of a Kṣatriya. But the Caṇḍālas who were impressed by Kāyavaya’s moral conduct, made him the headman of the village. He taught others that all people should honour Brāhmaṇas and love their country. His political creed was that those who prospered by the ruin of a country were just like the worms living on a dead body. (M.B. Śanti Parva, Chapter 135).

KEDĀRA. A holy place in the interior of Kurukṣetra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 83, that those who bathe in this holy Bath would obtain the fruits of good actions. One of the twelve Liṅgas consecrated in important places, is in Kedāra.

KEKARALOHITA. A great serpent which once took sage Cyavana to Pātāla. Cyavana, after worshipping Śiva at Nakuleśvara tirtha got into river Narmadā to take his bath when the nāga called Kekeiralohita caught hold of him, dragged him and bit him. As the sage meditated upon Viṣṇu the poison did not affect him. The serpent released him from Pātāla as he was unaffected by poison. Cyavana went to the palace of Prahlāda accompanied by nāga damsels. On the request of Prahlāda Cyavana described to him the holy places on earth, and without any delay Prahlāda came to earth for hunting during which sojourn on earth he visited Naimiṣāraṇya. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 8).

KEKAYA. The Mahābhārata mentions another Kekeya, a King of the solar dynasty. He wedded two Mālava princesses from the elder of whom were born Kīcaka and Upākicaka, and from the younger was born Sudeśṇā, also called Kaikeyi. This Sudeṣṇā married Mātśya, the Viṃśa King. (Viṃśa Parva, Southern text, Chapter 16).

KEKAYA (M). 1) General. A Kingdom in ancient India. Kaikeyi, one of Daśāratha’s wives, was a daughter of a Kekeya King.

2) Origin. The country got the name ‘Kekeya’ as it was ruled by King Kekeya. His genealogy is as follows. Descended from Viṣṇu thus:—Brahmā—Atri—Candra—Budha—Purūravas—Āyus—Nahuṣa—Yayāti—Anudruhu—Sabhnāra—Kālanara—Srījaya—Uśīnara—Śibi—Kekeya. Śibi had four sons called Bhadra, Suvira, Kekeya and Vṛṣadarpa. (Bhāgavata 9th Skandha).

Other details. (1) The King and the people of Kekeya were called the Kekeyas.

(2) Five heroic Kekeya princes met with their deaths in fighting Droṇa. (Strī Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 25).

(3) Two Kekeya Princes, Vinda and Anuvinda fought on the Kaurava side. (Karna Parva, Chapter 13).

KERAKA. People of an ancient country in South India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhāparva, Chapter 31 that Sahadeva the son of Mādrī conquered the Kerakas and Kerala.

KERALA. 1) General information. A small country lying in the south-west corner of India. From the Purāṇas it could be understood that this country lying to the south of Gokarṇa up to Cape Comorin and to the west of Western Ghats had a very ancient history and civilization of its own.

2) Origin of Kerala. There are two statements, slightly different from each other, in the Purāṇas, about the origin of Kerala.

(1) For performing the funeral ceremony of the sons of Sagara whose ashes were lying in Pātāla (Nether world), Bhagiratha performed penance and brought the heavenly river Gaṅgā to the earth. (See under Gaṅgā). The river fell in North India and flowed in torrents to the sea and the surrounding regions were submerged in water. Among the places submerged, there was the important holy place and Bath of Gokarṇa also, lying on the west coast of India. Those hermits who lived in the vicinity of the temple at Gokarṇa, escaped from the flood and went to Mahendra-giri and informed Parāsurāma of the calamity of the flood. Parāsurāma went with them to the sea-shore. Varuṇa did not make his appearance. The angry Parāsurāma stood in deep meditation for a little while. The weapons came to his hands. Varuṇa was filled with fear and he instantly appeared before Parāsurāma, who asked him to release the land swallowed by the sea. Varuṇa agreed. Parāsurāma sent his bow and arrow back to the sky. Then he took a winnowing basket (Śūrpa) and threw it at the sea. The sea retreated from the place up to the spot where the winnowing basket fell, and the portion of land including Gokarṇa which had been swallowed by sea was recovered. This land is called Kerala, which is known by the name ‘Śūrparaka’ also. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 98 and 99).

(2) Parāsurāma went round the world eighteen times and killed all the Kṣatriya Kings. After that he performed the sacrifice of Aśvamedha (horse sacrifice). In the sacrifice he gave all the lands as alms to the Brahmins. Kaśyapa received all the lands for the Brahmins. After that he requested Parāsurāma to vacate the land. Accordingly Parāsurāma created new land by shooting an arrow at the sea, for his own use. “At the words of Kaśyapa, he made the sea retreat by shooting an arrow, thereby creating dry land.” This land was Kerala. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70).

3) Kerala and Pātāla (Nether world). The ancient sages of the Purāṇas have grouped the worlds into three, the Svarga (heaven), Bhūmi (the earth) and the Pātāla (the nether world). The three worlds taken as a whole were divided into fourteen worlds. It does not appear that this grouping was merely imaginary. A keen observation of the Purāṇas would lead one to infer that the Himālayan plateau was considered as Devaloka-Svarga (heaven), the planes between the Himālaya and the Vindhya as Bhūloka (the earth) and the regions to the south of the Vindhya as Pātāla (the nether world), by the ancient people of India. The seven worlds of Pātāla such as Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātāla, Mahātāla, Rasātāla and Pātāla might have been seven countries in this region. The following description which occurs in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 8, would substantiate this inference.

“Pātāla is below the earth. This Pātāla is a group of seven worlds one below the other, with names, Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātāla, Rasātāla and Mahātāla. In all those worlds, there are several beautiful cities and houses, palaces and castles, parks, gardens, open temples and halls, natural arbours etc., made by Maya. There live the Asuras, the Dānavas (a class of Asuras-demons) the nāgas (serpents) and others, with their families, with happiness and comfort. Chirping birds, pigeons, parrots, docile parrots etc. always play there with their inseparable mates. Trees bearing sweet fruits, plants covered with fragrant flowers, arbours with creepers growing thick, beautiful houses floored with white marble, and so many other things giving pleasure and comfort are seen there in plenty. In these things the Pāṭāla surpasses heaven. Dāiyas, Dānavas and the Nāgas (the Asuras and the serpents) are the dwellers of these worlds. They lead a happy and pleasant life with their families enjoying all sorts of comfort and luxury."

Pāṭāla, one of the seven divisions of the world, is described as follows:

"This is the region of the Nāgas (the serpents). At the root-place of this region there is a particular place having an area of thirty thousand yojanas. Viṣṇu Kāla who has the attribute of 'tāmasa' (darkness) lives there under the name 'Ananta'. The real Ananta or Ādiśeṣa is the radiant embodiment of this Kāla. The daughters of the Nāga Kings are of fair complexion and very beautiful, with clean body. They use perfumeries such as sandalwood, aloewood, saffron, etc.

In this description, the words Dāiyas, Nāgas, Ananta, Sandalwood, aloewood etc. and the mention of natural beauty should be paid particular attention to. From the Rāmāyana we can understand that the Āryas referred to the Drāvidas as Asuras, Rākṣasas (Giants) etc. History says that the Nāgas were the early inhabitants of Kerala. The ancient word 'Ananta' denotes Trivandrum (Tiru-Ananta-puram). The temple of Śrī Padmanābha at Trivandrum answers to this description. The perfumeries such as sandalwood, aloewood (cidar) etc. are the wealth of Kerala. On the whole the description of Pāṭāla fits well with that of Kerala. So it is not wrong to infer that the description of Pāṭāla in the Purāṇas is entirely about Kerala in all its aspects.

4) The Primitiveness of Kerala. From the portions of Purāṇas given below it could be ascertained that Kerala had an independence of its own from the very ancient days.

(1) Among the Kings who attended the Svayamvara (marriage) of Sāikāla, the daughter of the King of Kāśi, such as, the King of Kuru, King of Mādra, King of Sindhu, King of Pāṇcāla, Kings of Kannātaka, Cola and Vidarbha, there was the King of Kerala also. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 3).

(2) When describing the various places in the Southern part of Bhārata, names such as Dramida, Kerala, Mūsika, Kannātaka etc. occur in the Mahābhārata. So it is to be understood that when Vyāsa wrote Bhārata, there was the kingdom of Kerala and that it was separate from the country of Drāviḍa. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

(3) "Kārtavīryārjuna took his majestic seat in the midst of Cola, Kerala, Pāṇḍya and other Kings of the countries under the sea, who were standing round him to pay homage to him." (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 54).

(4) It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277, that a King named Gāndhāra was born in the dynasty of Turvasu the brother of Yadu, and that from Gāndhāra were born the powerful families of the Gāndhāras the Keralas, the Golas, the Pāṇḍyas and the Kolas.

(5) In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 175, it is mentioned that the people of Kerala were considered as barbarians by the North Indians.

(6) In Bhāgavata, Skandha 10, it is mentioned that the Kings of Cola, Pāṇḍya and Kerala, from South India, had reached the capital city of Vidarbha to take part in the Svayamvara (marriage) of Rukmīṇī.

(7) Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanza 15, that in his conquest of the countries, Kaūra had conquered Kerala also.

(8) It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 31, that Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas, conquered the Keralas and the Kerakas. It may be noted that the Kerakas are different from Keralas.

(9) Vālmiki mentions the countries which could be seen by the monkeys who were sent to the South by Sugriva to search lor Sītā.

"Nādim Godāvari caiva Sarvarnēvānupāyātā / Tathaśvāṅdrīn ca Paundrān ca Colān Pāṇḍyān ca Keralān. //

"You could see the river Godāvari and beyond it the countries of Āndhra, Paundra, Cola, Pāṇḍya and Kerala."

This is a proof of the primitiveness of Kerala.

(10) The King of Kerala had given Yudhiśthira, as presents, sandalwood, pearls, Lapis Lazuli etc. (M.B. Dāśinātayapātā, Sahā Parva, Chapter 51).

In several other Purāṇas also, mention about Kerala occurs.

5) The ancient administration of Kerala. Parimelazhakar, a Saṅga poet who was a great expounder of "Tirukkuṟal", has stated that from the beginning of the world the three kingdoms, Cera, Cola and Pāṇḍya had existed. Though there is a bit of exaggeration in this statement, there are enough proofs to say that a long time before the birth of Christ, Kerala was under a systematic rule.

In 'Tolkāppiyam' the first grammatical work in Tamil mention is made about the administration of Kerala. Megasthenes, a traveller of 4th century B.C. has stated about the rule of Kerala:

"There were five councils called the Paṅcamahāśabhas (the five great councils) to help the Cera Kings. It is stated that these councils were formed by the King Utiyana Cera of the Trākkāna fort. Besides these five councils there was an advisory Committee, of which, the priest of the King, the Chief Minister, Chief of the spies and the Chief Revenue officer (Kaviṭi) were members. For convenience of administration the country was divided into tarakkāṭṭas (groups of houses—villages) and Nattukkūṭṭas (Districts—group of villages). Taras (villages) were ruled by four elders (Kāranavas). Four villages formed a Nāḷpādu (group) of four. Four Nāḷpadus formed a Kaṇzhaka (a division of the country with a chief temple within it) and four Kaṇzhakas formed a Peruṿakzhaka (greater Kaṇzhaka). Peruṿakzhaka was also known as Trākkala. The assembly hall of Trākkūṭta is called Koṭil. This hall was erected generally beside the temple. The chief officer of the temple was the chairman of the Trākkūṭta (assembly of the people). When a Trākkūṭta is assembled, sixty-four elders of the "taras", the "accas" (officers) of Kaṇzhakas, the sixty-four Taṇḍāns and sixteen Nālpādies had to be present. The Nālpādies were the chiefs of four taras. The accas, who were the Presidents, had to come clad in variegated silk, with waist-band of long cloth and wearing a small sword (Churikā). Till recently the Kazhakas of Andallūr, Rāmpallya, Kurvantaṭa, Turuttī etc., and so many Nālpādus and taras and the elders thereof had been retaining and enjoying titles and distinctions of rank.

The Namboothiris (Brahmins) entered Kerala before the beginning of the Malayāla Era. With that, changes took place in the administration of Kerala. Certain edicts help us to ascertain the changes that took place in the administration. The edict of Vāzhappally of the 9th century by Rajaśekhara is an important one in this connection. This emperor of the Ceras who is considered to be a contemporary of Śri Saṅkarācārya had the title beginning with “Rājadhirāja Paramesvāra Bhāṭṭāraka” (T.A.S. Vol. II, P. 8-14). The subject dealt with in the edict is the ‘daily worship and settlement’, in the temple of Tiruvottiyūr. It is stated in this edict that the people of Vāzhappally and the representatives of 18 Nādus or divisions had met in the temple and taken certain decisions.

The next one is the Kottayam Copper edicts known as the ‘Tarisa Church Edicts’. This is a document granting the Tarisa Church in Quilon, the adjoining lands and some other institutions. This edict was granted by Ayyaṇaṭi tiruvvaṭikal the ruler of the Nāṭu (division), for the Cera emperor. It is mentioned as “including the Temple Officer Vaijayaṛākeṭavār”, which means that Vaijayaṛāka had been present on the occasion of granting the edict, as the representative of Emperor Sthāṇuravī. The Nāḍuvāṭhis (local chiefs or rulers of division) were not empowered to take decision in very important matters. Titles, rights, distinctions of rank etc. were granted by a council of Chief minister, Officers, Punattalappati and Polakkūṭṭapati (two high officials). Vaijyaṛākeṭavar, the Koil adhiḥkāri, was the representative of the emperor at Mahodayapurā. The supervising officials of temples were generally called the ‘Koil adhiḥkāri’. Normally the younger brothers of the Kings were appointed in this rank. These temple-officers were helped in their duties by the Division-rulers, people of the locality and the inferior officers in the temple. When the empire of Kulaśekhara declined, the family of Perumpadappu got this position of ‘Koil adhiḥkāri’. So the title ‘Koil adhiḥkāri’ is added to the names of the princes of Cochin.

Another one is the Mampally Edicts. This is a deed of granting some lands free to the temple of Airūr, in the name of Adiccaṇ Umayamma of Tṛkkalayapuram, by Veṇaṭṭu Śri Vallabhanākota in M.E. 149. Even such an unimportant thing as the granting of free lands, had to be effected with the permission of Cera kings and their councils. (T.A.S. Vol IV, Page 9).

From these edicts it is clear that the administration of the temples was carried out by representatives elected by people. For each village temple there was an administrative council. These councils were controlled by Nāḍuvāṭhis and Deśavāṭhis (Divisional and Sub Divisional rulers who had Nair infantry (big or small as the case may be) at their disposal. The administrative assembly met either in the open hall at the main gate of the temple or on the stage for performances. The rights and authorities were in the hands of the general assembly of the people called Nāṭṭukkūṭṭa and the council of the temple officials. When the Namboothiris became powerful they became members of the council. With this change the Kings and Koil adhiḥkāris became puppets in the hands of the Namboothiris. In the Rāmeśvaram edict of M.E. 276 it is mentioned that King Rāmnarvama Kulaśekhara was punished with retribution for his ‘hatred’ of the Aryas. Finally the Nambūthiris (Malayāla Brahmins) became the landlords of the country.

6) The people of ancient Kerala. It is assumed that the ancient inhabitants of Kerala were Dravidas. But some historians have mentioned about the ‘Proto Dravidians and the Pre Dravidians. The hill tribes such as Kāṅkiṅkāri, Mutuvas, Mala Vetas, Pulayas, Kuravas, Nāṭṭis, Malayarayas, Malayāṭis, Malāpyāṭas, Malayáṭis, Mutuvan Pulāṭis etc. are said to have belonged to this group. They worshipped several things such as stone, banyan tree, cleni tree, Asclapia tree, Nim tree Terminatia Bellarica, Borassus flabelliformis, cassia fistula, Ghosts, thunder, rain, the sun etc. They worshipped good ghosts for welfare, and bad ghosts to avoid misfortunes. They had images of Māṭa, Gīta, Cāvū, Marut, Pettucāvū, Arukula, Preta, Vazhipinakki, Ayirimilī, Parakkutti, Kattutāti, Malayāṭhi, Mārīpi, Nāyāṭṭu Pe Māṅkāṭṭamma, Muniyappa, Veṭṭakkārān and so on. They worshipped in small bouses, open grounds or houses. They knew black magic such as cursing, giving poison in meals etc. These uncivilized people were very particular about cleanliness on the occasions of delivery, menstruation, death etc. They pleased bad ghosts by offering liquor, flesh and blood, and good-ghosts with milk, ghee, honey etc. They buried dead bodies with a little raw rice meant for food at the time of entering the other world. They had collective worship. They sang songs at the time of worship using some primitive musical instruments. For each village there were elders who were priests and rulers. They erected stone huts in the burial place and buried the dead inside these in graves. These graves were called ‘Pāṇḍukuzhy’. The Urālīs, continue the custom of posting two stones at either end of the grave. The custom of burial prevailed more than cremation.

Nair, Nambūtiri, Izhava, Christians, Muslims and such other castes came to Kerala from other places later. 7) Ibn Batuta and Kerala. Ibn Batuta who was born in the town of Ṭanjīr in Morocco in Africa in A.D. 1304 had travelled all over the Eastern countries then known. He had started from his house on a Haj Pilgrimage at the age of 22. He returned home only after 29 years, having travelled all over the known countries. He has written a book in Arabic about his travels of 29 years. One third of this thick volume is devoted for descriptions of his travels in India alone. Its name is ‘Tuh Phattunannā’. He passed over the Hindu Kush in A.D. 1333 and entered India. In the midst of his travels throughout the length and breadth of India, he came to Kerala also. He says as follows about Kerala in his book:—

“Malabar is the country of Pepper. This country’s length from Gokarna to Quilon is two months’ journey. All the roads in this country are rendered cool and shady by asclapia trees. On the roads at intervals of ‘half an hour, there are inns. Near the inn there will be a well and a person to give water. The non-Muslims are given water in pots. But water is poured into the hands of Muslims. Rice is served in plantain leaf and sauces are also served in the same leaf. Uncultivated and uninhabited land is not to be seen. Each house is situated in the centre of a cultivated area. The people of this country do not use animals to carry goods. Travelling is on foot. Only Kings use horses. There is a conveyance called mancal (Palanquin). Slaves are used as Palanquin bearers. I have seen roads which could be used so fearlessly, only in Kerala and, nowhere else in the world. Capital punishment is given to one who steals even a coconut. The people of this country respect Muslims.

There are twelve kings in Malabar. None of them are Muslims. Many of them are powerful having an army of more than fifty-thousand soldiers. But there are no quarrels or clashes among them. The powerful do not have the desire to subjugate the less powerful. The inheritants of these kings are not sons, but nephews (sons of sisters). Besides the people of Kerala I have seen only the Muslims of the country of Salam on the banks of the Niger in Africa who have adopted the system of inheritance in the female line.”

Ibn Batuta has given some minor descriptions about the towns of Maṅgalāpuram, Ezhumala, Kannūr Calicut, Pāliyam, Crāṅgānūr and Quilon.

KESARĀ. A Mountain in Sākadvīpa (Sāka island). The air on this mountain was always filled with fragrance. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 23).

KESARĪ. A forest King who lived in the Mahā Meru. While Kesari was living in the Mahāmeru, Brahmā cursed a celestial maiden named Mānagarvā and changed her into a female monkey. She became the wife of Kesari, under the name Aṭjanā. For a long time the couple had no children. Aṭjanā worshipped Vāyu Bhagavān (Wind-God) for a child.

Once during this period the gods and hermits went to Pārvaṇa Śiva and requested him to beget a son to help Mahāvisṇu who was about to incarnate as Śrī Rāma to kill Rāvaṇa. Śiva and Pārvati instantly took the form of monkeys and entered the forest for play. They having not returned for a long time, the gods asked the wind-god to go in search of them. The wind god came in the form of a great storm and shook the whole of the forest. Still they did not come out. Pārvati who was pregnant was ashamed to come out. With Śiva she got on an Aśoka tree and sat there. Seeing that tree alone standing motionless in the big storm Vāyu god approached the tree and looked up. Śiva and Pārvati appeared before Vāyu. Pārvati refused to take the foetus in the form of monkey to Kailāsa. As Śiva had instructed, Pārvati gave the child in the womb to the wind-god. It was at this time that Aṭjanā had prayed to Vāyu for a child. Vāyu gave that child to Aṭjanā, who gave birth to it. That child was Hanumān. Thus Hanumān got the names, Aṭjanāputra (son of Aṭjanā), Vayuputra (son of Vāyu), Kesari putra (Son of Kesari) etc. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 417).

KEŚAVA. See under Keṣaṇa.

KEŚAYANTRĪ. An attendant of Skandadeva. (M.B. Sālya Parva, Chapter 46).

KEŚI I.

1) General information. An Asura. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 65 that forty Asuras or Dānavas were born to Kaśyapa, the son of Marici, and the grandson of Brahmā, by his wife Danu, and that Keśi was one of them.

2) Keśi and Indra. Once a war broke out between the Devas and the Asuras. Disasters befell the Devas. Dāityasenaṇa and Devasenaṇa, the daughters of Prajāpāti were about to be carried away by Keśi. Dāityasenaṇa agreed to accompany him of her own accord, but Devasenaṇa cried aloud. Hearing her cry Devendra reached the spot. A terrible fight ensued and finally the defeated Keśi ran away. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 223).

3) Keśi and Viṣṇu. Once there was a fight which lasted for thirteen days, between Keśi and Viṣṇu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 134, Stanza 20).

KEŚI II. A follower of Kaṁsa. This Asura, on the instruction of Kaṁsa, went to Ambājī (Gokula) taking the form of a horse, to kill Śrī Kaṇṭha. Śrī Kaṇṭha killed Keśi. It is seen in the Bhāgavata (Malayalam) that Śrī Kaṇṭha got the name Keśava because he had killed Keśi. (Skandha 10, Keśivadhā).

KEŚI III. In Bhāgavata there is another Keśi who was the son of Vasudeva.

“Pauravi Rohini Bhadrā Madirā Rocanā Ilā / Devakiṣramukhā āsan / Patnīya Ānakadundubbheḥ.”

Pauravi, Rohini, Bhadrā, Madirā, Rocanā, Ilā and Devakī were the wives of Vasudeva. From this statement made in Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, Chapter 24, it is clear that Vasudeva had a number of wives. Kausalyā, who was one of them, was the mother of Keśi. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, Chapter 24, Stanza 48).

KEŚINI I. A celestial woman. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 65 it is stated that the twelve celestial maids, Alambuṣa, Miśrekeśi, Vidutyparanā, Tilottamā, Aruṇā, Rakṣitā, Rambhā, Manorāmā, Keśini, Suratā, Surajā and Supriyā were born to Kaśyapa of his wife Pradā.

KEŚINI II. The wife of Ajāmīdha, a King of the Pūru dynasty. The three sons Jahnū, Vraja and Rāpiṇa were born to Ajāmīdha of his wife Keśini. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KEŚINI III. A maid of Damayanti. When Nala reached Kundinapurī, as Bāhuka the charioteer of Rūtaparṇa, Keśini approached Bāhuka at the request of Damayanti and by various tests found out that Bāhuka was Nala. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 74 and 75).

KEŚINI IV. A servant of Pārvati. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 231, Stanza 48 that once Pārvati with her servant Keśinī praised Śiva.

KEŚINI V. Once there arose a quarrel between Sudhanvā, the son of Aṅgiras, and Virocana the son of Prahlāda, because both wanted to marry the same girl named Keśinī. Sudhanvā was a Brahmin whereas Virocana was an Asura who argued that Asura was nobler than Brahmin and Sudhanvā said that it was the other way. Both wagered their lives and accepted Prahlāda as their judge. The decision of Prahlāda was that the Brahmin was the nobler of the two. Because Prahlāda said the truth Sudhanvā did not kill Virocana. But Virocana had to wash the feet of Sudhanvā in the presence of Keśīṇī, feet Sudhanvā married Keśīṇī in the presence of Virocana. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 35).

KEŚĪṆĪ VI. A wife of King Sagara. This Keśīṇī was the daughter of the King of Vidarbha. The son Asamajjas was born to Sagara of Keśīṇī. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Sarga 38).

KETAKI. (A flower). [Pandurnus odoratissimus] Though Ketaki is a flower which had been worn on Śiva's head, it is not worshipped for the following reason.

In Satyayuga Mahāvīra performed intense penance on the Śveta island for the attainment of eternal happiness. Brahmā also performed penance at a beautiful place for the annihilation of desires. During their tapas Viśu and Brahmā, for a rest, left their seats and walked about in the forest when they met each other. There arose a controversy between them about their respective greatness when Śiva, in the form of a Liṅga, appeared between the two contestants and told them that he, who first found out his (Śiva's) head or feet was greater than the other. Accordingly Viśu went down and Brahmā went up on a tour of enquiry.

Though Viśu went down deeper and deeper for a long time to find out Śiva's feet he failed in the attempt and so returned and sat at the place whence he started for the search. Brahmā went up a very long distance when he saw a Ketaki flower falling down from the sky. He took the flower in his hands and went to Viśu and told him that he had found out Śiva's head and showed the Ketaki flower as proof of his discovery claiming that it was taken from Śiva's head. But Viśu did not believe Brahmā and asked the Ketaki flower to bear witness to Brahmā's claim. The flower gave false evidence in favour of Brahmā. Śiva got angry at this false evidence of Ketaki and cursed it. The Ketaki lost its place among the best flowers from that day onwards.

KETU I. (KETUMĀṆ). A Dānava. He was the son of Kaśyapa (grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici) by his wife Danu. This Asura, who exists in the shape of a planet or in the body of thirty-three brothers, i.e., Vipravati, Śambara, Namuci, Pulomā, Asiloma, Keśi, Durjaya, Ayaṭṭiras, Avaṭṭiras, Aṣva, Sāṅku, Mahābala, Garga, Amūrdhan, Vegavān, Mānavaṇ, Svarbhāṇu, Aṣvapati, Vṛṣaparvan, Ajaka, Aṣvagrīva, Śūkṣma, Tuhunḍa, Ekapāt, Ekacakra, Virūpākṣa, Harāhara, Nikumbha, Kapata, Sarabha, Salabha, Śūrya and Candramas. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63).

But Ketu maintained closer relationship with Rāhu, a step-brother of his, being the son of Kaśyapa by another wife called Śīmhikā. Rāhu and Ketu are even today considered as inauspicious planets. Rāhu wears a half-moon and Ketu holds in his hands a sword and lamp. Amitaujas was Ketu reborn. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 11).

KETU II. A great sage of ancient India. He attained salvation by self-study. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 7).

KETU III. A synonym of Śiva. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 38).

KETU IV. A King born in Bharata's dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KETU V. (DHŪMAKETU). The following story is told in Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa about the birth of Dhūmaketu.

Noting that the population on earth had increased abnormally Brahmā created a damsel called Mṛtyu and asked her to kill people. At this command of Brahmā she began crying, and from her tear drops various kinds of diseases originated at the sight of which she took to penance. Then Brahmā appeared and blessed her saying that no one would die because of her at which she heaved a great sigh of relief from which she was born Ketu or Dhūmaketu.

KETUMĀṆ I. The grandson of Priyavarta, the son of Manu. Agniḍhra, a son of Priyavarta married Pārvacitti. Nine sons were born to Agniḍhra of his wife Pārvacitti. KetumāṆ was one of them. His brothers were Nābhī, Kimpuruṇa, Hari, Ilāytra, Rāmyaka, Hiraṅmaya, Kuru and Bhradṛśa.

In old age Agniḍhra divided his kingdom among his sons. Later, the portion given to KetumāṆ came to be known as KetumāṆa. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 5).

KETUMĀṆ II. A holy place in Jambudvīpa. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 89).

KETUMĀṆ III. (See under KetumāṆ I). KetumāṆ is the ninth division of Jambudvīpa. The people of this part of the earth are equal to gods (Devas). The women are very beautiful. In Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva it is stated that Arjuna conquered this land. KetumāṆa is situated on the east of Mount Meru. In Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 6, there is the description of KetumāṆa.

KETUMĀṆ I. Ketu the Asura (demon). (See under Ketu I).

KETUMĀṆ II. A King who was a luminary in the council of Yudhīśhṭhira. He was a warrior on the side of the Kauravas and a friend of Śrutayudha, the King of Kaliṇga. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 54, Stanza 77, that Bhīmasena killed this warrior in the battle of Bhūrata.

KETUMĀṆ III. In the Mahābhārata, another KetumāṆ who had fought on the side of Puravas, is stated. Dhruvāraṇa had praised the valour of this warrior. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 10, Stanza 44).

KETUMĀṆ IV. A palace in Dvārakā. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Dākṣīṇāyat-pāṭha, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38, that Sudattā, the wife of Śīrṣa lived in this palace.

KETUMĀṆ V. Antapāla (the guard of the boundary) of the west. At the beginning of the creation of the world Brahmā had appointed as guards of the boundaries, Sudhanvan in the east, Śaṅkhaṭapāḍa in the south, KetumāṆ in the West and Hiranyaromaka in the North. (Āgni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

KETUMĀṆ VI. A King of the Puru dynasty. (See under Vaiśāyavi).

KETUMĀṆ VII. In Bhāgavata we see a KetumāṆ who was the son of Dhanvantari, who gave Ayurveda to the world.

"Who was the deva who made the Āyurveda in days of old? His son was KēṭumāṆ whose son was Bhīmara-tha." (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

KETUMĀṆ VIII. Son of Ekalavya. In Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva it is mentioned that this King of the forest tribes fought on the side of Duryodhana and was killed by Bhima.

KETUMATI. Mother of Prahasha, a minister of Rāvana. Ketumati had two sisters Sundarī and Vasudhā. These three were daughters of a Gandhārva woman. Giant Heti, the son of Brahmā married Bhayā and Vidyutkēśa was born to the couple. Sukēśa was born to Vidyutkēśa by his wife Sālakatākā. Three sons Mālyavān, Sumālī and Māli were born to Sukēśa by his wife Daivavatī. Sundarī, Ketumati and Vasudhā the three beautiful sisters mentioned above, were married by the giants Mālyavān, Sumālī and Māli respectively. Thus Ketumati became the wife of Sumālī. To Sumālī and Ketumati were born ten sons, Prahasha, Akampana, Vikāta, Kālākāmukha, Dhūmrakṣa, Dānda, Supārśva, Sainhrāda, Prakvata and Bhasakarna and four daughters Vekā, Puṣpotkāta, Kaikāśi and Kuṃbhinaśā. Most of the sons were ministers of Rāvana. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KETUŚRĪGA. A king of ancient India. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 1).

KETUVARMA. A prince of the country of Trigarta. He was the youngest brother of Suryavarṇā, the King of Trigarta. When Arjuna led the sacrificial horse of the horse-sacrifice of the Pāṇḍavas, Ketuvaraman accompanied Arjuna as a helper. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 74).

KEVALA. A city of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanzas 10 and 11 that Kaṇa conquered this city.

KHA. This syllable has the meanings ‘empty’ and ‘organ of sense’. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

KHAḌGA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Mahābhārata, Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 67).

KHAḌGĀḤU. See under Duṣṣāsana 11.

KHAḌGĪ. See under Kalki.

KHAḤA I. A nāga (serpent) born in the family of Kasīyapa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103).

KHAḤA II. A synonym of Śiva. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Stanza 67).

KHAḤAMA. A Brāhmaṇa. In Mahābhārata, there is a story which describes how this Brahmā Khagama changed another Brahmā into a serpent by cursing him. The Brahmā Khagama and Sahasrapāt were friends. Once Sahasrapāt made a snake of grass and terrified Khagama at Agnihotra (Burnt offering in the holy fire) Khagama instantly cursed Sahasrapāt to become a serpent. Sahasrapāt requested for liberation from the curse. Khagama said that he would resume his original form on the day he saw Ruru the son of Pramati. From that day onwards Sahasrapāt roamed about in several countries in the form of a serpent. Once Pramadvāra the wife of Ruru, died by snake-bite. Ruru cried over the death of his wife for a long time. According to the advice of a messenger from the Devas Ruru gave half of his life-time to his wife and she came to life again. But Ruru felt a bitter hatred against serpents and began their extermination. Once he met with Sahasrapāt. Instantly at the sight of Ruru, Sahasrapāt obtained his original form. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 11).

KHAḤAṆA. A king born in the family of Śrī Rāma. He was the son of Vajranābha and the father of Vidhṛti. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

KHAḤOḌARA. See under Kahoḍa.

KHALĪ I. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Stanza 43).

KHALĪ II. An Asura dynasty. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 153, Stanza 22, that Vasiṣṭha once destroyed an Asura dynasty called Khalī with his eulogence.

KHALU. A river of ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 29).

KHANAKA. A messenger sent by Vidura, secretly to the Pāṇḍavas who were living in the wax-house. Vidura sent a message through Khanaka to the effect that Duryodhana had decided to set fire to the wax-house employing Purocana to do it on the 14th night of the dark lunar fortnight. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 147).

KHAṆḌAKHAṆḌA. A female attendant of Skanda. In Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 20, mention is made about this woman.

KHAṆḌAPARASU. Śiva. A story occurs in Mahābhārata stating how Śiva got this name. The famous Dakṣa-yāga (sacrifice performed by Dakṣa) was performed at a time when the Nara Nārāyana were engaged in penance in Badaryārāma. Dakṣa did not invite his son-in-law Śiva. The angry Śiva sent his trident against Dakṣa. The trident destroyed the sacrifice of Dakṣa and then flew against the breast of Nārāyaṇa who was sitting in penance in Badaryārāma. By the power of the trident the hair of Nārāyaṇa became of munja (a grass) colour. From that day onwards Nārāyaṇa came to be known by the name Muṇījakēśa. By a sound ‘hum’, the hermit Nārāyaṇa deviated the trident, which reached the hands of Śiva, who got angry and approached Nārāyaṇa to kill him. Nara, who was close by took an arrow and reciting spells over it, released it to kill Śiva. Immediately the arrow changed to an axe. Śiva broke the axe. After this the axe became the weapon of Śiva. In Mahābhārata Sāntī Parva, Chapter 49, Stanza 33, it is mentioned that this axe was given to Parasurāma the disciple of Śiva. Thenceforward Śiva got the name Khaṇḍaparasu. (Parā'u means axe). (Mahābhārata, Sāntī Parva, Chapter 343. Stanzas 159-59, 167).

KHAṆḌAVADĀḤA. 1) Introduction. Long ago a King named Śvetaki began to perform a sacrifice of duration of 100 years. Many Brahmās took part in the sacrifice as priests conducting the rituals and ceremonies. These Brahmā priests began to depart after a few years turning blind due to the smoke coming out of the sacrificial fire. Thus the sacrifice was stopped for want of priests. Śvetaki was grieved at this and performed penance to Śiva for getting a priest. Śiva appeared before him and pointed out hermit Durvāsas as the priest. Śvetaki recommenced the sacrifice and under the supervision of Durvāsas the sacrifice was completed. But Fire god caught dysentery due to the continuous eating of oblations offered in the sacrificial fire for a long period. His face became pale, body became lean, and he had no taste for food. At last Fire-God went to Brahmā and complained about his disease. Brahmā said that in the forest of Khāṇḍava there lived so many creatures which were enemies of the devas (gods) and that by eating their fat the disease of Agni would be cured. Accordingly Agni came to the Khāṇḍava forest.
The serpent Taksaka, a friend of Indra, lived in this forest with his wife and children. Indra knew that Agni had come to burn the Khandava forest and resolved to save Taksaka at any cost. When Agni (fire) began to catch the forest, Indra had already begun rain. So it was not possible for Agni to consume the forest. Agni tried seven times to consume the forest and in all these seven attempts he failed. Agni again approached Brahmā, who told him that the Nara-Narayanas would take birth in the earth as Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and that at that time it would be possible for fire to consume the forest Khandava.

2) Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna in the forest of Khandava. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in Indraprastha, once the hot season became so unbearable that Arjuna took Kṛṣṇa with him and went to the forest of Khandava. While they were playing in the river Yamunā with their wives Agni came there in the guise of an old Brāhmaṇ and told them all that had happened and requested their help for eating the Khandava forest. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna promised to help him in this affair.

3) Preparation of weapons. For the time being Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were not having sufficient weapons. Agni (fire-god) thought of Varuṇa (the God of water) who instantly appeared. At the request of Agni Varuṇa gave Arjuna the famous bow ‘Candradasana’ (Gāndiva), a quiver which would never become empty of arrows and a chariot having a flag with the sign of monkey and to Śri Kṛṣṇa the weapon of the discus. Varuṇa gave four white horses also with gold chains round their necks for drawing the chariot of Arjuna. With these weapons Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna got ready to help Agni. Śri Kṛṣṇa became the charioteer of Arjuna.

4) Burning the forest. When Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna stood ready Agni began to consume the forest. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna guarded the boundaries of the forest so that the inmates of the forest might not escape. The living creatures ran hither and thither finding no way to escape. Many died of suffocation. At that time the hermits who were dwellers of that forest ran to Indra and informed him of the great calamity. Indra instantly got ready to fight and save the forest. He covered the whole of the sky with clouds and a heavy rain was showered on the forest. Arjuna created a covering of arrows like an umbrella over the fire and saved him from the rain.

5) The family of Taksaka. At this particular time Taksaka had been away at Kurukṣetra. Aśvaseṇa the son of Taksaka was with Indra at Indraprastha. Seeing his mother (wife of Taksaka) swallowed him from tail to head. Then she ran to the boundary to throw the chariot into the outer region. Seeing this Arjuna got angry and cut at the head of Aśvaseṇa. But at the nick of time Indra sent a storm and made Arjuna swoon and Aśvaseṇa was saved. So Arjuna became furious and began to cut down every creature he saw. Arjuna, Kṛṣṇa and Agni together cursed Aśvaseṇa that he would get refuge nowhere. Aśvaseṇa kept up his hatred of Arjuna. In the Bhārata battle, Aśvaseṇa got on an arrow sent by Karna at Arjuna and knocked off the crown of Arjuna and returned. But due to the curse Karna did not receive him back.

6) Deadly fight. The serpents and hawks confronted Arjuna, who cut off their heads. Kṛṣṇa killed the Asuras with the weapon discus. Indra came to the battle-field riding on his elephant Airāvata. Kāla (Time), Kubera, Skanda, Aśvinidevas and all the other Devas (gods), and Asuras (demons) helped Indra in the fight. But Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna came out victorious.

7) The advent of Maya. Meanwhile Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna called Indra and told him who they were and informed him that Taksaka had gone to Kurukṣetra. Hearing this Indra blessed Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and retreated from the battlefield. Agni began to consume the forest more vigorously than before. Because of the unbearable heat, Maya, the architect of the Asuras, came out of the house of Taksaka and ran to Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and entreated them to save him. Accordingly Arjuna saved him from the fire.

8) The story of four birds which escaped from the fire. In that forest a hermit named Mandapaḷa had erected his hermitage and lived there performing penance. He died and went to the world of ancestors. But there, the hermit did not attain any fruit of the penance he had performed. The hermit asked the Devas for the reason. They replied that it was because the hermit had no sons. The hermit came to the forest again to marry and beget sons. Mandapaḷa married a bird called Jāritā. Four sons named Jāritāri, Sārīśīka, Sīambamitā and Droṇa, were born to them. After this Mandapaḷa left Jāritā and her sons and went after another woman Lāpitā. Feathers were not yet grown on the body of Jāritā’s four sons. The burning of the forest began before it. Jāritā and her sons were in a sorry plight. The mother could fly. But she did not think of leaving her young ones in danger. She decided to die in the fire folding the young ones under her wings. But her sons did not agree to it. They entreated her to fly away. Thus moments of tears passed by. At last Jāritā told them crying, “There is the hole of a rat closely. The rat had been taken away by a kite. I will take you to that hole and close it. Then I shall go away and return when the fire is abated.”

But the young ones did not agree to this. They loved to be killed by fire, rather than to be killed by rat. Finally at their request Jāritā flew away. Mandapaḷa thought of his sons. He separated from Lāpitā, and came to Agni and requested him to save his sons and Jāritā. Agni consumed the forest and cleared the birds. The young birds requested Agni to save them. Agni Deva saved them. Mandapaḷa and Jāritā returned. That family lived for a long time in joy and happiness and finally attained the world of the gods. Agni returned to heaven after the burning of the forest of Khandava. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapters 233 to 346).

KHANḍAVAPRASTHA. See under Indraprastha.

KHANḍAVĀYANA. Parasurāma gave all the countries conquered by him to Kaśyapa. Along with the lands he gave a golden dās also. The group of hermits called Khāṇḍavāyanas cut the dās into pieces and shared them with the permission of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 117, Stanza 13).

KHANḍIKYA. A Kṣatriya King, Keśidhvaja was the son of his paternal uncle. Both had learned well the ways of union with the divine life. Khāṇḍikya had become an expert in Karmayoga (the path of action) for becoming one with the divine life whereas Keśidhvaja tried to achieve oneness with divine life by Jñāna.
Yoga (the path of knowledge or spiritual attainment). Each desired to subdue the other. Consequently Khāṇḍikīya lost his kingdom and had to live in a forest with his priest and minister. (Bhāgavata, Skandhas 9 and 13).

Keśīdhvajā who tried the path of knowledge to attain Absolution performed several sacrifices for that purpose and cut himself asunder from the bonds of action. Once, while he was performing a sacrifice, a tiger came to the place of sacrifice and killed the sacrificial cow. Then Keśīdhvajā asked the priests who were conducting the sacrifice, what the atonement was for the death of the sacrificial cow. The priests sent the King to the hermit Kaśērū, who sent the King to the hermit Bhṛgu. Hermit Bhṛgu in his turn sent the King to the hermit Śunaka. But the matter did not end there. The hermit Śunaka could not dictate the atonement for the death of the sacrificial cow. So he sent the King to Khāṇḍikīya who was living in the forest. The moment Khāṇḍikīya saw Keśīdhvajā he stood ready to kill him. But Keśīdhvajā revealed everything to Khāṇḍikīya. When he understood the situation Khāṇḍikīya told him with sincerity the rites given in the Śāstras (Vedāṅgas) to atone the death of the sacrificial cow.

Keśīdhvajā returned and completed the sacrifice. The one item of 'gift to the teacher' alone remained. So Keśīdhvajā came to the forest again. Khāṇḍikīya raised the sword to cut him. Keśīdhvajā said that he had come to give Gurudakṣiṇā to the teacher. Khāṇḍikīya repented his rashness and requested Keśīdhvajā to tell him the ways of cutting himself asunder from the bonds of sorrow and grief. Keśīdhvajā advised him the ways to obtain eternal bliss. (Nārada Purāṇa).

KHĀṇīNETRA. The eldest son of Vīvaṁśa, a King of the solar dynasty. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 4, that this King was driven away from the country as he harassed the people.

KHĀRA I. A giant (Rākṣasa). Khara and Atikāya were the reighths of Madhu and Kaitabha. For details see under Kaitabha and Atikāya.

1) Birth and genealogy. Mahābhārata mentions as follows about the birth of this giant:—Viśravas was born from Pūlaskya, the son of Brahmā. Kubera was born from Viśravas. Kubera ruled over Laśkā. Viśravas who had no one to help him once looked with anger at Kubera, who, understanding the wish of his father gave him three giantesses named Puspotaka, Rākā and Mālinī as attendants. They attended on him faithfully and Viśravas was pleased with them. To Viśravas two sons named Rāvana and Kumbhakarna were born by Puspot'āja, Viśbhīṣaṇa was born by Mālinī and the twin sister and brother Śūpanaṅkāh and Khara were born by Rākā. By and by Khara became a famous archer. Rāvana, Kumbhakarna and Viśbhīṣaṇa performed penance to obtain boons and Khara and Śūpanaṅkāh stayed with them to serve them. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 275)

2) Other brothers. Khara had two other brothers Dūṣaṇa and Triśīrās. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

3) The slaughter of Khara. While Śrī Rāma, Sītā and Laṃkṣaṇa were staying in the forest of Daṇḍakāranya Śūpanaṅkāh the sister of Khara came there once and tried to get one of the brothers Śrī Rāma and Laṃkṣaṇa as her husband. Laṃkṣaṇa cut off her nose and ears.

She went to Khara, Dūṣaṇa and Triśīrās and lamented before them. The three of them immediately started with an army of fourteen thousand giants and fought with Rāma and Laṃkṣaṇa, who killed every one of them. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Arayayakānda, Sargas 19 to 30).

KHĀRA II. Another giant who helped Rāvana in the battle between Rāma and Rāvana. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 2, it is said that ‘Parvaṇa, Patana, Jambha, Khara, Krodhavāsa, Harī, Prarujā, Arujā, Praghāsa and others fought with Rāma.

KHĀRAJĀNGHA. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 22).

KHĀRAKARMĪ. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 26).

KHĀṢĀ. A wife of Kaśyapa Prājāpati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa Anīśa I, Chapter 15).

KHASA (M). A country in ancient India. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 41).

KHĀŚIRA. A place situated on the North East corner of Ancient India. (M.B. Bhūṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 68).

KHATVĀNGA. 1) General Information. A King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty, known by the name Dīlīpa also. Bhāgavata Skandha 9, states that Khatvāṅga was the son of the grandson of Kalmāṣapāda. Aṃka was the son of Kalmāṣapāda, Mūlaka the son of Aṃka and Khatvāṅga the son of Mūlaka.

Khatvāṅga who was a royal hermit once pleased God and understood how long he would live. From that day onwards he left all the work of administration in the hands of ministers and spent the remaining days in devotion and meditation. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 2).

2) Particular details. In Mahābhārata it is mentioned that Khatvāṅga was the son of the woman called Ilibilā and that he had the name Dīlīpa also. Khatvāṅga was one of the sixteen famous Kings of Bhārata. The sixteen Kings were Marutta, Suhoitra, Paurava, Śibi, Śrī Rāma, Bhagiratha, Khatvāṅga, (Dīlīpa) Māṇḍarāṣṭha, Yāyāti, Ambarīṣṭa, Śaśābindu, Gaya, Rantideva, Bharata, Pṛthu and Paraśurāma. Khatvāṅga performed one hundred sacrifices. At the time of sacrifice he made golden roads. Even Indra came to the sacrifice. The Devas blessed Khatvāṅga on that day. See under Dīlīpa. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 61).

KHILA. There is an appendix to Mahābhārata called Khila. This Khila is known as Harivaṁśa also. This portion too was written by Viṣṇu.

KHVĀṬA. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 20).

KHVĀṬI I. A daughter of Prājāpati Dakṣa. The hermit Bhṛgu married her. A daughter named Lakṣmī and two sons named Dhātā and Vīḍhātā were born to Bhṛgu by Khyāṭi. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 20).

KHVĀṬI II. Daughter of Kuru, who was born of the family of Dhrvula. Six sons, Aṅga, Sumanas, Śvāti, Kṛatu, Aṅgiras, and Śibi were born to Kuru by his wife Āgneyi. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Arinīa I, Chapter 13).

Khyāṭi was a daughter born to them.

KICĀKA. Brother-in-law of Māṭya, king of Viṣṇu and son of Kckaya, king of the Śūtras.
1) General information. To Kekaya, king of the Sutas, was born of queen Mālavī, Kicaka and other 105 sons younger to him called Upa-Kicakas. Their only sister was called Sudeśṇā. (Bhārata, Southern text, Page 1898). Kicaka and Upa-Kicakas took their birth from an aspect of Bāṇa, the eldest of the Asuras known as the Kālakēyas. (See Bhārata, Page 1893). Mātśya, the Virāṭa king wedded Sudeśṇā; and from that day onwards, the brothers too lived in the Virāṭa palace. Kicaka was the chief-town of Virāṭa's army, and he had, many a time, defeated in war King Susarman of Trigarta.

2) Kicaka and Pāncālī. During their life incognito, the Pāṇḍavas lived in the Virāṭa palace after taking up various jobs. Pāncālī, under the assumed name Mālinī, served Sudeśṇā and her daughter Uttarā as their chaperon. Kicaka fell in love with Pāncālī at first sight. But, Pāncālī resisted all his advances. Then, he sought the help of his sister Sudeśṇā to bring round Pāncālī to him somehow. Sudeśṇā asked Kicaka to be ready on the New Moon day with liquor and rice and promised to send Mālinī (Pāncālī) to him. Ordered by Sudeśṇā, she went to Kicaka with his plate of food much against her will. Kicaka caught hold of her, but she ran when the former caught her by the hair, felled her on the floor and killed her. A Rākṣasa, who was deemed for Pāncālī's security appeared on the scene in a trice and felled Kicaka.

3) Kicaka's Death. The very same night with tears in her eyes, Pāncālī told Bhima all about the indecent behaviour. He asked Pāncālī to invite Kicaka to a secret meeting at a specified place the next night, and promised her that he would remain concealed there and kill Kicaka. Accordingly Bhima concealed himself the next night in the dancing hall and, as requested by Pāncālī, Kicaka came to the hall at midnight to spend a few hours with Pāncālī. Bhima was lying there on a cot, and Kicaka, mistaking him for Pāncālī kissed him. Bhima caught him in his iron grips and crushed him to death. The next morning, it was the fate of Kicaka's brothers to lament over his death. The story also was spread that Kicaka was killed by some Gandharva, the husband of Pāncālī.

The Upa-Kicakas removed the dead body of their brother to the burning ghat. Proclaiming that Pāncālī, who was responsible for the death of their brother would also be burnt to death on the same pyre, the Upa-Kicakas forcibly took her with them. Hearing the heart-rending cries of Pāncālī Bhima rushed to the spot and killed all the Upa-Kicakas and saved Pāncālī from death. In the presence of the Virāṭa king the cremation of Kicaka and the Upa-Kicakas took place.

KIKATA. A King born in the dynasty of Priyavarta, son of Manu. He was one of the nineteen sons of King Bharata, the other eighteen being Kuśavarmā, Ila-varta, Brahmaparta, Arvāvarta, Malayā, Bhadraketu, Sena, Indrasprk, Vidarbha, Kapi, Hari, Antarikṣa, Prabuddha, Pippalayanā, Avirhotra, Damidā, Camasa and Karabhajana. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

KIKATA (M). The country ruled by King Kikata.

KIMPURUSA. A river in Devaloka. It worship Varuna in his assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20).

KIL (PARROT). 1) Origin. About the origin of Kilis (parrots) the following is stated in Canto 14, Aranyaka Kaṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa.

Kasyapa, the grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici married the eight daughters of Daksaprājapati, one of them being called Tāmrā. Tāmrā had five daughters called Kraucī, Bhāsā, Syenī, Dhātaraśtri and Sukī. Sukas or Kilis (parrots) are the offsprings of Sukī.

2) Parrots acquire talking faculty. Lord Śiva agreed to beget a son to kill Tārakāśura, at the request of the Devas. The coitus between Śiva and Pārvati for the purpose did not end even after a hundred years. Due to the pressure of the process the whole world shook, and when the world appeared to get destroyed the Devas asked Agnideva to persuade Śiva to stop. But, afraid of approaching Śiva Agni ran off and hid himself in the ocean. The Devas followed him, and animals in the water which were burning with the heat of Agni, told the Devas that Agni was hiding in the sea. But, Agni cursed them all to dumbness, and leaving the ocean hid himself on mount Mandara. The parrots revealed this secret, when Agni cursed them also and made their tongues fold inwards. The Devas and the parrots requested for redemption from the curse. Redemption was granted thus: "Though the tongue be turned inwards your sound will be melodious. Just like the voice of a child your (parrots') sound also will be sweet and wonderful."

From that day onwards parrots began talking and singing. (Kathāsārītāgāra, Lāvānakalambaka, Tārāngā 6 and Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 85).

KIMPURUSA. A king called Agnīdhra was born in the dynasty of Priyavarta, son of Manu. He became lord of the Jambū island, and married an apsārā woman named Pārvaciti. To them were born nine sons called Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hari, Ilavīta, Ramyaka, Hiraṇmaya, Kalva, Bhadrāsva and Kētumāla. Agnīdhra partitioned the kingdom among the nine sons. The land Kimpuruṣa ruled over was known as Kimpuruṣa or Kimpuruṣavarsa. It lay to the south of Hemakējha mountain. It was here that Hanumān spent his last days worshipping Śrī Rāma.

"The son of the wind God (Hanumān) lives in the country called Kimpuruṣavarsa in the worship of Śrī Rāma." (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

According to the Sabhā Parva (Chapter 23, Verses 1,2) Kimpuruṣavarsa guarded by the sons of Druma is situated to the north of the Himālayas facing the Dhava mountain, and this country was once conquered by Arjuna."
KINDAMA

2) Other information.
(i) Kimpurūṣas were the sons of Pulaha Prajāpati. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 8).
(ii) They witnessed Agastya drinking up the ocean dry. (Vana Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 21).
(iii) They guard the lotus ponds kept by Kubera to sport with his beloved ones. (Vana Parva, Chapter 15; Verse 9).
(iv) In his conflict with Rāvaṇa, Kubera left behind him Laṅkā and his Puspaka Vīmāna, escaped towards the north and settled down on mount Gandhamādana with the help of the Kimpurūṣas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 33).
(v) Yakṣa women were their mothers. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 25).
(vi) They were present at the āsvamedha of Yudhisthira. (Āsvamedha Parva, Chapter 88, Verse 37).
(vii) Suka Brahmārśi reached Bhārata, crossing Kimpuruṣavāra. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 325).

KINDAMA. A great sage. Once sage Kindama and his wife were roaming in the forest in the form of deer. While hunting, King Pāṇḍu discharged his arrow against the he-deer. It assumed its original form as sage Kindama and told the King that it was wrong on his part to have hit him (the sage) while he was engaged in love play. "I am dying, but in future if you physically contact your wife you too will die." After saying so the sage fell down dead. Pāṇḍu could never have children of his own from his wives due to this curse. He forgot all about the curse once, embraced Mādri and fell down dead. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 117).

KINDANĀ (M). A sacred place in Kurukṣetra. A holy dip here is productive of innumerable auspicious results.

KINDATTAKUṆA. A holy pond. He who sows gingly seeds in the pond is redeemed from the three R̙̄ṇas (debts) i.e. R̙̄ṣī-R̙̄ṇa Pitṛ-R̙̄ṇa and Deva-R̙̄ṇa. The first is to be redeemed by Brahmacarya (celibacy), the second by house-holder's life and the third by yajnas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 88).

KINJAPYA. A particular holy place in Kurukṣetra. A bath here is productive of innumerable auspicious results.

KIṆKAṆA. A King born in the lunar dynasty. Namroci, Kiṅkana and Vṛṣṇi were the three sons of King Mahābhṛoja. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KIṆKARA I. A Rākṣasa. Śakti, the son of Vasiṣṭha and King Kalmāśapāda of the solar dynasty once quarrelled with each other, and the King cursed and turned Śakti into a Rākṣasa. At this juncture Viśvāmitra invoked Kiṅkara, a Rākṣasa attendant of his, into the body of Kalmāśapāda, and induced by Kiṅkara, Kalmāśapāda killed all the sons of Vasiṣṭha. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 175).

KIṆKARA II. Name of Kāla's stick. It is with this stick that Kāla kills living beings. "Like Kāla who holds the stick Kiṅkara". (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 122).

KIṆKARA (S). A race of Rākṣasas. After building the palace at Indraprastha for the Pāṇḍavas Mayāsura put 8000 Kiṅkaras for guarding the palace. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 3). These guards were able to remove the palace from one place to another. Yudhīṣṭhira, who started for the north to collect money is said to have met the Kiṅkaras on the Himalayas. (Āsvamedha Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 6).

KIṆKINIKĀSRAMA. A holy place. A bath here will lift one to heaven. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 23).

KINNARA(S). A sect of Devas all of whom hold Viṇās in their hands. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

KIRĀṬA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 51).

KIRĀṬARUṆIYA. During the life in exile in the forest of the Pāṇḍavas, Arjuna performed penance to propitiate Śiva in the Himalayas. Disguised as a forest-hunter Śiva appeared on the scene and tested Arjuna's valour. Arjuna won in the test and was presented the Pāśupatāstra by Śiva. The story is told in Chapter 167 of the Vana Parva. (See under Arjuna).

KIRĪTI I. A warrior of Skanda deva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 71).

KIRĪTI II. A synonym of Arjuna. (See under Arjuna).

KIRMĪRA. A fierce Rākṣasa, brother of Baka and friend of Hidimba. Having heard about the death of Baka at the hands of Bhīma, Kirmīra who was living in Kāṃyaka forest planned a revenge against Bhīma. After being defeated in the game of dice the Pāṇḍavas came to the forest, and they confronted Kirmīra. In the duel with Bhīma, Kirmīra fell down dead. (Vana Parva, Chapter 11).

KIRĪTI I. Daughter of Śuka Brahmārśi, son of Vyāsa. Śuka wedded Pivāri, the beautiful daughter of the Pitr. Four sons named Kṛṣṇa, Gauraprabha, Bhūri and Devāsruta and a daughter Kirti were born to Śuka and Pivāri. Kirti was wedded by Prince Aṇu, son of King Vibhrama, and a son called Brahmadatta was born to them, who grew up to become a great scholar and an ascetic. On the advice of Nārada, King Brahmadatta ultimately abdicated the throne in favour of his son, performed penance at Badaryāśrama and attained salvation. (Devi Bhāgavata, 1st Skandha).

KIRĪTI II. A daughter of Dakṣa-prajāpati. Śvayambhūva Manu wedded his own sister Sātārūpa, and to them were born two sons called Priyavrata and Uttānāpāda and two daughters called Praśāti and Ākūti. Dakṣa-prajāpati married Praśāti, and they had twenty-four daughters who were: Śraddhā, Lakṣmī, Dṛhti, Tuṣṭi, Medhā, Puṣṭi, Kriyā, Buddhī, Lalajā, Vapus, Sānti, Siddhi, Kirti, Khyāti, Sāti, Sambhūti, Smrī, Priti, Kuṃsā, Sannatī, Anasīya, Urjā, Svāhā, and Svadhā. The first thirteen of the above twenty-five girls were married by Dharmadeva. The other eleven girls were married respectively by Bhṛgu, Śiva, Marici, Avigras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kṛatu, Atri, Vaśītha, Agni and Pilī. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 7).

KIRĪTI III. The Devi who is the basis and cause of all fame and reputation. (Vana Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 38).

KIRDHARMA. A Kṣatriya hero, who was a supporter of Dharmaputra. (Drona Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 39).

KIRTIMĀN I. The first son born to Vasudeva and Devakī. As a celestial voice had warned Kāṃsa that the eighth son of Devaki would kill him he had ordered that every child born to her should be taken to him. Accordingly the first-born son of Devaki was taken to him, but was returned to the parents as Kāṃsa thought that he was not his enemy. He was brought up under the name Kirtimān. Afterwards Nārada visited Kaṁśa and explained to him about his former birth, the object of Kṛṣṇa's incarnation etc. This information so angered Kaṁśa that he got Vasudeva and Devakī chained in prison. Moreover he brought back the first-born son of Devakī and dashed him to death on a stone. Thus ended the life of Kirtimān.

Kirtimān II. Mahāviṣṇu mentally created a son called Virājas, and Kirtimān was his son. A son called Kardama was born to Kirtimān. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 59, Verse 90).

Kirtimukha. A Śiva gaṇa born out of the matted hair of Śiva with three faces, three tails, three legs and seven hands. The Lord at first asked him to live on corpses, but later on, in appreciation of his valour granted him the boon that if anyone saw the Lord without thinking first about Kirtimukha, he would meet with his down-fall. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttara Khaṇḍa, Chapter 50).

Kirtisenā. Son of the brother of the Nāga chief Vāsuki. He made a love-marriage with Śrutārthī daughter of a brahmin, and a child was born to them. (Kathāśārītisāgara, Kathāpīṭhakalambaka).

Kirtisenā. A heroine who has firmly established her reputation in Sanskrit literature. An exceptionally good woman, Kirtisenā was the daughter of a merchant called Dhanapāla in Pāṭaliputra, and was married by another merchant called Devasena. Once Devasena left the country for purposes of trade, and during his absence from home the mother-in-law of Kirtisenā shut her up in a dark room. But, with the help of an iron rod, which fortunately came to her hands she made a hole in the room at night, and through it escaped from captivity. Hungry and thirsty, Kirtisenā travelled a long distance in the forest, and at night climbed a tree and rested thereon. Presently a Rākṣasī woman with her children came to the foot of the tree. During this period the King of Vasanattapura was suffering from pain in the head because a bug entered his ear and multiplied there in numbers. All the physicians gave up the case as incurable. But, the Rākṣasī at the foot of the tree advised the following cure for the King's illness to her children:—"Anoint the King's head with ghee and make him lie in the sun at noon. After that insert a small tube into his ear, and keep the other end of the tube in a pot full of water. Then the bugs will come out from the ear into the water, and the King will be cured of his illness.

Kirtisenā, who heard this medical advice from her seat on top of the tree disguised herself as a physician, went to the palace and cured the King of his troubles. In her disguise, she continued to live in the palace as a friend of the King. Shortly, her husband Devasena, came there and they were happily reunited. The King gave them costly presents. (Kathāśārītisāgarā, Madanaṁjaṭukalambaka, Taraṅga 3).

Kiskindaḥ. An ancient kingdom of the monkeys in South India. This kingdom is mentioned both in the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata. During the Rāmāyaṇa period a monkey King called R̄ṣa-rāja was the ruler of Kiskindaḥ. He was childless. Once upon a time a son called Bāli was born to Arun-devī by Indra, and another son called Sugrīva was born to her by Śrīva. (See under Aruṇa). Both the boys were brought up in the Āśrama of sage Gautama. When they grew up, Indra handed them over to R̄ṣa-rāja, and thus Bāli and Sugrīva came to Kiskindaḥ. After the death of R̄ṣa-rāja, Bāli became King of Kiskindaḥ and Sugrīva lived in the service of his brother. At that time there was a very mighty Asura called Dundubhi. Finding no one fit to fight with, he challenged Varuṇa. Varuṇa directed him to Himavān, whose peaks he rent asunder, and played with. Then Himavān told Dundubhi that he was of a peaceful nature and that Bāli would be a match for him (Dundubhi). Accordingly Dundubhi fought with Bāli and got killed. Bāli cast away the corpse of Dundubhi. The blood oozing out from the nose of Dundubhi fell on the body of sage Mataṅga who was engaged in penance on the peak R̄ṣayāmūka. By means of his divine powers, the sage found out the origin of the blood contaminating his body, and cursed that Bāli would die the moment he set foot on the mountain.

Dundubhi's son Māyāvi was enraged at the death of his father. He went to Kiskindaḥ to take revenge on Bāli, but got defeated by the latter in fighting. Māyāvi took to his heels; Bāli followed him, and Sugrīva followed his brother. Māyāvi took refuge in a cave followed by Bāli, and Sugrīva waited at the mouth of cave. Even after one year neither Bāli nor Māyāvi emerged out of the cave, but Sugrīva saw blood coming out of the cave and heard Māyāvi roaring. Taking it for granted that Bāli was killed, Sugrīva closed the mouth of the cave, returned to Kiskindaḥ, and at the instance of his subjects assumed kingship. But, Bāli forced open the cave, hurried back to his kingdom, and interpreting the action of Sugrīva as one purposely done to usurp the throne, drove Sugrīva away and took for himself Sugrīva's wife. Thus Bāli became again King of Kiskindaḥ. There is a mountain called "Bāli-kerā-mala"—mountain prohibited to Bāli—in the eastern region of the former princely kingdom of Travancore. Is it in any way connected with R̄ṣayāmūkācala? Sugrīva founded a new kingdom at R̄ṣayāmūka mountain. Maṁda, Dvīvīda, Hanūmān and Jāmbavān were the ministers of Sugrīva. It was while Sugrīva was thus living on R̄ṣayāmūkācala that Rāma and Lakṣmana came that way in the course of their search for Sitā. In accordance with the agreement made between Sugrīva and Rāma, the latter killed Bāli and crowned Sugrīva as the King of Kiskindaḥ. (Vālmīki R̄ṣayāmāṇa, Kiskindaḥ Kāḍa, and Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 280).

During the triumphal tour of Sahadeva in the South he fought against Kiskindaḥ, and after seven days' fighting the monkeys saw Sahadeva off with a present of costly gems. "Sahadeva fought against the monkey chiefs like Maṁda, Dvīvīda etc. for seven days, but neither of them got exhausted, and the monkey chiefs, with affection and gratitude asked Sahadeva to depart with gems." (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31).

During this period nothing was heard of Sugrīva, Hanūmān and Jāmbavān in Kiskindaḥ. Might be Sugrīva was no more. Hanūmān, after the death of Śrī Rāma, lived in Gandhāmādana in Kimpuruṣavāraśa. (Bhārata and Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha). From the story of Prasena it may be seen that Jāmbavan left Kiṣkindhā and lived in another cave with his sons and other relations. It was the other two ministers of Sugriva, Maina and Dividiva, who were ruling Kiṣkindhā when Sahadeva went there. The power and prestige of Kiṣkindhā had begun to set by then, and in course of time Kiṣkindhā ceased to exist but in name.

Kiṣkindhāguhā. A mountainous region in Dhaṇḍa district in South India. Certain scholars hold the view that this was the actual Kiṣkindhā.

Kīṭaka. A King born from an aspect of the Asura called Krodhavāsa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 60).

Kītava(s). An ancient tribe of people. They once visited Yudhiṣṭhīra with many presents. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 12).

Kohala. A Brahmin scholar. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 9, that this Brahmin was present at the ‘Sarpa Satra’ (sacrifice to kill serpents) of Janamejaya. Once Bhagiratha gave this hermit as alms one lakh of cows with calves. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 138, Stanza 27).

Koka. (Cakravāka bird), Ruddy Goose. To know the Purānic story about the origin of this bird (Ruddy goose) see under ‘Arayanna’ (Swan).

Kokāmukha. A holy place. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 153, that those who bathe in this holy bath will get the faculty of remembering their previous births.

Kokananda I. A Kṣatriya King of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, that at the time of the regional conquest of Arjuna, this King fell at his feet and sought refuge.

Kokananda II. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27).

Kokavaka. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīsma Parva, Chapter 9).

Kokila. See under Diṇḍika.

Kokilaka. A warrior of Skanda. (Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 73).

Kollagiri. A mountain of South India. (Mahābhārata Sabhā Parva). Sahadeva conquered the people of this mountain.

Kolahala. A famous Asura. In the battle between the Devas and the Asuras carried on by Subrahmanyā, this Asura confronted Mālyavān and was killed. (Padma Purāṇa; Part IV, Chapter 13).

Kolaśvarūpa (Kolattunādu). After the decline of the second Cera empire in Kerala, several royal families such as Perumpaṭappu, Neduvirippu, Kolavārūpa, Venāṭu etc. came into power. Some details regarding the family of Kolasvarūpa are given below.

In ‘Kerala Māhāmya’, it is given that Parāsūrama had made a Soma-Kṣatriya, as King of Cirakkal or Kolattunādu. According to ‘Keralotpatti’ it was Cera-mān Perumāl who did this. Logan says that Kolasvarūpa came into being from the children born to the last Perumāl of the Venāṭu family. In the edicts Virāgāhavattiyar or Jītaśāsana no mention is made about Kolattunādu. Both the families of Venāṭu and Kolattunādu, from very early times had observed the customary rites of taint, pollution, defilement etc. It is said in ‘Keralamāhāmya’ that Parāsūrama had enthroned the sons of two sisters in both the kingdoms.

But no documents are available to prove that there was any connection between the two families till the 5th century M.E. (Malayālam Era). i.e. 14th century A.D. See under Kollavarṣa.

KoliKa (Kokila). This is the name of a rat. Kokila is a character in the story known as Biḍalopaṭkhyāna, told by Nārada to Dhrūtāraṣṭra. Once a cat began to perform penance holding up both of its hands, on the bank of the Gaṅgā. After a long time birds and rats began to come very close to it believing that it would not hurt them. They made the cat their leader. The wicked cat daily ate a rat secretly. Thus the body of the cat grew stronger day by day and there appeared a steady decrease in the number of the rats. Among them there was a wise rat called Kokila. He understood the deceit played by the cat. So proclaiming independence he and his fellows ran away and saved themselves. (M.B. Udyogā Parva, Chapter 160).

Kolisorpa. A tribe. Formerly this tribe was of Kṣaṭriya Caste. A Brahmin once cursed them and made them Śūdras. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 33, Stanza 22).

Kollagireya. An ancient country in South India. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Āsvamedha Parva, Chapter 83, that Arjuna conquered this country.

Kollavarṣa. (Malayālam Era). Several opinions have been brought forward about the starting of the Malayālam Era. There is great controversy as to the causes of starting this new era. The opinion of Saṅkunī Menon is as follows. The King Udayamārtanda-varmā called together at Quilon, an assembly of the learned men and astronomers of the time, in Kalivarṣa 3926 (A.D. 825) and made astronomical researches and taking into account the movements and positions of the various planets in the solar system, started a new era beginning with the month of Cinām (August-September). This new era commenced on the 15th of August 825 A.D. All the learned men and scholars of the time welcomed this Malayālam era. The neighbouring kingdoms also recognized this new era. Reckoning of dates based on this Malayālam Era is seen in the ‘Madura and Tinneverly Stone-edicts and copper edicts.’ On the fifth day of Cinām of the first year of M.E., five royal families of Travancore met together and took a decision that the festival days of the temples should be reckoned according to the Malayālam Era. The controversy is not about the starting of the new Era, but the reasons for starting the new era.

Logan says that the Malayālam Era was started in commemoration of the conversion of Ceraṁān Perumāl to Islam and his pilgrimage to Mecca. But there is impropriety in thinking that the Hindu subjects of a King would commemorate the conversion of their King into Islam religion. Some say that the new era was started to commemorate the erection of a Saivite temple. Another argument is that a new era was started in memory of the exhortation of Śrī Saṅkaraçārya to the Brahmins of Quilon, to do away with the irregularities seen in the Hindu religion. The period of Saṅkaraçārya has not yet been decided definitely. The opinion accepted by scholars on this subject is that of K.B. Pathak, according to whom Saṅkaraçārya lived from 787 to 819 A.D.

If this is accepted as true, the exhortation made in 825 A.D. should be by somebody else and the Malayālam Era should have been established for some other reasons.

Another opinion is that the new era was established to commemorate the independence given to the two Kolattiri Kings (North and South) by the Perumāḷ. The North Kolattiri family should have begun the new era on the first day of Kanni (the second month) and the South Kolattiri family on the first day of Cinñām (the first month). (Because in Malabar area, the era commences on the first day of Kanni.) Another opinion that is prevalent is that Kollavarṣa was started to commemorate the erection of the two towns of Quilon (North and South). But even two centuries before A.D. 825 the town of South Quilon had become famous. So it is an objection to this argument. Some are of opinion that a new era was started in commemoration of Śaṅkaravijayā (the victory of Śaṅkarā) due to the fact that the Brahmins of the north and the south alike accepted the teachings of Śaṅkarācārya. But it is difficult to believe that the northerners and the southerners accepted the teachings of Śaṅkarācārya on a particular date and issued a declaration to that effect and started a new era. Some connect the starting of the New Era with the 'Tiruvonam' a grand festival of the Malayāḷes. But it cannot be believed that a national festival was started by a single man. According to Logan it would appear that the grand festival of Tiruvonam was started to commemorate the journey of Perumāḷ to Mecca. But the conversion episode is more likely to be considered as a blasphemy and the Kings and people of Malayāḷa land are not likely to commemorate it. Prof. Sundaran Pillai has cut all the arguments given above and brought forward a new theory. His inference is that the new Era is the transformation of an old era known as Saptārśivatsara (year of the seven sages) or Śastrāsānivatsara (scientific year) which prevailed throughout India and is still in force in Kāṁśīrā. In A.D. 897 Saptārśi-Vatsara was 4972 and it was known as merely 72, and that if all the hundreds are taken away, the remaining figure will be the same as that of the Kollavarṣa. That is, at the expiry of each century the Saptārśivatsara begins as one, two and so on. But the Saptārśivatsara begins in the month of Mēṭam (9th month) whereas Kollavarṣa begins in Cinñām. He explains this difference also. His opinion is that the Namūṭīri Brahmins took some time to reach the country of Malayāḷa from North Indian countries and they had been using their Saptārśivatsara up to the time of their arrival in Malayāḷa and after their arrival they adopted some slight modifications in the era according to the requirements of the new settlement, and renewed the Saptārśivatsara. Gopala lyer, the great exponent of the Vedānta philosophy, says as follows about Kollavarṣa in his 'Chronology of Ancient India': "Kaliyuga and Kollavarṣa commenced in B.C. 1176." But Kollavarṣa is divided into groups of recurring thousands. This has a close connection with Saptārśi Vatsara, which also might have commenced in B.C. 1176. The year mentioned above completed 2000 by A.D. 824. The third recurring thousand begins in A.D. 825, under the name Kollavarṣa.

Princent, Buchanan and Burnell are the three memorable western scholars who have expressed their opinions about Kollavarṣa. Princent connected Kollavarṣa with Paraśurāma. Buchanan said that the Malayāḷes have a recurring of every millennium. Burnell has stated in his book "South Indian Paleography", that the theory of recurring Millennium is wrong.

An astronomer who was a contemporary of the King who established the Malayāḷam era has stated in his work called 'Saṅkaranārāyaṇiya' (a manuscript in Palm leaves) that an astronomical movement was reckoned and a new era was started at Quilon. This palm leaf manuscript is kept in the Manuscripts Library at Trivandrum.

KONKAṆA. An ancient country of South India. (Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

KOPAVEGA. A hermit. This hermit had served Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16).

KOṢA. A river. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 27, that the water of this river was used for drinking by the ancient people of Bhārata.

KOṢAKĀRĀ. See under Nišākara II.

KOSALA I. The King and the people of the country of Kosala are called by the name Kosala.

KOSALA II. One of the wrestlers of Kaiśa. The famous wrestlers of Kaiśa were Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Kūṭa, Śāla, Kosala and others.

KOSALA.

1) General information. A wealthy and prosperous country on the banks of the river Sarayū. Ayodhyā was the Capital of this kingdom. This city was built by Manu, the father of Ikṣvākul. This city was twelve yojanas long with a breadth of three yojanas. It is understood from Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākaṇṭha, Sarga 5 that during the time of Daśaratha this city was modified to such an extent as to be on a par with any modern city.

2) Other details. (1) Bhīṣmāna once conquered Uṭṭara Kosala (north Kosala). (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30).

(2) Sahadeva during his regional conquest, subdued Dakṣiṇa Kosala (South Kosala). (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 12).

(3) Sri Kṛṣṇa once conquered the country of Kosala. (M.B. Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 13).

(4) Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna, killed the King of Kosala in the battle of Bhārata.

(5) Karna once conquered this country for Duryodhana. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 19).

(6) During the time of the battle of Bhārata a King named Kṣemadarśi ruled over Kosala. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 82, Stanza 6).

(7) At the time of the Śvayānvara (marriage) of Ambā, Bhīṣma defeated the King of Kosala. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 38).

(8) Arjuna who led the horse for sacrifice conquered the country of Kosala. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 83).

(9) Those who bathe in the holy bath of Rṣabha tirtha in Kosala, will obtain the fruits of giving one thousand cows as alms. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Stanza 10).

KOṢALĀ (S). The Kṣatriyas of the country of KoṢalā. These KoṢalas once fled to the southern countries KOŚṬHAVĀN. A mountain. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 43 that this mountain was the overlord of many other mountains.

KOṬĀRĀ. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 14).

KOṬĀRAKĀ. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 12).

KOṬIKAṢYA (KOṬIKA). A King who was the follower of Jayadrata. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Kāmyaka forest once they went out leaving Pāñcāli alone in the hut. At that time Jayadrata, the King of Sindhu, the son of Vṛddhakṣatra came there and saw Pāñcāli. He sent his follower Koṭiékśya to entice Pāñcāli, who did not succumb to temptation. At last Jayadrata carried Pāñcāli away by force. This Koṭiékśya was the son of Śrūṇatha and was the King of Trigarta. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 265).

KOṬĪLĪṆGA. This word was added to the names of the members of the Koṭuṇāllur royal family. Especially, Kuṇājjuṭṭan Tampurān is denoted by the name ‘Koṭilīṅgaśvar’ in some of his poetic works. The word ‘Koṭilīṅga’ is the Sanskrit form of the Dravidian word Koṭuṇāllur. This city was the Capital of the Cera Kings.

KOṬĪṢA. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Stanza 5).

KOṬĪTIRTHA. A holy bath. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, that those who bathe in this holy bath will get the fruits of performing the horse sacrifice.

KOṬṬUVĀ. (Yawning, Gape). In Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 6, there is a story explaining how the living beings began to yawn. After getting boons from Brahmā, Vṛtrāsura swallowed Indra. The Devas were filled with fear and approaching Brahaspati they represented their grievance. According to the instruction of Brahaspati the Devas caused Vṛtrāsura to gape. After opening the mouth he found it difficult to shut, and the mouth remained open. In the meanwhile Indra jumped out of Vṛtra through the mouth. Gape came into existence from that time. (For details see under the word Vṛtra).

KRAMAJIT. A Kṣatriya King who was a constant follower of Dīrghaputra. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 28).

KRAMAPA. A son born to Pulaha by his wife Kṣamā. Kramapa had a brother named Saliṣṭha. (Agni Purāṇa Chapter 20).

KRAMAPATHA. A method of teaching the Vedas. It is due to the insistence on strict adherence to this method of teaching that even after thousands of years variations have not crept into the original texts of the Vedas which form the earliest literature. There is a portion called ‘word study’ (Pada Prāpta) in the Vedas (the scripture). Every word in the Veda is separated from its prefixes and suffixes. The second step is Krama-pātha or the study of joining prefixes and suffixes to each word got by the first step. Next step is Jaṭāpātha in which words are combined with their prefixes and suffixes. To guard against the creeping in of mistakes in this step, the next step which is known as Ghana-pātha is taught. In this step the first step of Padapātha and the second step of Krama pātha are mixed together and intermingled from beginning to end and end to beginning. There are rules to make combined words by using prefixes and suffixes. These rules are called Prāṣṭakhyā. Because the Vedas are taught in this way with so much attention and care, their texts have never been subjected to changes and variations.

KRATHA I. A Kṣatriya King. He was the rebirth of an Asura called Krodhäusera. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 61). See under Jyāmagnha.

KRATHA II. A King defeated by Bhimasena during his regional conquest. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 30, Stanza 7).

KRATHA III. A hermit. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga-Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 27 it is stated that this hermit visited Śrī Kṛṣṇa on his way to Hastinapura.

KRATHA IV. There was a warrior named Kratha on the side of the Kauravas. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 120, Stanza 10).

KRATHA V. A warrior of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 70).

KRATHA VI. A Yakṣa. (Demi-God). When Garuḍa reached the world of Devas he had to fight with this Yakṣa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 32, Stanza 18).

KRATHA VII. An Asura (demon). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67 Stanza 57 that this Asura was born as King Sūryākṣa on the earth in his re-birth.

KRATHA VIII. Name of a son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 116, Stanza 11).

KRATHA I. A famous King in Ancient India. The following details about this King are found found in the Mahābhārata.

1) He was the rebirth of an Asura called Rāhu, the son of Simhikā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 40).
2) Kratha attended the Svayativeda (marriage) of Draupadi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 186, Stanza 15).
3) Śrī Kṛṣṇa defeated Kratha at the city of Jāruthi. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 30).
4) In the battle of Bhārata this King attacked Abhimanyu. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 26).
5) In the battle of Bhārata Kratha killed the prince of Kaśī, and a King from the mountain killed Kratha. (M.B. Karna Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 15).

KRATHA II. A King of the Puru dynasty. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 94; Stanza 58).

KRATHA III. A captain of the army of monkeys. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 283, Stanza 19).

KRATHA IV. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 70).

KRATHA V. A famous serpent. At the time of the death of Balabhadra this serpent came there to lead his soul to Pāṭāla (nether world). (M.B. Mauṣala Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16).

KRATHA (M). An ancient country in India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Śabhā Parva, Chapter 21 that Bhīṣmaka the King of Vidarbha had conquered this country.

KRATU.

1) General information. One of the six mental sons of Brahmā. Marici, Aśvins, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu were the mental sons of Brahmā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65). Kratu is described as one of the 21 Prajāpatis (lords of emanation).
2) Some details. (1) It is stated in Mahabharata, Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 9, that the hermits called Bâlakhilyas were the sons of Kraunca.

(2) Kraunca was present at the birth-celebration of Arjuna. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 32).

(3) Kraunca came to save the Râkṣasas from the Râkṣasa sattrâ, (A great sacrificial fire meant for the Râkṣasas (giants) to jump into and die by themselves) performed by the hermit Parâśâra. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 189, Stanza 9).

(4) Kraunca was a luminary in the councils of Brahman and Indra. (M.B. Sabha Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 17).

(5) Kraunca was present at the Birth celebration of Skandadeva. (M.B. Sâlya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 10).

(6) There is a group of hermits called Citraśikhandins, of which Kraunca is a member. (M.B. Sânti Parva, Chapter 335, Stanza 27).

(7) By the blessings of Śiva, Kraunca got a thousand sons. (M.B. Anuśâsana Parva, Chapter 14, Stanza 87).

(8) Kraunca went to visit Bhîṣma who was lying on the bed of arrows awaiting death in the beginning of Uttarâyaṇa of the year. (M.B. Anuśâsana Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 4).

KRAUNCA I. An Asura. In Vâmana Purâṇa, Chapter 57 it is mentioned that this Asura was killed by Subrahmanya.

KRAUNCA II. A mountain. There is a story about this mountain. Long ago there lived an Asura named Kraunca. He was leading a wicked life and was haughty and arrogant. Once Agastya went to Kailâsa and worshipped Śiva. Kâverîdevi also was standing close by, worshipping Śiva. God Śiva appeared before Agastya and told him that he might ask for any boon. He requested for the power to push down Vindhyâ by kicking and to establish a holy Tirtha (bath) on the earth. Śiva granted the boon. For making the tirthâ Śiva turned Kâverî into a river and placed her in the water-pot of Agastya. As Agastya was returning from Kailâsa with Kâverî in his water-pot, Kraunca the Asura took the shape of a mountain and hindered his way. The Asura caused a heavy rain too. Agastya wandered through the forest without finding the path for days. At last he realized the cause. He took a few drops of water from his waterpot and with chanting of Mantras and meditation threw the drops at the Asura with the curse that he would stand there for ever as a mountain. He said that he would be liberated from the curse when pierced by the arrow of Subrahmanya, the son of Śiva. From that day onwards Kraunca the Asura had been standing there as a mountain. That mountain was called The mountain of Kraunca. (Skanda Purâṇa, Asura Kâṇḍa).

There is another statement in Harivanaṭa, Chapter 18, that the mountain Kraunca was the son of the mountain Mainâka, the son of Menâ. Subrahmanya fought a terrible battle with the Asuras. Many died. Bânâsura, the son of Mahâbali, fled from the battlefield and hid himself inside the mountain Kraunca. Subrahmanya left the mountain into two with the arrow given by Agni (Fire-god). Thus Kraunca was liberated from the curse. (M.B. Sâlya Parva, Chapter 46).

In ‘Meghadutâ’ Kâlidâsa mentions about the cleavage in the mountain Kraunca. In Mahâbhârata, Vana Parva, Chapter 225, Stanza 33, mention is made that through this cleavage swans and vultures fly to Mahâmeru. (For the story of how Parasurâma cut the Kraunca mountain see under Parasurâma).

KRAUNCA III. (A kind of snipe). A bird.

KRAUNCADVIIPA. (ISLAND OF KRAUNCA). One of the Saptadvîpas (seven islands). The seven islands are Jambudvipta, Plakṣadvîpta, Sâlmâladvîpta, Kusadvîpta, Krauncadvipta, Sâkadvîpta and Pûṣkârâdvîpta. (Devî Bhâgavata Skandha 9). Krauncadvipta is described as follows in Mahâbhârata, Bhîṣma Parva, Chapter 12:—In this island there are the mountains Kraunca, Vâmanâca, Andhâkâra, Mainâka, Govînda, Nîlîka, and Viśkambha. The various countries in this island are Kuśâla, Manonuga, Usâ, Prâvaraka, Andhâkâra, Munideśa, Dundubhvîsana etc.

KRAUMCANIŚUDANA. A holy place on the banks of river Sarasa. It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 160 that he who bathes in this place would get a Vîmâna.

KRAUNCAPADI. A holy place. He who makes oblations of balls of boiled rice in this place will obtain remission of sin of Brahmanyatä (sin incurred by killing a Brahmin). (M.B. Anuśâsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 42).

KRAUNÇÂRUNÂVYUHA. Another name of Kraunca-vyûha (strategic disposition of an army). Dhruḍayumna formed the Kraunca-rûnâvîyûha. (Mahâbhârata, Bhîṣma Parva, Chapter 50).

KRAUNÇÂVYUHA. A strategic formation of the army in the shape of Kraunca bird (snipe). In the battle of Bhârata, Bhîṣma made the formation of Kraunca. (M.B. Bhîṣma Parva, Chapter 73). The Kraunca disposition has eight strategical positions, the face, eyes, head, neck, stomach, left flank, right flank and thighs. In the disposition formed by Bhîṣma, Drona stood at the face, Aśvatthâma and Kṛṣṇa stood at the eyes, Hardikya at the head and Śûrasena at the neck. The King of Prâgyojotisa stood at the stomach of the formation. The Tûṣâras, Yanavas, Śakas and Čûpvás guarded the right flank. Śrîyus and Bhûrîrâvas kept the thighs.

KRAUNÇI. A daughter born to Kaśyapaprajapati by his wife Tâmrâ the daughter of Dakṣa. Five daughters, Kraunçî, Bhâṣî, Śyeni, Dhrârâṣťir and Sukî were born of Tâmrâ. From Kraunçî, were born the owls, the Bhâsas from Bhâṣî, the hawks and vultures from Śyeni, the swans and ruddy geese from Dhrârâṣťir and Nârâ, the mother of Vinatâ from Sukî. (Viśmiki Râmâyaṇa, Sarga 14).

KRAVYÂDA (S). A particular group of the Manes or the deified ancestors that receive the souls of the deceased. Mention is made about the Krayâḍas in Mahâbhârata, Sânti Parva, Chapter 269, Stanza 15.

KRÎYA. One of the daughters of Dakṣa. Dharma deva married her and three sons Danâ, Naya and Vinaya were born to him of Krîya. (Viśv Putâna, Âśîa 1, Chapter 7).

KRÂKÅEYU. (KAKÅEYU). One of the ten sons whom King Raudrâśva of the Pûru dynasty begot of the Apsaras called Mîrâkasis. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 10).

KRMI I. A King of the royal dynasty of Aṅga. King Uśārā had five wives named Nṛgâ, Narā, Kṛmi, Daśā and Dvârâvati, and of them were born respectively the sons Nṛga, Nara, Kṛmi, Suvrata and Śibi. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 227).

KṛMI II. A wife of Uśānara. (See under Kṛmī I).

KṛMI III. A Kṣatriya dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Verse 13).

KṛMI IV. A river. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 17).

KṛMIBHOJANA. One of the twenty-eight hells. (See Naraka under Kāla I).

KṛMILA. A king born in the Puru dynasty. There was a king in the dynasty called Bāhyaśva, who had five sons called Sṛujaya, Bṛhadisu, Mukula, Kṛmila and Yavīnara. In later years they became famous as Pāncacālas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KṛMĪŚA. A hell known as Kṛmibhojanaka also. (See under Kāla I.)

KRODHAvI. A famous Asura born to Kaśyapa by his wife Kālā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 35).

KRODHAvI. It is stated in Bhāgavata that Krodha was born of the eye-brow of Brahma. There is a story about this Krodha in the 'Jaimiti-Asvamedha Parva'.
 Once, while the hermit Jamadagni was performing sacrificial offerings to the Manes, Krodha came there and secretly put poison in the pudding prepared from the milk of the sacrificial cow. Even though the hermit knew this he did not get angry. Seeing this, Krodha became afraid of the hermit and approaching him said
 "Oh, hermit! I thought that the Bhārgavas (those born of the family of Bṛggu) would get angry quickly.
 Now I understand that it is wrong." Jamadagni pardoned him and said: "But you have appeased the anger of the Manes". The Manes cursed him that he would have to take birth as a mongoose. But he was given remission that he would be liberated from the curse, when he narrated the story of the Brahmin Uṭechayvṛti at the palace of Dharma in the presence of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.
 Thus Krodha regained his former form.

KRODHAHANTĀ. A famous Asura. He was born to Prājapati Kaśyapa by his wife Kālā. The notorious Vṛtrārav was the brother of Krodhahantā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65).

KRODHANA. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 6).

KRODHANA. A hermit of great importance in the palace of Indra. (Mahābhārata, Savbhā Parva, Chapter
 7, Stanza 11).

KRODHASATRU. A famous Asura who was born to Prājapati Kaśyapa of his wife Kālā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 35).

KRODHAvARDHANA. An Asura. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 46, it is mentioned that in later ages this Asura was reborn under the name Dandadhara.

KRODHAvAŚA. A follower of Indrajit. In the battle between Rāvana and Śrī Rāma this Asura made himself invisible and attacked the monkeys. By the help of Vibhiṣaṇa, who was an expert in the art of vanishing, the monkeys killed Krodhavaśa in the battle. (M.B.
 Vana Parva, Chapter 269).

KRODHAvAŚA. Wife of Prājapati Kaśyapa. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kanda, Sarga 14). The Asuras who were born to Krodhavaśa are also called Krodhavaśas.
 Most of these Krodhavaśas were employed to guard the lotus-lake of Kubera. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 154).
 Bhimasena once entered the lotus-lake of Kubera and plucked the "Saugandhika" flower. The Krodhavaśas ran to Kubera to inform him of this theft. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 2 that these Krodhavaśas were present in the army of Rāvana.

KROSANĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 17).

KROSTHA. A son of Yadu, Sāhasrada, Payoda, Krośṭha, Nila and Ajīka were the five sons of Yadu. (Harivānśa, Chapter 38).

KRPAG. A King in ancient India. He never ate flesh.
 (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 64).

KRPACARYA. 1) Genealogy. Descended from Viśu thus:
 Brahmacari—Candra—Budha—Puruśavas—Ayus—Nahuṣa—
 Yayaṭi—Puru—Janamejaya—Prācīnavan—Pravīra—
 Namsuyu—Vitāhīya—Śūdūr—Bahuvidha—Śañjītyā—
 Rahovādī—Raudrāsya—Matināra—Santuropatha—

 Puruja—Arka—Bhavāya—Pānchala—Mudgala. A daughter called Ahalaya was born to Mudgala. Maharsi Gatama married her. To Gauṭama was born Satānanda, to him Satyadhrti, to him Saradvān and to Saradvān was born Kṛpācarya. The Purāṇas refer to the generation preceding Gauṭama only in the maternal line. It is said in verse 2, Chapter 130 of the Ādi Parva, that Saradvān was the son of Gauṭama. According to Agni Purāṇa, Bhāgavata etc. Saradvān, father of Kṛpa was the son of the great-grand son of Gauṭama and grandson of Satānanda. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

2) Birth of Kṛpa. Though born in a family of Sages Saradvān evinced more interest in Dhanurveda. He performed penance in the forest, with bow and arrows deposited by his side. As his penance gathered intensity the Devas got alarmed. To break his penance Indra deputed the Devata called Jānapati to the earth and she appeared before Saradvān and danced, dressed only in one piece of cloth. Emission occurred to him. But, wisdom dawned on him immediately and leaving behind him the bow, arrows and deer skin he quit the place.

The semen discharged by him fell on the arrow which broke into two giving birth to a male child and a female one.

3) Kṛpa in the Palace. One of the attendants of King Sāntanu, who had come to the forest to hunt, saw the children and took them to the King. The King felt Kṛpā (pity) for them and brought them up in the palace and as they were thus brought up due to his Kṛpa they came to be called Kṛpa and Kṛpī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 130).

4) Kṛpa's mastery of Dhanurveda. While living in the forest engaged in penance Saradvān, with his divine power understood that the two children forsaken by him were growing up in the palace. He went to the palace and told the king details about the children. He also lived there in secret and taught Kṛpa everything contained in the four branches of Dhanurveda and the various usages in archery. Gradually Kṛpa became an ācārya (master) in Dhanurveda. Not only the Pāṇḍavas the Kauravas, the Yādavas and the Vīśṇis but also kings, who came from various regions of the country, learned archery at the feet of Kṛpa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 29).
5) Krpa at the trial of skill in archery of the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas. When the training of the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas in archery was over, a test was arranged for them. Spectators crowded to see it. Drona, Krpa, Somadatta, Bālāhika, Bhiṣma and Vidura and other great ones took their seats in the stadium. Arjuna and Karna entered the arena for contest when Krpa intervened and said that Arjuna was the youngest son of Kunti but Karna should specify his parentage. At this Karna stood stunned, and it was then that Duryodhana declared Karna to be the King of Áṅga. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 136).

6) Activities of Krpa up to the great war. (i) He attended the Rājaśūya yajña of Yudhīṣṭhīra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 8). There he acted as the custodian of money and distributed daksīṇās (monetary presents). (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 7).

(ii) It was he who instructed the spies deputed by Duryodhana as to how to detect the Pāṇḍavas during their life incognito. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 29). He also detailed to Duryodhana the various aspects of politics.

(iii) Krpa once told Duryodhana that he was powerful enough to annihilate the Pāṇḍava army within two months. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 193).

7) Krpa in the war. (i) On the first day of the war he fought with Bṛhatkṣetra. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45).

(ii) In the fight with Cekitāna he fell down and fainted. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 31).

(iii) He wounded Sātyaki. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 40).

(iv) Fought a duel with Sahadeva. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 110, Verse 12).

(v) He fought with Arjuna and Bhiṣma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 113, Verse 114).

(vi) Fought with Dhṛtārāṣṭra. (Drona Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 33).

(vii) Fought with Vārdhakṣemi. (Drona Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 41).

(viii) His flag floated in the air and could be seen from anywhere in the battlefield. (Drona Parva, Chapter 105).

(ix) He killed the body-guards of Abhimanyu. (Drona Parva, Chapter 42, Verse 38).

(x) Fighting with Arjuna he fainted and fell down. (Drona Parva, Chapter 147 Verse 9).

(xi) During the fight he ridiculed Karna. (Drona Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 13).

(xii) He advised Aśvatthāmā to prevent Duryodhana from confronting Arjuna. (Drona Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 77).

(xiii) In the battle that ensued he defeated Śikhaṇḍī. (Drona Parva Chapter 169, Verse 39).

(xiv) When Drona fell down dead he fled from the battlefield. (Drona Parva, Chapter 193, Verse 12).

(xv) He was defeated by Sātyaki. (Drona Parva, Chapter 20 Verse 53).

(xvi) He killed Suketu, son of Citraketu. (Karna Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 28).

(xvii) Defeated Yudhāmāṇu. (Karna Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 55).

(xviii) He killed the Kalinda prince. (Karna Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 6).

(xix) He advised Karna to enter into a compromise with the Pāṇḍavas. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 4).

(xx) He ran away from the battlefield to Dwāerpāya lake. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 9).

(xxi) Yudhīṣṭhīra came to the lake with an army and Krpa ran away from there. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 60).

(xxii) He appointed Aśvatthāmā chief of the army on the suggestion of Duryodhana. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 43).

(xxiii) He fought during the night along with Aśvatthāmā. (Saupātika Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 35).

(xxiv) He killed the soldiers who ran away from the Pāṇḍava camp. (Saupātika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 106).

(xxv) He set fire to the camp of the Pāṇḍavas. (Saupātika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 109).

(xxvi) He cried at the pitiable condition of Duryodhana. (Saupātika Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 10).

(xxvii) He went to Hastināpura after telling Dhṛtārāṣṭra and Gândhārī that both the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas would be ruined. (Śṛṭī Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 21).

8) End of Krpa. The great war ended. Duryodhana and others were killed and, when Dhṛtārāṣṭra left for the forest with Gándhārī, Krpa desired to accompany them. But, Dhṛtārāṣṭra did not permit it. Yudhīṣṭhīra, as advised by Dhṛtārāṣṭra, put up Krpa with him. (Aśramavāsi Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 5). Before the Pāṇḍavas set out on their great journey Yudhīṣṭhīra appointed Krpa as the preceptor of Parīkṣit, the son of Arjuna. (Māhāprasthāna Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 4). During his last days Krpa went into the forest for penance and there he breathed his last. (Śṛṭī Parva, Chapter 296, Verse 14).

9) Synonyms for Krpa. Ācārya, Ācāryasattama, Bhara-tacārya, Brahmarṣi, Śāradvata, Śāradvataputra, Gautama, Krpa.

KRPI. (See Para 2 under Krpa II).

Later history. Krpī was brought up in the palace of King Śantana. She was duly married by Dronācārya and a son called Aśvatthāmā was born to them. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 130). Krpī lamented very much over the death of Drona in the great war. (Śṛṭī Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 33).

The terms Śāradvatī and Gautāmī are used as synonyms of Krpī in the Mahābhārata.

KRŚA I. A friend of sage Śrīgī. Since Krśa underwent a lot of sacrifices for the protection of dharma (righteousness) his body became very Krśa (lean). Hence he was called Krśa. It was Krśa, who told Śrīgī about King Parīkṣit who had once thrown a dead snake round his (Śrīgī's) father's neck. (Ādi Parva, Chapters 41 and 42).

KRŚA II. A prominent serpent born in the Airāvata family. The serpent was reduced to ashes at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 11).

KRŚA III. A great sage endowed with divine powers. He was also present in the company of sages who visited Bhiṣma on his arrow-bed. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 7).

KRŚADRATHA. Son of Titikṣa, brother of the famous emperor Śibi. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).
KRŚAKA. A nāga born in the Kaśyapa dynasty. (Udyogaparva, Chapter 106, Verse 15).

KRŚĀṆU. The sage who stood guard over Soma at the Yajña conducted by sage Kutsa. (Rgveda, Maṇḍala 1, Anuvāka 16, Śūkta 112).

KRŚĀṢWA I. The Prajāpati called Kṛṣṭīśva married Jayā and Suprabhā the daughters of Daksāṇaprajāpati and to both were born fifty sons each. All the sons were really arrows called Saināhāra. Viśvāmitra, by the power of penance made these hundred sons (arrows) of Kṛṣṭīśva his own. It was these arrows, which Viśvāmitra gave to Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Cantos 21 and 26).

KRŚĀṢWA II. A king of the solar dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KRŚĀṢWA III. A King who served Yama in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 17).

KRŚĪVALA. An ancient sage who lived in Indra's Vimāna to witness Arjuna, in the company of Uttara, the Vīrāṇa prince, fight during the lifting of cows. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 56).

KRŚEYU. A King born in the Puru dynasty. (See under PŪRUVAMSĀ).

KRŚNA (ŚRĪ KRŚṆA). Born in the Yadava dynasty as the son of Vasudeva and Devaki, Śrī Kṛṣṇa was the ninth of the ten incarnations of Mahāviśu.

Ten sons called Vasudeva, DeVabhaṅga, Devaśravas, Anaka, Śriñjaya, Kākānika, Śyāmaka, Vasat, Kaṅkuka and Vasu were born to King Śūrasena by his wife Māriṣā. Of those ten sons Vasudeva married Devaki, the sister of Kaṁsa. He had also a second wife called Rohini and she was the mother of Balabhadrārama.

2) Śrī Kṛṣṇa's former births. Owing to a curse of Vaṣuṣa, Kaśyapaprajāpati was born on earth as Vasudeva and his (Kāṣṭa) wives Aditi and Suraśā were born as Devaki and Rohini. (See under Kaśyapa and Aditi). Like this Śrī Kṛṣṇa also had previous births.

Once upon a time from the heart of Brahmā was born the Prajāpati called Dharma, who was very truthful and wedded to righteous living according to the injunctions of the Vedas. He wedded the ten daughters of Daksāṇaprajāpati, and four sons called Hari, Kṛṣṇa Nara and Nārāyaṇa were born to him. Hari and Kṛṣṇa turned out to be great Yogins, and Nara and Nārāyaṇa ascetics. Naranārāyaṇas performed penance to please Brahmā for a thousand years at Badarikāśrama in the valley of the Himālayas. Celestial women, whom Indra had deputed to break their penance, approached them and requested them to take them (celestial women) as their wives. Ascetic Nārāyaṇa who got angry at the celestial women's request was about to curse them when sage Nara intervened and pacified him. Then sage Nārāyaṇa told them thus:—"You must protect my Vrata (penance) in this life. In that case, in the next birth I shall satisfy your desire. In the 28th Dvāparayuga 1 will be incarnating on earth on behalf of the Devas. Then you also may be born as princesses. I shall incarnate as Kṛṣṇa in the Yadu dynasty and marry all of you. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

Accordingly sage Nārāyaṇa was born as Śrī Kṛṣṇa in the Yadu dynasty, and sage Nara was born as Arjuna to be his companion.

The curse of Bhṛgu the great sage also contributed to Mahāviśu's incarnating himself as Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Once in a war which lasted for 100 years between the Devas and the Asuras most of the latter were killed. Then Śukra, preceptor of the Asuras went to Mount Kailāsa to secure exceptional weapons, and the Asuras took refuge under Kāvyamātā, the mother of Śukra. Devendra sought Mahāviśu's aid, and he cut off Kāvyamātā's head with his Cakra (discus). Bhṛgu was enraged at this killing of a woman. He cursed that Mahāviśu should be born as man. Owing to various reasons like the above Mahāviśu happened to be born as man in the Yādava dynasty, as the son of Vasudeva. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

3) Vasudeva's wedding. To Śūrasena, the Yādava King of Mathurāpurī was born a son called Vasudeva, and Devaki was born as the grand-daughter of Devaka, the brother of Ugrasena, another Yādava King. Devaki was the sister of Kaṁsa. Devaki was given in marriage to Vasudeva with a dowry of twelve bharas (a particular weight) of gold and a chariot. Kaṁsa acted as charioteer in the wedding procession during which a celestial voice addressed Kaṁsa as follows:—"Asyāṁ tvām aśtamgarbho hantā' (Her eighth son will kill you). As soon as he heard the celestial voice Kaṁsa stood up in the chariot ablaze with rage. He caught hold of Devaki by her hair and raised his sword to cut her throat. All the conciliatory words of Vasudeva failed to pacify Kaṁsa. Then Vasudeva promised to hand over to Kaṁsa all the children born to Devaki immediately after their birth. Accordingly Kaṁsa left them alone.

4) First-born son of Vasudeva. The first-born child of Vasudeva was duly handed over to Kaṁsa. But, he returned the child to its parents as, according to the celestial voice the first-born child was not to be his enemy. Vasudeva and Devaki brought it up under the name Kaṁtāṁ. On one of those days Nārada visited Kaṁsa and told him about his previous life, the object of Kṛṣṇa's incarnation etc. Then it was that Kaṁsa realised how fatal to him was the existence of Vasudeva and Devaki, and he hurried up to them and killed the child by dashing its head against a rock. He also kept them chained in prison.

5) Kaṁsa's excitement. The information imparted by Nārada upset Kaṁsa much. He shut his father Ugrasena in prison and himself became King. He deputed Asuras like Pralamba, Cāñṇāra, Trāṇavarta, Mustika, Arista, Keśi, Dhenuka, Agra, Vīvāda and Pātanā to harass the Yādavas, the Andhakas and the Vṛṣṇis. After the death of Kaṁtāṁ, Devaki, in the prison, delivered five sons. (See under Kaṁsa. Para 2 for the previous history of the first six sons of Devaki). Kaṁsa killed all the five children also as soon as they were born.
6) Birth of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The Asuras killed in the old Devāsura war were later born as cruel and evil Kings on earth. The burden of such Kings having become too much for her, goddess Earth, in the guise of a cow complained about it to Brahma who took her to Śiva who too could not find a solution to the problem posed by Bhūmidevi. So, all of them accompanied by the Devas approached Mahāviṣṇu and prayed for the redress of their grievance. Mahāviṣṇu sent them back comforted by the assurance that he would be born as the son of Vasudeva and Devaki to solve the problem. He also arranged the Devas to be born as Gopas and the Apsarā women as Gopikās on earth for his assistance.

Devaki conceived for the 7th time, and it was an aspect of Ananta. Mahāviṣṇu instructed Māyādevī thus: “You go to the earth and transfer the child in Devaki’s womb to that of Rohini, the second wife of Vasudeva and after that, at the very time of my birth you should be born as daughter of Yaśodā, wife of Nandagopa. You would be worshipped by the world in various names like Ambikā, Nārāyaṇī, Ṛtavr̥tā, Durgā, Bhadrakāli etc. The child transferred by you to the womb of Rohini will become known as Saṅkarṣaṇa, Balabhadra and Rāma. Accordingly Māyādevī transferred the child in Devaki’s womb to that of Rohini, and it was given out that the seventh child of Devaki was aborted in the womb.

Devaki conceived for the eighth time, and on Aṣṭami day in the month of Sīhā (Leo, August-September) when the Brāhma stars were collected on the same day was Śrī Kṛṣṇa born. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated himself as Kṛṣṇa with the conch, the discus, the club and the lotus flower in his four hands. Vasudeva saluted the marvellous child, and the chain that bound himself and Devaki broke asunder, and the new-born child spoke thus to Vasudeva:—“In Śvayambhuva Manvantara the Prājāpāti called Sutapas with his wife Prṣṇi meditated upon me for 12,000 years, and when I appeared to them and asked them to choose any boon they prayed for my being born as their son. In the next life Sutapas was born as Kaśyapa and Prṣṇi as Aditi, and I incarnated in the form of Vāmanas (Dwarf) as their son. Afterwards Kaśyapa and Aditi took various births, and I too took various births as their son. Now also, Kaśyapa and Aditi, are born as Vasudeva and Devaki. Just at this time a daughter has been born to Nandagopa and Yaśodā at Gokula. You shall take me over there and replace me with the child born at Gokula.” After having told Vasudeva the above fact, Kṛṣṇa assumed the form of an ordinary child and lay by the side of its mother. At mid-night when the guards at the prison house were deep in sleep the doors of the prison opened by themselves. Vasudeva with the child Kṛṣṇa, started for Gokula and on his way the river Yāmuṇā changed its course for him to proceed. The doors of Yaśodā’s house were open. Owing to the divine prowess of Māyādevī, the child of Yaśodā, everybody in the house went into deep sleep. Vasudeva placed Kṛṣṇa by the side of Yaśodā and returned home with her child. As soon as he had thus returned the prison-guards woke up and reported to Kaṁsa about the delivery of a child by Devaki. Karṇa rushed to the house, caught hold of the child and was about to dash it against the rock when lo! the child slipped free of his hands and rose in the sky wherefrom it spoke as follows:—

Oh! unrighteous and cruel Karṇa! thy prowess is not to be exhibited against women. Thy killer is born on earth, and search for him everywhere. (Śiva Purāṇa, Chapter 1).

7) Colour of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarāma. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was dark in colour and Balabhadra white. There is a story in the Mahābhārata to explain this difference in their colour. The Devas informed Mahāviṣṇu of their decision to incarnate themselves on earth for the annihilation of the evil and cruel people. Pleased at their decision Viṣṇu plucked from his head a black hair and also a white hair and threw them on the ground, and he said that the black hair would enter Devaki and be born as Kṛṣṇa while the white one would enter Rohini and be born as Balabhadra. Accordingly Kṛṣṇa became of the colour of the cloud (black) and Balabhadra white in colour. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 199, Verse 31).

8) The incidents during the childhood of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

(1) Pūtānāmokṣa (Salvation to Pūtānā). Pūtānā, a Rākṣasa and one of the assassins deputed by Karṇa to search out and kill Kṛṣṇa, went to Kṛṣṇa’s house disguised as a Gopā woman and fed him on her breasts. But the child extracted her life also with her breast-milk, and she assumed her original form and fell down dead.

(2) Sakaṭāsura killed. Karṇa next deputed the Asura called Sakaṭa to kill Kṛṣṇa. He approached the sleeping Kṛṣṇa in the form of a cart and raised great sound. Kṛṣṇa jumped awake and kicked the cart into hundreds of pieces. (See under Sakaṭa).

(3) Killed Trāṇārtāsura. Trāṇavarta, son of Tārakāsura, at the behest of Karṇa went to Ambādi in an invisible (formless) manner. Yaśodā was then breast-feeding child Kṛṣṇa, and the child appeared to gradually increase in weight. Yaśodā tried to lay the child on the bed, but had to lay him on the ground as it was too heavy for her to lift up to the bed. At once, Trāṇavarta, in the form of a whirl-wind, rose up to the sky carrying Kṛṣṇa along with him. Ambādi (Gokula) was chokingly filled with clouds of dust; the Gopālas cried out. But, Śrī Kṛṣṇa clasped round the Asura’s neck and rested, and on account of the child’s weight he could not rise any more. The child hardened its hands around the Asura’s throat and he got killed and fell down with a thud on a rock. Yaśodā hurriedly took the child in her hands and covered it with kisses. (See under Trāṇavarta).

(4) Naming. During this period the famous sage Garga visited Kṛṣṇa at Ambādi, and he informed Vasudeva and Devaki of the actual facts relating to Kṛṣṇa. The son of Rohini was brought there, and the sage named him Rāma, and Yaśodā’s child Kṛṣṇa, and blessed them. Thenccforth Rāma and Kṛṣṇa grew up in Ambādi as the apple of the people’s eyes. (See under Garga).

(5) All the worlds in Kṛṣṇa’s mouth. The Gopākas once saw Kṛṣṇa eating mud and informed Yaśodā of it, and she, in great anger, opened the child’s mouth to look for the sand when she saw there all the worlds including herself and she closed her eyes in great alarm. (Bhāgavata 10th Skanda).
KRŚNA

(6) Kṛṣṇa drags Ulūkha. (Mortar). Yaśodā was once breast-feeding Kṛṣṇa when she noticed milk flowing out of the boiling pan, and she put the child on the floor and went to attend to the boiling milk. Anger at this Kṛṣṇa broke the milk-pot by throwing a stone at it. Yaśodā then tried to bind the child to the mortar with a cord. But, any number of cords could not reach round the child's waist. At this trouble of his mother Kṛṣṇa decided to oblige her and then the first cord itself sufficed to bind him round the mortar. But, Kṛṣṇa then began running, dragging the mortar behind him. Dragging the Ulūkha behind him he passed through a narrow gap between two trees. The trees were shaken and at once the trees rose up in the sky as two Devas. The two trees were actually Nalakūbara and Manigrīva, the sons of Vaiśravaṇa, both of whom had been cursed into the form of trees by Nārada. (See under Nalakūbara).

(7) Vatsāsura killed. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarakṣa were one day, engaged in sports along with the Gopālas on the banks of river Kālindī. At that time an Asura sent by Kāṁśa got into the ranks of the cows disguised as a cow. Śrī Kṛṣṇa understood it; Balabhadrarakṣa also pointed out the new 'cow' to him. Then Kṛṣṇa leisurely went towards the herd of cattle, lifted the new 'cow' by its legs and tail and dashed it against a peepal tree. The peepal tree and the one next to it were broken, and thus ended the life of Vatsāsura.

(8) Baka killed. On another occasion Kāṁśa deputed Bakāsura, brother of Pūtanā to kill Kṛṣṇa. He assumed the form of a bird, and lay there on the road with his fierce mouth wide open. The Gopālas were terror-stricken. But, Kṛṣṇa entered the cave-like mouth of the bird leaving his companions behind. The Asura closed his mouth, and the Gopālas cried out in fear and agony. But, Śrī Kṛṣṇa stirred round and round within Baka's stomach and he was forced to vomit Kṛṣṇa out. Along with Kṛṣṇa he vomited blood and died. (See under Baka).

(9) Killed Aghāsura. Aghāsura, brother of Baka and Pūtanā, deputed by Kāṁśa to kill Kṛṣṇa assumed the form of a serpent and with its mouth opened like a cave lay on the road used by the Gopālas. The stench that emanated from its mouth vitiated the atmosphere. The Gopālas including Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarakṣa entered the serpent's mouth, and immediately its entire body shook and it vomited blood. Life escaped through its broken stomach. The Gopālas came out of it and fell down unconscious. But, at the very sight of Kṛṣṇa they regained consciousness. (See under Aghāsa).

(10) Brahmā placed in ridiculous situation. On another occasion Brahmā saw Mahāviṣṇu, in the assumed form of man, playing on the banks of the Kālindī along with Balabhadrarakṣa and his companions. To test whether God possessed powers in the assumed form of man also Brahmā carried away the cattle of the Gopālas. The Gopālas were naturally upset at the disappearance of their cows. After consoling them Kṛṣṇa searched for the cattle on the heights of mount Govardhana and in the forest. But, the cattle were to be found nowhere, and when Kṛṣṇa returned to the banks of the Kālindī the Gopālas too had disappeared. Divining the reason for the whole affair by his divine powers, Kṛṣṇa created both the Gopālas and the cows with his divine powers.

One year passed by thus, and one day Kṛṣṇa and his companions with their cattle went to the top of Govardhana. Brahmā was alarmed to find Kṛṣṇa with the artificially created Gopālas and the cattle, and while he was looking at them the colour of all of them began changing and within minutes they put on the form of Viṣṇu. Moreover, he saw another Brahmā and Brahmaloaka. Upset and alarmed by the whole phenomenon he sang the praises of Mahāviṣṇu at which his illusion was lifted and he saw the actual Kṛṣṇa, the Gopālas and the cattle.

(11) Dhenukāsura killed. There lived in the Kadali forest on the banks of the Kālindī an Asura called Dhenuka with his followers. The forest was thick with palm trees. Out of fear of the Asura nobody dared to travel in the forest. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarakṣa having heard the story about Dhenuka one day went to the forest with their companions. Balabhadrarakṣa shook down a lot of the palm fruits, the Gopālas loudly cheered him. The Asura rushed forth challenging them when Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarakṣa thrashed him to death.

(12) Suppressed Kāliya. There lived in Kālindī a fierce serpent called Kāliya with his wife and relations. The trees on the banks of the river were withered and had dried up on account of the poisonous breath emitted by the serpent. One day the Gopālas and their cattle drank water in the Kālindī and fell down dead. Then Kṛṣṇa climbed a tree on the banks of the river and jumped into its waters and Kāliya rushed forward to him with his hoods spread out. Kṛṣṇa stepped on the hoods and danced thereon. Kāliya vomited blood, got exhausted and prayed to Kṛṣṇa for mercy. At the instance of Kṛṣṇa the serpent with its family emigrated to the Ramanāka island. (See under Kāliya).

(13) Kṛṣṇa swallows fire. When Kṛṣṇa came out of the waters after having suppressed Kāliya and taking with him the gem presented by Kāliya, the Gopālas covered Kṛṣṇa with embraces. People of Ambādī came to the banks of the Kālindī looking out for the children. As the sun had set by now the Yādavas spent the night there, when a wild fire enveloped them, and they cried out to Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa swallowed the entire fire. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(14) Killed Pralamba. While the Gopālas were playing once under the shade of a giant peepal tree called Bhāndiraka an Asura known as Pralamba joined their games disguised as a Gopāla. Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarakṣa understood the trick. They made all the others take the following pledge, i.e. that all of them would beat one another, and the vanquished should carry about the victor on his head. The beating began, and the Gopa called Śrīdāman defeated Kṛṣṇa. Vṛṣabha defeated Bhadrasena and Balabhadrarakṣa defeated Pralamba. According to the pledge Śrī Kṛṣṇa carried on his shoulders Śrīdāman, Bhadrasena carried Vṛṣabha and Pralamba carried Balabhadrarakṣa. But, Pralamba rose up to the skies with Balabhadrarakṣa, who broke the former's head, and Pralamba fell down dead in his actual form as an Asura.

(15) Again in wild fire. The Gopālas were once again caught in wild fire at the Muṇīja forest on the banks of the Kālindī. They cried out in great fear when Kṛṣṇa went to them and asked them to remain standing with eyes closed. They obeyed him, and he swallowed the fire as though it were nectar. The Gopālas were astonished to find themselves safe when they opened their eyes. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(16) Blessed the wives of Brahmans. Kṛṣṇa and his companions one day travelled a long way along the banks of the Kālindī. They felt very hungry and Kṛṣṇa advised them to request for food at brahmin houses. They begged for food the wives of brahmans, and the wives happy at Kṛṣṇa’s presence there, came with food. Kṛṣṇa blessed them. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(17) Theft of clothes. Kṛṣṇa once picked up the clothes of the Gopa women who were bathing in the Kālindī and climbed to the top of a tree with these clothes and played on his flute. The Gopa women came out of the river and saluted Kṛṣṇa with folded hands. He then returned the clothes to them. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(18) Mount Govardhana used as Umbrella. Indra is the rain-God. The people of Ambāḍī used to perform yajña every year in favour of Indra for rain-fall. Kṛṣṇa opposed the custom saying that Mount Govardhana was the house-hold deity of the people of Ambāḍī and it was enough for them to worship the mountain. The people of Ambāḍī, therefore, offered the Yajña they had arranged that year for Indra to Govardhana. Angered at this Indra let loose heavy rains on Ambāḍī. Kṛṣṇa uprooted and held Mount Govardhana like an umbrella lest the people should suffer from the heavy rains, and they took shelter under it. The rain did not stop even after seven days. Yet, due to Kṛṣṇa’s kindness the people did not suffer any hardships. Beaten at his own game, Indra sang the praises of Kṛṣṇa. Devasurabhi (cow of the Devas) came and saluted Kṛṣṇa and anointed him, as the Indra of the Gopālas. The Devas addressed him ‘Govinda’ meaning, he who protects the cattle. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(19) Nandagopa abducted by Varuṇa. Once after having observed Ekādaśivrata Nanda bathed in the river Kālindī. At the instance of Varuṇa a Deva abducted and took him to the abode of Varuṇa. People of Ambāḍī were distressed at the disappearance of Nandagopa. Kṛṣṇa and Balbhadra dived into the Kālindī and rose up at Varuṇālaya. Varuṇa told them that he had abducted Nandagopa so that he might see Viṣṇu in person, and requested to be pardoned. Meanwhile the people of Ambāḍī, who came to Kālindī saw all the worlds reflected in it. Kṛṣṇa and Rāma returned to Ambāḍī with their father, Nandagopa. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(20) Rāsakṛṣṇā. At the advent of the spring the melody of Kṛṣṇa’s flute rendered the Gopa women love-lorn. He went to Vṛndāvana with his flute, and all the Gopa women, both married and unmarried followed him. Kṛṣṇa made a futile attempt to send them back to their houses. But, the love-sick Gopa women did not. Suddenly Kṛṣṇa disappeared from among them, and the Gopa women mad with love roamed about Vṛndāvana with Rādhā calling “O Kṛṣṇa! O Kṛṣṇa!” Suddenly Kṛṣṇa appeared before them. He entered the waters of the Kālindī with them and satisfied them. Śrī Kṛṣṇa thus explained Bhakti-yoga to the world. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(21) Python swallowed Nandagopa. One day the Gopas performed Maheśvara Pūjā (worship) in Devī forest, and they spent the night without going to sleep on the banks of the Kālindī. A python from somewhere began swallowing Nandagopa. Though the Gopas tried their best the snake did not loosen its grip on Nandagopa. Then Kṛṣṇa gave it a kick and the snake transformed itself into a Deva called Sudarśana. He was a Vidyādhara, who had been converted into a python by the curse of sage Āṅgira. (See under Sudarśana).

(22) Killed Ariṣṭāsura. (Kṛṣṇa). During this period Ariṣṭāsura, a follower of Kamsa, came to Ambāḍī disguised as an ox, and people got terror-stricken at the sight of the fierce ox. Kṛṣṇa engaged himself in a duel with the ox (Ariṣṭa) and killed it. (See under Ariṣṭa).

(23) Killed Kesi. Kansha then sent an Asura called Kesi to Ambāḍī. He approached Kṛṣṇa in the guise of a horse into whose mouth the latter thrust his hand, which began growing in size with the result that the Asura vomited blood and expired; Kṛṣṇa got the name Kṛṣṇa as he killed Kesi. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(24) Killed Vyomāśura. Vyomāśura, son of Mayāśura was the last of the Asuras deputed by Kamsa to kill Kṛṣṇa. He joined the company of the Gopas disguised as a goat. Kṛṣṇa dragged him into a cave and killed him there. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

9. Śrī Kṛṣṇa quits Ambāḍī. When all the attempts of Kamsa to do away with Kṛṣṇa failed he resorted to another trick. Kamsa invited Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra, feigning great affection, to witness the dhanur yajña (worshipping the bow) being held at Mathurāpurī, the capital of the country. The invitation was sent through Akrūra, a great devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He went to Ambāḍī with a chariot and delivered to Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra Kamsa’s invitation to them for the fourteen days’ dhanur yajña. The Gopas and Gopis shed tears at the prospect of Kṛṣṇa leaving Ambāḍī. But, Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra took leave of them and started for Mathurāpurī in the chariot brought by Akrūra. On their way to Mathurā they bathed in the Kālindī and when they dived in its waters Akrūra saw the Viśvārupa (Cosmic form of Kṛṣṇa). After the bath they continued their journey when Akrūra informed Kṛṣṇa in secret, about all the evil tactics of Kamsa, and requested him to kill the latter. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

10. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa in Mathurāpurī.

1. Rajakovadha (the washerman is slain). Rāma and Kṛṣṇa duly reached Mathurāpurī, and in the evening they went out for a stroll in the city to view its beauties when they saw a washerman carrying the washed clothes of Kansha. They asked him for some of the clothes but the washerman not only refused them the clothes but also ridiculed them calling them cattle-breeders. Śrī Kṛṣṇa thrashed the washerman on the spot and distributed the clothes among the children who had gathered there, himself wearing a yellow cloth from the stock and giving a blue one to Balabhadra.

2. Karicukakāra (tailor) given salvation. Next, they saw a tailor who used to stitch shirts, turbans etc. for Kansha. He presented costly shirts and turbans to Rāma and Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa gave him salvation and distributed the clothes to the Gopas with him.

3. Sudāman presents garlands. Then Kṛṣṇa and Rāma entered the house of Sudāman who gave them each a garland. Kṛṣṇa blessed him.

4. Straightened the hunch-back Trivakrā. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa continued their walk when they saw a female hunch-back coming opposite to them with a beautiful vessel filled with aigārāga (fragrant things like sandalwood, musk etc. reduced into a paste to be smeared on the body). She told them that she was the maid-in-attendance of Kânîsa; her name was Trîvakrâ and the aîgârâga in the vessel was for the use of Kânîsa. She felt pure love for Kṛṣṇa and gave him the aîgârâga along with the vessel. Râma and Kṛṣṇa smeared their bodies with it. Kṛṣṇa stepped on her feet and with his right hand raised her chin upwards and she was cured of her hunch. Her love for Kṛṣṇa knew no bounds and she begged him to spend the night in her house. Kṛṣṇa promised to oblige her on another occasion and continued the walk.

(5) Kṛṣṇa broke the bow. Râma and Kṛṣṇa continued their walk into the Yajña hall of Kânisâ. A big bow was seen there, and Kṛṣṇa broke it with his left hand before the guards could approach him. With the broken pieces of the bow he killed the soldiers sent by Kânisâ to take him and Râma into custody. They again continued their walk. The sun set, and though they lay down to sleep thoughts about the underhand dealings of Kânisâ kept them sleepless.

(6) Kṛṣṇa killed the fierce elephant. That night Kṛṣṇa dreamt many an inauspicious dream. The next morning Kânisâ set up an arena for pugilistic combats. Yâdava chiefs like Nandagopa, many other important persons in Mathurâ and Kânisâ took their seats on the dais. Famous pugilists like Cânûrâ, Mûṣîkî, Kûta, Sala and Kosala also entered the scene. Kânîsa had stationed a fierce elephant called Kuvalâyapida on the way Râma and Kṛṣṇa had to take to enter the arena for pugilistic competition. The mahout prompted the elephant to catch hold of Kṛṣṇa, and in the fight that ensued with the animal Kṛṣṇa killed it and gave one tusk of it to Râma. Kṛṣṇa beat the mahout also to death with the tusk. After this they entered the scene.

(7) Kânisâ killed. The pugilistic competition started. Cânûrâ fought against Kṛṣṇa and Mûṣîkî against Râma and both Cânûrâ and Mûṣîkî were killed. Râma and Kṛṣṇa killed three other famous pugilists too, who confronted them following the death of Cânûrâ and Mûṣîkî. Thereupon the remaining pugilists ran away into the forest. Kânisâ, burning with anger, jumped up from his seat roaring, "Annihilate the Gopâlas, kill Nandagopa, drown Ugrasena, the friend of our enemies, in the Kâlînî" etc. Responding to Kânisâ's war-cry Śrî Kṛṣṇa jumped into the former's sofa and pushed him down. Kṛṣṇa jumped on to the back of Kânisâ and killed him. Balabhadrâ killed with his iron club the eight brothers of Kânisâ who rushed against Kṛṣṇa. After consoling the women, who lamented over the death of Kânisâ and others Śrî Kṛṣṇa got their dead bodies duly cremated. Râma and Kṛṣṇa released Vasudeva and Devaki and Ugrasena immediately from prison. Ugrasena was crowned King of Mathurâ.

(8) Farewell to the people of Ambâdi. Râma and Kṛṣṇa saluted Nandagopa and Yaśodâ, and entrusted to them their clothes and bows for safe custody. Then saying that they would return after strengthening the Yadu dynasty, Râma and Kṛṣṇa sent their parents and the other Gopas home. (Bhâgavata, 10th Skandha).

11) Education of Râma and Kṛṣṇa.

(1) After bidding adieu to the people of Ambâdi, Vasudeva, on the advice of sage Garga sent Râma and Kṛṣṇa for their studies to the Âstrama of the great sage Sândipani. During their education at the Âstrama Kṛṣṇa and Kucela became intimate friends. One day, at the instance of the wife of their preceptor, Kṛṣṇa and Kucela went into the forest to gather firewood. In the heavy rain and storm that followed they lost their track and wandered about in the forest. The next day the preceptor brought them back from the forest. Kṛṣṇa learned the sixty-four arts and dhanurveda (science of archery) at the feet of Sândipani. (Bhârata, Southern Text, Page 802; Sabha Parva, Chapter 38).

(2) Gûrudakṣînâ (Preceptor's fees). When Râma and Kṛṣṇa completed their studies they asked the preceptor as to what he wanted by way of tuition fee, and the guru wanted to get back his son, who was, years ago, drowned in Prabhâsa river. Accordingly Râma and Kṛṣṇa went in their chariot to Varuṇa at the sea coast. Varuṇa told them that it was the Asura called Pañcâjana, who lived in the sea in the form of a conch, who had killed their preceptor's son. Śrî Kṛṣṇa entered the sea and killed the Asura. But, the child was not to be seen inside the conch. Blowing this conch, which in later years became famous as Pañcâjana, Râma and Kṛṣṇa went to Yâma's abode, who on being told about the object of their visit returned the child to Râma and Kṛṣṇa. They presented the child to their preceptor. He blessed them and they returned to Mathurâpuri.

12) Uptî Kṛṣṇa's return to Duârakâ.

(1) Message through Uddhava. Râma and Kṛṣṇa who returned to Mathurâpuri after their studies at Sândipani's Âstrama thought about the people of Ambâdi. It was a long time since they had heard about them. So Kṛṣṇa sent a message to Ambâdi by his minisiter Uddhava. After duly delivering the message Uddhava stayed at Ambâdi four or five months after which he returned to Mathurâ with the presents given to Kṛṣṇa by Nandagopa, Yaśodâ and the other Gopas.

(2) Visited Trîvakrâ. Kṛṣṇa had promised to visit the house of Trîvakrâ at the time he cured her of her hunch, and she had been for long awaiting Kṛṣṇa. But only now he got the opportunity to fulfil his promise. He accepted her hospitality at her house and thus ended her grief.

(3) Interested himself in the Pândavas. By this time Pându had died. The Pândavas and Kûntî, sister of Kṛṣṇa's father were living at Hastinâpura along with the Kauravas. They were victims to all sorts of miseries. Hearing about the sad plight of the Pândavas Kṛṣṇa deputed Akûrâ to Hastinâpura to enquire about them. Kûntidevi, with tears in her eyes, told Akûrâ about the injustice being done against the Pândavas by the Kauravas and the continuous attempts being made to kill Bhîma. Akûrâ visited important persons like Vidura, Dîrtrâstra etc. Akûrâ exhorted Dîrtrâstra, who had succeeded Pându as King, to mete out equal justice to Kauravas as well as to the Pândavas. Akûrâ returned to Mathurâ and gave a report to Kṛṣṇa about his visit to the Pândavas.

(4) The Jârâsandha war. Asti and Prâpti, wives of Kânisâ complained about the killing of their husband by Kṛṣṇa to their father Jarâsandha, King of Magadhâ. Jarâsandha, aided by such famous Kings as Sâlva, Kûlînga, Cêdrîja, Dantavakra and Siûpûla besieged Mathurâpuri with a big army. Yâdava leaders like Kṛṣṇa, Balabhadrâ, Uddhava, Akûrâ and Krtvârman met the enemies in battle in which many kings got killed. Balabhadra met Jarāsandha in duel, but let him off on the request of Kṛṣṇa. But, Jarāsandha, supported by Bāṇāsura and others besieged Mathurā again and again. When Balabhadra attempted to kill Jarāsandha, a celestial voice declared that it was not possible for the former to kill Jarāsandha, and the war, therefore, ended for the time being.

(5) Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra meet Paraśurāma. The continuous war with Jarāsandha reduced the financial resources of the Yādavas and to replenish their treasury Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra started for mount Gomantaka to the repository of gems and on their way they saw Paraśurāma engaged in penance under a peepal tree. Paraśurāma told them that there was a kingdom at the foot of the Gomantaka called Karavīra ruled by King Sṛgālavāsudeva and advised them to kill him and collect enough money and gems. Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra did so and reached Pravarṣanagiri with money and gems so collected. There Garuḍa brought back to Kṛṣṇa his crown which had been, sometime back, stolen away by Bāṇāsura. Kṛṣṇa and Rāma returned to Mathurāpurī.

Since Sṛgālavāsudeva had been killed by Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, Jarāsandha attacked Mathurāpurī again, for the eighteenth time. Though during all the wars Jarāsandha was defeated, by that time the Yādava power had been weakened much and so Kṛṣṇa ultimately decided to leave Mathurā and found another kingdom somewhere else. Kṛṣṇa had two reasons to come to this decision. Firstly, Jarāsandha was the father-in-law of his uncle Kaniṣa. Next, it was Jarāsandha's object to conquer Mathurāpurī for Kaniṣa's sons. Taking into consideration the above two objects of Jarāsandha, Kṛṣṇa and Rāma voluntarily quit Mathurā with the Yādavas and went and lived in the city built for them by Vāyākarman on an island called Dvārakā in the western sea. (See under Kuśasthali). (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

13) Kṛṣṇa killed Kālayavana. King Kālayavana wanted to conquer Mathurāpurī for which purpose he performed penance and secured from Śiva the boon that none of the Yādavas would be able to kill him. Kṛṣṇa had shifted to Dvārakā, somewhat deceived by the thought that Kālayavana could not be killed because of the protection accorded by Śiva's boon. Another thing also happened at this juncture. King Mucukunda, son of Māndhātā had on the request of Indra gone to Devaloka and defeated the Asuras in war. Indra asked him to choose his reward for this service and Mucukunda wanted to be shown a place for him to sleep as he had not slept for a long time. Indra, accordingly showed him a cave on earth and told him that he who disturbed him in sleep would be reduced to ashes by his very look. Mucukunda went to sleep in that cave. Kālayavana approached Kṛṣṇa to kill him and the latter, pretending to be in fear of Kālayavana, ran before him. Kālayavana followed Kṛṣṇa, who entered the cave where Mucukunda was sleeping and he followed Kṛṣṇa into the cave also. Kālayavana, mistaking Mucukunda for Kṛṣṇa, kicked him violently whereupon he jumped up from sleep and looked at Kālayavana, who was reduced to ashes. Then Kṛṣṇa appeared before Mucukunda who praised the former. On the advice of Kṛṣṇa he performed penance at Badarikāśrama and attained salvation. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

14) Śrī Kṛṣṇa escaped from fire. Balabhadra and Kṛṣṇa started for Dvārakā carrying all the riches of Kālayavana. They met Jarāsandha on their way and took to their heels. Jarāsandha followed them to the heights of Mount Pravṛṣanā where they disappeared. Jarāsandha set fire to the four sides of the mountain when Rāma and Kṛṣṇa escaped secretly from the fire to Dvārakā. Jarāsandha returned to Magadha believing that both his antagonists were burned to death. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

15) Wedding of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

(1) Balabhadra-Revati. Balabhadra married Revati, daughter of King Ānarta of Kuśasthali, former name of Dvārakā.

(2) Kṛṣṇa-Rukmīni. King Bṛīṣmaka of Vidarbha had five sons the eldest of whom was Rukmī. His sixth child was a daughter and she was named Rukmīni. Stories about Kṛṣṇa kindled in Rukmīni love for him. Rukmīni, who hated Kṛṣṇa, wanted to give his sister in marriage to Śīśupāla. Rukmīni sent through a brahmin a message about the affair to Dvārakā. On the day of Rukmīni's Śvayamvara Rāma and Kṛṣṇa also went to Kuṇḍinapurī, capital of Vidarbha, and Kṛṣṇa, in the presence of all Kings, carried Rukmīni away in his chariot. The Kings who, under the leadership of Rukmīni, attacked Kṛṣṇa were routed. A son called Pradyumna was born to Kṛṣṇa by Rukmīni. (See under Pradyumna).

(3) Kṛṣṇa-Jāmbavatī. Prasena, brother of the Yādava King Satrājīt, went aching wearing on him the gem called Syamantaka presented to the latter by the Sun-god. Jāmbavān saw a lion carrying off the gem after killing Prasena. He killed the lion, recovered the gem from it and gave it to his children to play with. A rumour was spread that it was Kṛṣṇa who had killed and stolen the gem. Kṛṣṇa searched for the gem in the forest and found it out in the cave of Jāmbavān. In the duel that ensued between Jāmbavān and Kṛṣṇa the former was defeated. He recognised Kṛṣṇa to be the Lord, and presented Syamantaka and also his daughter Jāmbavatī to Kṛṣṇa and Jāmbavatī thus became Kṛṣṇa's wife. (See under Syamantaka).

(4) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Satyabhāmā. Śrī Kṛṣṇa returned Syamantaka to Satrājīt and he, in return, gave his daughter Satyabhāmā in marriage to Kṛṣṇa. Though Syamantaka was given to Kṛṣṇa by way of dowry he did not accept it. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(5) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Kuśasthali. The happy news that the Pāndavas had escaped from the lac palace and were living at Kuḥḍavapraṣṭha took some time to reach Kṛṣṇa, who had been pained to know that they were burned to death in the palace. As soon as Kṛṣṇa knew that the Pāndavas were safe at Kuḥḍavapraṣṭha he went to them along with Yādava chiefs like Śāyaki and others. It was then that the fire-god Vāhāni, requested Arjuna for the Kuḥḍavā forest for his food and Arjuna consented to it. It was Kṛṣṇa who drove Arjuna's chariot in his fight with Indra at the burning of the forest by Agnideva. (See under Kuḥḍavādāhā). Arjuna saved Maya from the Kuḥḍavā forest and Maya, in return for the kindness, built a palace for the Pāndavas at Indraprastha. Kṛṣṇa also lived there for a few days. One day while Kṛṣṇa was strolling on the banks of the Kuḍiṇi in the company of Arjuna they saw a woman, who told them that her name was Kuḍiṇi and that she would marry none but Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa then took her as his wife. (See under Kālindī). After staying at Indraprastha for three or four months Kṛṣṇa returned to Dvārakā with Kālindī. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(6) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Mitravindā. The King of Avanti had married Rājadhīdevī, sister of Kṛṣṇa's father and they had two sons called Vinda and Anuvinda and a daughter Mitravindā, who had fixed in her mind Kṛṣṇa as her husband. Kṛṣṇa, who was present at her Svayamīvara carried her off on his chariot to Dvārakā.

(7) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Satyā. King Nagnajīt of Kosala, father of Satyā, had seven oxen like elephants in strength. The King proclaimed that his daughter would be married to the person who would tie down the oxen. Various Kings attempted the task but failed. Ultimately Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa went to Kosala and Kṛṣṇa assumed seven forms and tied down the oxen with cords. The seven oxen at once fell down. Kṛṣṇa took Satyā for his wife.

(8) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Kaikeyī (Bhadrā). Kṛṣṇa married Kaikeyī, the daughter of Śrutakīrti, sister of Kṛṣṇa's father.

(9) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Lakṣmāṇā. Lakṣmāṇā, daughter of King Madra chose Kṛṣṇa at her Svayamīvara and she became Kṛṣṇa's wife.

(10) Kṛṣṇa-16000 women. Brahmā had given the boon to the 16000 daughters of Narākāṣura in their previous birth that Viṣṇu would marry them in their next birth. While even the Devas were suffering on account of Narākāṣura, Śrī Kṛṣṇa along with Satyabhāmā mounted Garuḍa, went to Prajñāyoṣa, the kingdom of Narākāṣura, defeated him in fight and released his 16000 daughters from captivity. He returned with them to Dvārakā, assumed the guise of 16000 men and married those 16000 girls. He built a palace for each of his 16000 wives. (For details see under Narākāṣura).

(16) Kṛṣṇa's 16008 wives. The eight women, i.e. Rukmīṇī, Jāmbavatī, Satyabhāmā, Kālindī, Mitra-vindā, Satyā, Kaikeyī (Bhadrā) Lakṣmāṇā and the 16000 daughters of Narākāṣura constituted Kṛṣṇa's harem. (The 16000 daughters of Narākāṣura are not mentioned by name in the Purāṇas). (See under Sudattā and Ketumān IV.)

17) Gave Salvation to Ghanṭākārṇas. Ghanṭa and Karna were two demon brothers. Kṛṣṇa met them at Badarikāśrama where he had gone after his marriage with Rukmīṇī, to perform penance to Śiva for a child. Kṛṣṇa offered salvation to the two demon brothers, Ghanṭa and Karna.

18) Fight between Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna. (See under Gālavā).

19) Killed Murūṣaṇa. (See under Mura).

20) Killed Narākāṣura. (See under Narāka).

21) Plucked away Pārījāta. During the period when Narākāṣura was having his own ways on the earth and when he took away by force Indra's royal umbrella and the ear-rings of Aditi, the Devamātā, Indra sought Kṛṣṇa's help to suppress the Asura. Kṛṣṇa along with Satyabhāmā, mounted Garuḍa, went and killed the Asura and restored the royal umbrella to Indra and the ear-rings to Aditi. On their way back home Kṛṣṇa, as desired by Satyabhāmā, plucked by its roots the Pārījāta from Devaloka at which Indra fought Kṛṣṇa, but got defeated. The Pārījāta was brought to Dvārakā and planted in front of Satyabhāmā's palace. It is stated that Pārījāta was thus brought and planted by Kṛṣṇa to alleviate the grief caused to Satyabhāmā by the return by Kṛṣṇa of Syamanatka to Satrajīṭ. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

22) Kṛṣṇa's sons and grand-children. Ten sons were born to each of the eight chief wives—from Rukmīṇī to Lakṣmāṇa—of Kṛṣṇa. Names of the chief among those eighty sons are given below.

(1) Of Rukmīṇī—Pradyumna, Cārudekṣaṇa, Sudekṣaṇa, Cārudeha, Suchāru, Cāruguṭpa, Bhadracāru, Cāruncandra, Aṭīcāru, Cāru.

(2) Of Jāmbavatī—Śaṁba, Sumitīra.

(3) Of Satyabhāmā—Bhānu, Subhānu, Svarbhānu, Prabhānu, Bhānumāṇa, Candrabhānu, Bhadabhānu, Hariṇabhānu, Śriṭhānu, Pratīhbhānu.

(4) Of Kālindī—Śruta.

(5) Of Mitra-vindā—Vṛkaḥmaṇa.

(6) Of Satyā—Bhānumaṇḍra.

(7) Of Bhadrā—Śaṁgrāmacitta.

(8) Of Lakṣmāṇa—Pṛaghobara.

A daughter called Rukmāvatī was born to Rukmīṇī, brother of Rukmīṇī. Pradyumna married Rukmāvatī and Aniruddha was their son. It was this Aniruddha, who wedded Uṣā, Āru, the daughter of Rukmīṇī who was married by the son of Kṛṭavarmā. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

23) Kṛṣṇa tested Rukmīṇī While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was once having a chat with Rukmīṇī he wanted to test her love for him. So he told her that he was penniless and helpless and was hiding from his enemies there at Dvārakā and that he would only be really glad if she married some other powerful King. Kṛṣṇa had not completed his sentences when Rukmīṇī fell down unconscious. Kṛṣṇa then consoled her. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

24) Kṛṣṇa fought with Bāna. See under Bāna.

25) Kṛṣṇa killed Paunḍraka. See under Paunḍraka.

26) Nyga given salvation. See under Nṛga.

27) Śrīkṛṣṇa blessed Pāṇcālī at the time of her Svayamīvara (See under Pāṇcālī).

28) Subhādā given in marriage to Arjuna. Arjuna had to go on a pilgrimage for one year as atonement for having got into the palace where Yudhiṣṭhira was spending the days with Pāṇcālī. It was during this period of his pilgrimage that Arjuna married Subhādā, who was the younger sister of Kṛṣṇa due to whose cleverness alone Arjuna got her as his wife. (For details see under Subhādā).

29) Kṛṣṇa got the club called Kaumodakī and he saved Maya. See under Khaṇḍavadāsā.

30) Kṛṣṇa with the Pāṇḍavas. The rest of Kṛṣṇa's life was intimately connected with the history of the Pāṇḍavas. Important roles played by Kṛṣṇa during the period up to the great war, are summarised below.

(1) He conducted Yajña continuously for many years for the protection of Dharma (righteousness). (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 16).

(2) Permitted Yudhiṣṭhira to perform Rājasūya yajña. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

(3) Along with Bhīma and Arjuna, he went to Mathurā in the guise of a brahmin and killed Jārāsandha. (See under Jārāsandha).

(4) He crowned Sahadeva, son of Jārāsandha, as King of Mathurā. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 24, Verse 43).

(5) He gave a lot of money as donation at the Rājasūya Yaśa of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 15).

(6) He was presented with ear-rings by Bhūmidevī (goddess Earth). (Sabhā Parva, Page 808, Southern text).

(7) He killed Śiśupāla. (See under Śiśupāla).

(8) He made the clothes of Pāṇcālī unending when Duryodhana tried to strip her naked in the royal assembly. (See under Pāṇcālī).

(9) He fought Śālva and Saubha. (See under Śālva and Saubha).

(10) He once took Subhadrā and Arjuna to Dvārakā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 22; Verses 47, 48).

(11) He consoled the Pāṇḍavas at the Kāmeyaka forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 16).

(12) He ate the bit of a leaf of greens from Pāṇcālī’s vessel and was pleased with her. (See under Pāṇcālī).

(13) Attended the wedding of Abhimanyu at Uppalavanyagara and gave a lot of money to Jāharpāputra. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 72, Verse 24).

(14) He sent to the court of King Virāṭa a messenger, who explained to him the corrupt ways of the Kauravas and the righteousness of the Pāṇḍavas. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 1).

31) Tested by Nārada. Nārada wanted to know how Kṛṣṇa managed to satisfy all his 16008 wives. For this purpose he visited their houses and Nārada was wonder-struck to find Kṛṣṇa engaged in conversation with his wives in all the houses he visited. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

32) Kṛṣṇa blessed Kucela. See under Kucela.

35) The story of Santānagopālām. See para 7 (d) under Arjuna.

34) Kṛṣṇa feigned sleep. The Kauravas refused to part with half the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas, who had returned from their exile in the forest. Both the sides began preparations for war. Duryodhana went to Dvārakā to invite Kṛṣṇa to his side, and seeing him at a distance Kṛṣṇa feigned sleep and lay down there. Duryodhana occupied a stool at the head of Kṛṣṇa’s bed. Arjuna, who also came to seek his help, stood with folded hands at Kṛṣṇa’s feet. It was Arjuna whom Kṛṣṇa first saw on waking up. But Duryodhana told him that it was he who had come first. Kṛṣṇa was in a fix, and he had to promise to help both the sides. He promised his entire army to one side and his personal help, himself without any weapons with him, to the other side, and Arjuna was asked to make his choice first as he was younger than Duryodhana. Arjuna chose Kṛṣṇa without arms and Duryodhana with his infantry. Kṛṣṇa agreed to act as Arjuna’s charioteer.

35) As messenger of peace in Kaurava assembly. Dharmaputra requested Kṛṣṇa to find out means to avoid war somehow or other and Kṛṣṇa sent a message to Dhṛtarāṣṭra through Saṁjaya but nothing came out of it. Ultimately Kṛṣṇa himself decided to visit the Kauravas for which purpose he went first to Dvārakā in his chariot with Saṁjaya. On his way Kṛṣṇa held talks with many a great sage. From Dvārakā he returned to Hastinapura where he visited and consoled Kuṇḍi at Vidura’s house. He had his supper also there. The next day he attended Duryodhana’s court and strongly pleaded for the Pāṇḍavas. But Duryodhana and others ridiculed him and even attempted to take him captive. Śri Kṛṣṇa at once exhibited his Viśva-rūpa (Cosmic form). The Kauravas were frightened to witness Brahmā on Kṛṣṇa’s forehead, Śiva on his chest, Aditya-Vasu-Rudras in his mouth etc. Śri Kṛṣṇa granted the blind Dhṛtarāṣṭra divine eyes to see this Viśvarūpa and he sang the praise of Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa returned to the Pāṇḍavas after advising Karna to fight on the Pāṇḍava side in the impending war. (Udyoga Parva).

36) Kṛṣṇa in the great war. The parts Kṛṣṇa played during the Kuru-Pāṇḍava war are briefly given below.

(1) The Kaurava and the Pāṇḍava armies were gathered at Kurukṣetra in full battle array and Arjuna, at the sight of the thousands of relations in the opposite camp, became a prey to a great delusion and sat down. Kṛṣṇa then enthused him to fight by giving him advice, which came later to be known as the great Gītā. The Gītā contains the Sānkhya, Yoga, the characteristics of the wise people and the unwise, description about yajñās, greatness of knowledge, characteristics of Sānkhya and niṣkamakarma, yogins, jñānayogas etc. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapters 26-42).

(2) At the commencement of the battle, Kṛṣṇa blew aloud his conch Pañcājanya. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 15).

(3) Kṛṣṇa rushed forward with his Cakrāyudha to kill Bhīṣma, who then praised Kṛṣṇa. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 65).

(4) He prompted Arjuna to kill Bhīṣma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 33).

(5) He received on his chest the Vaiṣṇavāstā shot by Bhagadatta against Arjuna. (Drona Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 13).

(6) Consoled Arjuna, who was lamenting over the death of Abhimanyu. (Drona Parva, Chapter 72).

(7) Consoled Subhadrā, who was sunk in sorrow at the loss of her son. (Drona Parva, Chapter 77).

(8) Consoled the crying Pāṇcālī and Uttara. (Drona Parva, Chapter 78).

(9) Took Arjuna in a dream to Śiva and got Śiva’s blessing for him. (Drona Parva, Chapter 80).

(10) He looked after the horses in the battle-field. (Drona Parva, Chapter 100).

(11) Prompted Arjuna to kill Duryodhana. (Drona Parva, Chapter 102).

(12) Kṛṣṇa created illusory darkness and prompted Arjuna to kill Jayadratha. (See under Jayadratha).

(13) He lifted the darkness after Jayadratha was killed by Arjuna. (Drona Parva, Chapter 146).

(14) As it was not proper for Arjuna and Karna to be fighting with each other at mid-night he deputed Ghatotkaca to fight Karna. (Drona Parva, Chapter 173).

(15) He consoled Dharmaputra, who was grieving over the death of Ghatotkaca. (Drona Parva, Chapter 153).

(16) He prompted Arjuna to kill Karna. (Karna Parva, Chapter 60).

(17) Withdrew Arjuna from confrontation with Karna on the pretext of attending to Dharmaputra, who had been wounded. (Karna Parva, Chapter 64).

(18) A sudden dispute arose between Dharmaputra and Arjuna, who drew his sword to kill the former. And Kṛṣṇa reconciled them by relating the story of Vyādha and Kauśika. (For the story see under Valāka).
Arjuna got ready to commit suicide: Kṛṣṇa dissuaded him from the attempt. (Karna Parva, Chapter 70).

Kṛṣṇa again prompted Arjuna to kill Karna.

In the fierce battle that ensued between Arjuna and Karna, Kṛṣṇa pressed down the platform of the chariot when the latter shot the nāgāstra (the serpent arrow). The arrow flew off with Arjuna’s crown. (Karna Parva, Chapter 90).

Arjuna killed Karna after which Kṛṣṇa prompted Dharmaputra to kill Śalya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 7).

Kṛṣṇa prompted Bhīma to kill Duryodhana in an illusory battle. (Salya Parva, Chapter 58).

As requested by Yudhiṣṭhira Kṛṣṇa left the battle-field for Hastināpura and returned after consoling Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhāri. (Salya Parva, Chapter 62).

Kṛṣṇa cursed Aśvatthāma who released arrows against pregnant women. (See under Aśvatthāma).

Kṛṣṇa explained to sages and Bhūmidevi some profound doctrines about God and the world. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167).

He gave permission to Bhīṣma to die. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167).

Consoled Gaṅgādevī who grieved over the death of Bhīṣma. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 168).

He once again revealed the doctrine of the Gitā in the form of discussions between Siddhamahārṣis and Kaśyapa. (Aśramavāsika Parva, Chapter 16).

After the great war was over he went to Dvārakā with Subhadra and Śatyraki with the consent of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Aśramavāsika Parva, Chapter 57, Verses 54-58).

Sri Kṛṣṇa again at Dvārakā. When Kṛṣṇa returned to Dvārakā, Sage Uṭṭanaka visited him. The sage was told details about the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas by Kṛṣṇa. He detailed to the sage spiritual principles too and showed him his Viṣvarūpa (Cosmic form). Kṛṣṇa participated in festival held by the Yādavas on the Raivata mountain. Afterwards when he went to Dvārakā he told his father Vasudeva details about the war. He himself performed the obsequies of Abhimanyu. (Aśvamedha Parva).

Kṛṣṇa brought back Parīkṣit to life. Kṛṣṇa again went to Hastināpura. There Utārā, wife of Abhimanyu, delivered, but the child was born dead as the arrow of Aśvatthāma had hit her womb. Kṛṣṇa brought the dead child back to life on the request of Kunti. It was this child, who became later famous as Parīkṣit. (Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 66).

The evening of Kṛṣṇa’s life.

The curse of Gāndhāri. Most of the heroes and distinguished archers like Duryodhana had been killed in the great war, and Gāndhāri overwhelmed with grief and anger at the death of her sons lamented over them loudly. She realised that Kṛṣṇa was the cause of all the destruction and cursed him as follows:—

“If I have gained any powers by my loyal and devout service to my husband, O! Kṛṣṇa I curse you on the strength of that power. Since you forsook relations like the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas who quarrelled with each other, you also will have to witness the killing of relations. Thirty-six years from today your relations, ministers and sons will be killed, and you too will be killed by a hunter in the forest. Your women-folk also will cry as we women cry now.” (Śrī Parva, Chapter 25).

The curse of Gāndhāri that the Yādava dynasty would be annihilated after thirty-six years was fulfilled. In the thirtysixth year another curse also befell the dynasty which contributed further to its annihilation.

Curse of the sages. The sages Viśvāmitra, Kanva and Nārada came to Dvārakā one. Some Yādavas brought Samba dressed as a pregnant woman before the sages and asked them derivisely what child, whether male or female, would Samba give birth to. Angry at this insult, the sages said that the ‘pregnant woman’ would deliver an iron rod, which would become instrumental for the destruction of the Yādava dynasty. Kṛṣṇa who was told about the curse said that it was as it was destined to be. Next day Samba delivered an iron rod. The Yādavas filed it into powder and threw the powder into the sea. Śrī Kṛṣṇa enforced prohibition of liquors in Dvārakā with the object of avoiding any untoward incidents in Dvārakā. It was declared that those who produced liquor would be hanged to death along with their families. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 1).

Evil omens. Signs of the destruction of the Yādavas began appearing. Agents of Kaśa visited house after house. Rats multiplied in numbers everywhere in the land, and they began gnawing the nails and hairs of people enjoying sleep. Sheep howled like jackals. Asses were born from cows and cats from mules. Dogs cohabitated with rats. The Cakrāuydha (Discus) given to Kṛṣṇa by Agnideva at the time of Khāṇḍavadāha disappeared into the sky while the Yādavas were looking on. Thus symptoms of an all-round destruction were witnessed.

 Destruction of the Yādavas. Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Balabhadrā, Uddhava and others were about to go on a pilgrimage, and the Yadus, the Vṛṣṇis and the Andhakas began manufacturing and drinking liquor. They also began to quarrel with one another. The powder of the iron rod thrown into the sea was washed ashore and it grew up like arrow-like grass. The Yādavas fought with one another and many were killed. Kṛṣṇa got terribly angry at the death of Śatyraki, Pradyumna and others. He plucked a handful of grass and it transformed itself into an iron rod with which he beat to death those around him. Then all the people plucked up the grass which turned into iron rods. They fought amongst themselves with the iron rods and all of them got killed.

Death of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa. During this period Balabhadrā went and seated himself under a tree in deep meditation. Kṛṣṇa stood near him. Dāruka and Bahbhu also arrived there. Kṛṣṇa deputed Dāruka to Hastināpura to inform Arjuna about the annihilation of the Yādava race. Then Kṛṣṇa went to the palace and consoled the women-folk there. When he told them that Arjuna would come and take care of them, his wives shed tears. Kṛṣṇa then took leave of Vasudeva and returned to Balabhadra. Kṛṣṇa saw even at a distance a white serpent coming out of Balabhadra’s mouth and moving away to Pātāla through the sea. The serpent which was the soul of Balabhadra was duly received by the prominent Nāgas in Pātāla. Kṛṣṇa roamed about the forest for some time and then lay down on the ground immersed in Yoga with his feet raised up. An Asura called Jara, who saw Kṛṣṇa’s raised feet from a distance mistook the same for a deer and shot it with his arrows. Kṛṣṇa expired at once and rose up in the guise of Viṣṇu to Vaikunṭha. (Mausala Parva).

(6) Reason for Kṛṣṇa’s foot being hit by arrow. Durvāsas once went to Dvārakā and enquired who was there to put him up as a guest. Kṛṣṇa invited him to his palace and treated him as a very honoured guest. He began creating trouble there by breaking vessels, cating only very sparingly at times but eating all that he saw at other times. Kṛṣṇa and Rukmini put up with the vagaries of the sage quite patiently. One day the sage expressed a desire to taste pudding, and accordingly Kṛṣṇa and Rukmini cooked it and served it to the sage. After tasting some pudding he asked Kṛṣṇa to smear his whole body with the balance of it and Kṛṣṇa did so except the bottom of his feet. The sage asked him why he did not smear the nether surface of his feet with the pudding to which Kṛṣṇa humbly answered that he did not like doing so. Durvāsas smeared Rukmini’s body with what remained of the pudding. He yoked Rukmini to the chariot and rode off swiftly in it. On the way he whipped Rukmini. Kṛṣṇa ran after the chariot so that he might be of service to the sage. After he had gone some distance the sage jumped out of the chariot and ran through the forest. Ultimately he turned round to Kṛṣṇa and told him as follows:—

“Oh! Kṛṣṇa! I am pleased with your service. Let Rukmini have the first place among your wives. She will not be affected by old age. And, you will never meet with death by being hit at those parts of your body which have been smeared with the pudding.”

When Kṛṣṇa and Rukmini returned to the palace the vessels which Durvāsas had broken were found to be in a more glittering condition than of old. Their welfare and happiness were also increased. Kṛṣṇa died hit by the arrow of the hunter on the lower surface of his feet as he had not smeared that part of the body with the pudding left over by Durvāsas. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 159), (There is another story to the effect that Jara, the hunter, was Bāli (whom Śrī Rāma had killed) reborn, and he killed Kṛṣṇa in retaliation for his former death).

(7) After Kṛṣṇa’s death.

(i) Arjuna came to Dvārakā and cremated Kṛṣṇa. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 31).

(ii) After his death Kṛṣṇa, lives in the guise of Nārāyaṇa in the divine sphere. (Svarga-rōhana Parva, Chapter 5, Verses 24-26).

(iii) Anointed queens like Rukmini and Jāmbavati and some other wives of Kṛṣṇa entered his funeral pyre and ended their lives. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Verses 73 and 74).

(iv) While Arjuna was leading the remaining wives of Kṛṣṇa away from Dvārakā forest-dwellers attacked them on the way. But the women, to escape from their clutches, ran off and jumped into the river Sarasvatī and died in its waters. Their souls entered heaven (Svarga-rōhana Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 25).

(8) Names of Kṛṣṇa.

KṛṣṇaKarnī

KṛṣṇaKesa. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

KṛṣṇaNanda. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 13th century A.D. He is the author of Saḥrdayānanda Kaṭya which contains fifteen cantos. The theme is the story of Nala.

KṛṣṇaNjana. Capital city of Nirṛti, one of the eight Guardians of the quarters. (Devī Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

KṛṣṇaNubhautika. A great sage. He visited Bīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 11).

KṛṣṇaParvata. A mountain in Kuśa island very dear to Viśu. (Bīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 4).

Kṛṣṇatreyā. A great sage of ancient India. It is said that this sage grasped the whole of Ayuṛveda and practised it by the strength of his penance (M.B. Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 210, Verse 21).

Kṛṣṇavartman. Another name for Agni. Agni was addressed by this word at the serpent yajña by Āstika. (M.B. Chapter 55, Verse 10).

KṛṣṇaVenī. A sacred river in South India. A bath in the Devakūṇḍa in this river (Jātismarhrada) will kindle in one remembrance about previous life. (Śaṅbh Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20). Agni is supposed to originate from this hrada. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222, Verse 26).

Kṛta. I. A King of Janaka's dynasty. He was the son of Vijaya and father of Śunaka. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha). Kṛta had seven beautiful daughters who, because of a sense of non-attachment and renunciation, forsook their father's home for the cremation ground even while they were mere children. They lay down there declaring that they had left their bodies as food for the birds; and birds and wild beasts ate up their beautiful bodies. Because of this life of renunciation, they attained salvation. (Kathāśarītīgāra, Madana-mājukilambaka, Taranīga 2).

Kṛta II. A Viśvadeva (Universal Deva). (Amuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 31).

Kṛtacetās. A great sage of ancient days. (Vana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 22).

Kṛtadhvaja. A King of Janaka's dynasty. (See under Vaṁśāvali).

Kṛtadyuti. Queen of King Citraketu. Though the King had many wives he had no children. He pleased Āngiras by means of his austerities and due to the latter's blessing Kṛtadyuti delivered a son. But, her co-wives poisoned the child to death at which both Citraketu and Kṛtadyuti fell down unconscious. Though Āngiras and Nārada appeared on the scene and tried their best to console the King and the queen they refused to be comforted. Then Āngiras returned to them the soul of the dead child. The soul saluted them and spoke as follows:- "Oh elders, during various births I had been the son of various parents. And, you please point out to me the particular parent as whose son I am to live just now." Nobody had any answer to this question, and the child went on its own way.

Afterwards Citraketu and Kṛtadyuti went round the earth as great devotees of the Almighty, and during this perambulation Citraketu came to the presence of Śiva on whose thigh Pārvatī was sitting then. Citraketu felt ashamed at the sight and questioned Pārvatī about her action whereupon she cursed and turned Citraketu into an Asura. The well known Vṛtrāsura was Citraketu thus reborn. Kṛtadyuti ended her life following the curse upon her husband. (Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

Kṛtagni. See under Dhanāśarma.

Kṛtagni. A King of the Yadu dynasty. Descended from Yadu thus: Sahasrājīt-Satajīt-Heheyā-Dharmā—Kuntī—Bhadrasena—Dhanaka—Kṛtagni. Kṛtagni was the brother of Kṛtvārīya, who was the father of Kṛtvārīyārjuna. Kṛtvārīya had three brothers called Kṛtvāni, Kṛtvārvān and Kṛtvāujas. (Kṛtyus).

Kṛtaksana. A King of Videha, who was a member in Yudhiṣṭhira's court. He made a present of fourteen thousand horses to Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śaṅbh Parva).

Kṛtamaḷā. The river in which Mahāviṣṇu first appeared as fish. (See under Matsyāvātāra).

Kṛtarpava. A King of the Yadava dynasty. (See under Yadava Varṣiṇī).

Kṛtaśaucam. A holy centre in Kuruksetra. He who bathes here will derive the benefits of conducting a Puṇḍarīka Yajñā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 21).

Kṛtāṣrama. A great sage, who had distinguished himself in the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. He lived a life of renunciation as a Vānaprastha and attained heaven. (Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 244, Verse 18).

Kṛtāśva. A great sage of ancient days. He was the son-in-law of Daśakṣaprajāpatī. Daśa had sixty daughters by his wife Vīraṇī, thirteen of whom were wedded to Kaśyapa, ten to Dharmā, twenty-seven to Candara, two to Bhṛgu, four to Arīśanemi, two to Kṛtāśva and two to Aṅgiras. (Devī Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

Kṛtajñas. See under Kṛtagni.

Kṛtāvāk. A great sage, who was an admirer of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Vana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 24).

Kṛtavāmra. A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. In the previous generation of Vṛṣṇi also a Kṛtvārman is noticed. The genealogy of both is given below.

Dhanaka had four sons called Kṛtvārīya, Kṛtvāni, Kṛtvārvān and Kṛtvāujas, and one of the four was the first Kṛtvārman.

Hṛṣīka had four sons, viz. Devāvāha, Gadaḥvan, Kṛtvārman and Śūra. And, Śūra begot of his wife, Māriṇā ten sons, i.e. Vasu, Devabhāga, Devāvāha, Anaka, Śrījaya, Kākānīka, Śyāmaka, Vatsa, Kavūka and Vasudeva. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was the son of Vasudeva. The Kṛtvārman referred to below was the brother of Kṛṣṇa's grand-father.

2) Kṛtvārman and Syamantakā. King Satrājīt had in his possession the famous gem called Syamantakā. The King's brother Prasena, went for hunting with this jewel on him. A lion killed Prasena, and Jāmbavān killed the lion and got the gem. A scandal was circulated to the effect that Śrī Kṛṣṇa had stolen the gem. But, Kṛṣṇa got back the gem from Jāmbavān and handed it over.
to Sastra, who in turn, gave his daughter Satyabhama in marriage to Krsna. Though Sastra wanted to give the gem—Syamantaka—to Krsna as dowry, the latter did not accept it.

Akrura and Krtavarman were bosom friends, and they incited another Yadava King Satadhanava, to grab the Syamantaka. Satadhanava killed Sastra and took possession of the gem. Hearing about this murder Sri Krsna and Balabhadra set out to kill Satadhanava, who, in great alarm, started for north after entrusting the gem to Akrura and Krtavarman. His horse died at Mithilapuri and he began running. Balabhadra and Krsna ran after him, caught and killed him. But, they did not get the Syamantaka.

Now Akrura and Krtavarman began their penance at Kasi. Seven years passed thus when famine broke out in Dwarka. When once upon a time famine stalked Kasi the king had brought Svapthaka, father of Akrura, over to Kasi, and there was no more famine in the country. Therefore, when famine broke out in Dwarka the Yadavas thought the presence of Svapthaka's son, Akrura would dispel the famine. Accordingly Akrura was recalled to Dwarka, and along with him returned Krtavarman also. Sri Krsna and Balabhadra decided that Syamantaka should be kept by Akrura himself.

3) Other Information relating to Krtavarman.

(i) He was a very famous archer. (Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 81).
(ii) He was a great devotee of Sri Krsna. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 105).
(iii) He was present at the Svayamvara of Panchali. (Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 18).
(iv) He had once gone to Khandaqvaparvata with presents to Subhadra. (Adi Parva, Chapter 220, Verse 31).
(v) He was a member in the court of Yudhisthira. (Sabhava Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 30).
(vi) He was one of the seven Maharathas in the Vrsi dynasty, the other six being Sri Krsna, Caturdeksa, Saineya, Cakraidea, Pradyumna and Samba.
(vii) He was present at the marriage of Abhimanyu at Upaplayanagara (Viraja Parva, Chapter 72, Verse 21).
(viii) The Pandyas invited him to war against the Kauravas. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 12).
(ix) As demanded by Duruyodhana he contributed an Akshauhinji (a particular division of army) to the Kaurava forces (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 32).
(x) As ordered by Sairyaki he stationed himself at the city gates to protect Krsna. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 10).
(xi) On the first day of the great war he fought a duel with Sairyaki. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 12).
(xii) Abhimanyu wounded him. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).
(xiii) He was posted at the head of the Kauravas to set up by Bhisma. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 17).
(xiv) Bhumasena defeated him. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 61).
(xv) Sairyaki wounded him. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 16).
(xvi) A duel was fought between him and Dhristadyumna. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 110, Verse 9).
(xviii) He fought with Arjuna, Bhma and Sairyaki.

KRTAVARMĀ 431

KRTAYUGA. There are four Yugas (Eras) called Kṛta, Treta, Dvapara and Kali yugas. (For the set up etc. of the Yugas see under Manvantara).

In the first Yuga, i.e. Kṛta yuga, people will be quite righteous. As the Yugas change righteousness will fade out in increasing measure till the world will be filled with unrighteousness and evil by the time it is Kaliyuga. When Kaliyuga is completed Mahāviṣṇu will incarnate himself as Kalki and wipe out unrighteousness and establish Kṛtyuga once again.

KRTAYUS (KRTAUJAS). A brother of Kṛtāgni. (Sec under KRTAGNI).

KRTAYU. A king born in the Ānā dynasty.
KRTI I. A Sage who belonged to the order of the disciple of Vedavyāsa. Jaimini was the disciple of Vyāsa, and Sumanu the son of Jaimini. Sumanu had a son called Sutヴィ, and Sukarmā was the son of the latter. He had two disciples called Hiranyanābha alias Kausalya and Pauspinī. Kṛti was a disciple of Hiranyanābha, and he composed twenty-four Samhitās for the Śāmaveda and taught them to his disciples. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 6).

KRTI II. A saintly King who flourished in the court of Yamarāja. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 9).

KRTI IV. A synonym of Mahāviśnu. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 22).

KRTI V. A King of Sūkaradeśa. He presented hundred elephants to Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 25).

KRTI VI. A son of Nahuṣa. Nahuṣa had five other sons called Yatī, Yaṇāī, Śāṃśuṣā, Ayāī and Vīṣyā. Kṛti was the sixth son and the youngest of the lot.

KRTTIKĀ I. When Subrahmapya was born the Devas deputed six mothers to breast-feed him, and they are called Kṛttikās. Certain Purāṇas hold the view that six faces were caused to Subrahmapya as he had to feed on six breasts at the same time while others opine that six mothers were deputed to feed him as he was born with six faces. Again, according to certain Purāṇas it was Pārvatī, who deputed the Kṛttikās. The child came to be known as Kṛttikīsena also as it was fed by the Kṛttikās. (Skanda Purāṇa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 37 and Kathāsārītāsāgara. Lāvānakālambaka, Tarāṅga 6).

After having fed Skanda the Kṛttikās entered into the sphere of the stars. (Vana Parva, Chapter 236, Verse 11). The star into which the Kṛttikās entered is called the Kṛttikā star. Nārada said once that if one feeds brahmínis with ghee and pudding on Kṛttikā day one may ascend to Devaloka. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 5).

KRTTIKĀ II. A holy place. He who bathes here will derive the benefits of performing an Atriātra Yajñā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 51).

KRTTIKĀNGĀRAKA. A holy centre. He who bathes here and observes fast for two weeks will be absolved from sins. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 22).

KRTTIKĀŚRAMA. A holy centre. One who bathes here and worships the Pītris will be absolved from sins. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 22).

KRTTIVĀSÉVARA. See under Siva.

KRTVĪ. Kṛtīrī alias Kiritimati was the daughter of sage Śukā. Anuha, born in the family of Ajamīdhā, married Kṛtīrī, and Brahmadatta was their son.

KRTYĀ (KRTYAKĀ) I. A Rāķgāsi who is born when the black arts as enunciated in the Athsarveda are practised to annihilate enemies. Kṛtyā may appear in male form too. Some of the activities of Kṛtyā are given below.

(1) Carried off Durvōdhaṇa. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in exile in the forest, Durvōdhaṇa and others went in a procession to the forest. Though Durvōdhaṇa was taken into captivity in the forest by a Gāndharva, Arjuna saved him out of fraternal consideration for him. Durvōdhaṇa returned to Hastināpura. Now the question was: whether half of the kingdom should be given to the Pāṇḍavas or not. Śakuni and others advised Durvōdhaṇa to give it, but the latter remained adamantly against it. Dhṛtarāṣṭra decided to end his life and for the purpose spread darbha grass on earth and sat thereon. The Asuras heard about these developments and created a Kṛtyā by mantras. The Kṛtyā took Durvōdhaṇa to Pāṭalī where the Asuras advised him against any compromise with the Pāṇḍavas. On the other hand they wanted him to intensify his hatred against the Pāṇḍavas, and they assured him all support. After that Kṛtyā took Durvōdhaṇa back to Hastināpura. (Vana Parva, Chapter 252).

(2) Kṛtyā born under the name Madana. Devendra once prevented the Aśvinīdevas from drinking Soma juice. (Devas drink a liquid-liquor extracted from the soma creeper, during yajñās, and that is called Somapāṇa). Agrieved at the orders of Indra the Aśvinīdevas wandered about the world in the course of which they approached sage Cyavana of the Bhāṛgava family. They restored sight to the blind Cyavana, who, in return, assured them that he would see to it that they got the right of drinking soma juice. Cyavana began a Yajña and Indra came for Somapāṇa. The sage invited the Aśvinīdevas also for Somapāṇa. Indra prevented them from doing so, and the sage opposed him. Then Indra drew his Vājrayudha against Cyavana. The sage made Indra’s hands paralysed. Further, he raised from the Yājñīc fire a Kṛtyā which appeared in male form under the name Madana. Sharp molar teeth hundred yojanas long, other teeth each ten yojana long, hands ten thousand yojanas long and as big as mountains, round eyes like the Sun and Moon, mouth spitting fire—such was Madana, the Kṛtyā, a really terrible being. Frightened at the sight of the terrible being Indra permitted the Aśvinīdevas to drink Soma.

(3) Kṛtyā against Ambariṣa. Ambariṣa once began the Ekādaśī Vrata and the Devas deputed Durvōsas to obstruct it somehow or other. Durvōsas came to Ambariṣa, who requested him to return after bath. But, though the vrata was over the sage did not return and Ambariṣa fed the Devas with the offerings (havis). Immediately after that Durvōsas returned and complained that what he was given was the left-overs of the havis. By means of black art he created a Kṛtyā, who charged against Ambariṣa’s throat. Ambariṣa prayed and the Sūdārṣaṇa Cakra of Viśṇu appeared and killed the Kṛtyā and drove Durvōsas round the three worlds. At last the sage sought refuge with Ambariṣa himself and thus saved himself. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

(4) Kṛtyā opposed Śrī Kṛṣṇa. While Kṛṣṇa was ruling Dwārakā, Paunḍrakavāsudeva was the King of Karuṣa. Once he sent a messenger to ask Kṛṣṇa to go and bow down before him as he was the real Vāsudeva. Enraged at this insolent demand Kṛṣṇa cut off Paunḍraka’s head with the Sūdārṣaṇa Cakra. The dead King’s son, Sudakṣiṇa, to gather power enough to fight Kṛṣṇa went to Kāśi and performed penance to please Śiva. Śiva appeared and taught him the method of creating Kṛtyā. Accordingly he created from fire, a Kṛtyā, who dashed against Kṛṣṇa roaring like hell. Kṛṣṇa used the Sūdārṣaṇa Cakra, which burnt to death not only the Kṛtyā, but also Sudakṣiṇa.
(5) Kṛtyā against Prahlāda. To change the nature of Prahlāda, a great devotee of Viṣṇu, his father Hiranyakāśipu deputed Asura preceptors. But, severe punishments like poisoning, throwing into fire etc. did not succeed in changing the devotee’s character. At last, the preceptors raised Kṛtyā from fire. The Śūlam, which Kṛtyā thrust against the throat of Prahlāda was broken into hundreds of pieces. Kṛtyā then got angry and turned against the preceptors, who had sent her against Prahlāda. The preceptors fell down unconscious on the verge of death. But, Prahlāda touched their bodies and they became alive again. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 18).

Kṛtyā II. A river. Indians used to drink water from this river. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9 Verse 18).

Kṛūrā (KRODHĀ). A daughter of Prajāpati Dakṣa. She became the wife of Kaśyapa. A large number of Asuras were born to her. They all were very cruel and were called Krodhavāsas. (Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 32).

Kṛūra. A country in Ancient India. (Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 65).

Kṣa (s). This letter means (1) Kṣatriya (2) field (3) Nārāśimha (the lion-man incarnation of Viṣṇu) (4) Hari (Viṣṇu) (5) protector of temples and gate keeper. (6) Lightning (7) Destruction (8) A demon.

Kṣāmā. Wife of Prajāpati Pulaha. Three sons Kardama, Urvārīyān and Saṁhītū were born to Pulaha of his wife Kṣāmā. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Aini’a 1, Stanza 10).

Kṣamākya. A King of the Puru dynasty. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

Kṣatradeva. The son of Śiṅhachāṇḍa. He was a famous archer. Bhagadatta wounded the right hand of Kṣatradeva in the Bhrārat-battle. He fought with Laksmana and Draṇa. Laksmana killed him. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapters 57 and 171; Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 95; Draṇa Parva, Chapters 14, 21 and 23; Karṇa Parva, Chapter 6).

Kṣatriya. See under Cāturvarṇya.

Kṣatta. I. Vidura.

Kṣatta. II. See under the word Varṇa.

Kṣemā. A celestial maid. This celestial maid took part in the birth celebration of Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 66).

Kṣema. A King in Ancient India. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 65, that this King was the rebirth of the Asura Krodhavāsa. In the Bhrārata-battle this King took the side of the Pāṇḍavas and was killed by Draṇa. (M.B. Draṇa Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 53).

Kṣemārāsi. A King of Kosala. There is a story in the Mahābhārata stating how the hermit Kālakavrśīya saved this King from the trap laid by his favourites. The treasury-keeper spent the money of the King lavishly on himself. The subjects began to consider how to inform the King about this. Finally the hermit Kālakavrśīya began to travel throughout the country with a crow kept in a cage. As if the crow was speaking, the hermit began to tell the past, present and future fortunes of the people. The crow became famous and people began to have faith in the crow. Once Kālakavrśīya and the crow reached the palace and under the pretence that the crow was speaking, the hermit disclosed all the secret dealings of the treasury-keeper. The servants of the King stealthily put the crow to death that night. When the King knew this he made Kālakavrśīya the minister and the country began to prosper. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 82).

On another occasion the treasury of the King Kṣema-arśi became empty. At this time King Janaka had come to war with this King. According to the sincere advice of Kālakavrśīya the King married the daughter of King Janaka. From that day onwards his country became prosperous. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 106).

Kṣemādhūrti. I. A Kṣatriya King of Ancient India. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 64 that this King was born from a portion of the Asura called Krodha. The King ruled over the country called Kūlūta. In the battle of Bhrārata he fought on the side of the Kauravas and was killed by Bhūmasena. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 44).

Kṣemādhūrti II. A King who took the side of the Kauravas. This King who was the brother of Bhṛṅgata, fought with Śaṭyakī in the Bhrārata battle. (M.B. Śālīya Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 8).

Kṣemādhūrti III. A warrior. He fought with Bhṛṅgata and died in the fight. (M.B. Draṇa Parva, Chapter 107, Stanza 6).

Kṣemāgiri. Another name of Bhadrakāli (a goddess). In Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 12, it is mentioned that Āryā, Durgā, Vedagarbha, Ambikā, Bhadrakāli, Bhadrā, Kṣemāyā and Naikababā are also synonyms of Bhadrakāli.

Kṣemaka I. A Rākṣasa (giant). In Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 2, it is mentioned that this Rākṣasa had lived in Kāśi and that the King Divodāsa killed this Rākṣasa and built a city there.

Kṣemaka II. A serpent (Nāga) born to Kaśyapa-prajāpati of his wife Kadrū. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 11).

Kṣemaka III. A King who was a luminary in the palace of Yudhishṭhira. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 24, that the Pāṇḍavas had sent invitation to this King for the battle of Bhrārata.

Kṣemamūrti. I. A son of Dhrītarāṣṭra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 100).

Kṣemāṅkara. A King who was the friend of Jayadratha. This King ruled over the country of Trigarta. Nakula killed this King. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 265 and 275).

Kṣemāśarma. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Kṣemāśarma stood and fought at the neck of the Gauḍavāyuḥā (the formation of the army. into the shape of an eagle) made by Karṇa. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 20, Stanza 6).

KSEMAVĀHA. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 66).

KSEMAVṛDDHI. The minister of King Sālva. He was both minister and general of the army at the same time. Sāmba, the son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa defeated Ksema-vṛddhi. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 16).

KSETRA (S). Sacred spots. In Malayālam it means Temples also.

1) General information. The temples of India are reflections of the outward form or body of man. As the soul lives in the body of man, God dwells in the temples. The stone, rock, marble, metals etc. are equal to the bones of the body of a man.

2) Two types of temples. Temples are of two types. One type is the Grāmadevātā temples. These are temples in which goddess Bhadrakāli is consecrated and worshipped for the protection of villages and cities. The second type is of special temples. These are temples specially meant for a particular god or goddess. Thus there are temples for Viṣṇu, Śiva, Gaṅapatī and so on.

3) Grāmadevātā temples. Worship of Bhadrakāli existed in India from very early times. When Mahanjanodaro and Harappa were excavated idols of Devī (goddess) more than 4000 years old, were obtained from there. During the prevalence of Buddhism in India the goddesses Yakṣi and Hārīti were worshipped in India. Later when Hinduism was revived these goddesses took their places in it as the goddesses of Hindu Purāṇas and epics. The Kāli temples of Ujjainī and Calcutta are famous. In the Cidambaram temple also the main deity is Kāli. The legend is that Paramaśiva defeated Kāli in a dance. In Mysore Cāmūṇḍi (Kāli) is worshipped as chief goddess or family goddess. Kāmākṣi in Kannē, Mūnākṣi in Madura (South India), Mūkambikā in North Ċaṇḍīkā and so on are the gentle and peaceful forms of Kāli.

4) Devas (gods). In many of the temples in South India, Munīśvaran and Karuppan are the grāmadevātā (village gods). In some places Bhairava also is worshipped as grāmadevātā. In certain other places Vīraṇ, Iruḷan, Kāreṭṭi, Nōṇḍi and Paṇcarulī are worshipped. Sāṭā or Ayyappan has a prominent place among the village gods. Importance is attached to Sāṭā or Ayyappan mostly in Kerala and Tamil Nādu.

KSETRAPĀLA. Kṣetrapāla is consecrated on the South East corner of the temple, for protecting the villages and cities. This is a large image with three eyes. There are figures which are Sāttvikā, Rājasa and Tāmasa (having the attributes goodness, ostentatiousness and sloth). In some places figures having two or four or eight hands are seen. It is presumed that this deity is a portion of Śiva. It is stated in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51 that Kṣetrapālas should be figures having trident in the hand.

KŚIRASĀGARA. Sea of Milk. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, that Brahmā drank too much of Amṛta and vomited. From the vomit the cow Surabhi came into being. The milk of Surabhi flowed and collected into a sea. This sea is called the milk-sea or Kśirasāgara.

KŚIRAVATI. A holy bath. Those who bathe in this holy bath will obtain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Vājapeya. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84).

KŚIRIN. A tree in the family of the Uttara Kurus. This tree has six tastes. Milk flows ceaselessly from this tree. It is said that from the fruit of this tree we could get cloth, ornaments etc. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 7).

KŚITIKAMPANA. A captain of the army of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 59).

KŚUDRAKĀ. There was a country known as Kṣudrakā in Ancient India. Those who inhabited this country were called Kṣudrakās. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 52 that the Kṣudrakās had brought gifts to Dharma Putra. In the battle of Bhārata Duryodhena protected Śakuni with the help of the Kṣudrakās. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 16). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 19 that the Kṣudrakās attacked Arjuna at the behest of Bhīṣma. Many Kṣudrakās were killed when Paraśu-rāma exterminated the Kṣatriyas. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 70).

KṢUPA I. A Prajāpati. There is a story about the birth of this Prajāpati in Mahābhārata. Once Brahmā wished to perform a sacrifice. But he could not get suitable priest as the performer of the sacrifice. So Brahmā decided to create a befitting person as Rtvik (the priest who does the rituals of the sacrifice) and he got pregnant in his head. After a thousand years he sneezed and a Prajāpati came out of the head of Brahmā. That Prajāpati was Kṣupa. He made Kṣupa his Rtvik. (Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 122). Rudra Bhagāvān made him Prajāpati (the Lord of all subjects).

KṢUPA II. A King who was the son of Prasandhi and the grandson of Vaivavasata Manu. He was the father of Iksvāku. In Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, it is mentioned that Kṣupa stayed in the Palace of Yama after his death. In Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 166 it is stated that this King had received a sword directly from Vaivavasata Manu. Kṣupa was not in the habit of eating flesh. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 159, Stanza 67).

KṢURAKARMI. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 25).

KUBERA.

2) Birth. Pulastya Prajāpati wedded Mānini alias Hāvīr-bhū, daughter of sage Tṛṇabindu, and a son called Viṣṇavas was born to them, Viṣṇavas married Ilibilā alias Daivavārṇini, daughter of Bhaḍravājā. Rāvaṇa Kumbhakarṇa and Vībhīṣaṇa were the sons of Viṣṇavas by another wife. (Refer to the genealogy of Rāvaṇa). Viṣṇavas was childless for long, and the above mentioned four sons were the fruits of the boon granted him by Brahmā, whom he pleased by austerities. (For details see under Viṣṇavas, Para 1).

3) Kubera’s attainment of eminence. Once during Kṛtya-yuga the Devas went to Varuṇa, and after performing a Yajña for Kubera they told him thus: ‘In future you live in the ocean itself as deva of all rivers, and let the ocean and the rivers obey you. As in the case of the moon you too will experience waxing and waning.” From that day onwards Kubera became the lord of oceans, rivers, streams etc. and all of them together gave him immense wealth. Śiva became a particular friend of Kubera. (Sālya Parva, Chapter 47).

4) Kubera in Lankā. Afterwards Kubera performed penance for ten thousand years in water with head submerged, to please Brahmā. Yet, Brahmā did not appear. Then he performed penance standing on one foot in the centre of Pañcagni. Brahmā appeared and asked him to choose any boon. Kubera requested that he might be made a lokapālaka (protector of the universe) and the custodian of wealth, and Brahmā responded by supplying Kubera the treasures Saṅkhaśidhi and Padmanidhi and also the Puspaka Vimāna as vehicle. He was also appointed one of the Aṣṭadikpālakas. (Indra, Agni, Yama, Nirṛti, Varuna, Vāyu, Kubera and Iśa are the eight protectors of the eight regions). Kubera's city is called Mahodaya.

Kubera felt really happy and told his father Viśravas about his new status and dignity. The father also blessed the son. Kubera requested his father to get a city built for him to live in, and his father asked him to settle down in Lāṅkā built by Maya on top of the mountain Trikūṭa in the middle of the south sea. From that day onwards Kubera took his abode in Lāṅkā. (It was originally built for Indra).

5) Old history of Lankā. Once upon a time when Brahmā was repeating the Vedas he felt hungry. He was annoyed that at that untimely hour he should have felt hungry, and from his angry face emerged the Rākṣasas called Heti. From his hunger emerged the Yakṣa called Praheti. The Rākṣasas turned out to be an unrighteous being, and the Yakṣa a righteous person. Heti married Bhayā, daughter of Kāla, and a son Vidyutkēśa was born to them, who wedded Sālakaṭaṅkā, daughter of Sandhyā. To them were born a child, whom they forsook in the valley of mountain Manthara and went their own way. Śiva and Pārvatī came that way just then, saw the forsaken child and blessed it. At once the child became a youth. Śiva named him Śukesa, and he married Devavatī, the daughter of a Gandharva called Maṇjimaya. To them were born three sons called Mālyavān, Sumālī, and Māli. Thanks to the blessings of Śiva all of them became youths as soon as they were born. By means of penances they secured from Brahmā the boon to conquer the three worlds. They then returned to their father. They did not relish the advice of their father to lead a righteous life. They went round the three worlds harassing people. Maya built for them the city called Lāṅkā on the top of the Mountain Trikūṭa.

There is a story about the origin of Trikūṭa. Once a controversy arose between Vāsuki and Vāyuybhagavāṇ as to who was the greater of the two. To prove that he was greater than Vāyu, Vāsuki enveloped with his body mountain Mahāmeru so that Vāyu (wind) could not enter it, and Vāyu tried to blow off the mountain with the result that a dust storm concealed the whole world from view. The Devas took refuge in Viṣṇu, who pacified Vāsuki, and he then unwound one coil round the mountain. Vāyu took advantage of the opportunity and swept off one peak of the mountain to the South into the sea, and that peak is Trikūṭa.

Mālyavān, Sumālī and Māli settled down in Lāṅkā, and they married Sundari, Ketumati and Vasudhā, the three daughters of Narmāda, a Gandharva woman. Seven sons called Vaṭramuṣṭi, Viśūpākṣa, Durmukha, Suptaghna Yajītakōśa, Matī and Unmatī and a daughter called Nālā were born to Mālyavān and Sundari. Ten sons called Prahasta, Akampa, Viṣṇa-kā, Kālakāmukha, Dhūmrākṣa, Daṇḍa, Supārśva, Saṁhirā, Prakāṇa and Bhāṣakarṇa and four daughters called Vekā, Puspotkāṭa, Kaṅkaśi and Kumbhūnasī were born to Śiva and Ketumati. Seven sons born to Anāla, Anīla, Aha and Sampāṭī (these four were the ministers of Viśvīṣṭa) were born to Māli and Vasudhā.

When the harassments of the Rākṣasas became unbearable, the Devas sought protection from Śiva, and Indra detailed to him about the unrighteous actions of Mālyavān, Sumālī and Māli. Śiva directed the Devas to Viṣṇu, who set out, to fight against the Rākṣasas. Māli cut at Garuḍa, and Viṣṇu killed him (Māli) with his Sudarśana Cakra. The other Rākṣasas retreated to Lāṅkā. As their presence in Lāṅkā was dangerous to the Devas, Viṣṇu directed the Sudarśana Cakra to go to Lāṅkā every day and kill the Rākṣasas in groups. The Cakra began its work, and the remaining Rākṣasas escaped to Pātāla. Lāṅkā became thus deserted and Kubera took his abode there. The Yaksas, born from the hunger of Brahmā roamed about without a leader and ultimately settled down in Lāṅkā under the leadership of Kubera. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

6) Kubera left Lankā. The other sons of Viśravas like Rāvaṇa returned with boons from Brahmā for the conquest of the earth, and the first thing Rāvaṇa did was to drive away his brother Kubera from Lāṅkā. He also took by force the Puspaka Vimāna of Kubera, who cursed Rāvaṇa thus: "This will never be your vehicle, but will become that of his, who kills you."

Kubera, with the Yakṣas, Kinnaras etc. went north and settled on mount Gandhamādana. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275).

7) Kubera's sabhā. The assembly hall of Kubera is 100 yojanas in length and 100 yojanas wide. High walls surround the city. In the centre of the city is a beautiful mansion studded with gems where Kubera sits surrounded by thousands of women. Māruta Deva carrying fragrance from Kalpavṛkṣa worships him. Gandharvas and Apsārās women entertain Kubera with music. Miśrakeśa, Rambha, Menaka, Urvāśi, Citrasena, Sucismitā, Gṛhṭaci, Puṇḍjakasthalī, Viśvāच, Sahahayanī, Pramloci, Vargcī, Saurabhcyī, Samicī, Budbudā, and Latā are among them, Maṇiṣhadra (Maṇiṣhadra), Dhanaḍa, Aśvata, Bhadra, Ghuhyaka, Kaśeraka, Gaṇḍakancu, Pradyota, Mahābala, Ka, Tumburu, Piśāca, Gaṇakarṇa, Viśāla, Varāhakarṇa, Tamroṣṭha, Galakacca, Halodaka Hamsaṇcita, Saṅkhāvartt, Hemantra, Viśvīṣṭa, Puspānana, Pingalaka, Sopītoda, Pravālaka, Vṛkṣābāpaniketa, Citravasas and Nalakabara are the chief members in the court of Kubera. Śiva, a good friend of Kubera, very often visits him. Gandharvas and sages like Viśvavasū, Hāha, Hūha, Parvata, Tumburu and Saḷīṣa live in Kubera's assembly. Nārada told Dharmaputra that the Kuberasabhā was thus always sweet and pleasant. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10).

8) Fight between Kubera and Rāvaṇa. Kubera got secret information that the Devas and the brahmins had decided jointly to complain to Mahāviṣṇu about their unbearable harassment by Rāvaṇa. He sent a messenger to his brother Rāvaṇa warning him to lead a more righteous life. Rāvaṇa got so much enraged at the advice of his brother that he cut the messenger into pieces and served as food to the Rākṣasas.

Rāvana mobilised his army against Kubera and the Devas, and decided first to attack Kubera. At the head of a huge army led by heroes like Mahādara, Praheasta, Mārdaka, Sukha, Sāraña, Vajradāmśā, Dhūmāraka, Virūpākṣa, Yūpākṣa, Mahāphāra, Mātra, Unmatta, Vikaṣa, Suptaghīna, Yajñāntaka, Makara, Kumbhākaṇa, Atikāyaka and Aṣakaumāra, Rāvana marched to Alakāpūri where a fierce battle ensued between Rāvana’s and Kubera’s armies. Many Yaksas were killed by Rāvana’s army, and the Yaka hero Manicara killed a large number of Rākṣasas. As a last resort Rāvana thrashed Manicara on the head with a club and this turned the hair on his head to one side. From that day Manicara came to be known as Pārvamauli (head turned to one side). In the fight that followed between Kubera and Rāvana the former fell down unconscious. But, the Yaksas brought two Vimānas and carried Kubera to the palace. Rāvana plundered Kubera’s palace and carried off to Laiākā a lot of costly gems and other wealth. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

9) Kubera became a Chameleon. King Marutta once performed a Mahēsvara yajña to which were invited Indra, Varuṇa, Kubera and Kāla. While the yajña was progressing Rāvana came that way with his army. Indra and the others, in great fear, ran away and escaped disguised in various forms, Kubera assuming the form of a chameleon. After resuming his own form Kubera gave the Chameleon the gift to change its colour. It was further blessed that to the onlookers it would seem that there was gold on its cheeks. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

10) Kubera cursed Virūpākṣa. Kubera had a yakṣa called Virūpākṣa as Manager, and he was in charge of Kubera’s treasures also. Virūpākṣa had employed a gigantic yakṣa to look after the treasures outside the capital. One day a brahmin called Pāṣupata came in search of treasures to Alakāpūrī. He knew a very peculiar art, viz. he would go about with a lamp lighted with ‘the ghee of men’ (oily substance extracted from human body) and the lamp wouldumble down from his hands on earth exactly on spots where treasures lay hidden. Pāṣupata tried to unearth Kubera’s treasures by the above means, and Virūpākṣa who got scent of the brahmin’s activities got him killed. Since a brahmin (Pāṣupata) was killed the sin of brahmanatya affected the Yakṣa community, and angered at this Kubera cursed Virūpākṣa into a man, and he was born on earth as the son of a brahmin. Virūpākṣa’s wife complained about this curse to Kubera, who told her that she would be born as a daughter of the maid-servant of the brahmin as whose son her husband was born, and that he (son) would marry her. Kubera, further told her that association with her would redeem Virūpākṣa from the curse and that both of them would return to him. Accordingly she lay as a human child at the gates of brahmin maid-servant, who took it to her master. The child and the brahmin’s son grew up together in his father’s house, and in due course they were wedded to each other. They felt so happy as though at a reunion after a long separation. First the brahmin boy and after him his wife expired, and they returned to Alakāpūrī. (Kathāsārītaśāgara).

11) Kubera and emperor Prthu. While emperor Prthu was ruling the land in the best interests of his subjects, mountains, trees, Devas, Asuras, Saptarasī, Rākṣasas etc. came to the earth and sang his praises, and as ordered by the emperor the earth turned itself into a cow and they milked her. It was Kubera who served as calf when the Rākṣasas began to milk the cow. (Drona Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 24).

The Devas crowned Prthu as emperor, and, on that occasion imperial symbols were presented to him. The throne was presented by Kubera; the royal umbrella by Varuṇa; the crown by Indra and the sceptre by Yama. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha Chapter 15, Verses 14 and 15).

12) Kubera cursed Tumburu. The Yakṣa called Tumburu once displeased Kubera, who cursed him into a Rākṣasa. He was to be redeemed from the curse on his death at the hands of Śrī Rāma. Tumburu, who was born as Virādha, the Rākṣasa in Daṇḍakāranya attacked Rāma and Lakṣmana during their stay in exile in the forest and was killed by them. He was cremated in the forest. He resumed his former form as Tumburu and returned to Kubera’s palace. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Aranya Kānda, Canto 4).

13) Kubera became Piṅgalākṣa. Kubera once looked with jealousy at Pārvatī seated on the left thigh of Śiva, and therefore, he became blind in one eye. When Pārvatī regained her equanimity she turned that eye of Kubera into yellow in colour so that he might always remember the incident. Henceforth Kubera came to be known as Ekapīṅgala.

14) Agastya cursed Kubera. Kubera also was invited to the chanting of mantras held by the Devas at Kuśāvati. Kubera was on his way to Kuśāvati with Maṇīmān when the latter sat on the head of Agastya, who was performing penance on the banks of river Kālindi. Agastya cursed them thus:—“Oh Kubera, your attendant Maṇīmān has insulted me. Therefore, he himself and the army will be killed by a man. You will grieve over their death. But, you will be absorbed from this curse at the sight of the man, who had killed Maṇīmān and his army.”

Bhumasena, who went to mount Gandhamādā in search of the Saguṇḍhika flower could kill Maṇīmān and his soldiers because of this curse of Agastya. After killing Maṇīmān, Bhumā saw Kubera in person, and the latter got absorbed from the curse. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161).

15) Other information about Kubera. (i) He comforted the Pāṇḍavas once during their life in exile in the forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 41).

(ii) During the war with Rāvana when Śrī Rāma fainted on the field, it was the water, purified by mantras, which Kubera sent through the Yakṣa, Guhıyaka, which brought Rāma back to consciousness. (Vana Parva, Chapter 289, Verse 9).

(iii) Kubera once cursed the Yakṣa called Sthūna-karṇa. He went to live in forest. Ambā the woman became a male by getting the penis of Sthūna-karṇa. (See under Ambā and Sthūna-karṇa).

(iv) Sukrācārya once gave Kubera a lot of wealth. (Bliśma Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 23).

(v) A King called Mucukunda once fought with Kubera. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 74, Verse 4). See under Mucukunda.
(vi) Sukra once carried off all the wealth of Kubera, who complained to Siva about it. Siva, in anger, raised his śūla, when Sukra stood on its top and pressed it down. Siva threw Sukra off, but he fell into the palms of Siva who threw him again. Sukra then entered the stomach of Siva and roamed about there finding no path to get out. Siva waited with the śūla to kill Sukra the moment he came out of his (Siva’s) stomach. Sukra came out as Siva’s son, and Pārvatī prevented Siva from killing Sukra on the plea that it was not proper to kill one’s own son. Sukra thus escaped and Kubera lost some of his wealth. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 289).

(vii) On another occasion Kubera entertained sage Aṣṭāvakra. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 37).

(viii) Kubera should be installed in temples as seated on a goat with club in his hand. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

(ix) The name of Kubera’s wife was Bhadrā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 198, Verse 6).

(x) Kubera is called Nāravāha as also he rides in a vehicle drawn by men. He is also called Rājārājā, as he is King of Kings. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 275, Verses 1-3).

(xi) Viṣṇu got angry with Kubera, and from that day he deputed three Rākṣasa girls to serve his father. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verses 1-3).

(xii) Synonyms for Kubera used in Mahābhārata. Alakādhipā, Dhanada, Dhanadeśvara, Dhanagoptā, Dhanādhipā, Dhanādhipati, Dhanādhyakṣa, Dhanesvara, Dhanapati, Dhanes, Dravinapati, Gaddāhara, Guhyakādhipā, Guhyakādhipati, Kaiśāsanilaya, Nāravāhāna, Nidhipā, Paunasya, Rājārājā, Rājārāj, Rākṣasādhipati, Rākṣasasvarā, Vaiśāravāna, Vittagoptā, Vittapati, Vīteṣa, Yakṣādhipati, Yakṣapati, Yakṣapravara, Yakṣarāj, Yakṣarājā, Yakṣarākṣasabhārā, Yakṣarākṣodhipā.

xiii) Kubera’s garden is called Caitrarathā, his son Nalakūbara, his capital Alakā and his mountain-scat Kailāsā.

xiv) Kubera once did tapas for hundred years when Siva appeared and granted him the boon that he would become King of the Yakṣas. (Padma Purāṇa, Ādiśākhaṇḍa Chapter 16).

KUBERATĪRTHA. A holy place on the banks of the river Sarasvatī. Once the Devas appeared to Kubera at this tīrtha and granted him lordship of wealth, friendship of Siva, Deva-hood and rulership of the world. The Marudgaṇas crowned him King. He got the son Nalakūbara also there. This place, thus important in many ways came to be reputed as Kubera-tīrtha in later years. (Sālya Parva, Chapter 97).

KUBHĀ. A river mentioned in the Rgveda. Kubhā, Sindhu, Suvāstu, Vitāstā, Asikī, Parusū, Vipāśā, Sātadrū, Sarasvatī and Yamunā are the important rivers referred to in the Rgveda.

KUBJĀ. An ugly woman about whom the following story is told in Chapter 126, of Uttarakaṇḍa in Padma Purāṇa.

Kubjā became a widow in her very childhood, and she spent eight years in observing auspicious ceremonies. As she took the ‘Māgha bath’ every year she attained salvation. This was the period when Sunda and Upasunda were harassing the world, and to destroy them Kubjā incarnated as Tilottamā and hooked them by her excellent beauty. They fought each other for her hand and got killed. Brahmadeva was pleased at this and granted Kubjā a place in Sūryaloka.

KUBJĀMRAKA. A holy place. A visit to this place is as good as offering a gift of a thousand cows. The visitor will also attain heaven. (Vana Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 40).

KUCELA. Sudāman, better known as Kucela was a brahmīn class-mate of Śrī Kṛṣṇa at the Ārāma of sage Śāndipani. One day Śāndipani’s wife deputed Kucela and Kṛṣṇa to collect fire-wood from the forest, and they had to stay the whole night there as they could not find out the way back to the ārāma due to heavy rain, thunder etc. After their education was over these two thick friends left the ārāma and went their different ways in life. Śrī Kṛṣṇa became the lord of Dvārakā, and Kucela a house-holder with many children, and starvation gripped the family. One day, at the instance of his wife, Kucela started for Dvārakā to visit Kṛṣṇa with a packet of rice flakes as a present to him. Kṛṣṇa received his old classmate most cordially, and ate one handful of rice flakes from the packet brought by Kucela. Rukmini prevented him from a second helping of the flakes. After spending some time most happily with his old friend, Kucela started homewards. Only on his way back did he think that Kṛṣṇa had not given him any monetary help. But, by the time he reached home his old dilapidated house had converted itself into a beautiful mansion, and his wife and children were in great happiness. Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s blessings thus converted poor Kucela into a very rich person. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUJA. Kuja is an individual belonging to the Deva-gaṇa. His weapon is called Śakti. He wears the aksamāla. (Rudrākṣa garland).

KUJRMBHA. A very powerful and valiant Rākṣasa who possessed an iron rod named Sunanda. He had earned the boon that the rod would lose its power only on contact with women. He lived underground in a thick forest on the banks of the river Nīrvindhyā. Once he abducted Mudāvati, the beautiful daughter of Vidurātha, King of Vaishāli. At last Vatsapri, the son of Bhālandana made Mudāvati touch the iron rod of the Asura, which became powerless because of the touch of a woman, and then he (Vatsapri) killed the Asura. Vatsapri then married Mudāvati. (Mārkandeya Purāṇa, Chapter 116).

KUKKURA. A wicked monarch of Piṇḍārakadeśa. He had to be born in Pretayoni (womb of a ghostess) due to his many sins, and once he came to the ārāma of Kahoḍa, and the sage recognised him as his former disciple and absolved him from his ghosthood. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttarakaṇḍa, Chapter 139).

KUKKURA I. A King of the Lunar dynasty, the founder of the Kukkura dynasty.
KUKKURA II. A noble sage who distinguished himself in Dharmaputra's court. (Bhishma Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 19).

KUKKUTIKA. A female attendant of Skanda. (Bhishma Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 15).

KUKUDMIN. A son, Anarta, was born to King Saryati, the son of Vaivasvata Manu. Revata, the famous Rājārshi, who ruled from his capital at Kuśasthali island, was the son of Anarta. Anarta had hundred sons, the eldest being Kukudmin, and also a daughter called Revati. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

KUKURA. (KUKURA). A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. From Vṛṣṇi the descendants are in the following order:—Yudhājī—Śiśi—Satyaka—Satyaki (Yuyudhāṇa)—Jaya—Kuni—Anamitra—Pṛṣṇi—Citraratha—Kukura. As Kukura was a very reputed King his successors were also called Kukuras. The Kṣatriyas of this dynasty were subject to the orders of Sri Kṛṣṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 28). Members of the Kukura and Anandha dynasties became drunkards, and at last quarrelled with one another and died. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 3).

KUKUKI. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Verse 10).

KUKUNA. (M). An urban region in ancient India. (Bhishma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 60).

KUKŚI I. To Śvāyambhuva Manu the son of Brahmā were born two sons called Priyavrata and Uttānapāda by his wife Satārūpā, and Kardama Prājāpati married the daughter of Priyavrata. And, to them were born three sons called Samrāt, Kuṣki and Virāt. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

KUKŚI II. A well-known Asura King. An aspect of this Asura was later born as King Pārvaṭīya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 56).

KULACA. (KULAPARVATA). Kulaparvatas are seven in number, Vīz, Mahendra, Malayā, Sahya, Sūktimān, Rksavān, Vindhya, Pāriyātra. (Bhishma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

KULADHARMA. The moral and ethical codes of conduct, especially with reference to family life. Arjuna told the following about Kuladharmas to Kṛṣṇa at Kuruksetra.

In the decline of a family, its time-honoured usages perish; with the perishing of such rites impiety over-takes the entire family.

With the growth of impiety even the noble women become unchaste, and if women become corrupt, mixture of castes ensues.

Hell is verily the lot of the family and family-destroyers through caste admixture; for, their ancestors fall deprived of balls of rice and libations.

The ever-lasting caste virtues and the family merits get ruined because of the chaos in the caste system.

We have heard that hell is verily the long-lasting abode of the men whose family religious practices have been broken. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 25 and the Gītā).

KULAMPUNA. A river which ought to be daily remembered. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 20).

KULAMPUNA. A holy place. A bath here brings about sanctification of the entire family. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 104).

KULATTHA. A holy centre in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

KULIKA. A prominent serpent born of Kadru. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 41).

KULYA. A Rṣi who belonged to the line of disciples of Vyāsa. (Bhāgavata, 12th Skandha).

KUMARA I. Skanda or Subrahmanya. (For details see under Skanda).

KUMARA II. A King in ancient India. He was invited by the Pāṇḍavas to help them in the great war. He was defeated by Droṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 24).

KUMARA III. A sage reputed as Sanatkumāra. (For details see under Sanatkumāra).

KUMARA IV. One of the prominent sons of Garuḍa.

KUMARA V. An urban region in ancient India. King Sreṇīmān of Kumāra was defeated by Bhīma during his triumphal tour. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 1).

KUMARA (S). Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumāra and Sanatśujāta were the sons of Brahmā endowed with eternal youthfulness. They are known as the Kumāras.

KUMARADASA. A Sanskrit poet of the 7th century A.D. His chief work is the great poem called Jānaki-harapam consisting of twenty cantos.

KUMARADHĀRA. Guardian of the mother of the Vaiṣṇava called Māśika. (See under Māśika).

KUMARĀKA. A river which has its source in Brahmasaras. Those who bathe in the river will become intelligent and wealthy. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 180).

KUMARAKA. A prominent serpent born in the Kuruva dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of King Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 13).

KUMĀRAKOṬI. A holy place. A visit to the place is as good as offering a gift of a thousand cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 117).

KUMĀRAVĀNA (M). The place where King Sudyumna got changed into a woman. When once Sanaka and other sages went to Kumāravāna to see Śiva he was seated there with Pārvaṭī on his lap. Seeing the sages Pārvaṭī got angry and cursed that those who entered the forest in future would be turned into women. King Sudyumna went to hunt in the forest ignorant of this curse, and as soon as he set foot in the forest he was turned into a woman. Purūravas was the son born to this woman by Budha. (Devi Bhāgavata, 1st Skandha).

KUMĀRAVARSA. A place near mount Raivataka. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 26).

KUMĀRĪ I. A princess of the Kekaya kingdom. She was the mother of Pratiśravas, and wife of Bhīma, a King of the Puru dynasty. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 43).

KUMĀRĪ II. In verse 31, Chapter 23 of the Vana Parva, it is stated that certain maidens were born from the body of Skanda. They were called Kumārīs and they used to eat unborn children in the womb of their mothers.

KUMĀRĪ III. Wife of the serpent called Dhanañjaya. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 17).

KUMĀRĪ IV. A river in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 36).
feed the cows their keepers went with their live-stock every morning to Kumbhaka’s place where summer had not yet even peeped in, and after feeding their cows there, they returned home in the evening. But, one evening they led back with them the cows used by the sage for his Pūjas. When the sun set, as usual the sage sat before the sacred fire for Pūja. But, the cow had not come. With his divine vision he found out the reason for the absence of the cow. He cursed that the region where the keepers of the cows lived be turned into a desert, and the kingdom of Kaśi became a desert place, whereupon King Divodāsa went to the banks of the Gomati and founded a new kingdom there. (Brahmānda Purāṇa Chapter 2).

KUMBHAKĀRNA.
2) Birth. Pulastya, one of the Prajāpatis married Havirbhūti (Mānine) and a son called Viśravas was born to them.
Rāvana and Kumbhakārna were born to Viśravas of Puspokatā, and Viṣṇiṣaṇa was born to him of Rākū, and Khara and Sūrpaṅkha were born to him of Māline. The above version is based on verses—1 to 8 in Chapter 275 of the Vana Parva. But, according to Utrata Rāmāyaṇa, Rāvaṇa, Viṣṇiṣaṇa and Kumbhakārna were born to Viśravas of his wife called Kaikasi. According to the Agni Purāṇa, Puspokatā and Kaikasi were one and the same.
3) Former births of Kumbhakārna. Rāvaṇa and Kumbhakārna were originally the two Devas called Jaya and Vijaya. Viṣṇu appointed them as gate-keepers at Vaikuṇṭha. Once they stopped sages like Sanaka and others at the gates, and the latter cursed Jaya and Vijaya into Rākṣasas. When they complained about the curse to Viṣṇu he promised to welcome them back to Vaikuṇṭha after they had lived three births as Rākṣasas. Accordingly Jaya was born as Hiranyākṣa and Vijaya as Hiranayakaśipu, both of them Asuras. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated himself as a Boar and killed Hiranyākṣa and as Narasimha he killed Hiranyakaśipu. Hiranyakaśa and Hiranayakaśipu were reborn as Rāvaṇa and Kumbhakārna respectively. Mahāviṣṇu, during his incarnation as Śrī Rāma killed both Rāvaṇa and Kumbhakārna. Rāvaṇa was reborn as Śīsūpāla and Kumbhakārna as Dantavakra. Both of them were killed by Mahāviṣṇu during his incarnation as Śrī Keśa. Thus the Deva called Vijaya, on account of the curse of Sanaka and other sages, passed through three lives as Hiranyakaśipu, Kumbhakārna and Dantavakra and finally reached Vaikuṇṭha. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).
4) Kumbhakārna secured boons. Kumbhakārna spent his childhood with his brothers at the āśrama of his father on mount Gandhamādana. Kubera was at the zenith of his glory at that time, having been crowned king of the Yakṣas, and also having got the Puspaka Viṃāna. The reputation of Kubera kindled jealousy in Kumbhakārna and his brothers. They too performed penance in the forest on one foot for a thousand years. But, Brahmā did not appear. They continued the penance without eating any food. Khara and Sūrpaṅkha stayed there serving their brothers. Even after the second thousand years Brahmā did not appear. Then Rāvaṇa cut off his ten heads and made offerings of them to Brahmā. Then Brahmā appeared. Brahmā restored his heads to Rāvaṇa.
and he was granted the boon that he would not be killed by anybody but a man. The Devas shuddered at the gift to Rāvana, and feared about the future in case Kumbhakarna too got such a boon. At their request Sarasvati danced on his tongue at the time of Kumbhakarna’s request for a boon. Kumbhakarna wanted NIRDEVATVAM (Absence of all Devas). But by a slip of the tongue (caused by Sarasvati) what he asked for was nidrāvatvam (sleep). Brahmā granted him nidrāvatvam; he said that Kumbhakarna would sleep for six months of the year continuously. Vibiṣiṇa got the boon that he should remember righteousness in danger and use the Brahmarśa without any training in its use. The brothers returned home after securing the boons, and, after driving off Kubera, the lord of Laṅkā, Rāvana and his brothers took their abode there. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275 and Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

5) Death of Kumbhakarna. Kumbhakarna played a very important part in the Rāma-Rāvana war. Prominent warriors on the side of Rāma, like Sugrīva, his ministers and Lakṣmana fought with him. But, none of them could kill him. At last, Śrī Rāma’s arrows killed him. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 67).

Kumbhakarna is not to be viewed merely and purely as an evil character. His advice to Rāvana on various occasions shows noble traits of his character. When Śrī Rāma with his army of monkeys appeared on the other side of the ocean Rāvana held a conference of his brothers, ministers and others at which Kumbhakarna spoke as follows:—“You abducted Śītā without consulting us, and we would not therefore be responsible for the consequences of that action of yours. But, it is not proper that the younger brother should keep away when danger faces the elder one, and on that principle here I am ready to fight Rāma.”

These weighty words of Kumbhakarna throw considerable light on the character of Kumbhakarna. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddhakāṇḍa, Chapter 12).

KUMBHAṆĀṆĪṢĀṆA. A holy place. He who visits this place will enjoy the respect of others. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 157).

KUMBHĀṆĀṆ. Minister of Bāṇāsura. Citralekhā, companion of Usā, the daughter of Bāṇa was the daughter of Kumbhanātha. (See under UŚA). (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUMBHĀṆĀṆĀṆODĀṆA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 69).

KUMBHAṆETĀS (RATHAPRABHU, RATHADHIṆĀṆA). Bharadvāja, the first son of Śaniya married Virā, and an Agrideva was born as their son. This Agni is known by the names KumbhaṆetās, Rathaprabhu and Rathadhivāna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 220, Verse 9).

KUMBHAṆARAVAS. An attendant of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 26).

KUMBHAVAKTRA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 75).

KUMBHAṆ convey to Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 75).

KUMBHAṆODYA I. Agastyā. (See under Agastya).

KUMBHAṆODYA II. A Deva woman who danced in Indrasahā when Arjuna came to Indraloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 30).

KUMBHAṆADI. Daughter of Sumāli the Rākṣasa, by Ketumati. She was abducted by the King of Mathurā called Madhupa. Rāvana killed him. (See under Madhupa).

KUMBHAṆASA. An asura and a notorious philanderer. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 39, Verse 7).

KUMBHAṆAS I. Wife of Aṅgāraparāṇa, a great Gandharva. When Arjuna was about to kill Citraraṅha Kumbhaṇasi requested Yudhiṣṭhira to save her husband, and he was accordingly set free. (For details see under Aṅgāraparāṇa).

KUMBHAṆAS II. A daughter born to Vīśvāvasu of Analā. A Rākṣasa called Madhupa abducted and made her his wife. The famous Lavaṇāṣu was their son.

KUMBHAṆĀṆA (M). One of the twentyeight narakas (hells). It is intended for the cruel folk, who kill for food harmless animals and birds. Since such cruel folk are roasted in Kumbhi fire the hell came to be known by this name. Big vessels full of boiling oil are kept there and the servants of Yama push the sinners into them. One who had killed an animal will be kept in the boiling oil for as many years as the number of hairs the animal killed by him had on its body. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha; also see under Pīṭṛṛtha).

KUMUDA I. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 15).

KUMUDA II. A prominent monkey, who was an attendant of Sugrīva. (Vana Parva, Chapter 289, Verse 4).

KUMUDA III. A great elephant born in the dynasty of Supratika. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 15).

KUMUDA IV. A son of Garuda. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 12).

KUMUDA V. One of the five attendants given by Brahmā to Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 59).

KUMUDA VI. A warrior who fought with Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 56).

KUMUDA VII. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 76).

KUMUDA VIII. There are four mountains supporting Mahāmeru on its four sides, and Kumuda is one of those four mountains, Mandara, Meru and Suśra being the other three. According to the 8th Skandha of the Devī Bhāgavata there are other twenty mountains on the four sides of Mahāmeru, viz. Kuraṅga, Kuraga, Kuśumbha, Viṅkaṅkata, Trīkūṭa, Śīrā, Patārī, Rucaka, Nila, Niśadh, Sītivāsa, Kapila, Śāṅkha, Vaidūrya, Cāudhi, Hāṁsa, Rśabhā, Nāga, Kāḷaṇā and Nārada.

KUMUDĀDI. One of those Vedic scholars, who belonged to the line of Vyāsa’s disciples. His forte was the Atharvaveda. Jaimini was a reputed disciple of Vyāsa. His son, Sumantu, taught his disciple Kabandha the Atharvaveda. Kabandha divided it into two between Devadarśa and Pathya. Medhā, Brahma- bali, Sautkayani and Pippalāda were the disciples of Devadarśa, and Jābali, Kumudādi and Saunaka were the disciples of Pathya. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 6).

KUMUDĀṆA. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 15).

KUMUDAMĀṆI (KUMUDAMĀṆI). One of the four attendants given by Brahmā to Skanda, the other three being Nandīsenā, Gaṇṭakaṇāra and Lohītākṣa. All the four were very powerful, as swift and speedy as wind and noted for their sexual energy. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 25).

KUMUDODARA. A particular region in the Śāka island. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 25).

KUMUDVATI I. Wife of King Vimarsana of Kīrāta-deśa. Kumudvati requested him one day, to put a stop to his cruelties against the people. His reply was as follows:—“Oh! dear wife, don’t feel sorry. In my past life I was a dog and, starved almost to death. I went to the gates of the Śiva temple at Pampāpura. It was Caturdāśī day, and thousands of people had gathered there, and I stood there looking at the Śivalinga. Then someone cried out, ‘Beat the dog to death’, and though, in mortal terror, I ran thrice about the temple, people beat me to death. Since, although only by accident, I had run thrice around the temple, I was born as a King in the present life. I cherish the greatest devotion for Lord Śiva; but, as inherent tendencies do not die out so easily I possess certain characteristics of the dog and that is why I commit the present cruelties.”

On hearing her husband’s past history Kumudvati wanted to know about her past also, and Vimarsana said thus:—“In the past life you were a she-dove. Once you sat on the top of a Pārvati temple with a piece of flesh in your beak. Then another dove tried to snatch it from you, and with it you flew thrice round the temple. But, the other dove killed you and flew away with the piece of flesh. Since you flew around the Pārvati temple thrice you are now born as a queen.”

Vimarsana told her this also that in the next birth she would be born as the daughter of King Śṛījaya, as the daughter of the King of Kaliṅga in her third rebirth, as the daughter of the King of Magadhā in her fourth birth, as the daughter of King Daśārṇa in her fifth birth, as the daughter of Yāyāi in her sixth birth, as the daughter named Vasumati of the King of Vidarbha in her seventh birth, and that ultimately she would attain salvation. Vimarsana in his next birth would likewise be born as the Sindhu King, as the King of Saurāśṭra in his third birth, as the King of Gāndhāra in his fourth birth, as King of Avanti in his fifth birth, as King Anarta in his sixth birth, as King of the Pāṇḍyas in his seventh birth, and that ultimately he too would attain salvation. Thus Vimarsana taught his wife that both of them would ultimately attain salvation as they had gone round the temple. (Śiva Purāṇa, Caturdāśīmāhātmya).

KUMUDVATI II. Wife of Kuśa, son of Śrī Rāma. Kuśa lost the ornaments on his hands in water once while he was sporting in the river. Angry at the loss Kuśa was about to shoot his arrows at the Sarayu when the nāga called Kumuda not only returned to him his lost ornaments but also gave Kumudvati as wife to him. (Ananda Rāmāyana).

KUNÀDIKA. A warrior of Skanda deva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 58).

KUNDA. A very erudite Brahmārṣi. He was present at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 8).

KUNḌODARA II. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 16).

KUNḌODARA III. Sixth son of King Janamejaya. The King had eight sons, Vīz. Dḥṛtarāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu, Bāhlīka, Nisādha, Jāmbūnada, Kuṇḍodara, Padāti and Vasiṭṭi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 57).
KUÑIGARGA. A reputed sage. By severe austerities he increased his spiritual powers, created a girl by his mental power, and afterwards entered into Sañadhī. The girl, who did not relish the idea of marriage, began penance in solitude, and she grew old. In the Mahābhārata she is known as Vṛddhakanyā (Old Virgin). In the evening of her life she longed to give up her material body and to attain salvation. At this juncture Nārada told her that salvation was not for unmarried women. She, therefore, gave half the power of her penance to a young man called Śrīgavān and lived as his wife for one single night. She thus attained salvation (Śalya Parva, Chapter 52).

KUṆINDA. A noble brahmin. He presented a divine conch to Yudhiṣṭhira at his Kājasūya Yajña. (Śabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Southern text).

KUṆJA. A reputed sage. Once he enjoyed the company of Pramlocā, the celestial woman. (See under Pramlocā).

KUṆJALA I. A warrior of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45).

KUṆJALA II. A wise parrot which lived on the banks of the river Narmadā. The Padma Purāṇa (Chapter 85, Bhūmikhaṇḍa) has the following to say about the parrot.

KuṆjala, the wise parrot, had a wife and four sons called Ujvala, Samujjvala, Vijvala and Kapitījala. These brothers used to feed themselves on sweet fruits etc. on the planes, mountains and other places. They also used to carry tasty fruits to their parents. The four brothers thus led a happy life in every way. (See under Subālu).

KUṆJARA I. A great monkey. Añjanā mother of Hanumān was the daughter of KuṆjara. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindhā Kāṇḍa; Canto 66, Verse 9).

KUṆJARA II. A well-known serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 15).

KUṆJARA III. A prince of the Sāuvira country. He was a follower of Jayadratha, and was killed by Arjuna. (Vana Parva, Chapter 27).

KUNTAKA (KUṆTALA). A Sanskrit poet who flourished in the eleventh century A.D. He was a contemporary of Abhinavagupta, and a critic who maintained that the 'life' of real poetry was Vakrokti (expressing ideas in an artistically round-about way instead of in a blunt and plain manner).

KUNTALA. The King of the country Kuntala. Kuntala was a Kingdom in ancient South India. The King of the country was called Kuntala and the people were known as Kuntalas. (Śabhā Parva, and Bхиṣma Parva).

KUṆṬI (PRTHĀ). Wife of King Pāṇḍu and the mother of the Pāṇḍavas, Kunti is a noble heroine in the Mahābhārata.

1) Birth. Kunti was the sister of Śrī Kṛṣṇa's father Vasudeva. Her real name was Prthā. Vasudeva and Prthā were the children of King Śūrasena of the Yādava dynasty. King Kuntibhoja was the son of Śūrasena's sister. He had no issues. Śūrasena had promised to give the daughter first born to him as the adopted daughter of Kuntibhoja, and accordingly his first-born daughter Prthā was given to Kuntibhoja, and Kunti was brought up in his palace. From that day onwards Prthā came to be known as Kunti. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 111).

Kunti, Mādrī and Gāndhārī were born from aspects respectively of the three celestial women Śiddhi, Kṛti and Māttī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 160).

2) Kunti and the mantra. To treat brahmmins who came to the court of Kuntibhoja with worshipful offerings etc. was the duty of Kunti. Once sage Durvāsas visited Kuntibhoja, and as he knew that the sage was easily annoyed Kunti was specially deputed for his service, and she served him to the utmost. One day, to test Kunti, he asked her to be ready with his food by the time he took his bath, and he took practically no time to return after bath and sit for meals. By that time Kunti had managed to cook his food, which she placed before him in a plate. The food was too hot and steaming, and the sage meaningfully looked at the back of Kunti. Realising the meaning of the look, Kunti turned her back to the sage for him to place the plate of food thereon. The sage placed it accordingly on her back and began eating. Though her back was really burning she showed no sign of it. Pleased at her behaviour the sage taught her a mantra and blessed her to the following effect.

"Repeating this mantra you invoke whichever Deva you like and thanks to his favour you will get children. (Kathāsaritsagara, Lāvāṇakalambaka, Tarāligā 2 and Bhārata (Malayālam) Chapter 111).

3) Kunti tested the mantra. After the departure of Durvāsas from the palace, Kunti developed an irresistible desire to test the efficacy of the mantra. and one day she invoked Sun-god with the mantra. Thereupon Sūrya approached her in the guise of a brahmin youth. Kunti got alarmed. Owing to disinclination to become an unmarried mother Kunti could not make up her mind to welcome the brahmin youth. But, Sūrya deva argued that his coming could not be in vain, and Kunti had to yield. She requested Sūrya for a son adorned with helmet, ear-rings etc. (Vana Parva Chapter 207 Verse 17).

Sūrya assured Kunti that even though a child was born to her from him, that will not affect her virginity and departed. Kunti delivered a son in due course of time in secret. She locked up the child in a box and floated it in the Yamunā. An old charioteer called Adhiratha picked up the child from the river and brought it up as though it were his own son. That boy grew up to become the famous Karna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112).

4) Kunti's wedding. In due course Kuntibhoja celebrated Kunti's Śvayānvāra and she chose King Pāṇḍu of the lunar dynasty as her husband, and Pāṇḍu took her to Hastināpura in all pomp and glory. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112).

5) Kunti's wedded life. Pāṇḍu married another wife also called Mādrī, and all the three of them led a very happy life. During one of those days Pāṇḍu went on a hunting in the forest and arrowed to death sage Kindama, who was making love with his wife in the forest, both of them having assumed the forms of deer. The sage cursed Pāṇḍu with death the moment he touched his wives, and grief-stricken at the curse he told his wives about it and decided to take to Sannyāsa. But, the wives told him that they would commit suicide in case he took to Sannyāsa. Ultimately Pāṇḍu went to Śataśriṅga with his wives, and there he began the performance of penances.

After some time Pāṇḍu asked his wives to become mothers by some noble persons. But, Kunti and Mādrī did not agree to it. Then Kunti told Pāṇḍu about the boon she had got from Durvāsas, and with his permission she bore three sons called Dharmaputra, Bhūma and Arjuna respectively from the three Devas, Dharma, Vāyu and Indra. As it had been ordained that the fourth and fifth children would bring sorrows and pain to the parents Kunti satisfied herself with three children (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verses 77, 78).

But, as Pāndu desired that Mādrī also should have children by Kunti's mantra she used the remaining mantra and two sons, Nakula and Sahadeva from the Aśvinīdevas were born to her.

6) Kunti widowed. During a winter when the forest was fragrant with flowers, Pāndu forgot all about the Sage's curse and indulged in sexual joys with Mādrī, and immediately he expired. Kunti and Mādrī competed with each other to end their life in the funeral pyre of their husband. But, as the sages and other relations insisted that one of them should live to bring up the children, Mādrī alone ended her life, and Kunti returned to Hastināpura with the five children. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 125).

7) Kunti at Hastināpura. At Hastināpura differences cropped up between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas. Kunti and the five Pāṇḍavas removed themselves to the 'Lac palace' built at Vārānāvata. When the palace was gutted by fire Kunti and her sons escaped through a secret tunnel to the forest, and Bhūma carried the worn out Kunti on his shoulders. In the forest the Rākṣasa woman Hiḍimbi, requested Kunti to permit Bhūma to become her husband, and Kunti advised Bhūma to beget a child by Hiḍimbi, and thus was born Ghaṭotkaca. At the city named Ekacakrā, Vṛṣaṃa consoled Kunti. There the brahmins complained to Kunti about the depredations of Bakāsura. Kunti got Baka killed by Bhūma and asked the brahmins to keep the matter secret.

On the advice of a brahmin who came there accidentally Kunti and others visited the Pāṇcāla kingdom, and there Arjuna, having defeated all the Kings present at Pāṇcāla's Sva-yānvara wedded her. The Pāṇḍavas who returned with Pāṇcāla at dusk time were asked by Kunti to enjoy that day's bhikṣā (Alms received) together among themselves. Accordingly Pāṇcāla became the wife of all the five Pāṇḍavas. Vidura, at the court of the Pāṇcāla King saluted Kunti and presented to her various varieties of gems. Kunti and Vidura talked about the painful incidents of the past, and Vidura escorted the Pāṇḍavas back to Hastināpura.

Arjuna led a solitary life in the forest for one year, and then returned to Hastināpura with Subhadrā whom he had married meanwhile. Kunti received Subhadrā heartily. In the game of dice with Durvodyana, Dharmaputra was defeated, and the Pāṇḍavas again started for their life in the forest. During this period Kunti lived in Vidura's house. Meanwhile Śrī Kṛṣṇa one day visited Kunti, and she told Kṛṣṇa about the fate of her sons with tears in her eyes. Durvodyana refused to give half of the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas, who returned after twelve years' life in exile in the forest and one year's life incognito. Śrī Kṛṣṇa prompted the Pāṇḍavas to war with the Kauravas, and both the parties began preparations for war. (Ādi Parva, from Chapter 135 to Sabhā and Vana Parvans and Udyoga Parva, upo Chapter 137).

8) Kunti before Karna. War clouds grew thick and fast, and Kunti at Vidura's house got restless. Her heart trembled at the disasters of war as described by Vidura. She went alone to the banks of the Gaṅgā where just then Karna was engaged in Japa with his hands raised and face turned to the east. Kunti waited for some time after which they began to talk. With tears in her eyes Kunti told Karna that he was her son and implored him to return to the Pāṇḍava side to which Karna replied as follows: "Oh ! noble lady, that is quite impossible. I have vowed to kill Arjuna. I will not kill the other four Pāṇḍavas. You shall always have five sons alive. If Arjuna were to be no more I would be there for you in his stead."

Kunti shuddered at those terrible words of Karna, and thus did both of them part with each other. (Udyoga Parva, Chapters 145 and 146).

9) Last days of Kunti. The great war ended. Thousands of warriors on the Kaurava side like the mighty Karna were no more. On the Pāṇḍava side also many were killed. Though the Pāṇḍavas won the war their hearts no more enjoyed peace or happiness. Kunti suffered as though caught in a wild fire. She asked the Pāṇḍavas to perform the obsequies for Karna also. When she let out the secret that Karna was her first-born child Dharmaputra burst into tears. Kunti consoled Subhadrā and Uttrā who were lamenting over the death of Abhimanyu. She requested Śrī Kṛṣṇa to cremate the dead son of Uttrā.

Then Kunti went to Gāndhārī, who stood there bathed in tears. Grief-stricken, Dhrtaraṣṭra and Gāndhārī started for the forest. Holding Gāndhārī's hand in hers Kunti led the way. The Pāṇḍavas prevented their mother from going, but she did not yield. She advised Dharmaputra to have a special eye on Sahadeva, not to forget Karna's name and not to show any displeasure towards Bhūma and Pāṇcāla. But, the Pāṇḍavas wanted to follow their beloved mother into the forest. Pāṇcāla and Subhadrā stationed themselves behind Kunti, who shed copious tears at the sight. Dhrtaraṣṭra and Gāndhārī, who also felt deeply pained at the sight tried their best to dissuade Kunti from following them to the forest. But, Kunti consoled her sons and daughters-in-law by means of sympathetic words and followed Dhrtaraṣṭra and Gāndhārī to the banks of the Gaṅgā, where all of them lived together. The Pāṇḍavas felt acutely the absence of their mother at home. They went to the forest and paid their respects to Kunti on the banks of the Gaṅgā. Kunti embraced Sahadeva with tears in her eyes. Though Yudhishthira and Sahadeva wanted to stay with Kunti in her service she did not allow that. Kunti, Dhrtaraṣṭra and Gāndhārī performed penance in the forest near the Gaṅgā, taking food only once in a month. The three of them died there in a wild fire. (Āśramavāsīka Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 31). Their relations immersed their bones in the Gaṅgā and performed the necessary obsequies. (Śrī, Śántī, Āśramavāsīka and Āśvamedhika Parvans).

KUNTI II. A particular region in ancient India. The warriors there were known as Kuntis. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 11).
KUNTIBHOJA.
1) General. A King of the Yadu dynasty; son of the sister of Śūrasena, who was the father of Vasudeva and grandfather of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (For genealogy see under Śrī Kṛṣṇa.) Kuntibhoja was also the foster-father of Kunti, the daughter of Śūrasena. (See Para 1, under Kunti 1.)
2) Other information. (i) Sahadeva, during his triumphal march over the southern kingdoms subjugated Kuntibhoja. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 16).
(ii) He participated in the Rājasūya Yajña of Yudhishṭhīra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 12).
(iii) The son of Kuntibhoja also became famous under the same name, and Puruṣjt was the son of this Kuntibhoja. Both of them were uncles of the Pāṇḍavas. (Karna Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 22).
(iv) On the first day of the Kurukṣetra war Kuntibhoja and his sons fought with Vīndha and Anuvinda. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 72).
(v) It was Kuntibhoja who occupied the netraśāhā (eye-position) of the Krauṇcavyuha set up by Dhṛṣṭadyumna. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 47).
(vi) Kuntibhoja and Satānīka occupied the Pāḍaśāhā (foot position) of the Makaravṛyāṇa on the Pāṇḍava side. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 11).
(vii) He possessed a noble and high-bred horse. (Drona Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 46).
(viii) In the great war he fought with Alambaṣa. (Drona Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 183).
(ix) Ten of his children were killed by Aśvatthāmā. (Drona Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 18).

KUPAṬA. An Asura son of Kaśyapa by Danu. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 26).

KURAṆGA. One of the mountains which encircle Mahāmeru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

KURAṆGAKŚETRA. A holy place. He who bathes here and observes fast for three nights will attain salvation. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25).

KURAṆKU. (The Malayalam word for monkey).

Kaśyapa, the grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici married eight daughters of Dakṣaprajāpati and one of them Krodhaśvāśa delivered ten daughters. Monkeys and lions were born from Harih, one of those ten daughters. Thus they are brothers, and both are called 'hari'. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kanda, Canto 14, Verse 24).

KURAPARVATA. One of the mountains which encircle Mahāmeru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

KURĀṆKU. One of the sons of Viśvāmitra. They were Brahmavādins, (expounders of Brahman) (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 53).

KŪRNA. I. A prominent serpent, son of Kadrū. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 41).

KŪRNA II. (Turtle). The second incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu. (See under Avatāras).

KŪRNAṆAṆKU. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. (See under Purāṇas).

KURU I. A King called Kuru was born in Dhrūva's dynasty.

Genealogy. Descended from Viśu thus: Brahmā —

Śrīyambhuva Manu—Uttanāpāda—Dhrūva—Śiśṭi—Rīpu—Kāśyapa (Kāśyapa Manu)—Kuru.

Kuru Kuru was the grandfather of the reputed Vena and the great grandfather of emperor Pṛthu. Ånga was the father of Vena. Not much is said about this Kuru in the Purāṇas. Kuru had ten brothers called Puru, Īru, Satadūṣyam, Tapasvī, Satyavāk, Śuci, Aṃgaṇīthu, Aṃhiratha, Śudvyumna and Ahbhimanyu. Kuru had by his wife Ātreya seven sons called Ānga, Sumanas Śvātī, Kṛatu, Aṃgirā, Gaya and Śībi, and to Ånga was born by his wife Sunītha the son, who became reputed as Vena. Pṛthu was Vena's son. Pṛthu had five sons called Antardhāna, Vādī, Śīta, Māgadha, Pāli. To Antardhāna was born of his wife Śikhiṇḍini a son called Havirdhāna, to whom were born by his wife Dhiśanā six sons called Prācinabharīs, Śukra, Gaya, Kṛṣṇa, Vṛja and Ājina. The above is the only information available about this Kuru dynasty in the Purāṇas. (Viśu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 13).

KURU II. Two sons, i.e. Uttanāpāda and Priyavrata were born to Śrīyambhuva Manu of his wife Satārūpā. One King Kuru born in the dynasty of Uttanāpāda has been referred to above, i.e. Kuru I. Another King Kuru is noticed in Priyavrata's dynasty. To Priyavrata were born of his wife Barhiṃṣat fourteen sons called Agnighra, Idhamaiḍha, Yaḍnābāhu, Mahāvīra, Ghrāprṣṭha, Sava, Hiraṇyaretā, Medhāthī, Viśhitroha, Kavi, Uṛjapati, Uttama, Tāmasa and Raivata. To Agnighra by his wife Pūrvacitti were born nine sons called Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hari, Īḷvītra, Ramyaka, Hiraṇmayā, Kuru, Bhadrāsva and Ketumāla. One King Kuru appears among them; but nothing more than the fact that he married a woman called Nāri is known about him. (Viśu Purāṇa).

KURU III. A King, the brother of Rancīvata. (See under Rancīvata).

KURU IV.

To Kuru were born four sons called Parikṣit, Sudhanus, Jahu and Nisādhāsya. The genealogy of the Kuru Kings is as follows: Sudhanus-Čyavana — Kṛṣṇa-pari-carvara — Bhārdrathā — Kusāra — Rāṣṭha — Puspa-vān — Jahu.

Jārasandha was another son of Bhādrathā. Jārasandha had four sons called Soma, Sahadeva, Turya and Sruṭasru. From Jahu, the following sons were born: —Sruṭa — Viḍūratha — Sārvabhaumā — Jaya-sena, —Kaviya — Bhāvika — Caitrodhata — Devatīthi — Rkṣa — Bhima and Pratīca. Pratīca had three sons called Devāṇi, Sāntu and Bālikha. Sāntu is known as Mahābhāsak, also, Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu were the successors of Sāntu, and they came to be known as Kauravas also as they belonged to the dynasty of Kuru. But, since the sons of Pāṇḍu were born of Devas they may not be called Kauravas.
2) Other Information. (1) Kurukṣetra became holy and sanctified on account of Kuru's tapas. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 30).

(ii) While Kuru was once ploughing a land in Kurukṣetra Indra appeared there, and they had a talk. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 53 Verse 6).

(iii) While Kuru was once performing a yajña at Kurukṣetra, the river Sarasvatī went there under the name Surenu (Oghavati) and watered the land. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 38, Verses 26 and 27).

KURU V. One of the sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 8).

KURU VI. A son born to Sārivarāṇa of Tapatī. The boy, following his naming and other consecratory rites, grew up like fire in which was offered havis (ghee). At the age of ten he became omniscient. At the age of sixteen he married Sudāmīni, daughter of Sudāman. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 21).

KURUJĀNGALAM (KURU). A kingdom in ancient India of which Hastināpura was the capital. This kingdom acquired the name Kurujāngala from Kuru. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 49).

KURUKŠETRA. 1. General. Made famous by the Mahābhārata, Kurukṣetra is a sacred place situated to the south of the river Sarasvatī and north of Dṛṣadvati. People who live in this region really live in heaven. (Aranyakāṇḍa, Chapter 83, Verse 4).

According to Pulastya even those who come into contact with the dust blown by the wind from this place meet with auspicious end.

2. Other details. (i) Takṣaka lived on the banks of the river Iksumati in Kurukṣetra (Ādi Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 139).

(ii) Kurukṣetra became a sacred place as King Kuru did tapas there. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 50).

(iii) Two sons called Citrāṅgada and Vīcitrāṅvīra were born to Santanu of Satyavatī. Once while hunting in a forest Citrāṅgada met a Gandharva, whose name also was Citrāṅgada. The Gandharva got angry that a man bore his name and so he killed Citrāṅgada. The incident took place at Kurukṣetra (Ādi Parva, Chapter 101, Verses 8 and 9).

(iv) Sunda and Upasunda, who conquered all the worlds lived in Kurukṣetra (Ādi Parva, Chapter 209, Verse 27).

(v) Before the Khāṇḍava forest was burnt down Takṣaka left the place and went to Kurukṣetra and lived there. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 226, Verse 4).

(vi) During their life of exile in the forest the Pāṇḍavas visited Kurukṣetra (Vana Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 1).

(vii) King Maṇḍhātā once conducted a yajña within the boundaries of Kurukṣetra. (Vana Parva, Chapter 126, Verse 43).

(viii) The reputed sage Mudgala lived here. (Vana Parva, Chapter 260, Verse 3).

(x) Once a fierce fight took place here (Kurukṣetra) between Bhīṣma and Paraśurāma. Paraśurāma wanted Bhīṣma to accept Ambā, daughter of the King of Kaśī as his wife.

(xi) Bhīṣma lay wounded on the bed of arrows here. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 92).

(xii) Kurukṣetra had been formerly known as Samantapaṇcaka. Since King Kuru made this place holy it came to be known as Kurukṣetra thereafter.

(xiii) It was at Kurukṣetra that the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas waged a fierce war and it was here that Śri Kṛṣṇa taught Arjuna the Gītā. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 258, Verse 42).

(xiv) Emperor Sudārśana, son of Agni, who was famous for his hospitality, lived here. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 40).

KURUPĀNCALĀ (M) The combined name for Kuru and Pāṇcāla in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KURUTA. A Sage mentioned in Rgveda. He is also known as Rṛjasva. (For details see under Rṛjasva).

KURUTĪRTHA. A sacred place to the south of Taḷjaśatīrtha in Kurukṣetra. He who takes a bath here will enter Brahmālokā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 166).

KURUVAMŚA. See under Kuru.

KURUVARŚAKA. An urban area in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KURUVARŚA (M) The country ruled over by Kuru came to be called Kuruvārga.

KURUVINDA. An urban area in ancient India. The people of Kuruvinda were called Kuruvindas. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 87, Verse 9).

KUSA I. A great sage of ancient India. He was as effulgent as burning fire. The famous Sage Viśvāmitra was born in Kuśa's dynasty. (For genealogy etc see under Viśvāmitra).

KUSA II. One of the two sons of Śri Rāma, the other, being Lava.

1) Birth. To Śītā forsaken by Rāma a son called Lava was born while she was living at the aśrama of Vālmiki. One day Śītā took Lava to the stream to bathe him, and Vālmīki, who did not know about it was upset not to see the child in the aśrama. He feared that it might have been eaten up by some animal, and fearing that Śītā might die when she missed the child he created a child with Kuśa grass and laid it there where Lava was lying before. When Śītā returned to the aśrama with Lava after their bath Vālmīki explained the whole situation to Śītā. Since the second child was created with Kuśa grass he was called Kuśa, and he was made the second son of Śītā (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa and Kathāsārītāgara, Alāṅkāravatīlamba, Tarāṅga 1).

2) Kuśa went to Ayodhya. Śri Rāma decided to conduct an Āśvamedha yajña. It was ordained that the emperor, who conducted a yajña should have his wife. As Śītā had been abandoned, Rāma had no wife for the purposes of the yajña. It was laid down that in the absence of the wife a statue of hers may be made with palāsa wood. But, Vaśiṣṭha decreed that a statue of Śītā might be made with gold. The yajña was to be held in the Naimiśa forest. During the triumphal tour of Satruṅgha with the yājñikī horse he reached the banks of the river Tamasā near the aśrama of Vālmiki where Lava and Kuśa captured the horse. Śatrughna could not defeat Lava and Kuśa, and they routed the additional force also which arrived under the leadership of Lakṣmaṇa to help Śatrughna. Then Vālmiki intervened and the horse was returned to Śatrughna. Afterwards, Vālmiki, Sītā and Lavakūsas also attended Śrī Rāma's yajña where Lava and Kuśa recited the poem Rāmāyana composed by Vālmiki. Rāma recognised the boys and they were made to live in Ayodhya. Thus did Kuśa visit Ayodhya.

The Kathāsaritsāgara tells the following story about Kuśa's visit to Ayodhya. Vālmiki duly performed the thread-wearing ceremony of Lava and Kuśa and taught them, even in their very childhood, all arts and sciences including the secrets about divine arrows. The boys one day killed a deer in the āśrama and worshipped with its flesh the liṅga, which Vālmiki used to worship daily, and as a result of that the sage became ill. Sītādevī requested for penance for the action of her children, and Vālmiki said that Lava should bring golden lotus flowers from Vaśiśravaṇa's pond and flowers of Kalpakavrksa from his garden, and that Lava and Kuśa together should worship the Sivalinga with those flowers. Lava then went to mount Kailāsa and after killing many yakṣas collected the flowers. On his way back he rested for some time at the foot of a tree. Just then Lakṣmaṇa, who was on the look-out for a human being for the naramedha (human sacrifice) of Śrī Rāma, also reached the spot. He decided to take Lava captive with him, and they fought with each other for some time. At last Lakṣmaṇa took Lava captive by using mohanāstra (arrow which makes the opponent unconscious) and took him to Ayodhya. Sītā was pained that Lava had not returned yet, and Vālmiki with his divine vision understood the reason for his absence. He deputed Kuśa to Ayodhya to bring back with him Lava somehow or other. When Kuśa reached Ayodhya, Śrī Rāma was conducting the Aśvamedha yajña, and Kuśa, successfully confronting a number of people, got into the yajña ground. In the combat that ensued between Kuśa and Lakṣmaṇa the latter was defeated, as he could not defeat Kuśa due to the greatness of Vālmiki. When Śrī Rāma asked Kuśa why he had not returned, Kuśa told him that he was the brother of Lava and that he had heard from his mother Sītā that both of them were the sons of Śrī Rāma. Rāma was overjoyed to hear that and he covered the boys with kisses. Sītā also was brought down from the āśrama of Vālmiki, and all of them lived very happily. (Kathāsaritsāgara, Alākāravatīlambaka, Tarāṅga 1.)

3). Kuśa's reign. Following the demise of Lakṣmaṇa Śrī Rāma divided the country between Kuśa and Lava. A city called Kuśāvati was built in the Kosala Kingdom and Kuśa was crowned King thereof. Thirty-two out of the sixtyfour akṣauhiṇīs of the kings of the solar dynasty, four out of the eight ministers and half of the movable property were allotted to Kuśa. Lava was crowned king of north Kosala where a city called Sarāvati was built for him, and the other half of the army, ministers etc. became his share. While Kuśa and Lava were ruling the country thus, Śrī Rāma immolated himself in the depths of the river Sarayū (Uttara Rāmāyana).

4). Kuśa's successors. Descended from Śrī Rāma thus: Kuśa—Adiū—Niśadha—Nabhas—Puṇḍarīka—Kṣema-

KUŚA III. A king born in the Kuru dynasty. To Kuru, who built Kurukṣetra was born a son called Sudhanvā, and to him was born Subhrota, who became the father of Cyavana. Subhrota begot of another wife Gīrikā seven sons called Bhṛdradra, Kuśa, Yadu, Pratyragna, Bala, Matsyakāla and Vira. Kuśa was one of the seven sons. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 78).

KUŚABINDU. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KUŚACĪRĀ. A river the water of which Indians of ancient days used to drink. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KUŚADHĀRA. A river the water from which Indians used to drink. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KUŚADHVĀJA I. A brahmin, son of Bhṛaspati. Penniless and poor, the brahmin once sought the help of King Sālva. The miserly king did not give him anything. Thereafter he began worshipping Bhagavati with the object of making some money. While meditating upon Bhagavati a girl emerged out of his mouth. She was named Devavatī. When she came of age an asura called Śambhu desired to marry her; but Kuśadhvāja did not agree to the proposal. Enraged at the refusal Śambhu killed Kuśadhvāja while the latter was asleep one night. But Devavatī cursed and reduced the asura into ashes. Then she took herself to penance to secure Mahāvīśu as her husband when Rāvya happened to come there, and he tried to make her his wife. But, she repelled all his attempts at which he caught hold of her by the hair. She escaped by cutting her hair. She then immolated herself in burning fire. It was this Devavatī, who was, in her next life, born as Sītā, daughter of King Janaka (Uttara Rāmāyana).

KUŚADHVĀJA II. Brother of King Janaka, father of Sītā. He lived on the banks of the river Ikṣumāti. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakanda, Canto 70). See under JANAKA I.

KUŚADHVĀJA III. A King. The following story about him is quoted from the Skanda Purāṇa. Kuśadhvāja was a monkey in his former birth, and as he had then performed the auspicious action of swinging Śiva in a cradle throughout day and night, in the next birth he was born as King Kuśadhvāja. One day the King abducted the daughter of the Sage Aṅgīvēṣa when she was bathing. The Sage cursed the King into the form of a vulture. He was promised redemption from the curse that he would regain his human form on the day on which he helped Indradyumna.

KUŚADVĪPA. One of the seven islands. Kuśa island is rich in pearls. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 13). Jambū, Plakṣa, Śālmali, Kuśa, Krauṇca, Śāka and Puṣkara are the seven islands (Saptadvīpas). Śālmali island has double the area of Plakṣa. Each island, in this order, is twice as large as the preceding one. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

Kuśa island encircles the sea of Surā (Wine.) Jotyśīmān was the chief over the island. He had seven sons called Udbhida, Venuṃān, Vairatha, Lambana, Dṛhti, Prabhākara and Kapila. The Subcontinents, are called by their names. In Kuśa island, along with Daityas and Dānavas, Men, Devas, Gandharvas, Kinnaras and Kimpurussas live. There are four castes of people there called Damis, Śuṣmis, Snehas and Mandehas, all of them leading righteous lives. The above four castes form the Brahmīn, Kṣatriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra people in the island. There are six mountains there called Vidruma, Hemaśaila, Dyutimān, Pus pavān, Kuśēśaya, and Harimandira. There are also seven rivers there called Dūhatāpā, Śivā, Pavitra, Sammati, Vidyut, Ambhā and Mahi. These rivers annihilate sins. There are also smaller rivers there. There is a Kuśastambha (a cluster of Kuśa grass) in the island. The stambha which grows like fire illuminates the island by its light and lustre. (Bhāgavata). The Kuśa island is encircled by the Gṛtā ocean. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa Part II, Chapter 4).

KUŚĀDYA. A Kingdom in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 44).

KUŚĀLA. A holy place near mount Kraūnca. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 21).

KUŚALAVA (S). Kuśa and Lava, the two sons of Sitā. (For details see under Kuṣa).

KUŚALAYA. A holy place in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 4).

KUŚĀMBA I. The third son of Uparicaravasu. Kuśāmbo is also known as Mañjīvāha. Vasu had five sons called Bhadrathā, Kuśāmbo, Māvella, Yadu and Rājanya.

KUŚĀMBA II. 1) General. A son of Kuṣa. The city he built was called Kuṣāmbo. (See under Kuṣa). 2) Other information. (i) Kuśāmbo had a daughter called Āravangi, who was married by Bhadrāsena, the solar King. (Brahmadatta Purāṇa, Chapter 2). (ii) Two sons, Sakra and Gādhī were born to Kuśāmbo and to Gādhī was born a daughter, Satyavrata. Viśvāmitra was Gādhī's son. (Brahmadatta Purāṇa, Chapter 57).

This statement is not quite correct. Certain other Purāṇas maintain that Gādhī, the father of Viśvāmitra was the son of Kuśānabha, who was the son of Kuṣaika and brother of Kuśāmbo. (See under Kuśānabha).

KUŚANĀBHA. A son born to Kuśa of Vaiḍabarī. (For Genealogy see under Viśvāmitra). Sage Kuśa had four sons, namely Kuśāmbo, Kuśānabha, Asūrtarajas and Vasu, and Kuśānabha built Mahodayapurā and lived there. One hundred daughters were born to him of his wife Gṛtā. Vāyuyahagāvan once asked the girls to marry him at which proposal they laughed at him in derision. He cursed them and made them hunch-backed ugly women, and Kuśanābha felt very sorry about this cruel fate of his daughters.

To Somadā, daughter of a Gandharva woman called Ürmilā, had been born a son, Brahmadatta, due to the mental power of the sage Cālī. Kuśanābha gave in marriage his hundred daughters to Brahmadatta, and they were cured of their hunch at the touch of Brahmadatta and became their previous beautiful selves.

Kuśanābha conducted the yajña called Putrakāmeṣṭi, and Kuśa, who was so pleased by the yajña blessed him to have a son called Gādhī. Viśvāmitra was the son of this Gādhī. Viśvāmitra had also a sister Satyavrata, whom Rāṣṭrika wedded. (Viṃśi Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Cantos 32-35).

KUŚAPLAVA (KUŚAPLAVANAM). A holy place. He who bathes and spends three nights there will derive the benefits of an asvamedha yajña. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 21). It was here that Dītidevi, wife of Kaśyapa did tapas for a son who would be equal to Indra. Again it was here that Indra entered into the womb of Dīti and cut into pieces the child in the womb. Kuśapalava became famous because of the above happenings. (Viṃśi Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 46).

KUŚASTAMBHA. A sacred centre in the Kuśa island. He who bathes here attains a place in heaven surrounded by Deva women. See under Kuśadvipa. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 28).

KUŚASTHALI. The ancient name of Dvārakāpurī; an island. It was emperor Revata, son of Anarta, the grandson of Vaivasvata Manu, who first built a city in Kuśasthalī and ruled the country. Their genealogy: Descended from Viṇḍu thus: Brahmā—Marici—Kaśyapa—Vivasvān—Vaivasvata Manu—Sārīyātī (Sāyātī)—Anarta—Revata. Certain Purāṇas state that it was Anarta, who first built forts at Kuśasthalī. It would not be incorrect to say that Anarta built forts in this city first founded by his son Revata. The city was sunk in the sea after a few years. Afterwards the region remained as a forest for long years. It was later on that Śrī Kṛṣṇa built Dvārakā there. Following Kṛṣṇa's death the Yādava dynasty got annihilated and the region was again swallowed by the ocean. Dvārakā is believed to have been an island situated in the sea to the west of Gujārat. Even today there is a place called Dvārakā on the coast of Indiā to the west of Gujārat. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha and Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUŚĀŚVA. An Ikṣvāku King son of King Sahadeva and father of King Somadatta. (Viṃśi Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 47).

KUŚAVĀN. A deep region in the lake called Ujjānaka near Mānasa lake. (Vana Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 18).

KUŚAVARTA II. A holy place in ancient India. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 13).

KUŚAVATI. A city in Devaloka, where the Devas once conducted a mantra yajña. It was on his way to participate in this yajña that Agastya cursed Kubera and his attendant Maṇjūmā (Vana Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 34).

KUŚESA. One of six great mountains in the Kuśa island. Durdurāṣa, Dyutimān, Pus pavān, Kuśēśaya, Kumūda and Hari are the six mountains. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verses 10 and 11).

KUŚIDA I. A sage belonging to the order of Vyāsa's disciples. (Bhāgavata 12th Skandha).

KUŚIDA II. To live on the interest of money lent to others. Agriculture, breeding of cows, commerce and Kuśida are the professions ordained for brahmins in emergency. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 152).

KUŚIKA I. A very famous monarch in the Puru dynasty. He was the grandfather of Viśvāmitra and father of Gādhī.

2) Indra as son. Kuśika began tapas for a son who would be equal to Indra and could not be killed by others. Pleased with his tapas Indra voluntarily took birth as Kuśika's son. Gādhi was that son; in fact he was an incarnation of Indra. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 49).

KUŚIKA II. A sage who came to see Pramādvarā who died of snake poison (Ādi Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 25). On his way to Hastināpura he saw Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 27).

KUŚIKĀŚRAMA. A holy aśrama on the banks of the river Kośi where the sage called Kuśika is believed to have lived. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 131).

KUSMĀNDAKA. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 11).

KUSTUMBURU. A Rākṣasa in Kubera's court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 16).

KUSUMA. One of the five attendants given to Skanda- deva by Dhatā. Kunda, Kusuma, Kumuda, Dambara and Adambara were the five attendants. (Sālīya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 39).

KUSUMBHA-PARVATA. One of the mountains around Mahāmeru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

KUSUMBHI. A forest near Dvarākā. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

KUṬA. One of the pugilists deputed by Kaṁsa to kill Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma when they went to Mathurā to witness the dhanuryajña. Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Śāla and Kosala were the other prominent pugilists deputed by Kaṁsa for the purpose. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUTAPA. Afternoon, considered to be auspicious for performing obsequies. The offerings made to Pīrṣ at Kutapa are the best. (Ādi Parva, Southern text, Chapter 93).

KUṬHĀRA. A prominent nāga. He was present among the nāgas, who went to receive Balabhadrā when he went, in the form of nāga, into the sea. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 15).

KUṬHĀRA. A nāga born in Dheṭarāṣṭra's family. It was burned to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 15).

KUṬHILA. See under Pārvaṭī.

KUTSA. Son of a Rājarṣi called Rūru. Kutsa is mentioned with reference to Indra in many places in the Ṛgveda.

KUṬṬĀLA (M). Seat of a famous Śiva temple in South India, originally a Viṣṇu temple. There is a story about its conversion into the present Śiva temple as follows —

Agastya, on his journey to the south, reached Tirukkuṭṭalam (Kuṭṭālam) in the Tirunelveli Zilla on the southern borders of Tamil Nadu. The temple there was dedicated to Viṣṇu, and the Vaishnavas (devotees of Viṣṇu) prevented Agastya from entering the temple with ashes on his forehead. At once he transformed himself into a devotee of Viṣṇu, and was permitted entry into the temple. As Viṣṇu wanted to show the world that he and Śiva were one and the same, and also the greatness of Agastya, the idol of Viṣṇu was all on a sudden changed into a Śiva Linga. Since then the temple has remained a Śiva Temple. (Skanda Purāṇa).

KUVALAYĀPIDA. Name of the elephant posted at the gates of Mathurāpuri to kill Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārāma, who went there to witness the dhanuryajña. But, they killed the elephant. (Rādhagovinda samāśīdya

Tasmin nāgamavasthitam /

Apasyat Kuvalayāpidaṁ

Kṛṣṇoṁ mbaśṭapacraditām

(Bhāgavata, Daśama Skandha, Chapter 49, Verse 2).

KUVĪRĀ. A river. (Bhīṣma Parva Chapter 27).

KUYAVA. An asura referred to in the Ṛgveda. (Ṛgveda, Mandala 1, Anuvāka 15, Sūkta 104).

L

LA (ṛ) This letter means the Creator. (Chapter 348, Agni Purāṇa).

LADHANĀSA. See under Paṁcataṇtra.

LAJJA. One of the thirteen daughters of Daksaprajā- pati. The other daughters were, Śraddhā, Kāmsi, etc. (Chapter 7, Aśvita 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

LAKṢĀGRHA. The house of lac (a kind of red dye). (See for details under Arakkilam).

LAKṢĀNĀ I. Daughter of Duryodhana. Wife of Śāmba. (See for details under Śāmba).

LAKṢĀNĀ II. A celestial maiden. This maiden took part in the birth day celebrations of Arjuna. (Verse 62, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva, M.B.).

LAKṢĀNĀ (LAKṢĀNĀ) III. One of the eight queens of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Lakṣāṇā was the daughter of Bhṛatsena, King of Madra. (Śrītī Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa). Śrī Kṛṣṇa got ten sons of her some of whom are Praghoṣa, Gātravān, Śīrṣa and Bala. (10th Skandha, Bhāgava- vata).

LAKṢĀNA. Son born to Daśaratha of Sumitrā.

1) Short history. Since details about Lakṣāna are included in the story under ‘Rāma’ only a short description is given below:

Daśaratha, King of Ayodhyā had three wives, Kausalyā, Kaikēyi and Sumitrā. To obtain children Daśaratha performed a sacrifice named Putrakāṃśi requesting the great sage Bṛhasprāṇa to officiate at the ceremony. At the close of the ceremony a divine person rose up from the sacrificial fire with a pot of pudding and all the three wives became pregnant by eating the same. Kausalyā gave birth to Śrī Rāma, Kaikēyi to Bharata and Sumitrā to Lakṣāna and Satrughna. Lakṣāna was an incarnation of Ananta and so Rāma and Lakṣāna had more attachment to each other.

Viśvāmitra once took Rāma and Lakṣāna to the forests to give protection to the sages against the demons who gave them trouble. In the course of that Viśvāmitra took them to the Svayahvāra held at the court of Janaka and [Śrī Rāma married Śītā and Lakṣāna married Urmiḷā.}
When the coronation of Śrī Rāma was about to take place, Kalkeyī demanded of Daśaratha, on the strength of the two boons granted to her on a previous occasion, to send Śrī Rāma to the forests for fourteen years and crown Bharata her son as King. Daśaratha was compelled to accede to her request and so Śrī Rāma went to the forests. Sitā and Laksmaṇa accompanied him. Laksmaṇa during the fourteen years of their exile followed his brother Rāma like a shadow. Laksmaṇa cut off the breasts and nose of Sūrpaṇakhā, the demoness who made amorous overtures to them. Laksmaṇa acted promptly and bravely when the notorious trio, Kharā, Dūṣāna and Triśūrā attacked them and he was responsible for the slaughter of the three. Rāvana, coming to know of that, carried away Sitā to Lankā.

Grief-stricken, Rāma and Laksmaṇa roamed about in the forests searching for Sitā. At last they came to Sugriva with whom they made an alliance. Rāma and Laksmaṇa went back for Sugriva his kingdom of Kīśkindhā and Sugriva in return helped Rāma and Laksmaṇa to fight Rāvana. Accompanied by an army led by Sugriva Rāma and Laksmaṇa went to Lālīka and defeating Rāvana took back Sitā to Ayodhyā. Śrī Rāma was crowned King and Laksmaṇa helped his brother in his duties. When there arose a scandal about Sitā from the people, Śrī Rāma asked Laksmaṇa to take Sitā away to the forest and leave her there. In the Āsvamedha conducted by Śrī Rāma, Laksmaṇa led the sacrificial horse and the horse was blocked and captured by Lava and Kuśa and Laksmaṇa fought against them.

When the purpose of the incarnation of Rāma was over, god of Death in the garb of a sage approached Śrī Rāma for a private talk. Rāma and the sage were closeted in a room and Laksmaṇa was asked to keep watch over the door with instructions not to allow anybody inside. After some time sage Durvāsas came there and Laksmaṇa entered the room to give his brother the information of his arrival. Rāma was angry and abandoned Laksmaṇa and, feeling repentant later, Śrī Rāma jumped into the river and drowned himself before a huge crowd of weeping subjects. Laksmaṇa immediately ended his life by drowning himself at the same place where his brother did so.

2) Birth. Laksmaṇa was born on the day of Asleṣā in the lagna of Karkataka. (Śloka 15, Chapter 18, Bāla Kāndā, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

LAKŚMAṆA II. A very brave son of Duryodhana. He was a great archer. The Mahābhārata gives the following information about him.

(i) In the great battle Abhimanyu defeated this Laksmaṇa. (Śloka 32, Chapter 73, Bhīma Parva).
(ii) Laksmaṇa fought against Kaśtradeva. (Śloka 49, Chapter 14, Droṇa Parva).
(iii) Abhimanyu killed him in the battle-field. (Śloka 17, Chapter 46, Droṇa Parva).
(iv) After the great war when once, at the request of Kuntī and Gāṇḍhārī, Vyāsa by his yogic powers arrayed the dead warriors for Kunti and Gāṇḍhārī to see, this Laksmaṇa was also among them. (Śloka 11, Chapter 32, Śrīramavāsīka Parva).

LAKŚMAṆA. One of the queens of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 33, Subhā Parva, Dākṣiṇātyapātha).

LAKŚMI I. Consort of Mahāviṣṇu.

1) Origin. Devī originated from the left side of Paramātmā (Supreme Being). The beautiful Devī by a command from the Supreme Being divided herself into two enchanting damsels both equal in figure, splendour, age, majesty, adornment and love. One of these was Lakṣmīdevi and the other Rādhādevī. That born of the left was Rāmā and that of the right, Rādhā. Rādhā wedded herself to the two-handed Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Lakṣmī also wanted the same person and so Bhaga-van himself became two, Śrī Kṛṣṇa from the left side as a two-handed person and as four-handed Viṣṇu from the right side. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

2) Different incarnations of Lakṣmī. Lakṣmī had many incarnations and she had been on earth in different forms at different times. They are given below:

(i) Birth from the ocean of milk. Once the Devas became aged and afflicted with rudgosity and grey hairs by a curse of Durvāsas. Indra lost his majesty and was ousted from Swarga. Śrīvākaṁ Śrīvākaṁ descended Devaloka and went to Vaikuṇṭha and merged with Mahālaksmaṇa.

The Devas were greatly aggrieved on account of this plight of theirs and they went to Satyaloka and appealed to Brahmā to find a solution to their difficulties. Brahmā was helpless in the matter and so they all together went to Vaikuṇṭha and represented their grievances before Mahāviṣṇu. Viṣṇu smiled and told Mahālaksmaṇa thus: "You go and be born as Kṣira-sāgarakanyākā using a part of your inherent power and do give relief to the Devas." Accordingly when the Devas conducted the churning of the ocean of milk (Kṣirābdhimatha) Mahālaksmaṇa, the goddess of beauty, wealth and prosperity arose from the ocean as Kṣirāsāgarakanyākā (Daughter of the ocean of milk) and blessed the Devas and put a Vanamālā (garland of wild flowers) on Mahāviṣṇu. The Devas got back all their lost wealth and prosperity and they, on going to Devaloka, worshipped Lakṣmīdevi properly. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

(ii) Mahālaksmaṇa was born as a mare. (See under Ekāvīra, Para 2).

(iii) Mahālaksmaṇa was born as the Tulasī plant. (Holy Basil. (See under Tulasī).

(iv) Mahālaksmaṇa was born as Sitā and Vedavati. (See under Sitā).

(v) Other births : Mahālaksmaṇa was born as a daughter to the sage Bṛgu of Khyāti. When Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Sūrya, Lakṣmī rose up from the lotus. When Viṣṇu became Paraśurāma, Lakṣmī became the earth. When Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Śrī Rāma, Lakṣmī became Sitā and when Viṣṇu was born as Kṛṣṇa Lakṣmī became Rādhā. Thus whenever and wherever Mahāviṣṇu changed his form, Mahālaksmaṇa also changed hers to form part of the changed life. (Chapter 9, Amśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

3) Mahālaksmaṇa cursed Viṣṇu. Once Mahālaksmaṇa cursed Mahāviṣṇu, her husband, that his head would drop off from his body. (See under Cītal).

4) Two forms of Lakṣmī. Mahālaksmaṇa has two forms, Viṣṇu-priyā Lakṣmī and Rājya-laksmaṇa. The former is the embodiment of chastity and virtuousness. The latter goes about courting Kings. Rājya-laksmaṇa is fickle and unsteady. This Lakṣmī enters all places where virtue and charity are found and as soon as these two vanish from any place Rājyalakṣmi will also vanish from that place.

5) Lakṣmi in cow-dung. The people of Bhārata consider cow dung as very sacred and there is a story in the 82nd Chapter of Anuśāsana Parva as to how cow-dung became so sacred:

Once a herd of cows was grazing in a large grassy ground when Lakṣmi happened to pass that way. Mahālakṣmi was pleased at the cows and bade them ask for any boon they wanted. The cows were prosperity incarnate and contented and they rejected the offer of Lakṣmi and when pressed again by her, said that they would like to have prosperity deposited in their dung also. Mahālakṣmi did so and so even today it is believed that the cow-dung is embedded with prosperity.

6) Other details:

(i) Lakṣmi stays in the court of Kubera. (Śloka 19, Chapter 10, Sañh Parva).
(ii) Mahālakṣmi is installed in temples as an idol carrying a lotus in her right hand and a Bilva fruit in her left hand. (Chapter 50, Agni Purāṇa).
(iii) Lakṣmīdevī stays in the court of Brahmā also. (Śloka 41, Chapter 11, Sañh Parva).

LAKŚMĪ II. A daughter of Daksaprajāpati. She was married to Dharmadeva. (Śloka 14, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

LAKŚMĪDĀSA. A Sanskrit poet who was the author of Śukasandesā.

1) Birth. He was born in the former state of Cochin in Kariṅgāmpilly Mana. This Mana (house) was near the temple of Trīpūtāmangala in Vellārappilly in Cochin (Kaṅayamūr taluk). The Kariṅgāmpilly Mana was bearing the position of Tāliyātiri in the village of Īrāṇikula. It is over two hundred years since that Mana became extinct. (The houses of Namboothiri brahmins are called Manas).

2) It is believed that the famous ‘Śukasandesā’ was written in 112 M.E. There is one set of historians who hold that it was written in 666 A.D. But the famous scholar and poet Īllār states with authority that it was written in the 10th or 1st century A.D.

2) Stories about this poet. As usual there are legends regarding this poet also. That the poet was a very dull boy in his childhood and that he became bright and brilliant by the blessings of his guru is one legend. After writing his Śukasandesā the poet went on a pilgrimage in South India. One night he came to a brahmin’s house but was not given any food or a place to sleep. He slept in an open veranda on the outside. He was lying awake when he heard his ‘Śukasandesā’ being read inside by a few people. At a stage they were not able to follow the import of a verse when Lakṣmīdāsa shouted the meaning from outside. A door opened and a voice enquired in Tamil ‘Are you Kariṅgāmpilly?’ When he said yes they were extremely happy and took him inside and treated him with respect.

4) Works. No major work other than Śukasandesā has been found. Two small poems are available.

Śukasandesā has been written on the model of the famous Meghasandesā of Kālidāsa. Many commentaries on this have come to light; of these the one written by Mānavedan Rāja of Kozhikode Palace named Vilāsinī is the best. Other commentaries named Varavarṇaṇī, Cintāmilaka and Vyākṛti are also worth mentioning.

LĀLĀHAKSAM. A hell. (See under Kāla 1).

LALĀMA. A division among horses. The white patch on the forehead of a horse is also called Lalāma and so horses with lalāma are called Lalāmas. (Śloka 13, Chapter 13, Drona Parva).

LALĀṬĀKṢA. A country of ancient India. The King of this country was present at the yajña of Yudhishthira with very many valuable presents. (Śloka 17, Chapter 51, Sañh Parva).

LALITĀ. See under PUNDĀRĪKAMUKHA.

LALITÁ. A Gandharva. This Gandharva was born by a curse and by observing a vrata called Kadāda Ekādaśī he obtained relief from the curse and became Gandharva again. (Uttara Khanda, Padma Purāṇa).

LALITĀKA. An ancient holy place of Bhārata. If one bathes in a sacred pond there, one will be free from sins. (Śloka 34, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

LALITTĀ. A country of ancient Bhārata. The people of the place were called Lalīttas. They fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. Lalīttas boasted that they would kill Arjuna in the big battle. The King of the Lalīttas attacked Abhimanyu. Arjuna killed them all in the battle. (Śloka 47, Chapter 5, Karna Parva).

LAMBĀ. A daughter of Daksaprajāpati. Asikñi wife of Daksaprajāpati got a hundred daughters and ten of them were married to Dharmadeva. Lambā was one of them. (Chapter 15, Arisna 1, Visūna Purāṇa).

LAMBANT. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 18, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

LAMBAPAYODHARĀ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 21, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

LAMPĀKA. A place of Purānic fame. In the great epic battle the people of Lampāka fought on the side of the Kauravas. They attacked Śātyaki and he destroyed the Lampākas. (Śloka 42, Chapter 121, Drona Parva).

LAŚGALI. A celebrated river of Purānic fame. This river worships Varuṇa in the form of a Devī. (Śloka 22, Chapter 9, Sañh Parva).

LAŚGHATI. A river of Purānic fame. This river sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him.

LĀNKA. The kingdom of Rāvana.

1) Origin. It is believed that the present island of Ceylon was the Lānka of the Purāṇas, the city of Rāvana. This city of Lānka was situated on the top of the mountain Trikūṭa. This Trikūṭa was a peak of Mahāmeru. Because of a fight between Vāsuki and Vāyubbagavān this peak broke away from Mahāmeru and fell into the ocean. (See Para 5 under Kubera).

2) History. Vīsvakarmā constructed a magnificent city on the top of the mountain Trikūṭa for the use of Kubera. Kubera lived there adored and worshipped by all. One day Kubera travelled by air in an acroplane of his. Kaikas, mother of Rāvana saw that and she became jealous. She called her son to her side and said that at any cost the city of Lānka on the mount Trikūṭa should be captured and given to her. Rāvana along with his brothers went to the Himālayas and performed penance there and obtained several boons from Śiva. Then Śiva conducted a victory march as an arch-opponent.
of all living forces and drove away Kubera from Lāṇkā and took possession of Lāṇkā as the place of his abode. He took along with him all the demons residing in Pātuḷāloka.

3. The design of Lāṇkā. Viṣṇukarmā, the celebrated architect designed the beautiful Lāṇkā and the supreme building ability of Maya brought it into form the enchanting city. On the top of Trikūţā was the all important Nāvaramārga and on a spacious plateau on its top stood the majestic city of Lāṇkā. In the centre was the ten-storied palace of Rāvaṇa and around it in eight different places stood the nine-storied buildings of the great ministers of Rāvaṇa. The nine edifices were like the Navagrahas (nine planets) of Lāṇkā. Each of the nine edifices was built with one of the nine gems and the royal palace in the centre was built by using all the nine gems. Even the sun avoided passing over these buildings and changed his path either a bit to the north or to the south making what is known as the Dākṣiṇāyana and Uttarāyana. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

4. No sand in Lāṇkā. The ancient belief is that there is no sand in Lāṇkā The fourth taraṅga of Kathāmukha-lambaka of Kathāsaratīṣāgara gives a story relating to the reason for this belief.

Garuḍa flew to Devaloka to bring Anūta (nectar) to redeem his mother from her servitude to his step-mother. On his way he took an elephant and tortoise from near the āśrama of Kaśyapa for his food. He sat on a huge banyan tree to eat them. On the ground below the Bīlakhilies were performing penance. The branch on which Garuḍa sat with his food sagged and before it broke Garuḍa took away the elephant and tortoise and deposited them on the mountain Gandhamadana near the ocean. The branch broke and fell into the ocean and the city of Lāṇkā was built on the branch and that was why the ancient people believed there was no sand in Lāṇkā.

5. Other details.
(i) Sahadeva sent Chāṭukacca to collect tribute from the King of Lāṇkā for the Rājasūyayajna of Dharmaputra. (Chapter 31, Dākṣiṇāyapāṭha).
(ii) The people of Lāṇkā attended the Rājasūyayajna of Dharmaputra and took charge of serving rice in the feast. (Śloka 23, Chapter 53, Vana Parva).
(iii) Hanumān once burnt the city of Lāṇkā with a fire from his tail. (See under RĀMA).
(iv) It was Brahmā who gave Lāṇkā at first to Kubera. (Śloka 16, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).
(v) After the death of Rāvaṇa, Vībhīṣaṇa was crowned the King of Lāṇkā (Śloka 5, Chapter 291, Vana Parva).

LĀṆKĀLAKŚMI. A Devi who was relieved of her curse by a hard stroke of his hand by Hanumān.

1. How she came to Lāṇkā. Lāṇkālakśmi was Vijayalakśmi in her previous birth. She was the watch-girl of the treasury of Brahmā and one day finding her negligent of her duties Brahmā cursed her "Go to the earth and be the watch-girl of the palace-gate tower of Rāvaṇa". She begged for relief and Brahmā said, "During the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Rāma his wife Sītā will be carried away by Rāvaṇa and Hanumān will come in search of her to Lāṇkā. You will then block the way of that mighty monkey and he will then strike you down by a fierce blow of his hand. You will be then released from the curse and come back to me."

Vijayalakśmi accordingly was born in Lāṇkā and became the watch-girl of Rāvaṇa’s palace.

2) Release from the curse. Hanumān coming to Lāṇkā in search of Sītā tried to find an opening through which to enter Lāṇkā. Then he saw a huge tower-gate on the northern side of the mountain Suvaḷagiri. When he reached the gate he found it closed. The mighty monkey beat hard on the door and the strong door burst into two and fell on to the floor. Instantly a ferocious woman of enormous size rushed to the gate with a piercing roar and blocked it. Hanumān found the situation dangerous and so gave her a powerful blow and felled her. She then very politely asked Hanumān who he was and Hanumān revealed his identity and told her the purpose of his visit. Lāṇkālakśmi then took leave of Hanumān and leaving Lāṇkā went to Śrī Rāma and worshipped him. Rāma blessed her and she returned to Satyaloka and started doing her duties as before. (Sundara Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

LĀṆṆĪTIKĀ. A holy place. If a man visits this place he will get the benefit of conducting a Vājapeya yajña. (Śloka 15, Chapter 38, Vana Parva).

LĀṆPITĀ. The second wife of a sage called Mandapāla. (See for details under Mandapāla).

LĀṬĀ. A celestial maiden. She was the companion of another Devī of name Vargā. Though she became a crocodile by the curse of a brahmin she was set free by Arjuna. (See under Pañcatirtha).

LĀṬA. A particular division of the Kṣatriyas. Because a set of the Kṣatriyas showed jealousy towards the Brahmins they became Lāṭas. (Śloka 17, Chapter 35, Anuśāsana Parva).

LĀṬĀVEṢṬA. A mountain situated on the southern side of Dvārakā. It had five colours and so resembled the Indracāpa. (Chapter 33, Dākṣiṇāyā Pāṭha, Sabhā Parva).

LAUḤĪṬYA I. A country of Purāṇa fame. This country of out-castes was conquered by Bhima and he took from there different kinds of diamonds. (Śloka 28, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

LAUḤĪṬYA II. A sacred place constructed by the powers of Śrī Rāma. If one bathes in a pond there one would become golden in colour. (Śloka 2, Chapter 83, Vana Parva and Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

LAVA. A son of Sītā. (See under Kuṣa II for more details).

LAVĀṆA(M). A hell. (See under Kāla I).

LAVĀṆA I. A demon. He was the son of a demon called Madhū. Madhuvana on the banks of the river Kālindī was the abode of this demon. This demon was a great oppressor of the Devas and Sātrughna had to kill him. Sātrughna then constructed a beautiful city there and lived there. In recognition of the increasing prosperity of the city it was named Madhuvāra. After the death of Sātrughna his two sons lived there. (4th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

LAVĀṆA II. A King who was a grandson of Harīścandra. He once conducted a Rājaśuṣya in his imagination and became a Cāḍāla. (story in Jñānavāṣiṣṭha). This story was narrated to Śrī Rāma by Vasiṣṭha to teach him the truth that man does not realise that this whole universe is an illusion only because of his ignorance.
Lavaṇa was the King of Uttarapīṇḍa, a country of great fame. He was the grandson of Harīcandra and wished to earn fame by performing Rājaśūya yāga as Harīcandra had done. Lavaṇa decided to perform the yāga in his mind only. He made grand preparations for the yajña. He invited the Rtvikis and after invoking the devas inflamed the sacrificial fire. For one year he observed yāga like that and in the end gave gifts to the brahmīns and the poor. It was all an imaginary performance that the King had in the course of a single day when he indulged in a reverie. In the evening as usual he continued his day to day duties.

One who performs Rājaśūya will have to bear woes and sorrows for a period of twelve years and since Lavaṇa had performed it mentally, Indra sent his agent to give Lavaṇa worries mentally. Indra's agent appeared in the court of King Lavaṇa in the guise of a magician. The magician bowing before the King with awe said, “Lord, I shall show you a magic. See it sitting on your throne. It will be as astounding as if seeing moon rise on the earth”.

Saying this the magician took a bundle of peacock-feathers and waved it against the face of the King. That bundle was capable of producing different objects and visions. The King fixed his eyes on the several glittering spots on the feathers and soon he saw a relative of the Saindhava King approaching the court. Behind him was a beautiful horse. Holding the horse by the reins the new-comer addressed the King thus: “Lord, this horse is as good as Uccaiśrvās and it has been sent by the King of Sindhu to be presented to you. Best things should be given to the best people and only then the value of the thing would be correctly understood.” The magician who was standing near-by supported the stat-ment of the new-comer. He said “Lord, what he says is true. This horse has wonderful powers. Take a tour of all the worlds riding on this horse”. The King sat staring at the horse and he sat thus for an hour and a half. The entire court was perplexed.

After some time the King awoke from his meditation and looking at his courtiers in wonder he said thus: “I shall tell you what happened to me during the short period I was sitting in meditation. While I was looking at the peacock feathers of the magician I felt a desire to go hunting riding on this horse. So I went to the forest alone riding on this horse. Very quickly the horse took me a long distance deviating from the main path and I soon found myself in the dark depths of a huge forest. By the time we reached that forest my mind and body were equally tired and still we went on moving till evening came. Somehow we crossed the forest and reached Jāṅgala. There I found a cluster of lemon trees and to ease my body I caught hold of a creeper hanging from one of the lemon trees. As I did so, to my horror, I found the horse running away from me and leaving me alone. Tired by the day’s travel I sat at a place and dozed. Darkness was creeping in and soon the whole place was in complete darkness. It was very cold also. Somehow I spent the night and when morning came, with hopes I walked around the place. The place was still and no living thing was in sight. As I roamed about I saw a forest-girl coming with a pot of rice. I approached her and asked for some rice. She did not pay any attention to my request and moved on. I followed her and she said she would give me rice if I promised to marry her. In despair I agreed to her condition and she was pleased with my reply. She gave me half of the rice and curry she was carrying to her father and also some lemon-juice to drink. After taking that food I rested for a while.

Her name was Harakeyūrī. As soon as her father came from the fields she told him everything. The candāla was immensely pleased to hear about our marriage and all of us went to their hut. The scene I saw at the hut was astonishing. At one place was the flesh of boars, horses, fowl and crows in a heap and on the intestines of animals hanging from ropes sat birds pecking at them. In the hands of children there were pieces of raw meat and flies hovered round them. The hut presented a disgusting atmosphere and yet I entered and sat on a leaf and my marriage with Harakeyūrī was conducted there. The celebrations of the marriage lasted for seven days and all these days people danced and shouted amidst loud noises of drumming in a hilarious mood of drunkenness.

Eight months passed by very soon and Harakeyūrī became pregnant. She delivered a girl first and soon we had two or three children more. I had to do many cruel and nasty deeds to feed my family and gradually I became old. My hair became grey.

At that time there occurred a great famine and those residing in the forests were put to great trouble. There was no water to drink as all ponds and lakes went dry. Some of us migrated to the vicinity of the Vindhya mountain where there were plenty of water-fountains. A few committed suicide. We also left the place and started walking, taking the children also along with us. After some time we sat under a palm tree completely exhausted. My wife began to weep profusely. She then kissed her children and lay down and started sleeping. Thirsty and hungry my children lay there awaiting death. Unable to witness the scene I jumped up from there deciding to commit suicide myself. Suddenly my vision faded and I was able to see this court and you all. This is the work of that magician”.

The courtiers sat dumb-founded at the incredible story of the King. Suddenly the magician disappeared. The magician after making the King experience the woes of twelve years in a very short time left for the court of Indra.

Next morning King Lavaṇa in the hope of seeing the place and people of his dream in reality near the mountain Vindhya started with his retinue on the false pretext that he was going to conduct a victory march. When he entered a big forest he met with many familiar places and hunters of his dream. Then he saw the hut where he had lived. The same men and women were there all around. Then I saw an old lady lamenting thus: “Oh my dear sons, where did you go from my lap? My dear daughter, have you forsaken me? Oh prince, you came here abandoning all luxury and the beautiful girls of your palace and married my daughter. But God did not allow even her to be your permanent wife. The river of life has to take worthless and mean paths forced by circumstances. A very virtuous King had to come and live with a candāla girl."

Hearing this the King went to her and asked her all details. When she repeated the story the king knew that the lady was the mother of his candāla wife. The King and ministers were surprised to find that his vision was real and within that short period of his meditation he had lived a life of years. This perplexed the King. He then gave the old lady whatever she wanted and after consoling her started for the palace thinking about the wonderful happenings and mysteries of life.

LAVĀṆA III. A demon who lived in the island of Rāmaṇīyaka. He had come to the island long before the serpents came to that place. The serpents saw him when they went there to live. (Śloka 2, Chapter 27, Adī Parva).

LAVĀṆA IV. Another King of the family of Hariścandra. Yogavaisiṣṭha says that this King had participated in several Rājasūya yajñas.

LĀVĀṆĀKA (LĀVĀṆĀKA). A place of Purānic fame near the country of Magadha. There are many forests in this place suitable for hunting and so several kings used to come and stay at Lāvāṇaka in times of old.

LAVĀṆĀSA. A sage. This sage showed very high respect to Dharmaputra. (Śloka 23, Chapter 26, Vana Parva).

LAYA. A King of old. He was a member of the court of Yama. (Śloka 21, Chapter 8, Sarhī Parva).

LEKHĀ (Ś). A deva-gaṇa (set of celestial beings) of Kaivata Manvantara. In this set there are eight Devas named Dhruva, Dhruvakṣit, Pragḥāsa, Pracetas, Bhṛhaspati, Manojaya, Mahāyasās and Yuvanas. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, 2, 36, 76).

LIKHIṬA I. An ancient sage. The King of that land cut off his hands on a charge of theft. But they grew into their original form by the power of the penance of his brother, (Chapter 23, Śaṅkti Parva).

It was a time when the celebrated King Sudyumna was ruling over a country of the river Bāhudā in that country there lived two sages, Saṅkha and Likhiṭa, in two separate hermitages of their own. Once Likhiṭa went to the ārama of his elder brother Saṅkha and finding none but feeling hungry took some vegetables from there and started eating them. While he was eating his brother walked in and he deemed the action of his brother taking the vegetables without his permission as an act of theft. Cutting the hands of the culprit was the punishment accorded by the King at that time to the offender. Saṅkha sent Likhiṭa to the King. The King received the sage respectfully and gave him a seat. The sage then told him all that had happened and then Sudyumna ordered the hands of Likhiṭa to be cut off. Blood was oozing from his hands when Likhiṭa went and bowed before his brother. The brother congratulated him on his accepting the punishment for his crime and asked Likhiṭa to go and take a dip in the Bāhudā river. Likhiṭa bathed in that holy river and then he found both the hands growing like lotus-buds from his body. He rushed to his brother and showed him the hands and then Saṅkha said that it was due to the power of his penance that Likhiṭa got his hands. Then Likhiṭa asked his brother why he did not purify him by his power before. Saṅkha replied that the power of punishing was vested in the King and the King Sudyumna had become great by executing the law correctly.

LIKHIṬA II. An evil-natured priest of Harihāsdhvaja, the King of Campakapurī. Saṅkha his brother also was the King's priest. Harihāsdhvaja blocked the sacrificial horse of the Āśvamedha yajña of Dharmaputra and Arjuna attacked the King to get the horse released. To mobilise an army the King announced that each and every soldier should assemble at the place by day-break the next morning and added that those who disobeyed would be put in burning oil.

By early morning the next day all the soldiers excepting the son of the King arrived at the palace. Sudhanvā, the King's son, was a general of the army and his absence annoyed the King. Harihāsdhvaja was hesitating whether his son should be punished when Likhiṭa advised the King to execute the punishment.

The King put Sudhanvā into a big cauldron of boiling oil but Sudhanvā escaped from it unscathed to the surprise of all. Likhiṭa and Saṅkha said that Sudhanvā escaped because the boiling of the oil was incomplete and uneven. So they boiled the oil again and threw Sudhanvā into it. At this moment a huge palm tree split into two and fell on them and they were killed. (Jaimini Āśvamedhāparva).

LILĀDHYA. A son of Viśvāmitra. He was a Brahmāvādi (Śloka 53, Chapter 4, Anujāśa Parva).

LILĀTILAKAM. The first book of Literary criticism in Malayālam. The author of the book is unknown. The book is divided into eight parts. Manipravāla, Malayālaśabdas, Alāṅkāra, Kāvyagūnas, Kāvyadoṣas and Rasā are critically examined in this book.

LILĀVATI I. Wife of Dhruvasandhi, King of Kosala. (For details see under Dhruvasandhi).

LILĀVATI II. A prostitute who attained Svarga by simply observing the Śuklātstamīvrata in the month of Prōṣṭhapada in which was born Rādhādevī. Chapter seven, Brahmāhṇḍa of Padma Purāṇa contains the following story.

In times of old in Kṛtyugya there was a beautiful prostitute of the name Līlāvati. Once she went away from her own town to another in search of better prospects. There she saw a big assemblage of people in a temple. They were observing Rādhāṣṭamīvrata and worshipping their deities with scented flowers and incense of sweet fragrance. Some were reciting prayers, some were singing and yet others were dancing. The whole atmosphere was filled with devotion. Līlāvati went to them and enquired about it. They told her that that day was the birthday of Rādhādevī, the Śuklātstamī of the month of Prōṣṭhapada, and if anyone observed Vrata on that day worshipping Rādhādevī he would be absolved of all sins.

On hearing that, Līlāvati decided to observe the Vrata. She joined the devotees of the temple and observed the Vrata with great devotion. Soon she died of snake-bite and the servants of Yama came to take her soul to hell because of the sins she had committed as a prostitute. But before the Yamadūtas could touch her, Pāśadas of Mahāvisuṣu wearing the insignia of Saṅkha, Cakra, Gaḍā and Padma came to her with a chariot drawn by kingly swans and took her to heaven.

LIŚGAṆAPURĀṆA. See under Purāṇas.
LIPI (ALPHABET, SCRIPT).

1) Origin. Lipi is the record in writing of the utterances by mouth. There are scientific and non-scientific statements about the origin of lipi. In the beginning people used figures of objects to express their ideas. They were called pictorial writings and are found even now in caves in Spain and France where the aborigines lived. Gradually the pictures vanished and letters took their place.

2) Ancient conception. Purāṇas give a different version. People of Java believe that the script originated from Java. The voice of Indonesia, a government organ, published once a purānic story relating to the origin of the script. Lipi came into being in 78 A.D. Ajaśikha, a saint among the Buddhists, was the originator of the lipi. He had two disciples named Dora and Sempādā. All the three went and stayed in a village in the valley of the mountains of Kontāṅg. The country of Menrāṅgkāmanāl was then ruled by a King called Baka. Ajaśikha heard about this wicked King who had ordered one of his subjects to go to him daily for his food. The people were worried. They tried in secret to find out someone to subdue this tyrant. One day they approached Ajaśikha and requested him to find out a way to get relief from this cruel King. Ajaśikha sent them back promising to do something to help them. Ajaśikha sat in meditation for some time and then told his disciples thus: "I have decided to help the people of Menrāṅgkāmanāl. Dora also should come with me. Sempādā should stay here keeping guard over my sword and clothes. Never give them to anybody but me. You should be prepared to give your life for it."

Ajaśikha and Dora went to see Baka. People discouraged them and advised them not to go to the King. But they did not heed that and straight away went to the presence of Baka. Baka started to kill them but then Ajaśikha said, "Oh King, you can eat me tomorrow. In return please give me today land as big as my headwear." Baka agreed to that and Ajaśikha spread his clothes on the ground. As Baka looked with wonder that small piece of headwear began to grow big and it grew in size to cover the whole of the country. Baka got furious at this and attacked Ajaśikha. But Baka was slain in the duel.

The people burst into joy and made Ajaśikha their King. Ajaśikha then sent Dora to his āśrama to fetch his sword and apparels, little thinking of the instructions he had given to Sempādā. Dora went and asked for the sword and apparels. But Sempādā did not give and a fight ensued in which both were killed.

Ajaśikha felt very sorry when he heard about the death of his disciples. He cursed himself for giving contradictory orders to his disciples and so wrote four lines, each containing five letters, to keep alive the memory of his dutiful disciples. Those twenty letters are the first ones written not only in Java but the whole world. They were the following:

He no co ro ko — There were two disciples.
To so to vo lo — They became enemies because they obeyed the orders of their guru.
Po dho jo yo ṭo — Both of them were brave men.
Mo go bo do ṭo — Both of them died.

3) Bhārata lipis. Different kinds of lipis were prevalent in ancient Bhārata. Lalitavistara mentions about sixty-four kinds of lipis in Bhārata during the time of Buddha. From inscriptions on stones and other historical records it can be gathered that the basis of all the lipis had been two main lipis named Brāhmi and Kharoṣṭhī. Kharoṣṭhī was used in the northwest of Bhārata and became extinct by the 4th Century A.D. Brāhmi was the lipi universally used in Bhārata. This lipi had different forms in the north and south. The lipi in use in the south was called Drāviḍi.

Kharoṣṭhī lipi was written from right to left and the Brāhmi from left to right. Even the Brāhmi was written first from right to left and gradually for the convenience of writing it was changed to one from left to right. Linguists consider Brāhmi lipi as the base of all the lipis of Bhārata. It underwent changes in different parts and took different names. The scholars of Europe are of opinion that the Brāhmi lipi was borrowed from foreign traders in B.C. 800. Others say that the Brāhmi lipi was born out of the pictorial lipi of the Chinese. There are those who say that the Brāhmi lipi originated in Greece and Phoenicia. The great linguist Bulhar says that the Brāhmi lipi came from the Semitic languages. But Lassen and Cunningham refused it.

There is a bundle of leaves in the hand of the idol of Brāhmā in the temple of Bādāmi. Hindus believe that the Brāhmi lipi found in those leaves was written by Brāhmi himself. The Aryans forgot that lipi and Vṛṣa found it out. This is a statement by the Arab traveller Albarūnī who came to India in the 11th century A.D.

4) Kerala lipi. The Brāhmi lipi came to South India by the 3rd century A.D. Many scholars on languages say that Vēṭṭeluttu is a changed form of the Brāhmi lipi. The great lipi expert L.A. Ravi Varma says that 'Elutta' has come from the word 'Elu' or 'Alu' meaning 'to mark by cuts'. The common method of writing in South India was to use a pointed stick, long metal nail or chisel to make marks on leaves, rocks or copper plates. Writing by making marks with the pointed stick (Kol) got the name 'Koleluttu'. Vēṭṭeluttu, Koleluttu and Malayānma were the three lipis in use in Kerala. Vēṭṭeluttu was in vogue in Tamilnadu also. But the Pallavas who were using Prākṛta language when they conquered the northern Tamilnad introduced Granthākṣara and Granthatamil there. T.K. Krishna Menon says that Granthākṣara was a false creation to write Sanskrit easily. In Pāṇḍyadēśa and Malanādu Vēṭṭeluttu was in use even then.

The influence of the Pallavas began to wane and the Tamil lipi slowly rose into prominence. Even then Vēṭṭeluttu was in vogue in the empire of Cera comprising of Malanāḍu, Mysore, Coimbatore, Salem and Tondāmāndalam. When Tamilnadu came under the emperor of Vijayanagara those kings introduced Nāgarī lipi there. Vēṭṭeluttu was called Nānām Monam also. In the south instead of using 'Hari Śrī' people used to say 'Namonārayaṇaya' and the first syllable 'Na' and the second one 'Mo' were used to name the language 'Nānām Monam'.

When the Malayālīs started liking the Maniṇpravīḷā they started using 'Arya elutta' a form of Granthalipi. This script was known as Tulu-Malayālām also. This was also born of the Brāhmillipi. Gradually Vēṭṭeluttu and Koleluttu was in use in the north of Keralā among Muslims. The Alphabets now in use by the different languages of south India took shape only about two centuries ago. The lipi of Malayāḷam now in use came into shape by the time of Eluttaśān spreading the belief that it was Eluttaśān who had made the alphabet. It is wise to believe that the Malayāḷam script came into use gradually from Ārya elutta than to give credit to one individual for its origin.

LOBHA I. One of the spiritual sons of Brahmā. Matsya Purāṇa mentions that Lobha was born from the lip of Brahmā while Bhāgavata mentions that he was the son of Māya.

LOHA I. An Asura. When the Pândavas were living ignorudu. At once the devas made him blind and thus helped the Pândavas. That place later became famous as Lohaṇapura. (Skanda Purāṇa 1, 2, 65).

LOBHA II. An ancient place of India. Arjuna conquered this place during his victory march. (Sloka 25, Chapter 27, Sabhā Parva).

LOHAJANGHA. See under MAKARADAMŚTRA.

LOHAMEKHALA. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 46, Sloka 18, Sālā Parva).

LOHAVAKTRA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 75, Chapter 45, Sālā Parva).

LOHITA I. (ROHITA), Son of Hariścandra. (For details see under HARIŚCANDRA).

LOHITA II. A king of ancient India. This king was conquered by Arjuna. (Sloka 17, Chapter 27, Vana Parva).

LOHITA III. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Sloka 8, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

LOHTAGANGA. A place of Purānic fame. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed five notorious demons like Pañcāja and Virūpākṣa at this place. (Chapter 33, Dākṣīṇātya Pātha, Sabhā Parva).

LOHTĀKSA I. One the four Pārśadas given to Subrah-manya by Brahmā. The other three are Nandisena, Gaṅṭākarna and Kumudamālī. (Sloka 24, Chapter 45, Śalī Parva).

LOHTĀKSA II. A sage who was a Rtvik in the Sarpasatras of Janamejaya. It was this sage who prophesied through a brahmin that the Sarpasatras would never be complete. (Āṣramavāsika Parva, Ch 45, Verse 15; Ch 51, Verse 6; Ch 53, Verse 12).

LOHTAKŚI. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 22, Chapter 46, Sālā Parva).

LOHTĀRANI. A river of Purānic fame of ancient India. (Sloka 18, Chapter 9, Bhūma Parva, M.B.)

LOHTĪŚAVĀ (ROHITĀŚVA). Son of Hariścandra. (See under HARIŚCANDRA).

LOHTIYANI. Daughter of Red Sea and one of the foster-mothers of Subrahmanya. Lohtīyani was a worshipper of the Kadamba tree. (Sloka 40, Chapter 280, Vana Parva).

LOHTYĀ. A great river. The present name of this river is Brahmaputra. The devi of this river sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. (Sloka 22, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

LOKA.

(i) Origin of Loka. There are several views in the Purāṇas regarding the origin of Loka or the world (Universe).

(ii) In the beginning of the universe Mahāviṣṇu alone stood as the Eternal, unseen, unheard, unknown entity. Then there was neither sky nor day, nor night. When the time of creation came Prakṛti entered Viṣṇu as Puruṣa creating emotion. From emotion arose Mahat or the Great Principle and from Mahat arose cosmic egoism (Ahaṁkāra). Ahaṁkāra divided itself into Vaiṣṇā, Taiṣa and Tāmasa. From Ahaṁkāra arose Ākāśa with the quality of sound and from Ākāśa came the air having the quality of touch and from air came fire having the quality of colour and from fire came water having the quality of taste and from water came earth with the quality of smell. All these were born of tāmasic egoism. From tājasic egoism came into being the organs of sense. From the Vaiṣṇā egoism came the ten Vaiṣṇā devas and the eleventh organ of sense, the mind. After that Mahāviṣṇu discharged his virility into water and that virility is life. (Chapter 17, Agni Purāṇa).

(ii) Mahāviṣṇu with a view to creating many different kinds of living things created water first and threw his whole energy into it. That energy grew into a golden mass of an egg and Brahmā was born from that egg. Mahāviṣṇu broke that egg into two, making one half heaven and the other earth. Between the two halves he created the sky. The earth was floating on the waters and he fixed it by anchoring it at ten sides. Then he created Prajāpati, Kāla, Manas, Vāk, Kāma, Krodha and Rati. Then he created thunder, lightning, clouds, rainbows and birds. Then for yajñāsiddhi he created from his face Ṛgveda, Yajurveda and Sāṃveda. He did sacrifices with them. From his hands he created the different Bhūtagrāmas and Sanaṭkumāras. He created Rudra out of Krodha. From his mind were born Marīci, Atri, Āṅgiras, Pulasta, Pulaha, Kratu and Vasiṣṭha. He made these seven Brahmās. These seven Brahmās and Rudra began to create the prajās. Then Prajāpati divided his body into two. One half of it became man and the other woman. Brahmā started creation through that woman. (Chapter 18; Agni Purāṇa).

(iii) In the beginning Mahāviṣṇu in the form of a child lay on a leaf of the Banyan tree. Lying there the Lord began to think like this, “Who am I? Who created me? Why was I created? What should I do here?” At once from the sky came a voice which said:—

!Voice of the Supreme Being

(All these are 1. There is nothing eternal except me). The Lord was surprised by the voice and there appeared before him Mahādevi with four hands bearing the Saṅkha, Cakra, Gādā and Pañcāla one in each hand. She wore divine garments and ornaments and was accompanied by Prosperity as her maid. She was surrounded by such forces as Rāj Rājśī, Viśvākāra, etc. by Rājśī's surrounding by the influx of great powers. The Supreme Being is without quality of any kind. We are all with quality. You have predominance of Sattavaguna. From your navel will arise Brahmā who will be dominated by Rajoguna and from the centre of the forehead of Brahmā will be born Rudra with Tamoguna predominant in him. Brahmā by the power of his pen.

LOBHA 455. LOKA
The constitution of Brahmanḍa. The Brahmanḍa is made up of seven Koṣas (coverings). The one in the extreme interior is very small. The second Koṣa originates from the centre of the first Koṣa. The third Koṣa also has its origin from the first one. Each of them envelopes the one before it. The seventh Koṣa thus originating from the first Koṣa and bursting forth through the other six Koṣas spreads out for millions of miles around. If you cut the Brahmanḍa longitudinally the one in the extreme interior is the earth. Then come Bhūvar-loka, Saṃstha-loka, Mahāloka, Janaloka, Tapaloka, and Satyaloka in succession. The worlds in the lower half are called Pātāla, Rasātala, Mahātala, Talātala, Vātaloka, and Atalā. From Satyaloka to Atalā there are fourteen lokas. The Brahmanḍa consists of the Sūrya, Candra, Sūrya, Sūrya, Sūrya, Sūrya, Sūrya, Sūrya, and Sūrya. From these fourteen lokas to the earth the Bhu-loka, the Bhūvar-loka, the Mahā-loka, the Janaloka, the Tapaloka, and the Satyaloka, there are twentyeight hells. (Vīṣṇu Purāṇa, Ainusa 1.)

Rāhu is ten thousand yojanas below Sūrya. Ten thousand yojanas below Rāhu is the loka of Siddhavīdayādharas. Below that up to the path of the clouds is the loka of the demons, ātma and ātman. Hundred yojanas below this is the Bhūloka (earth). Ten thousand yojanas below the earth and as many yojanas below the world above each are Ataḷa, Vītalā Sutala, Talātala, Mahātala Rasātala and Pātāla. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

3) Origin of life. Brahman originated from the navel of Mahāviṣṇu. Brahman started creation after obtaining permission from Vīṣṇu. In the beginning Brahman created from the mind Marici, Aṅgiras, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Pulaha, Kruṭa, and Pulastiya. They are therefore called the Mānasaputras of Brahman. (Manas = mind, Putra = son.) From his wrath came Rudra, from his lap came Nārada, from his right thumb Daksā, from his mind Sanaka and others and from his left thumb, Vīraṇi. Daksā married Vīraṇi. Daksā got five thousand sons of Vīraṇi. They also got sons. When the population began to increase thus Nārada intervened and questioned the advisability of increasing the population before knowing the capacity of the earth. The sons of Daksā realised the sense in it and started to have a survey of the earth. Daksā was disappointed that the children left him without showing any interest in the work of creation. So he produced another five thousand sons and asked them to start the work of creation. But they were also sent away as before by Nārada. Daksā became angry and he created sixty daughters.

He gave thirteen daughters to Kaśyapa, ten to Dharma, twentyseven to Candra, two to Bhṛgu, four to Arīṣṭane, two to Kṛṣṇa, and two to Aṅgiras. Of these most of the living things in the world were born to Kaśyapa. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata.)

Kaśyapa was the last of the Prajāpati. Kaśyapa married the daughters of Daksā named Aditi, Dīti, Daṇu, Kālikā, Tāmrā, Krodhavāṣa, Manu, and Anālā. Aditi got thirtythree sons and their family consists of the thirtythree crores of Devas. From Dīti were born the daityas or asuras. From Daṇu was born the dānava Hayagrīva. Kālikā got two sons, Naraka and Kālaka. Tāmrā got five daughters, Kanuṣṭī, Bhiṣā, Śyāṇa, Dhrta-rāṣṭri and Sūkhi. Kānūṣṭī gave birth to owls, Bhiṣā to Bānas and Śyāṇa to Śyena in Vultures (Vultures, Kites etc.). Dhrta-rāṣṭri gave birth to Hamisas, Kalahamisas and Koka. Sūkhi gave birth to Natā and Nātā in turn to Vinatā. Krodhavāṣa gave birth to ten daughters; Mṛgī, Mrgamandā, Hāri, Bhadrāmadā, Mātaṇī, Sārđūlī, Śvetā, Surabhī, Surasā and Kādrā. Of these Mṛgī gave birth to beasts, Mrgamandā to trees and plants. Lions and monkeys are the children of Hari, Bhadrāmadā got a daughter named Irāvati. Irāvata was the son of Irāvati. From Mātaṇī were born the elephants and from Sārđūlī the tigers. The Aṣṭadigajas are the sons of Śvetā. Surabhī got two daughters named Koṇiṇi and Gandharvī. Cows are the children of Koṇiṇi and horses are the children of Gandharvī. Serpents are the sons of Surabhī and Kādrā gave birth to snakes. From Manu were born men. Trees are the sons of Anālā. Vinatā got two sons named Aruṇa and Garuda. To Aruṇa were born two sons, Jaṭāyu and Sampati.

4) The end of the World—There are different views in the Purāṇas regarding the end of the world. The different Purāṇas give different views. For knowing the views of Agni Purāṇa on the subject see under the heading ‘Pralaya’. The eleventh Skandha of Bhāgavata gives the following theory regarding the end of the world.

All the material objects of the world will become illusory. Fire will increase. There will be no rains for hundred years together. The World will be burnt by the heat. The heat will go down to the head of Ananta who holds this world on his head. The Saptameghas (Seven Clouds) will rise up in the sunshine infected with the poisonous breath of Ananta. Then rains will start pouring down in streams as thick as the trunk of an elephant. Everything will be drowned in that water. Viṣṇu alone will be left above the vast expanse of water. (See under Manvantara).

LOKĀLOKA. There is a mountain between Loka and Alokā. This is called Lokālokaparvata and the land beside it is called Lokāloka. The mountain is as long as the distance between Mānasottara and Mahāmeru. This place is golden in color and as smooth as glass. Not a single being lives there. God has created this as a boundary to the three worlds. All the planets like the Sun get light from the brilliance of this mountain. Brahmā has posted four diggajas named Vṛṣabha, Puspaçūḍa, Vāmana and Aparājitā in the four corners of this mountain. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

LOKAPĀLA. Indra, Agni, Yama and Varuṇa are called lokapālas. (Śloka 35, Chapter 57, Vana Parva).

LOKAPĀLASYABHĀKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub-divisonal Parva of Sabhā Parva. The chapters five to twelve are included in this.

LOKODDHĀRA. A sacred place of Purānic importance in India. Lord Viṣṇu raised all the worlds at this place. If anyone bathes in a pond there he will be able to liberate the souls of other people from sins. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

LOLA. Son of a great sage called Siddhavirā. Lola in his later birth was born of a queen named Upalāvati. His name then was Tamasama. (Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa).

LOMAHARSAṆA. Father of Sūta who told Purānic stories. (1st Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata). He was a member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 12, Chapter 4, Sabha Parva).

LOMAPĀDA I. (ROMAPĀDA). A King of the country of Aṅga.

2) Other details.

(i) He was a friend of Daśaratha. (Śloka 53, Chapter 110, Vana Parva).

(ii) Once there was no rain in the country of Lomapāda. It was due to a curse from the brahmans and to remove the curse Lomapāda brought Rṣyaśṛṅga to his country. Sāntā, daughter of Daśaratha was living with Lomapāda as his adopted daughter at that time. Lomapāda gave her in marriage to Rṣyaśṛṅga and made him live in his country. The country got rains from that time onwards. (See under Rṣyaśṛṅga and Sāntā).

(iii) Lomapāda constructed a new hermitage for Rṣyaśṛṅga. (Śloka 9, Chapter 113, Vana Parva).

LOMAPĀDA II. A King born of the Yadu dynasty.

2) Birth. Rukmavaca, grandfather of Lomapāda conquered many countries and gave them all as gifts to those brahmans who participated in his Āsvamedha-yaṭa. He got five brave sons, Rukmeṣu, Pṛthurukma, Jyāmagha, Parīgha and Hari. Of them he made Parīgha and Hari great and rule in Vidyaha. Rukmeṣu ruled his father’s country and Pṛthurukma helped his brother. Jyāmagha was sent out from his country and he lived quietly in a hermitage. One day as per the advice of a sage he left the place in a chariot with a flag flying to the shores of the river Narmadā. He had neither servants nor the means for his daily food. He lived on the mountain Rṛṣavān eating only roots and fruits. He was very old and his wife Saibyā also was getting old. They had no sons and still Jyāmagha did not marry again.

Once when Jyāmagha gained a victory in a fight, he brought a girl and entrusted the child to his wife saying “This child is your daughter-in-law.” Saibyā was surprised and enquired “How can that be when I have no son?” Jyāmagha replied, “She is to be the wife of a son who will be born to you soon.” By means of the hard penance of that girl, Saibyā got a handsome son named Vidarbhā. Vidarbhā married her and got two wise sons, Kratha and Kaśika and a third son Lomapāda, who was righteous, virtuous and wise. All the three were great warriors also. Descending in order from Lomapāda came Babhrutruti-Kaśika-Citi. From this Citi came the Cedi dynasty of Kings. (Sṛṣṭi Khanda, Padma Purana, Bhāṣmapustya Sāṁvīda).

LOMAṢA I (ROMAṢA) I. A sage, who was a great story-teller. Many of the stories found as episodes in the Purāṇas were told by this sage. Mahābhārata gives the following details about him.

(1) Lomaṣa was very virtuous and longlived. (Śloka 18, Chapter 31, Vana Parva).

(2) Once Lomaṣa entered the court of Indra and spoke to Indra about Arjuna sitting sharing a half of his seat before him. (Śloka 1, Chapter 47, Vana Parva).

(3) Lomaṣa returned to Kāmyakavana from the court of Indra and gave Yudhīṣṭhira the messages from Indra and Arjuna. (Śloka 33, Chapter 47, Vana Parva).

(4) He prophesied to Arjuna that he would get divine weapons from Śiva. (Śloka 10, Chapter 91, Vana Parva).

(5) Lomaṣa consolved Yudhīṣṭhira when he came to the forests in exile leaving all his happy surroundings in the country. (Sloka 17, Chapter 94, Vana Parva).

(6) He told Dharmaputra the story of Agastya. (Chapter 96, Vana Parva).

(7) Lomaśa told Dharmaputra the stories of Śri Rāma and Parārūma. (Sloka 40, Chapter 99, Vana Parva).

(8) Asuras defeated all the Devas and the latter were perplexed. It was Lomaśa who then advised them to make weapons out of the bones of the sage Dādhīca. (Chapter 100, Vana Parva).

(9) Lomaśa mentioned to the Devas a trick to kill Vṛtrāsura. (Chapter 101, Vana Parva).

(10) The story of Bhaṅgirathā, the episode of Rṣyasrīgā etc. were all told by Lomaśa. (Chapters 103 to 113, Vana Parva).

(11) Lomaśa told Yudhisṭhira the story of the Yāga of King Gaya, the story of the river Payoṣṇi, the glory of the mountain of Vaiḍūrya and the river Narmādā, and the story of Ciyavana the great sage. (Chapter 121, Vana Parva).

(12) He told the Pāṇḍavas the story of Māndhātā. (Chapter 126, Vana Parva).

(13) Lomaśa told Yudhisṭhira the story of Somaka and Jantu. (Chapter 127, Vana Parva).

(14) He praised the glory of the holy place Yamunā-tirtha, known as Plaṅkāparasravaṇa also, near Kuruksetra. (Chapter 129, Vana Parva).

(15) It was Lomaśa who told the story of the emperor Śibi who gave his own flesh to protect a dove which went to him for refuge. (Chapter 130, Vana Parva).

(16) Lomaśa told the story of the sage Āstāvakra to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 133, Vana Parva).

(17) He described the story of Yavakrīta and Medhāvī to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 135, Vana Parva).

(18) Dharmaputra heard the stories of Bharadvāja, Raibhya, Arvāvasu and Parāvasu from Lomaśa. (Chapter 137, Vana Parva).

(19) Lomaśa told Dharmaputra the story of Narākṣa-sura and the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Vāraṇa. (Chapter 142, Vana Parva).

(20) Lomaśa visited Bhīṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Śanti Parva).

(21) Lomaśa praised the glory of giving rice as charity, (Sloka 10, Chapter 67, Anūśāna Parva).

(22) Lomaśa was a sage from the north. (Sloka 46, Chapter 165, Vana Parva).

(23) Lomaśa relieved many nymphs like Prahmohini from their curses. (See under Prahmohini).

LOMAŚA II. A cat. (See under Dīndika).

LOPĀMUDRĀ. Wife of Agastya. (For details see under Agastya).

LUŚA. A Rgvedic hermit. It is mentioned in Rgveda that Luśa and Kutsa were rivals to win the mercy of Indra. Once Luśa and Kutsa invited Indra at the same time, but Indra refused Luśa and put him in prison. Even from the prison Luśa prayed to Indra to visit him. (Rgveda, Maṇḍala 10, Anuvāka 88, Śūkta 5; Jāmiṇīya Brāhmaṇa I.128).

M. MA. This letter has the following three meanings--Prosperity, honour and mother. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

MACAKRUTA. A sacred place on the border of Kurukṣetra. A Yakṣa of name Macakruta keeps guard over this place. If one bows down before this Yakṣa one will have to his credit the benefit of a thousand Godānas (giving away cows in charity). (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, M.B.).

MĀDA I. An Asura. This demon came out of the sacrificial fire of Ciyavana to kill Indra. (See under Ciyavana).

MĀDA II. One of the Mānasaputras (spiritual sons) of Brahmā. Matsuṛa Purāṇa states that Mada was born of the Pride of Brahmā.

MĀDADHĀRA. A mountain. Bhīmaśena, while on his victory march to the cast conquered this mountain. (Sloka 9, Chapter 30, Sakha Parva).

MĀDĀLĀŚA I. A Vidyādhara. She was married to a Vidyādhara named Campaka. (See under Campaka).

MĀDĀLĀŚA II, Wife of Rtaḥvajā, King of Kāśi. Once a demon named Pātaḷaketu carried away Mādālāśa and Rtaḥvajā took her back after defeating Pātaḷaketu in a fight. Alarka was the son of this couple.

MĀDANAMĀLĀ. A celebrated prostitute of the city of Praṭiśṭhāna. Narasimha, King of Praṭiśṭhāna, did not surrender himself to Vikramāditya, emperor of Pāṭaliputra. The resourceful Vikramāditya went to Praṭiśṭhāna and caught hold of the prostitute Mādamaḷā first and then through her subdued the King Narasimha. After that Vikramāditya took Mādamaḷā to his place and made her stay there. (Taranga 4, Ratnaprabhālambaka, Kāthāśātrasāgara).

MĀDANAMĀNCUKĀ. A heroine of 'Vatsarājracarita'. Her mother was a nymph in her previous birth. By a curse of Devendra she was born on earth as Kaliṅgasenā and lived serving in the palace of Udyāna, King of Vatsa. So when the time came a Gandharva named Madanavega fell in love with Kaliṅgasenā. Knowing that Kaliṅgasenā was in love with Udyāna the Gandharva followed her in the garb of the King Udyāna and at last they were married. Kaliṅgasenā soon delivered Madanamāncukā, an incarnation of Rājadevi. When she grew up she married Naravāhanadatta, son of Udyāna. (Madanamāncukālambaka, Kāthāśātrasāgara, Taranga 8).

MĀDANAVEGA. A Gandharva. (See under Madanamāncukā).

MĀDANIKĀ. A nymph, a daughter of Menakā. A demon named Vidyuḍrūpa married her. But Kandhara of the family of Gaura killed Vijyuḍrūpa and took Madaniκā for himself. They got a child named Tārkāsī. (Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa, Chapter 2).

MĀDAYANTI. Wife of King Kalmāṣapāda. He was known as Mitrasaha and Saudāsā also. When Kalmāṣapāda lay cursed Vasistha begot a child of Madayanti named Aśma. Madayanti gave her ear-rings to the sage Uttanka. (For details see under Uttanka and Kalmāṣapāda).

MĀDHAVA I. A synonym of Śri Kṛṣṇa. Because Śri Kṛṣṇa could be properly understood by Manana, Dhyāna and Yoga he got the name Mādhava. (Sloka 4, Chapter 7, Udyoga Parva).

MĀDHAVA II. Son of Vikrama, King of Tālaḥdvajā. The Kriyā Khaṇḍa of Padma Purāṇa gives the following story about him.

Mādhava desired to marry a beautiful and good-natured Kaṭariya girl named Candragalā. She was not prepared for that and she informed Mādhava thus:

"There is a princess in the island of Plāka named Sulocanā. She is far more beautiful than myself and is fit to be your consort. Do try to get her."

Mādhava accepted the advice of Candrakalā and started for the island of Plāka with a servant of his named Praceṣṭa. The news that welcomed him when he reached the island was that the marriage of Sulocanā had been fixed with one Vidyādharā. Undaunted Mādhava sent a love-letter to the princess mentioning his arrival in the city, seeking her hand in marriage. In reply to that Sulocanā wrote that if Mādhava appeared on the marriage-daśa in time she would accept him as her husband.

The marriage day arrived and Mādhava waited for the time of the function. But when the auspicious hour came Mādhava was asleep. Praceṣṭa, his servant, took advantage of the opportunity and carried away Sulocanā. But Sulocanā was determined to marry only Mādhava and she escaped from the custody of Praceṣṭa and reached the palace of a King called Suseṇa and stayed there as a servant wearing the robes of a male, calling himself Viravara.

Viravara, i.e, Sulocanā in disguise, saved Vidyādharā and Praceṣṭa from committing suicide. At that time Mādhava also in despair was about to commit suicide when Sulocanā appeared before him in time and stopped him from doing it. Sulocanā then told him all that had happened and they were happily united as husband and wife.

MĀDHAVA III. A son born to Yadu of his Nāga wife Dhūnnaravanā. The renowned Yādava dynasty was established by this Yadu and his son Mādhava.

(Mahāvīra)

MĀDHAVA IV. A virtuous brahmin. Once when he was about to sacrifice a goat in the sacrificial fire the goat in human voice told the story of its previous birth and requested the brahmin to sacrifice it after reciting the ninth chapter of the Gītā. Mādhava did so and the goat got salvation. (Uttara Kāhanā, Padma Purāṇa).

MĀDHAVI I. Daughter of King Yayāti. A lady recluse she always wore a cover to hide her garment and went on observing a Vṛata called Mrgavṛata: Yayāti gave this daughter in marriage to Gālava. (Śloka 12, Chapter 145, Udyoga Parva). Mādhavī bore a son named Vasūman alias Vasūmanas to Haryāsa, King of Ayodhyā. She got of Divodāsa, King of Kāśi, another son named Pratardana; of the King of Uśīmara she got a son named Śibi. Besides these she got a son named Aṣṭaka of Viśvāmitra. (See under Gālava). When the accrued merit of Yayāti was exhausted and he fell down from heaven Mādhavī consented to part with half of her stock of merit to Yayāti. (See under Yayāti).

MĀDHAVI II. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 7, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MĀDHU I. One of the Asuras born from the ear-wax of Mahāviṣṇu. The other was named Kāṭabha. (For details see under KĀṬABHA).

MĀDHU II. Once there lived in a forest-garden on the shores of the Yamanā an Asura of name. Mādhu. Śatrughna killed this Mādhu and established there a city called Mathurāpuri. (Uttara Kaṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). While Indrajit, son of Rāvaṇa, was performing penance Mādhu carried away a demoness named Kumbhīna and there ensued a fight on that account between Mādhu and Rāvaṇa in which Mādhu was killed.

MĀDHU III. A king who used to sit in the court of Yama and worship him. (Śloka 16, Chapter 8, Saṁhitā Parva).

MĀDHUÇHANDAS. A sage who observed correctly the Ātraṇa of Vānaprastha. He was one of the Brahmāvāddī sons of Viśvāmitra. (Śloka 50, Chapter 4, Anuśasana Parva). Viśvāmitra had a hundred sons like Madhucchandas. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata). The first Sūkta of Rgveda was written by this sage.

MĀDHUΚĀṬABHA(S). Two Asuras named Madhu and Kāṭabha. (See under KĀṬABHA).

MĀDHUΚUMBHA. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 19, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MĀDHU Li. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 19, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MĀDHUṀĀN. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 53, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀDHUṀARKA. One of the children of Garuḍa. (Śloka 14, Chapter 11, Udyoga Parva).

MĀDHUṀA. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 71, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MĀDHUṀARŚVARĀ. A celestial maiden. She once conducted a dance performance in honour of Arjuna. (Śloka 30, Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUṀ ŚAKTA. An Asura. During the time of the emperor Prthu, the earth was turned into a cow and people milked from her the things they wanted. Madhuśakta was the person who did the milking for the Asuras.

MĀDHUṀRĀVA. A sacred place in Kurukṣetra, situated near another holy place called Prthūdaka. If one bathes in a pond there one will have to his credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. (Śloka 15, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUṀSUḌANA. Another name for Śrī Karṇa. Because he killed an Asura named Madhu he was called Madhusudana. (Śloka 16, Chapter 207, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUṀYAṆDA. A sage who was the son of Viśvāmitra. (Sarga 62, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀDHUṀVANA. A forest-garden owned by the great monkey-King Sugriva. After finding out the whereabouts of Śīta, Hanumān and Agāda accompanied by other monkeys entered this garden and drank honey to their heart's content. (Chapter 282, Vana Parva and Sundara Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀDHUṀVARĀ. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 72, Chapter 42, Śalya Parva).

MĀDHUṀVAṬṬ. A sacred place on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a sacred pond there and worships the Manes one will have to one's credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (giving away cows in charity). (Śloka 94, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUṀVIDYĀ. A special mystical lore of the Devas. This was imparted to the sage Dadhiyān by Indra. (See under DADHYĀN).

MĀDHUṀVILĀ (MADHUVILĀ). A river which flows in the neighbourhood of Kardamila kṣetra. This river has another name Samaṅga. This is a very sacred tirtha. Indra who became a Brahmahatyā-sinner by killing Vṛtrāṣura was absolved of his sins by taking a bath in this river. Aṣṭāvakra, the sage with eight bends in his body, got himself perfect by taking a bath in this river obeying the orders of his father Kahoḍaka. (Chapter 135, Vana Parva).
MADIRĀ. Wife of Vasudeva, father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Vasudeva had seven wives named Rohini, Bhadrāmānī, Madirā, Hā, Rοcānī, Pauravi and Devaki (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata). Of these Devaki, Rohini, and Bhadrā abandoned their lives by jumping into the funeral pyre of Vasudeva. (Śloka 18, Chapter 7, Mausala Parva).

MADIRĀKSA (MADIRĀŚVA) I. A brother of Viṣṇu, King of Matsya. When the Kauravas made Trigarta carry away the cattle of Viṣṇu it was Madirāksa who faced Trigarta in a fight. A great light ensued between Trigarta and Madirāksa. He had shown as one of the chieftains of the army of King Viṣṇu. He was a very charitable man well-versed in Dhanurveda (archery). He was killed in the big battle by Dronācārya. Chapters 31, 33, 82 Viṣṇu Parva; 171, Udyoga Parva and 9, Karṇa Parva).

MADIRĀKSA II (MADIRĀŚVA). A king of the dynasty of Ikṣvāku. He was the son of Daśāva. Madirāksa was a saintly king well-versed in archery. He was a very righteous person also. (27-8, Anuśāsana Parva). Madirāksa had a son named Dyumīman and a daughter named Sumadhīyā. (2, 8, Anuśāsana Parva.) After giving Sumadhīya in marriage to a sage named Hiranyahasta Madirāksa attained Svarga. (226: 34 Śaṅti Parva, and 137 : 24 Anuśāsana Parva).

MADOTKĀJA. A feroce lion mentioned in Pānca- tantra (See under Pānca-tantra).

MADRĀ. One of the ten wives of Atrīmahārṣi. Atri got of Madra a son named Soma. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

MADRĀ (M). An ancient place of habitation in Bhāratā. This is situated near the river Jhelum. Mādrā, the wife of Pāṇḍu was a princess of this place. Bhiṣma went to Madra and brought Madrī for Pāṇḍu. (Chapter 112, Ādi Parva). At the time of Arjuna's birth there was a voice from heaven which said, "This child will grow up and capture many countries like Madra". Aśvakī, father of Sāvitrī, was a king of Madra. Karna condemned Madra and Vāihu as countries which had fallen low in virtue. (Chapter 44, Karṇa Parva).

MADRĀKA I. A Kṣatrīya king of ancient Bhārata. He was born of the maternal spirit of the demon Krodhavāda. (Śloka 59, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

MADRĀKA II. Soldiers of the country of Madra were called Madrakas. Madrakas were included in the Kaurava army. (Śloka 7, Chapter 51, Bhiṣma Parva).

MADRĀKALĀNGA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 42, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

MADRĀVARŚI I. Wife of Parīkṣit, son of Abhimanyu. She was the mother of Jñānemjaya. (Śloka 85, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

MADRĀVARŚI II. Another name for Madrī, wife of Pāṇḍu. (Śloka 56, Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva).

MADRĒYAJĀNGALA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 39, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

MADRĪ. Mādrī who was the second wife of Pāṇḍu was a daughter of the King of Madra. She was the sister of Salya. Nakula and Sahadeva took birth from Mādrī. Pāṇḍu expired when he embraced his wife Mādrī. It was because of a curse of the hermit Kindama. Mādrī ended her life in the pyre with her husband. (For further details see under the word PĀΝDU).

MADYA. Wine. There is a story in the seventh Skandha of Devi Bhāgavata showing how Madya happened to be an intoxicant. Once Indra sent out the Aśvinidevas from Devaloka and banned wine to them. They took refuge in Cyavana a great Sage. Cyavana conducted a special Yāga and invited the Aśvinidevas to partake of the Yajñāṇa. Indra objected to this and Cyavana had to face Indra in a fight. Then Cyavana produced from the sacrificial fire a demon named Madā and he rushed at Indra to kill him. Indra then bowed down before Cyavana and craved for pardon. Cyavana withdrew the demon and charming him into four pieces put one each in dice, hunting, wine and women. That was how all the four became intoxicating.

In ancient India there were certain social conventions regarding drinking of alcoholic preparations. All those drinks which were intoxicants were not listed as 'Alcohol'. Wine, honey, toddy, juice of sugarcane, juice of Iruppa and Kūtampuli, and sweet toddy of palm tree were not considered alcohol. Surā (liquor) chiefly meant Paiṣṭi (liquor made out of rice paste). Drinking of Surā was banned to the three castes, Brahmāṇa, Kṣatrīya and Vaiśya. If they drank Surā they had to perform a penance for a year drinking only water or eat long pepper for a year. To be free from the sin of drinking Surā one should wear dress made of animal hair. Even if one drinks water in a pot in which Surā was taken, one should observe Vrata for seven days. (Chapter 173, Agni Purāṇa).

MAGĀ (S). The brahmins residing in the island of Śāka are generally called Magas. The Brahmāṇḍa Parva of Bhaviṣya Purāṇa and the Samba Purāṇa speak about the Magas thus:

Śāma, son of Kṛṣṇa, did severe penance to please Śrīyadeva and pleased with the unwavering devotion of Śāma, Śrīyau gave him a luminous replica of himself for worship. Śāma constructed a beautiful temple by the side of the Candrabhāga river and installed the idol there. He then brought from Śākadvipa the brahmins called Magas for conducting the ceremonies of the temple. All the eighteen families of Maga brahmins came and stayed near the temple at the request of Śāma.

MAGADHA. A famous city of ancient India. Its present name is Rājagriha. The Purāṇas mention many great Kings who had ruled Magadha. Brhadratha was once King of Magadha. (Śloka 30, Chapter 63, Ādi Parva) Jayatsena one of the Kālākeyas was once the King of Magadha. (Śloka 48, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva). Pāṇḍu father of the Pāṇḍavas once attacked Magadha and Dirgha the then King of Magadha was killed by Pāṇḍu. (Chapter 112, Ādi Parva). While Bhadratha was ruling Magadha he passed an order that each and every house should worship the demoness Jārā as a house-goddess. (Śloka 10, Chapter 13, Sabhā Parva). During the time of the Mahābhārata Jarāsandha was the King of Magadha. Śrī Kṛṣṇa made Bhimasena kill Jarāsandha. After his death Śrī Kṛṣṇa made Sahadeva brother of Jarāsandha the King of Magadha. (Śloka 43, Chapter 24, Sābhā Parva). Bhimasena conquered this country during his victory march. The people of Magadha offered gifts to Yudhīṣṭhira at his Rājasūya. (Śloka 18, Chapter 52, Sābhā Parva). The King of Magadha and the people there fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas in the great battle. (Śloka 2, Chapter 53, Udyoga Parva).

MĀGADHAS. A particular tribe of people. If the work of Śūtas was to drive chariots and the work of Pulkasas to hunt, the work of the Māgadhas was that of an adulator. (Chapter 151, Agni Purāṇa). This work of a flatterer was given to them by Brahmā. When the emperor Prthu was born, Brahmā conducted a Yāga. On the day of sūtyā at the place of Somābhīśava of the Yāga a very intelligent Sūta was born. At the same yāga a Māgadhā also was born. He was a great scholar. Then the sages told Māgadhā and Sūta thus: “Praise this king Prthu, who is the valorous son of Vena. Praising is the fittest work suited to you both. Prthu deserves praise.” Then the Sūta-Māgadhās placing their hands on their breasts with respect said, “What do we know of the qualities and capabilities of a king just born? His fame is not known. Based on what should we sing praises of him?” Hearing this the sages said that they should praise him for the qualities which he would be possessing in future. The king was pleased to hear that. Sūta-Māgadhās started singing eulogistic songs based on the qualities and exploits of a Prthu to be. Prthu then appointed Sūta as his charioteer and Māgadhā as his adulator. From then onwards the Sūta family became charioteers and the Māgadhā family flatterers. (Chapters 13—70 Anīsa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).

MĀGADHĪ. A river which flows through the middle of five mountains. (Sarga 32, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MAGHĀ I. A sacred place. If one visits this place one would get the benefit of performing the yajñas like Agni-stoma and Airātra. (Śloka 51, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MAGHĀ II. One of the twentyseven constellations. The importance of this constellation is mentioned in the Mahābhārata in several places.

(i) When the planet Kuja (Mars), during its retrograde motion, comes near the constellation of Magha many unhappy incidents occur in the world. (Śloka 14, Chapter 3, Bhīṣma Parva).

(ii) If Candra stays near Maghā it is an ill omen. (Śloka 2, Chapter 17, Bhīṣma Parva).

(iii) If one gives away land in charity on the day of Maghā one will be rich in children and cattle. (Śloka 12, Chapter 64, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iv) If one gives pudding to the poor on the day of Maghā which comes in the black half of the month of Tūla (October) the Manes will be pleased. (Śloka 7, Chapter 88, Anuśāsana Parva).

(v) If one worships the Manes on the day of Maghā sitting in the shade of an elephant, the manes will be satisfied. (Śloka 8, Chapter 88, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vi) If one conducts the obsequial rites and acts of charity on the day of Maghā one would become the most excellent member of the family. (Śloka 89, Anuśāsana Parva).

MAGHĀ. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 7th Century A.D. The only work of his which has come to light is Śiśūpālavadha known popularly as Magha.

Upamā Kālidāsaya
Bhāraveraṭhagauravam /
Daṇḍinaḥ padalāliyāṁ
Māghe santi trayo gunāḥ //

This is a very famous verse meaning thus: “The simile of Kālidāsa, the depth of the meanings of Bhāravi and the simplicity of language of Daṇḍin are all present in Magha”. This indicates how great a poet Magha was.

From the last part of this Kāya it can be surmised that Magha was the son of Dattaka and grandson of Suprabhadeva. Suprabhadeva was the minister of a King called Dharmadeva. Māgha was born in Gujarat. A literary critic named Jacobi fixes the period of Māgha as the 6th century A.D. while others fix it as the 8th century A.D. Māgha has made references to the drama ‘Nāgānanda’ written by Harṣa. Harṣa was a King during the period 606 to 649 and that is why the period of Magha is fixed after that period.

MĀGHA. A month (February). This is so called because it is closely associated with the constellation Maghā. This month is between the months of Pauṣa and Phālguṇa. Mahābhārata makes some statements about the importance of the month of Māgha.

(i) He who bathes at Prayāga during this month will be free from all sins. (Śloka 37, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

(ii) He who gives gingly as gift to Brahmins during this month will never go to hell. (Śloka 8, Chapter 66, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iii) If one takes food only once a day during the whole of this month one will be born very rich in the next birth. (Śloka 31, Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iv) If one worships Śrī Kṛṣṇa fasting on the Dvādaśi day of Māgha one will get the benefit of conducting a Rājasūya yajña. (Śloka 5, Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

(v) Bhīṣma expressed his desire to Kṛṣṇa to end his life on the aṣṭāṁ day falling in the bright fortnight of the month of Māgha. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167, Śloka 28).

MAHĀBĀHU. One of the hundred sons of Dhitrarāṣṭra. Bhīmasena killed him in the Bhārata Yuddha. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 157, Verse 19).

MAHĀBALA I. Minister of Śrīdatta. (See under the word Śrīdatta).

MAHĀBALA II. A follower of Lord Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 71).

MAHĀBALI. See under the word Bali.

MAHĀBHĀUMA. Son of Aṛiha, a King of the Puru dynasty. He had a son Ayutanāyī by his wife Suyaṅja. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 19).

MAHĀBHAYA. A Rākṣasa. He was born to Adharma by his wife Nīrīti. Mahābhaya had two brothers named Bhaya and Mṛtyu. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 54).

MAHĀBHĪṢAK. A King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He had another name Śantanu. (For further details see under Śantanu).

MAHĀBHŌJA. A Yādava King. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MAHĀCODĀ. A woman follower of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 5).

MAHĀDEVA. Śiva. (See under Śiva).

MAHĀDUTI 1. A King in ancient India. (M.B. Ádi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 232).

MAHĀDUTI 11. One of the sons of the Yaksā Maṇḍhapa by Punyajāni.

MAHĀGĀṆGA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 22 says that abstaining from food for a fortnight after a bath in this place will secure admission to Svargaloka.

MAHĀGAṆKĀ. A prominent river in India. (Mahābhārata, Bliśuna Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 33).

MAHĀGOG. A river (Nāḍa) celebrated in the Purāṇas. It is also known as “Sonabhādarā” and Mahāśoṇa. It is after crossing this river that Kṛṣṇa, Bhīma and Arjuna entered Magadha, the capital of Jārāsandha. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 27).

MAHĀHANU. A nāga born in the family of Taksaka. In Mahābhārata, Ádi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 10, we read that this nāga was burnt to death in Janamejaya’s ‘Sarpasatra’.

MAHĀHANUS. One of the sons of Vasudevā by Rohiṇī. (Matsya Purāṇa).

MAHĀHAYA. A King of the Yayāti dynasty. (Bhagavata, 9th Skandha).

MAHĀHRA. A holy place. One who takes a bath here will never be in misfortune. M.B. Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 48 says that one who takes bath here and spends a month fasting with a pure heart will attain salvation.

MAHĀJĀN. A Brahmaṇa. When Pramadvarā lay bitten by a serpent, this Brahmaṇa came near her with tearful eyes. (See under Pramadvarā).

MAHĀJAYA. A woman follower of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 22).

MAHĀJAYA. One of the two Pārśadas presented to Subrahmanya by Vāsuki, the King of serpents. The other one was Jaya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 52).

MAHĀṆĀLA. A hell. (See under Kāla 1).

MAHĀKĀDAMB. A tree standing on the tall peak of Supārśva mountain. The Purāṇas declare that five big rivers take their sources from the hollow trunk of this big tree. These rivers fall on the top of Supārśva mountain and flow through the western side of Śrīvatsa.

MAHĀKĀL. A sacred place situated in the Śrīvatsa river valley in Ujjain. The Śivalinga in-talled in this place is called “Mahākālā.” Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 49 says that those who take a bath in the Kotīṭhṛtha at this place, get the same effect as tho of an A’vamedha yāga.

MAHĀKAPĀLA. A minister of the Rāksasa Dūśaṇa. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kānda, 23rd Sarga).

MAHĀKAPĀLA 11. A Rāksasa who attacked Rāma and Laksmaṇa at Paṇĉaṭa. In Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kānda, 26th Sarga we read that when Rāma and Laksmaṇa fought with Kharā, Dūśaṇa and Triśiras there were three terrible Rāksasas named Mahākapāla, Sthūlāśaṇa and Pranāthin.

MAHĀKARNI 1. A wicked minister of Ambubīca, King of Magadha. There is a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Ádi Parva, Chapter 203, Verse 19.

MAHĀKRAUNCA. An island in the Krauṇca island. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 7).

MAHĀLAYA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 54 mentions that one who observes a fast at this holy place for one month, will be absorbed of all sins.

MAHĀMĀL. A Rāksasa hero of Rāvaṇa’s army. He was killed in the battle at Paṇḍavaṭi between Rāma and Laksmaṇa on one side and Kharā, Dūśaṇa and Triśiras on the other, over the affair of Śrīpaṇkaḥ. Mahāmālī appeared on the scene as a commander of Kharā’s army. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kānda, 26th Sarga).

MAHĀMANAS. Grand-son of Janamejaya, a King of the Anga dynasty. Mahāśāla was the son of Janamejaya and Mahāmanas was the son of Mahāśāla. Usūnara was the son of Mahāmanas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

MAHĀMĀT. The seventh son of the sage Angiras. There is a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 218, Verse 7.

MAHĀMERU. The golden coloured peak of Himāvān. The seat of Lord Śiva, according to the Purāṇas.

1) General features. Mahāmeru surpasses even the sun in its dazzling golden brilliance. Devas and Gandharvas attend on it on all sides. It is inaccessible to sinners. There are celestial herbs and serpents at its base. It is Mahāmeru that keeps Heaven in its place by supporting it. The atmosphere there, is always alive with the sweet songs of various kinds of birds. Precious stones are scattered all over its surface. All the 35 crores of gods dwell on the sides of this Mountain. (M.B. Ádi Parva, Chapter 17).

There are seventy peaks on Mahāmeru. Mahā Viśnu and Brahmā have their places in Mahāmeru. Viśnu’s place is in the east. There is a special place there for the residence of Mahārṣis. Those who go to Mahāmeru never return. The Sun and Moon go round Mahāmeru everyday. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 163).

There are twenty mountains surrounding Mahāmeru. On the eastern side there are two mountains, Jāra and Devakūṭa. On the western side there are two mountains, Pavamāna and Pārīyātra. On the southern side are the two mountains, Kaivala and Karavāra and on the northern side, the two mountains, Triśira and Makara. Thus Mahāmeru shines like the sun in the midst of eight mountains. In the middle of Mahāmeru is situated Brahmaloka, the abode of Brahmā in a square extending over 10,000 yojanas. This region is of inexpressible splendour. At eight places around this Brahmapuri, are situated the eight posts or abodes of the Aṣṭadikpālas, each of the abodes being 25000 yojanas in extent. Thus there are nine Puris or Cities on the top of Mahāmeru. They are:—(1) Brahmā's Manovatī in the centre. (2) Due east of it, Indra's Amarāvati. (3) In the south-east corner, Agni's Tejovatī. (4) On the southern side, Yama's Saniyamāni. (5) In the south west corner, Nṛti's Krṣṇājanā. (6) On the western side, Varuna's Śraddhāvatī. (7) In the north-west corner, Vāyu's Gandhāvatī. (8) On the northern side, Kubera's Mahodaya.(9) In the north east corner, Iśān's Yaovatī. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).
MAHĀMUKHA

2) Mahāmeru and Laikā. Rāvaṇa's place of abode Laikā was really a peak of Mahāmeru. (For further details, see the previous history of Laikā in Para 5 under the word Kubera).

3) How Mahāmeru got its golden colour. The Purāṇa declare that the sun keeps going round Mahāmeru. Once, while the sun was thus going round, he wished to take a little rest. He asked permission to place the axe of his chariot for a short while on Mahāmeru. The mountain agreed to it. The grateful Sun-god (Sūrya) blessed Mahāmeru that it would henceforth have golden colour. Until it received this blessing, Mahāmeru had the colour of ordinary mountains.

4) Other details.

(i) Two daughters named Ayati and Niyati were born to Mahāmeru. They were married by Dāhāt and Vīdhātā respectively. (Viśu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10).

(ii) Vasiṣṭha had an āśrama near Mahāmeru. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 6).

(iii) Mahāmeru attends on Kubera in Kubera's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 73).

(iv) The extensive Jambū Vṛkṣa stands on the southern side of Mahāmeru. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

(v) At the time of Emperor Pṛthu, the earth was turned into a cow and all living beings obtained all their necessities by milkling her. It was Mahāmeru who stood as 'milk-king man' on behalf of the mountains. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 18).

(vi) In Tripuradahana, it was Mahāmeru which was erected as the flag-staff in Siva's chariot. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 202, Verse 78).

MAHĀPADMAPURA. An ancient place in the south of the Ganga river valley. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 353, Verse 1).

MAHĀPĀGA. A famous river in ancient India. There is a reference to this river in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 28.

MAHĀPARIṣADEśVARA. A follower of Lord Subrahmanyas. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 66).

MAHĀPĀRṢVĀ I. One of the heroic warriors of Rāvaṇa. In the battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa, all those warriors were killed. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter II).

MAHĀPĀRṢVĀ II. A mountain to the north-east of Śiva's abode on the top of Mount Kailāsa. There is a reference to this mountain in Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 21.

MAHĀPRASTHĀNIKA PARVA. A subsidiary Parva in Mahābhārata which describes the Mahāpārṣṭhāna conducted by the Pāṇḍavas after the Bhārata Yuddha.

MAHĀPUMĀN. A mountain. (Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 26).

MAHĀPURA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 26 states that if one takes a bath in this place and leads a pure life here for three nights, one will become fearless.

MAHĀRAUDRA. A Rākṣasa who was the friend of Ghaṭotkaca. He was killed by Duryodhana at the battle of Kurukṣetra. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 20).

MAHĀRAURAVA(M). A narakā (hell). (See the section on Narakā under the word Kāla I).

MAHĀRAVA. A King of the Yadu dynasty. In Mahābhārata, Adī Parva, Chapter 218, we read that this Kṣatriya King had participated in the festival conducted by Yādavas at the Raiavatāka mountain.

MAHARLOKA. A world which was believed by the ancient people to be situated one crore yojanas above the "Dhruvāpāda". Vīṣṇu Purāṇa, Part II, Chapter 7 says that it is there that sages like Bhṛgu live till the end of Kalpa.

MAHĀROMĀ. A King of the Solar dynasty. He was the son of Kṛitrāta and father of Svaṁaromā. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MAHĀŚĀLĀ. A King of the Aṅga dynasty. He was the son of Janamejaya and father of Mahāmanas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

MAHĀŚĀNKHĀ I. A crocodile celebrated in the Purāṇas. He had a head named Saṅkhinī. The seven children born to Saṅkhinī became the Maruts in the Svārociṣa Manvantara. There is a story in Chapter 72, Vāmana Purāṇa about these children who became Maruts.

Ṛtadhvaja, son of Svārociṣa Manu had seven heroic sons. They went to Mahāmeru and began to worship Brāhmaṇ for gaining Indra’s place. Indra was alarmed. He sent the Apsarā woman Pūtānā to the sons of Ṛtadhvaja to obstruct their tapas. There was a river flowing by the side of their āśrama. Ṛtadhvaja’s sons came to the river to take their bath. Just at that time, Pūtānā also came there and began to take bath. At her sight, the young men had an involuntary emission of semen. Saṅkhinī, wife of the crocodile Mahāśānkha swallowed it. The princes whose tapas was interrupted returned to the palace. Pūtānā returned to Indra and reported the matter.

After some years, Saṅkhinī happened to be caught in a fisherman’s net. The fisherman caught her and informed Ṛtadhvaja’s sons about his catch. They took her to the palace and put her in a tank there. In due course Saṅkhinī gave birth to seven children. Immediately after that she attained mokṣa. The children began to cry for mother’s milk, moving about in the water. Then Brāhma appeared to them and told them not to cry and assured them that they would become the Devas of “Vāyu Skandha”. He took them up to the sky and put them in Vāyuskandha. These children were the Maruts of the Svārociṣa Manvantara.

MAHĀŠĀNKHĀ II. A Nāga. Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha says that this Nāga revolves along with the sun in the month of Mārgaśīra.

MAHĀSENA I. Another name for Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 225, Verse 27).

MAHĀSENA II. A prince of Ujjayinī. (See under Angāraaka I).

MAHĀŚĪRAS I. An ancient sage. In Mahābhārata. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 10 we find that this sage shone in the assembly of Dharmaputra.

MAHĀŚĪRAS II. A Nāga. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9 states that this Nāga worships Varuṇa in Varuṇa’s assembly.

MAHĀŚRAMA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, says that a person who spends a night here observing a fast, would obtain “Subhaloka”.

One who spends three months like that will become a “Paramasiddha”. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 17).

MAHĀŚŪRA. One of the Asura leaders who fought against Subrahmanyā. (Skanda Purāṇa, Asura Kānda).

MAHĀŚVA. A King celebrated in the Purāṇas. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19 says that this King now lives in Yama’s assembly.

MAHĀŚVĀNA. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40, Verse 26).

MAHĀTALA. A section of Pāṭala. The descendants of the serpent Kadrū live here. These serpents are many-headed and terrible monsters. Chief among them are Kakaḥa, Taṅkaka, Suṣena, Kāliya and others. All these serpents have long and slender bodies, large hoods and are of very cruel nature. Still they are all afraid of Garuḍa and so live quietly with their families in Mahātala. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

MAHĀṬAPAS. A great sage. Varāhī Purāṇa states that this sage advised King Suprabhā to worship Vīṣṇu.

MAHĀṬEJAS. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 70).

MAHATT. Nārada’s Viṇā (Lute). It was this Mahatī which became the lute in the world, as the result of a curse. (See under Nārada).

MAHATTARA. One of the five sons of the Agni Pāancajanya. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 22, Verse 9).

MAHĀUJAS I. A King of ancient Bhārata. The Pāṇḍavas had invited this King to take part in the great battle. (Śloka 22, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).

MAHĀUJAS II. A dynasty of Kṣatriyas. King Varayu was born in this dynasty. (Śloka 15, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).

MAHĀVEGĀ. A woman follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 16).

MAHĀVĪRA I. A son of Priyavrata. Śvāṃbhuvā Manu had two famous sons named Priyavrata and Uttānapāda. Of them, Priyavrata married Surūpā and Barhiṃmati, the two beautiful and virtuous daughters of Viśvakarma Prajāpati. By his first wife Surūpā, Priyavrata had ten sons, namely, Agnīdhra, Indhamajīva, Yajñabāhu, Mahāvīra, Rukmaśukra, Ghṛtapṛṣṭha, Savana, Medhātiḥi, Vīthotra and Kavi. The youngest of his children was a daughter named Urjjasvatī. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

MAHĀVĪRA II. Mahābhārata, Adī Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 68, refers to a Mahāvīra, who was the re-birth of the Asura Krodhavaśa.

MAHĀVYASAS. A woman follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 28).

MAHENDRA I. Father of the princess Pāṭalī. (See under Pāṭalīputra).

MAHENDRA II. One of the holy mountains. This mountain has great Purānic importance.

(1) After slaughtering the Kṣatriyas to extinction sage Parasūrāma made Mahendra his place of abode. (Śloka 53, Chapter 129, Adī Parva).

(2) Once Arjuna visited the mountain Mahendra. (Śloka 13, Chapter 214, Adī Parva).

(3) The presiding deity of this mountain sits in the court of Kubera worshipping him. (Śloka 30, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).
(4) If one bathes in the pond of Rāmatirtha on the top of this mountain one would get the benefit of performing an Āṣvamedhayāga. (Sloka 16, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

(5) Brahmā went once to this mountain and conducted a ṛgga there. (Sloka 22, Chapter 87, Vana Parva).

(6) Yudhisṭhira during his pilgrimage visited this mountain. (Sloka 30, Chapter 114, Vana Parva).

(7) Paraśurāma gave a dārāsāna (Interview) to Yudhisṭhira on a Caturdāsi day on this mountain. (Sloka 16, Chapter 117, Vana Parva).

(8) Hanumān when he was going in search of Sitā visited this mountain also along with the other monkeys. (Sundara Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MAHENDRAVIKRAMAVARMĀ. A Sanskrit instructor in histrionics who lived in the 7th century A.D. He was a Pallava King and ruled his country during the period 600 to 630 A.D. He is the author of the drama Mattavilāsa. Many verses from Mattavilāsa have been quoted later in many other books. Kānē was the capital of Vikramavarmā.

MAHESA. An incarnation of Siva. When once Vētāḷa, his gatekeeper was born on earth, Śiva and Pārvatī incarnated as Mahēśa and Sārādā on earth. (Sūtrasudra Sanshitā, Śiva Purāṇa).

MAHESVARA. Another name of Śiva.

MĀHESVARAPURA. A holy place. If one worships Śaṅkara (Śiva) at this place, all desires would be fulfilled. (Sloka 129, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀHESVARIDHĀRA. A holy place. He who visits this place would have to his credit the benefit of doing an Āṣvamedhayājāṇa. (Sloka 117, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀHEYA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Sloka 49, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀHIDĀSA. An ācārya (Preceptor). He is believed to be the author of “Aitareya Brāhmaṇa” and “Aitareya Aranyaka”.

According to Čhāndogyoṇaṇiḍsad and Jaiminiya Upaniṣad Brāhmaṇa, Mahīḍāsa lived for 117 years. Although this ācārya was a victim of diseases he was quite indifferent to the painful sufferings caused by them. (Chāndogyoṇaṇisad 3; 16; 7—Jaiminiya Upaniṣad Brāhmaṇa; 4; 2; 11).

MĀHIJIT. A King of Māhiṣmatī who lived in Dvāpara Yuga. He was childless and got a son by observing Vrata on the Ekādaśī day falling in the bright lunar fortnight in the month of Śrāvaṇa (August). (Uttarakhanda, Padma Purāṇa).

MĀHIKA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Sloka 46, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAHILAROPYA. See under Pañcatantra.

MAHIŅĀN. An Ādiya. Bhāgavata 6th Skandha says that Mahinān was the son of Bhaga by Siddhi.

MAHIMABHAṬṬA. A Sanskrit critic who lived in India in the 11th century A.D. His chief work was entitled “Vyaktiviveka”, a treatise on “Alaṅkāra”. The book is divided into three parts. He was a scholar in logic also. He was the author of another book “Tattvotkītokā”.

MAHĪRATHA. A King who earned great merit by observing Vrata in the month of Vaṣaṭkha (May). This King gave to those in hell his one day’s punya and all of them were released from hell.

Mahīratha was a King who became prosperous by accrued punya. Kaśyapa was his guru. The King entrusted the affairs of the state to his ministers and led a very immoral life. The country began to decay day by day and one day Kaśyapa gave Dharma-padeśa to Mahīratha. The Guru said: “Oh King, your body which was in a state of sinning has attained a state of virtue by your association with me. Those well-versed in the Vedas say that the body is of three different kinds. Firstly there is the one which is evil-natured without either virtue or knowledge. Secondly, there is the virtuous one with good conduct. Thirdly, there is the agonising body which hides both virtue and evil. The body without virtue and salvation is always a body of sins. Your body has now become virtuous by becoming devotional to your guru and attending to my words. You are now fit to do virtuous deeds and I shall now make you enjoy the benefits of Vaiṣākhaśaṇa (a bath with religious rites in the month of Vaṣaṭkha (May).

After that Kaśyapa made him take the bath and worship with proper Vedic rites in the month of Vaṣaṭkha. The King became old and died. At once the servants of Kāla (King of Death) came to fetch the soul of Mahīratha. But angels from Mahāvisṇu came and thrusting aside the agents of Kāla took charge of the soul of Mahīratha. Nymphs from above sang in praise of the King whose sin had waned because of Vaṣaṭkharāṭasāṇā (early morning bath in the month of Vaṣaṭkha). The angels from Viṣṇu carrying the soul of the King to Svarga took him through hell. The King heard the agonising cries of those suffering from different kinds of torture in hell. The King made enquiries and feeling compassionate requested those in charge of the hell to release those there in hell then by accepting a portion of the punya acquired by him. The angels agreed to that and the King gave away the Punya he had acquired during one day by observing the Vaṣaṭkhaṇvṛata. At once all those in hell were released from the agony and were sent to heaven. (Vaṣaṭkhamāhātmyaparākaraṇa, Padma Purāṇa, Pātaḷākhanda).

MAHĪṢA. An Asura.

1). Birth. Long ago there was a famous Asura King named Danu. Two sons named Rāmbha and Kāraṃbha were born to him. Having no issue, they decided to worship Mālāvaṇa yaks, praying to be blessed with children. They started tapas, Kāraṃbha, in the middle of water and Rāmbha in the middle of Pañcāgni. Indra was alarmed at their taps. He took the form of a crocodile and went into the water in which Kāraṃbha was standing and caught hold of his feet, pulling him down. Kāraṃbha was drowned. The mighty Rāmbha who was enraged at the death of his brother, decided to cut off his own head and offer it as sacrifice in the fire. He drew his sword and was about to cut off his head, when Agni, the god of fire, appeared before him and stopped him saying:—“Do not kill yourself. Killing another person itself is a sin. Suicide is a more serious sin. Ask for any boon you wish to have; I shall grant it. Do not put an end to your life.”

Then Rāmbha replied:— “If you are prepared to grant me a boon, let me have a son who is more brilliant than yourself and who will be the conqueror.
of all the three worlds. He should not be defeated by Devas or Asuras, and he should be as mighty as the wind, handsome and an expert archer.” Agni replied:—

“You will have such a son by the woman who wins your heart.”

When god Agni had left after saying this, Rambha went to visit Mālayakṣa, who was attended to by Yaksas. There, they had a treasure known as Padma and numerous animals like elephants, horses, buffaloes, cows and sheep. Among them was a three-year-old she-buffalo of exceptional charm and Rambha fell in love with her. She was also irresistibly attracted by him. As fate would have it, a sexual union took place between them.

The she-buffalo became pregnant and Rambha took her with him to his own house in Pātāla. There, the other Dānavas, his kinsmen who came to know of his connection with the she-buffalo, expelled him from their midst as one who had committed a forbidden act. So he returned to Mālavatya-kṣa. The pretty she-buffalo accompanied her husband to the holy Yakaša- maṇḍala.

While they were living there, she gave birth to an attractive buffalo-calf. After that a he-buffalo came across her. But she remained loyal to her Dānava husband who drew his sword and rushed towards the he-buffalo. The terrible beast with his mighty horns attacked Rambha who fell dead on the ground. The widowed Mahiṣi (she-buffalo) sought the protection of the Yaksas. They saved her from the Mahiṣa (He-buffalo). The disappointed and love-stricken Mahiṣa drowned himself in a holy lake and was reborn as a mighty and heroic Asura named Namara. The Mahiṣi spent some time under the protection of the Yaksas. When they cremated Rambha’s body, she jumped into the funeral pyre and burnt herself to death. At once from the middle of the fire there arose a monstrous being. That terrible monster, armed with a sword drove away the Yaksas and killed all the Mahiṣas. Mahiṣa who was the son of Rambha alone was spared. He was the Asura named Raktabīja. He defeated all gods like Indra, Rudra, Śūrya, Vāyu and others.

Mahiṣāsura became the King of the Asuras. The alarmed Devas (gods) abandoned their posts of honour. All the worlds were plunged in darkness. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 17).

2) Mahiṣāsura’s Reign. Mahiṣāsura who was intoxicated with pride on account of the boon he had received, became the undisputed and sole emperor of the three worlds. He formed a strong council of Ministers. Cīkṣura who was puffed with pride and an expert in military Science, was installed as War-Minister and Tāmra, the gifted economist as Finance Minister. The Prime Minister was Asilomā. Bīḍāla was Foreign Minister. Udaraka became Military Commander. Bāṣkalā, Trinetra and Kālabandhaka were assigned the posts of Members of the Executive Council. Skṛcārya was the Education Minister. Mahiṣa strengthened his army. The State Treasury overflowed with wealth. Kings of the neighbouring states paid tribute and bowed their heads to him. The Brāhmaṇas offered the share of yajña to Mahiṣāsura and prostrated before him. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

3) Outbreak of War. After strengthening his position as Emperor of the world, Mahiṣa contemplated the conquest of Heaven. He sent a messenger to Indra. The messenger ordered Indra to surrender to Mahiṣāsura. Indra answered with utter contempt to the messenger and his master Mahiṣa. The messenger returned and reported the matter to Mahiṣāsura who began to tremble with anger.

Although Indra sent away the messenger with scorn, he had no peace of mind. He called together the Devas and discussed what was to be done. They decided to declare war on Mahiṣāsura. Brahmanā and Indra, accompanied by the other Devas set out to hailāsa. From there, taking Paramāśiva with them, they proceeded to Vaikuṇṭha. On arrival there, they offered prayers to Mahāviṣṇu who appeared before them. They submitted to him their grievances and sufferings under the rule of Mahiṣāsura. After deep deliberations, Mahāviṣṇu supported the proposal for war. Thus the war between Devas and Asuras started.

4) Devāsura Tuddha. It was a dreadful war. Mahiṣa himself appeared on the scene of battle. He struck at Indra with his mighty club. Before he received the blow, Indra broke the club with his Thunderbolt. The Asura named Andhaka encountered Mahāviṣṇu. The five arrows of that Asura were broken to pieces by Mahāviṣṇu in the sky itself. Then they started a terrible fight with various weapons such as sword, spear, axe, arrow, discus etc. It lasted for about 50 days without a break. Bāṣkala fought against Indra, Mahiṣa against Rudra, Trinetra against Yamadhama, Mahāhanu against Śrīḍa, and Asilomā against Pracetas. In the course of the battle, Andhaka, struck a blow at Garuḍa with his cudgel. Garuḍa, the vehicle of Viṣṇu was stunned by the blow, but Viṣṇu restored his energy by stroking him gently with his right hand. After that he took up his bow Śārīga and tried to kill Andhaka with a shower of arrows. But the Dāitya warrior countered all of them with 50 arrows which he shot at Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu smashed all of them and sent his destructive weapon “Sudarṣana Cakra” against Andhaka. Without the slightest fear, Andhaka stopped it with his own Cakra weapon and kept Viṣṇu’s weapon at bay and shouted in triumph. Finding that Viṣṇu’s weapon had failed and hearing the scornful shout of Andhaka, the Devas were filled with panic. At this critical moment, Viṣṇu took up his club “Kaumodaki” and rushed into the midst of the Asuras and struck Andhaka with it. Under the blow, the Asura hero reeled and fell down unconscious. At his fall, Mahiṣa himself rushed forward to Viṣṇu with a terrible roar. Then there ensued a bitter fight between Viṣṇu and Mahiṣa. Each began a shower of arrows on the other. But not a single arrow injured either. In the thick of the battle Viṣṇu struck a blow on Mahiṣa’s head and he dropped down unconscious. But ere long the Dānava rose up and taking up his iron pestle aimed a mighty blow at Viṣṇu’s head and brought it down with deadly effect. Under the blow, even Viṣṇu fell unconscious on Garuḍa’s back. Viṣṇu’s condition made Garuḍa withdraw from the scene of battle temporarily, with Viṣṇu on his back. Indra and the other gods began to cry aloud. Śiva, who saw this desperate plight of the Devas, at once came to the battlefield, carrying his trident, ready to fight against
MAHIŠĀ

Mahiša. When he tried to pierce the Asura's chest with his trident, the latter thwarted the blow with his own lance and aimed it at Śiva's breast. Although it actually hit him, Śiva disregarded it and gave another thrust to Mahiša with his trident. By this time Mahāviṣṇu had recovered from his swoon. At once he returned to the field of battle and joined Śiva in his attack on Mahiša. When Mahiša saw that both Śiva and Viṣṇu were launching a combined attack against him, in his wild fury he assumed his own buffalo form and lifting up his tail and shaking his head rushed towards his mighty adversaries. With his terrible horns he lifted up mountain peaks and hurled them at the enemy. But the Deva leaders stopped them with their shower of arrows. Viṣṇu sent his Cakra against him and it made the Asura chief drop down senseless. But he soon recovered and rushed forward to renew his attack with a terrible roar. Viṣṇu then sounded his divine conch “Pāñcācajanya” and drowned the sound of his roar. Just as the roaring of the asura frightened the Devas, the sound of Pāñcācajanya struck terror in the minds of the Asuras.

5) Mahiša's Death. The Asuras were terrified at the sound of Pāñcācajanya. In order to encourage them, Mahiša assumed the form of a lion and rushed into the midst of the army of Devas roaring. Even the Trimūrtis were alarmed for a short while when they saw the fierce beast advancing through their battle-array killing and mauling hundreds of the Devas on either side. Mahāviṣṇu at once sent his weapon Cakra against the lion. The lion was reduced to ashes by it, but Mahiša rose up again in the form of a buffalo and rushed forward. He gave a severe cut on Mahāviṣṇu's chest with his long and powerful horn. Mahāviṣṇu started fleeing to Vaikuṇṭha. At the sight of this, Śiva concluded that Mahiša was proof against killing and so he also fled to Kailāsa riding on his bull. When Viṣṇu and Śiva took to their heels, Brahmā also flew to Satyaloka, riding on this swan. Although the leaders left the field, the rest of the Devas under the leadership of Indra, encountered Mahiša again. Indra drew his Vajra. The Aṣṭadikpālakas assisted him. The battle raged fiercely again. The Devas began to flee for life. Taking this opportunity, Mahišāsura forced his way into Heaven. He planted his Dāitya flag high. He drove out all the remaining Devas. In this way the Asuras took possession of Devaloka. The Devas took shelter on the tops of mountains.

Several centuries passed. The Devas assembled and prayed to Brahmā. He took them again to Vaikuṇṭha. Śiva also arrived there. The Devas submitted their grievances to Viṣṇu. They prayed to him to devise some method by which Mahiša could be killed. Brahmā had given him a boon that no Man was capable of killing him.

Mahāviṣṇu said to them:—"By Virtue of the boon, Mahiša could be killed only by a woman. If we can create a woman who is part of the Devas with their power and glory, we could kill him with her help. So let us try to create such a mighty woman, concentrating all our powers on her. After her creation, we must give her all our weapons."

As soon as Mahāviṣṇu spoke these words, a figure with dazzling effulgence issued forth from Brahmā's face. Both Viṣṇu and Śiva were amazed at the sight of this figure radiating beams of light which were partly cool and partly warm. Similar figures, embodying the peculiar powers and qualities of Viṣṇu, Śiva, Indra, Kubera, Vārūṇa and all other gods, emanated from them. In a moment all these figures merged into a single figure and transformed themselves into a single woman with celestial beauty and having eighteen arms. This woman of exquisite beauty combining all the powers and glories of all the Devas was Devī herself. The devas supplied her with jewels and ornaments and gorgeous clothes. Decked in all glory and with fascinating beauty, riding on a lion, she took her stand at the entrance of Devaloka and challenged Mahiša. At the very first sight of Devī, Mahiša fell in love with her. She declared she would become the wife of the person who could defeat her in battle.

So Mahiša made up his mind to defeat her in a fight. It was a terrible battle. All the Ministers of Mahiša, like Bāṣkala, Durmukha, Tāmra, Cīkṣura, Asilomā and Bīḍāla were slain. At last Mahiša himself appeared on the scene to fight with Devī. Mahiša started with a shower of arrows and Devī countered them all with her own arrows. In the end she attacked him with Viṣṇu's Cakra. The Cakra cut off his throat and he dropped down dead. The devas raised a thunderous shout of joy and triumph. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

MAHISĀDA. A woman follower of Lord Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 28).

MAHISĀKA. (MAHISĀKA): A special tribe. They were once Kṣatriyas but they became Śādāras by their evil mode of living. (Ślokas 22, 23, Chapter 33, Anuśāsana Parva). Arjuna during his victory march conquered this tribe in the south. (Chapter 83, Ā śvamedha Parva).

MAHISĀKA (M). The name given by the Ancient people to modern Mysore. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 59).

MAHISĀKA. An Asura who came into conflict with Subrahmanya. (Skanda Purāṇa).

MAHISĀNANĀ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 25, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MAHISMĀN I. A King of the Hēhaya royal family. It was this King who constructed on the banks of the river Narmada, Mahimsta, the capital city of Kārtavīryārjuna. It got the name of Mahīṃsta because it was constructed by Mahīṃsta (Chapter 2, Brahmandā Purāṇa).

MAHISMĀN II. A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. He was the son of a King called Kuṇi. (Kuṇi is called Kuṇi in some of the Purāṇas). Kuṇi had three other sons named Sabhājīt, Bhadrasesa and Durdama. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAHĪŚMATI. Sixth daughter of Aṅgiras. Mahīṃstati was known as Anumati also. (Śloka 6, Chapter 218, Vana Parva).

MAHĪŚMATI. An ancient city on the banks of river Narmadā. There is reference to this place in many places in the Purāṇas and a few of them are given below:

(i) King Nila was reigning in a country with Mahīṃstati as its capital. Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas during his victorious march to the south conquered this country. (Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) Daśāva, tenth son of Iksväku, had made this city his capital. (Sloka 6, Chapter 2, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iii) Kārtavīryārjuna who had made Māhīśmati the capital of his kingdom had subdued many kings. (Sloka 3, Chapter 152, Anuśāsana Parva). (See under Kārtavīryārjuna.)

MAHODARA I. A serpent born to Kaśyapa of his wife Kadru. (Sloka 16, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

MAHODARA II. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. Bhīmasena killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 19, Chapter 157, Droṇa Parva).

MAHODARA III. An ancient sage. (See under Kapālamocana).

MAHODARA IV. An army chief of Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

MAHODARĀ V. A friend of Ghaṭotkaca son of Bhīma. When Ghaṭotkaca started for Prāgyotisapura to conquer Kāmakaṭikāta, Mahodara also followed him. (Skanda Purāṇa).

MAHODARA VI. One of the sons of Rāvaṇa. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mahodara fought first with Aṅgada and later in a combat with the monkey soldier Nila, he was killed. (Sargas 70, 81, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARA VII. The minister of Sūmāli, grandfather (maternal), of Rāvaṇa. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mahodara accompanied Sūmāli when he came to help Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARA VIII. One of the sons of Viśravas born of his wife Puspotkaṭā. Hanūmān killed this demon in the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 70, Verse 66, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARYA. A King who is worthy of being thought of every morning. (Sloka 55, Chapter 155, Anuśāsana Parva).

MAHOĐAYA. One of the sons of Vasiṣṭha. Once Trīṣāṅku, King of Ayodhya, conducted a yāga with Viśvāmitra as Ritvik and for that yāga Viśvāmitra invited Vasiṣṭha and his son Mahodaya also. But Mahodaya refused to respond to the invitation and sent a message picturing both Viśvāmitra and Trīṣāṅku as Caṇḍālas. Enraged at this insulting message Viśvāmitra cursed Mahodaya to become Śūdra. (Verses 20-21, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Chapter 59, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MAHODAYAPURI. The capital city of Kubera. This is called Alakāpurī also. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MAHOTTHA. A Janapada of Purāṇic fame in Bhirata. The chief of this place, Akroṣa was conquered by Nakula during his victory march. (Sloka 6, Chapter 32, Sabhā Parva).

MAINĀKA I. 1) General information. A mountain. This mountain was the son of Himavān and father of Krauñca. (Sloka 13, Chapter 18, Harivarṇa).

2) How the mountain helped Hanūmān. There is an unbreakable tie between Maināka and the Kings of Iksväku family. There is a story in Bhrāmaṇḍa Purāṇa that the sāgara (ocean) was constructed by the sixty thousand sons of the King Sagara of Iksväku family. This sāgara once gave refuge to Maināka and brought it up. There is a reason for that :

In the early yugas mountains had wings and they used to fly and drop to the ground as they liked. People used to live in fright always and at the request of the people Indra made the mountains stand in a row and cut off their wings. At that time the god Vāyu (wind) took away his friend Maināka and put him in the ocean. From that day onwards Maināka and the ocean developed an intimacy which even death could not wipe off. Hanūmān was the son of Vāyu, the friend and saviour of Maināka. It was because of that that Maināka gave refuge for Hanūmān on his way to Lanka. Because the ocean gave refuge to Maināka after its escape from the sword of Indra and because the ocean (Sāgara) was the creation of the sons of Sagara, a King of the Iksväku race, Maināka felt indebted to Sagara and the entire race to which he belonged. Maināka thus had great respect for Śrī Rāma who belonged to the Iksväku race. This was also responsible for Maināka giving relief to Hanūmān on his way to Lanka. (See under Parvata).

2) Other details.
(i) This mountain is situated near the lake Bindusarovara which was to the north of Kaśīlāsa. Bhagiratha did penance to bring Gangā to the earth on this mountain. (Chapter 3, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) Paṇḍavas who went to the north crossed the mountain Maināka and went further. (Sloka 1, Chapter 139, Vana Parva).

MAINĀKA II. A holy place on the west coast on the banks of the river Narmadā. This is also on a mountain. (Sloka 11, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).

MAINĀKA III. Another mountain. (This is in Krauñcadvipa. (Sloka 18, Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAINDA. One of the monkeys who helped Śrī Rāma in the search for Śītā. Purāṇas give the following information regarding this monkey:

(i) Mainda lived in a cave in Kiśkindhā. While he was living there Sahadeva one of the Paṇḍavas came that way during his victory campaign in Daḵśaṇa Bhārata and fought with him. Sahadeva was defeated. But Mainda was pleased with him and gave him many valuable presents and advised him that no difficulties should be put against Dharmaputra achieving his object. (Sloka 18, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) Mainda was the minister of Sugrīva, King of the monkeys. He was mighty, intelligent, and kind to others. (Sloka 23, Chapter 28, Vana Parva).
(iii) Mainda was one of the leaders who led the monkeys who went in search of Śītā. (Sloka 19, Chapter 283, Vana Parva).
(iv) In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mainda and others also fainted along with Lākṣmaṇa and others. It was only when they washed their faces with the water given by Kubera that they could see things clearly.
(v) Mainda was the son of Aḥvinīdevas. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAITRA I. A demon tribe. Once a sage named Loma’a persuaded Dharmaputra to attack this tribe.

MAITRA II. An auspicious time (Muhūrta). Śrī Kṛṣṇa started on his historic journey to Hastināpura at Maitramuhūrta. (Sloka 6, Chapter 83, Udyoga Parva).
MAITRA III. A constellation. Kṛtavarmā joined the Kaurava side on the day of this constellation. (Sloka 14, Chapter 35, Sālyā Parvā).

MAITRĀVARUṆA. Another name for Vasiṣṭha. Agastya also is known by this name. Because they were born as the sons of Mitra and Varuṇa they got this name. How they came to be reborn as the sons of Mitrāvaruṇas is told in Devī Bhāgavata.

There was once a celebrated emperor named Nimi in the Iksvāku line of Kings. Nimi was the twelfth son of Iksvākū. The agrahāra found near the āśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi, called Jayantapura was constructed by Nimi. Once Nimi decided to perform a big yāga and after taking the consent of his father made preparations for the same. He invited such great sages as Bhūrgu, Aṅgiras, Vāmadeva, Pulastya, Pulaha and Rṣīka. He then went to their family preceptor Vasiṣṭha and requested him to be the chief priest. But Vasiṣṭha had already promised Indra to conduct a yāga for him and so advised Nimi to postpone his yāga to a later date. But Nimi was unwilling to postpone his yāga and so he performed it with Gautama Mahārṣi as the chief priest. It took five hundred years for Nimi to complete the yāga. After five hundred years Vasiṣṭha after completing the yāga of Indra came to see Nimi and found that he had already conducted the yāga without him. Vasiṣṭha was angry and he cursed Nimi saying that Nimi would become bodiless. But powerful Nimi cursed Vasiṣṭha also and separated his soul from his body.

Griefstricken, Vasiṣṭha went to Brahmā and complained to him. Brahmā said, "Oh son, you go and merge with the brilliance of Mitrāvaruṇas and stay there. After some time you will be able to be born without being in a womb; you will then have a memory of the past and you will be very learned and will be worshipped by all".

Vasiṣṭha was pleased to hear that and he circumambulated Brahmā and prostrated before him and then went to the āśrama of Mitrāvaruṇas. He then abandoned his body there and merged with the brilliance of Mitrāvaruṇas. One day Urvaśī with her companions came to the āśrama of Mitrāvaruṇas and attracted by her charm they spent a night with her. Their semen at one time fell into a jar nearby and from it were born two people, Agastya and Vasiṣṭha, (Skandha 6, Devī Bhāgavata).

MAITREYA. A sage of great brilliance of ancient India.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu:—

Somā was born as the son of Maitreya.

2) Other details.
(i) Once Maitreya went to Hastināpura and told Duryodhana that he should behave kindly to the Pāṇḍavas. Duryodhana who did not much relish the advice sat tapping on his thighs with his hands, not seriously attending to the sage. Maitreya was displeased at the discourtesy and cursed that Bhīma would one day break Duryodhana's thighs. (See under Duryodhana).
(ii) Maitreya was a courtier of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 10, Chapter 4, Sahā Parvā).
(iii) Maitreya was one among the sages who visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 6, Chapter 4', Saṁśā Parvā).
(iv) Once he discussed with Vyāsā topics on Dharma. (Chapter 120, Anuśāsana Parvā).
(v) When Śri Kṛṣṇa died, the spiritualistic ideology of Dharmanātha became more dominant and he approached Vidura for Dharma. Vidura sent him to Maitreya. Dharmanātha went to the Āśrama of Maitreya on the banks of the river Gaṅgā and after paying respects to him accepted Dharma (Instruction in law, duty and morals) from him. (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAITREYī. Wife of the sage Yājñavalkya. She was one of the most learned and virtuous women in ancient India. There are innumerable references to her in the Purāṇas. (For details about her splendour see under Candrāṅgada).

MAITRĪ. Daughter of Dakṣa. Thirteen daughters of Dakṣa were married to Dharma. Maitrī was one of them. Maitrī bore a son named Abhaya to Dharmadeva. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAJJANA. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 70, Chapter 45, Sālyā Parvā).

MĀKANDI. A city of the King Drupada. This city was on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. (Śloka 73, Chapter 137, Adī Parvā). See under KAPATAHĪKṢU.

MAKARADAMŚTRA. A prostitute of Mathurā, the birth place of Śri Kṛṣṇa. The story of this woman who had made prostitution and cheating her aim in life was told to Vasavadattā wife of Udayana by Vasantaka. The curbing of the arrogance of Makaradaṁstra by a poor brahmin of name Lohajaṅgha with the help of Vībhīṣaṇa, emperor of the demons, is the theme of the story. Makaradaṁstra had a daughter named Rūpinikā. The mother tried to make the daughter also a prostitute. Once Rūpinikā went to a far-off temple for worship as instructed by her mother. There she met a poor brahmin named Lohajaṅgha and Rūpinikā was attracted to him by his handsome features. She sent word through her maid requesting Lohajaṅgha to come to her house. Rūpinikā came back and waited for her lover to come. After some time Lohajaṅgha came. Makaradaṁstra scrutinised the new-comer with suspicion but Rūpinikā took him to her bed-room. Both of them remained there making love. Makaradaṁstra finding her daughter going against the principles of a prostitute called her to her side and said: "Dear daughter, why do you keep this poor brahmin? Is this the duty of a prostitute? Love and prostitution never go together. We are like dusk. The twilight of love remains for a few seconds only. So do send away this brahmin who has no money."

Rūpinikā discarded the advice of her mother and Makaradaṁstra felt annoyed. She decided to send out Lohajaṅgha somehow. One day a prince came that way and Makaradaṁstra enticed him to her house and requested the prince to accept Rūpinikā and send Lohajaṅgha out of her house.

The prince accepted the request of the mother-prostitute. At that time Rūpinikā had gone to the temple-and Lohajangha for a walk. After some time Lohajangha came as usual and entered the house and Makara-} danstra introduced Lohajangha to the prince. At once the servants of the prince beat Lohajangha and carrying him away out of the house put him in an excrement pit.
Lohajangha somehow escaped from there and ran away.
He was sorry to part with his love and he went on a pilgrimage. He walked for a long distance in the hot sun and feeling tired searched for a shady place to take some rest. Then he saw the carcass of an elephant.
Jackals entering through the buttocks had eaten all llesh and the animal lay hollow inside with the skin in tact on the skeleton. Lohajangha entered the inside of the elephant and slept there. That night it rained heavily and the hole at the buttocks contracted with little space for Lohajangha to get out. The rains continued, the water-level in the river Gaiga rose and soon the carcass of the elephant was carried away to the river and it gradually reached the ocean. At that time a great kite taking it to be flesh for food drew it up and took it to the other side of the ocean. When it pecked it open it found a man inside and frightened left it there and flew away. By this time Lohajangha awoke from his slumber and while he was looking around him in surprise he saw two demons approaching him. The demons thought he had come to the place crossing the ocean like Šri Rāma to bring disaster to them and so they immediately ran up to Vibhīṣaṇa and told him of the incident. Vibhīṣaṇa asked his servants to bring Lohajangha before him and when he was brought before him enquired very politely who he was and why he had come there and how he had come.
In reply to the enquiries Lohajangha said thus: “I am a brahmin from Mathurā. I did penance to please Viṣṇu to get relief from my poverty and one day Viṣṇu appeared before me in person and said, ‘Go to my devotee Vibhīṣaṇa, and he will give you enough wealth to live happily’. It was in a dream and when I awoke
I found myself on this shore. I do not know how it all happened.”

Vibhīṣaṇa was immensely pleased to hear the story of Lohajangha and gave him immense wealth including many precious diamonds, golden replica of the emblem of Viṣṇu consisting of Sankha, Cakra, Gada and Padma and a small kite from the mountain of Svarga-mūla. Accepting all these Lohajangha flew on the back of the kite back to Mathurā and alighted at a deserted place there. Keeping all his valuable articles in a secret place he took one diamond and selling it acquired some cash and with that purchased some ornamental dress for himself. At dusk he dressed himself and holding the emblem of Viṣṇu flew on the back of the kite to the house of Rūpinikā and addressing Rūpinikā in private said, “I am Viṣṇu. I have come to you for a union because you are virtuous” Hearing that Rūpinikā respectfully surrendered herself to him. Before dawn Lohajangha left the house and flew back to the deserti-ed place. Rūpinikā felt herself to be a goddess and did not speak to anybody in the morning. The mother was perplexed to find her daughter observing a vow of silence and questioned her. Rūpinikā then told her mother all that had happened on the previous night.
Makaradanstra wanted to confirm the story of her daughter and so she kept awake that night to see what took place. She found Lohajangha arriving as Viṣṇu on the back of Garuḍa and fully believing him to be Mahāviṣṇu was overjoyed at the fortune of her daughter and running to her the next morning said “Oh, dear daughter, by the grace of Šri Narāyana you have become a goddess. How fortunate am I? You should do one thing for me. You must send me to heaven with this body of mine along with your husband-god.”

Rūpinikā agreed to do so. That night she told the fake Viṣṇu the desire of her mother. Then Lohajangha said:
“Your mother who is a great sinner is not eligible to go to Svarga in her present state. Day after tomorrow on the Dwādaśi day the gates of heaven will open.
Early morning on that day the goblins of Śiva would enter Svarga. I shall then try to send your mother along with them. But your mother should then appear as a goblin. The hair on the head should be shaved at five places and the remaining hair locked to form five tufts of hair. She should wear a garland of bones and the body should be painted black on one side with charcoal and red on the other side with saffron. The painting should be in oil and she should not wear any clothes.
This would make her appear like a goblin of Maheśvara (Śiva) and then there will be no difficulty for me to allow her to enter Svarga.

Lohajangha left the place early in the morning and Rūpinikā told her mother all that her husband told her.
Makaradanstra dressed herself as instructed by Lohajangha and awaited the arrival of the fake Mahāviṣṇu. Lohajangha came at night and Rūpinikā showed him her mother dressed as desired by her husband. Lohajangha took Makaradanstra on the back of his kite and flew up. As he rose high he saw a tall flagstaff of a temple nearby. It had a wheel on its top. Lohajangha placed her on the wheel and said, “Do sit here for a while. I shall soon come back to you and bless you”. To the people assembled in the temple he spoke from the air, “Citizens, today the goddess ‘Māri’, destroyer of everything, will fall on you. If you want to avoid that, remain in this temple and worship Viṣṇu”.

People were frightened when they heard the warning from air and all remained in the temple chanting prays and reciting devotional songs about Viṣṇu. Makara-danstra sat there for a while dreaming about the happiness in store for her in Svarga and awaiting her daughter's husband to come and take her. But Lohajangha had come to the temple in an ordinary dress and was with the crowd in the temple. Time dragged on and it became midnight and Makaradanstra sitting on the wheel of the flagstaff felt uneasy. She could not sit there any longer and she cried aloud, “Oh, I am falling”. People mistook her for Māri and cried back, “Oh, goddess, do not fall” It became morning and in the sunlight they saw a figure sitting on the top of the flagstaff and were surprised. The King was informed and he came to the temple and so also all people from the place.
When the people on scrutinising the figure knew it was Makaradanstra, they all clapped their hands laughing loudly. Hearing the news Rūpinikā also came to the temple and she somehow got her mother down from the flagstaff. The King then made the prostitute tell her story and when it was finished he declared thus: “Who has thus played fraud on this prostitute who had throughout her life cheated other people? If he comes before me now I will give him my crown and Kingdom". Hearing that Lohajângaâha appeared before the King and confessed that he had done the mischief. He then narrated his story to the King and placed before the king the golden Scâl of Visûn's emblem which Vibhûsaâ had given him. The king as per his promise gave Lohajângaâha his kingdom and Rûpinîkâ once more became his. The arrogance of Makaradânsîâ was thus curbed.
(Kâthâmukhabalbaka, Kâthâsarîtâsagara).
MAKARAGIRI. A mountain near Mahâmûr. Mahâ-meru is two thousand yojanas long and six hundred yojanas high and stands in the midst of eight mountains two on each of the four sides. Makaragiri and Trîśîrâ are on the north side. On the east are Jâhara and Devakûta, on the south are Kailâsa and Karâvîra and on the west are Pâvamâna and Pâriyâtā. (8th Skandha, Devî Bhâgavata).
MAKARAKSA. Son of the demon Khara. In the epic battle between Râma and Râvana after the death of Kumbha and Nikumbha the most prominent fighter who entered the battle-field on the side of Râvana was Makaraksâ. He gave a great fight to Râma but was in the end killed by him. (Sarga 79, Yuddha Kânda, Vâlmîkî Râmâyana).
MAKARADHVJAJA I. A son of Hanûmân. He was born to a crocodile living in the ocean as the possession drops fell on her from Hanûmân. (Sârakânda, Ananda Râmâyana).
MAKARADHVJAJA II. One of the sons of Dhârtarâstra.
He was killed in the great battle by Bhûmascâ. (Chapter 92, Droño Parva).
MAKARI. A river of Purânic fame. (Sloka 23, Chapter 9, Bhûsha Parva).
MAKSTOPETA. A dâitya. This dâitya whirls round along with an Aûditya, known as Viûsa in the month of Kârttika. (November) (12th Skandha, Bhâgavata).
MALA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Sloka 39, Chapter 9, Bhûsha Parva).
MALADÀ. One of the wives of Sage Atri. (Brahmânâ Pûrâña, Chapter 38 Verses 74-87).
MALADÀ (S) A community of people who lived in ancient India. From Mahâbhârata, Droño Parva, Chapter 27, we learn that they were the partisans of the Kauravas.
MALAJA. An ancient town celebrated in the Purânas. It is also known as "Aûgâmalajâ". (See under AûGA-MALAJA).
MALATIKÂ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 4, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).
MALAVÎ. A Purânic river to be remembered. (Sloka 25, Chapter 165, Anuśasan Parva).
MALAVA. An ancient country on the west coast of India.
Mahâbhârata contains the following statements regarding Mâlava :
(i) The people of Mâlava participated in the Rásâ-ûya of Yudhîshthira. (Sloka 11, Chapter 34, Sâbha Parva).
(ii) Armed young Kâsîtriyas of Mâlava presented Yudhîshthira with great wealth. (Sloka 15, Chapter 52, Sâbha Parva).
(iii) Karna conquered Mâlava desa. (Sloka 20, Chapter
254, Vana Parva).
(iv) Mâlava was one of the prominent and renowned countries of ancient India (Sloka 60, Chapter 9, Bhûsha Parva).
(v) Obeying the order of Bhûsha the people of Mâlava attacked Arjuna. (Sloka 76, Chapter 59, Bhûsha Parva).
(vi) Sri Kûpa once conquered Mâlavadesa. (Sloka 16, Chapter 19, Droño Parva).
(vii) Parasâûrama exterminated the Kâsîtriyas of Mâlavadesa. (Sloka 11, Chapter 70, Droño Parva).
MALAVA(S). The Kâsîtriyas born to king Aûvapati of his wife Mâlavî are known as Mâlavas. (Sloka 49, Chapter 297, Vana Parva).
MÂLÂVI. The queen of Aûvapati king of Madra. She was the mother of Savîtrî. Aûvapati begot of Mâlavî a hundred sons called Mâlavas.
Yama took to Kâlapuri the soul of Satyavân who was shortlived. Savîtrî, wife of Satyavân, followed Yama.
Yama blessed Savîtrî and said she would have many children and gave life to Satyavân again. Yama said "Satyavân will live for four hundred years and you will get a hundred sons of him. Your father Aûvapati also will get a hundred sons of Mâlavî and the earth will get the name of Savîtri also". Accordingly Mâlavî got a hundred sons and they were called Mâlavas. (Chapter 297, Vana Parva).
MALAYA I. A son of King Rûabhadeva belonging to the Priyavatra dynasty. (Bhâgavata, 5th Skandha).
MALAYA II. A son of Garûda. (M. B. Sâbha Parva Chapter 99, Verse 11).
MALAYA III. A son of Garûda. (Sloka 14, Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).
MALAYA IV. A mountain in South India. The following pieces of information are gathered about this mountain from the Purânas:
(1) The sovereign deity of this mountain attends on Kubera in Kubera's assembly. (M. B. Sâbha Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 32)
(2) The Pândya and Cola Kings collected Sandal Paste essence from the Malaya and Dârdura mountains, filled them in golden pots and presented them to Yudhîshthira.
(M. B. Sâbha Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 33).
(3) The monkeys who went in search of Sîtâ crossed this mountain. (M. B. Vana Parva, Chapter 269, Verse 44).
(4) Malaya is considered as one of the seven chief mountains of India. (M. B. Bhûsha Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11)
(5) Once Mrtyu deity performed tapas on this mountain.
(M. B. Droño Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 26).
(6) In Tripuradahana, Siva used this mountain as the flagstaff of his chariot. (M. B. Droño Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 73).
MALAYA V. In Mahâbhârata there is a description of another Malaya Mountain besides the Malaya mountain of South India. When the sage Sûka ascended Heaven, he saw a Malaya mountain on the way. The celestial women, Urvâśî and Vipracitî used to dance there daily. This Malaya is somewhere above Kailâsa.
(M. B. Sânti Parva, Chapter 332, Verse 21).
MALAYADHVJAJA (PÂNDYA). In Mahâbhârata,
Karna Parva, Chapter 20, we read about a Pândya King named Malayadhvaja who took part in the Kurukshetra battle and was killed in the fight against Aûvathmâ.
MALAYAPRABHA. A King celebrated in Purânas. He ruled over Kurukshetra. Once when there was a famine in the land, King Malayaprabha exempted his subjects from all taxes. The greedy ministers did not like it and they advised him against it. The King yielded to the advice of his ministers. On one occasion Malayaprabha's son Induprabha pleaded with his father and told him that he should not oppress his subjects at the instigation of his evil ministers. He added that the King was their "Kalpa-vrksa" and the subjects were his "Kamadhenus." But the King did not heed the advice of his son. He jokingly said that Induprabha was also their "Kalpa-vrksa". Stung by this taunt, Induprabha took a solemn oath that he would either become a "Kalpa-vrksa" or lay down his life in the attempt. He left the palace at once and began an austere tapas. Indra was pleased and appeared before him. Receiving his blessing, Induprabha returned to his capital and stood there as a "Kalpa-vrksa". He fulfilled the desires of the people. A few days later, Indra came to the tree to test Induprabha. He told Induprabha: "Your mission of service is over; now you may come to Heaven". But he insisted that his subjects also should be taken with him to Heaven. Indra was pleased at the devotion and love of Induprabha for his subjects and agreed to take all his subjects also with him. Induprabha gave up the form of the tree and resuming his own shape, accepted "Bodhisattvacarya".

Kathasaritasagara, Sauadhavat lambaka, 5th Tarara)
MÆLEYA(S). The collective name of the ministers of Vibhișana. The four ministers were: Anala, Anila, Hari and Sampați. (Utar Kânda, Vâalmiki Râyâya) MÀL.I. A demon of great valor.

1) Genealogy and birth. There were two very brave brothers in the demon tribe named Heti and Praheti. They were inseparable companions of Mahâbali. Praheti was unmarried and spent his time in religious pursuits. Heti married Bhayâ sister of Kâla and got a son named Vidyutkesha. Vidyutkesha married Sâlakatañkâ daughter of Sandhîyâ and got a son named Sukeâ. Sukeâ married Devavatî, daughter of Grâmañi, alias Mañmeyâ. Devavâtî delivered three sons, Mâli Sumâlî and Mâlyavân.

2) Boon to Mâli: The three brothers, even while young decided to acquire great strength and started performing penance. When their penance became very fierce Brahma appeared before them in person and asked them what boon they wanted. They said, 'We must be invincible, we must be destroyers of our enemies, we must have long life, we must become rich and powerful ever remaining friendly with each other'. Brahma granted the boon asked for.

3) Family life. After obtaining the boon they went to Vişvakarmâ and asked him to construct a place of abode for them. Vişvakarmâ was frightened and he hastened to suggest a beautiful place for them to live. He said, 'There is a mountain named Trikûta on the shores of the southern sea. There is a mountain on it called Subala. Its main top grazes the sky. Its four sides have been beautifully chiselled. No birds fly to its top. I have constructed there the request of Indra a beautiful city surrounded by walls of gold and adorned on all sides with festoons of gold. That city is called Lânkâ and you, demon-lords, can stay there. You will get glory and prestige which even Indra could not acquire in his Aamarâvâti. If you live in Lânkâ with your followers you will be unconquerable'.

The happy demons with their people went to Lânkâ. They married the daughters of a Gandharva woman named Narmadâ. Mâli married Vasudhâ; Sumâlî, Ketumâtî; and Mâlyavân, Sundari. Mâli begot of his wife Vasudhâ four sons named Anila, Anala, Hari and Sampați. Suñâli got of his wife Ketumâtî ten sons named Prahasta, Akampana, Vîkañ, Khâkamukha, Dhûmrakâsa, Dânḍa, Supârîva, Samâhrîda, Prakâvâtâ and Bhâsakârâ and four daughters named Vekâ, Puspot-kâtâ, Kalka and Kumbhinas.

4) Death. The three brothers attacked Devaloka under the leadership of Mâli and a great fight ensued and Mâli died by the discus of Mahâvisû. (Uttara Râmâyana).

MÀLÍNÌ I. A river which flowed by the side of the ashrama of Kàyû Mûni. The river Cûkka which flows through the district of Saharanpur today was the Mâlini of old. Some believe that Mâlini starts from the Hímâyayas. Sakuntalâ was born on the shores of this river. (Sloka 10, Chapter 72, Ádi Parva).

MÀLÍNÌ II. One of the seven mothers of Subrahmanyâ. (Sloka 10, Chapter 228, Vâna Parva).

MÀLÍNÌ III. A demoness. This maiden was sent to serve Viśravas, father of Râvanâ, by Kubera. Vibhîśana was the son born to Viśravas of Mâlini. (Sloka 3, Chapter 275, Vâna Parva).

MÀLÍNÌ IV. A city of Purânic fame in the country of Aniga. Jarâsandha gave this city to Karna. (Sloka 6, Chapter 5, Sahâ Parva).

MÀLÍNÌ V. The name of Sabari in her previous birth. (See under Sabari).

MÀLÍNÌ VI. A nymph born to Puṣkara of Pramlocâ. (Chapter 8, Verse 14, Viśrâ Parva). King Ruci married this nymph and they got a son named Raucya. The lord of Raucyanvantara was this Raucya. (Mârkandeya Purâna).

MÀLÍNÌ VII. A brahmin woman of very bad character. Because of her evil deeds she was born as a dog in her next birth. It observed then the Sukladvâdâri Vrata and so was born again as the nymph Urvaśî. (2. 7. 24, Skanda Purâna).

MILLARÄSTRA. A country in ancient India. The capital of Millarästra was the present city of Kuśi. At the time of Mahâbhârata, this country was ruled by a King named Pârthiva. There is a statement in the Mahabhârata that this King was defeated by Bhimasena. When the Pândavas discussed the countries in which they were to live "incognito", the name of Millarâstha was also mentioned. (Mahâbhârata, Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 3; Bhîsma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 44; Viśrâ Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 13).

MÄLÝAPINĐAKA. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MÄLÝAVÄN I. A Pârśada of Siva. The most intimate friend of Mâlyavân was Puṣpadanta.

1) Curse of Mâlyavân. Once Siva was telling Pârvatî a story of the Gandharvas and Puṣpadanta heard it as he sat hiding in a place nearby. Pârvatî got angry and was about to curse when Mâlyavân intervened and recommended for mercy. Pârvatî got angrier and cursed them both to be born on earth as men. They begged for relief and Pârvatî said: "In the deep depths of the forest of Vindhyâ mountains there lives a Yakṣa named Suprattkâ who has been turned into a devil called Kânhabhûti by a curse. Puṣpadanta should narrate the story he has now heard to Kânhabhûti and he will then be released from the curse. Kânhabhûti would narrate to Mâlyavân what he has heard from Puṣpadanta and Kānabhitū would then be released from his curse. Mālyavān should then make public the story he has heard and then he will also be released from the curse". Puspadanta was born as Vararuci in the city of Kauśambī and Mālyavān as Guṇādhyā in the city of Supraṭiṣṭhita. (See under Guṇādhyā).

2) Another curse to Mālyavān. By another curse Mālyavān was born as a spider and Puspadanta as an elephant in the south of Bhārata. (See under Puspadanta).

3) Part in Devāsura battle. Released from curses Mālyavān reached the presence of Siva. It was the time of the Devāsura battle and Mālyavān fought on the side of the devas. Mālyavān played a prominent part in the battle. Mālyavān had to fight against a fierce archer named Kolāhala. Kolāhala sent three arrows one each on the forehead and the two shoulders. Mālyavān returned the fight with arrows. Then Kolāhala showing his swiftness of hand tormented him with several different weapons. Unmindful of this vehement attack Mālyavān plucked a hilllock and threw it at Kolāhala. Then suddenly a fierce figure blazing with fire having nine pairs of hands and feet and three heads looking yellow in colour jumped out of the demon and made Mālyavān faint by the terrible heat it gave out. Mālyavān accepted defeat and ran away to the mountain.

(Chapter 13, Part 4, Agni Purāṇa).

MĀLYAVĀN II. Son of the demon Sukeṣa. He was the brother of Mālī and Sumbali.

This Mālyavān was the father of Rāvaṇa's mother. They were all living in Pāṭāla but when Rāvaṇa obtained his boon he sent away Kubera from Lāṅkā and became the ruler of Lāṅkā. Mālyavān and other demons followed Rāvaṇa to Lāṅkā and stayed with him confirming his sovereignty over the place.

In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Sugrīva stole the crown of Rāvaṇa and kicked him on his face. Ashamed of the insult Rāvaṇa went back to his palace and the first person he saw was Mālyavān. The old man had come to advise Rāvaṇa to give back Sitā to Śrī Rāma. But Rāvaṇa did not like the advice and tore to pieces the letter of advice. (For more details see under Mālī).

MĀLYAVĀN III. A mountain. This mountain is situated between the mountains of Meru and Mandara in the country of Hāvrta. This mountain shines like gold.

(Chapter 7, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀLYAVĀN IV. Another mountain near the Hīmālayas. The Pāṇḍavas visited this mountain on their way to the mountain Gandhamadāna from the Āṛtmā of Āṛṣṭiṃ. (Chapter 153, Vana Parva).

MĀLYAVĀN V. A mountain situated in the country of Kiskindhā. The fight between Bāli and Sugrīva took place near this mountain. This is on the banks of the river Tūīgabhadrā. Uttara Rāmaṇya states that the palace of Sugrīva was on the top of this mountain. Śrī Rāma stayed on the beautiful peak of this mountain for four months. (Sloka 40, Chapter 280, Vana Parva).

MĀMĀNKAM. Māmāṅkam was a very important national festival of Kerala. This festival used to be conducted on the sandy beach of Tirūnāvāya. It represented the crowning ceremony of the sovereign of Kerala. There used to be a grand assembly of all the artists of Kerala. There was an exhibition of the arts, trade and commerce of the land attracting a huge crowd of people from different parts of Bhārata. Scholars believe that the word Māmāṅkam is derived from the Sanskrit word "Māḥa-maghā". Some say that it was so called because it was conducted on the day of Māghā in the month of Māgha.

The festival was conducted under the auspices of the supreme power in Malabar. For a long period Perumāls were in power in Malabar and so Māmāṅkam was conducted under the control of the Perumāls. The last of the line of Perumāls handed over the right to the then mighty chief, the King of Valluvanād and for several years Māmāṅkam was conducted under his auspices. The foreign traders who came to Malabar, the Mohammadians and the Portuguese, persuaded Sāmūṭiri (zamorin) to take control of this festival and with the help of the foreigners Sāmūṭiri wrested the right of conducting the Māmāṅkam. After some time the King of Valluvanād made an attempt to get back the right from Sāmūṭiri. This enraged Sāmūṭiri and there ensued a fight between them resulting in much shedding of blood. An agreement was reached that after twelve years each would relinquish the right in favour of the other. So after twelve years Sāmūṭiri was compelled to relinquish his right but by resorting to many sly tactics he retained the right. The strength of Sāmūṭiri increased and he became a great power in Malabar. He was bold enough to send away the Portuguese from the coast and Sāmūṭiri maintained his position till the advent of Tippu Sultan to Malabar in the year 1788 A.D. Every twelve years Sāmūṭiri had to show his might to retain the right of the Māmāṅkam and those of exhibiting strength were ghastly.

The place of this Māmāṅkam was at Tirūnāvāya in Tirūr taluk. A Siva temple of historic fame stands on the shores of the river Bhārata flowing through Tirūr taluk. There was an expansive sand beach on its shores, become famous by being the scene of many socio-political events there. It was the venue of the mighty Nambūdīris of Malabar to discuss matters of socio-political importance. Every year on the full-moon day in the month of Māgha all the ruling chiefs of Kerala would assemble there and on a special dais there Sāmūṭiri would sit with royal robes and a sword in his right hand presiding over the assembly. The sword was given to the Sāmūṭiris by Ceramān Perumāl and was considered the symbol of undisputed sovereignty of Kerala. It was also a sanction to conduct the Māmāṅkam. The Sāmūṭiris came prepared to give a fight if their authority was challenged by anybody. The ruling Sāmūṭiri would send an invitation to all chiefs of Kerala. On either side of Sāmūṭiri would sit the relatives and friends of Sāmūṭiri. There would be an army of Naiks and Tiyyas ready outside and only after defeating them could anybody approach the dais of Sāmūṭiri. The dais was called Nilāpattutuṭa. The whole atmosphere would resound with drummings and shots from pop-guns. Majestic elephants adorned with golden headaddresses would be arrayed there. The conference of the chiefs would last for twelve days and the festival for twenty-four days. The Māmāṅkam attracted a huge crowd from far and wide because there were then many items of interest and information. The Māmāṅkam commenced on a fixed day at an auspicious hour in the morning when the caparisoned elephants started moving to the accompaniment of drums and pipes. The last Māmāṅkam was in 1735 A.D. By the time of Mārtanda Varmā the centre of power shifted from Malabar to the south. Even today the memories of the same are brightening spots in the history of Malabar.

MAMAYA. Mother of the sage Dirghatamas. (See under Dirghatamas).

MAMMATA. An Indian scholar who lived about 1100 A.D. He was a great scholar and critic in Sanskrit and was born in Kashmir. His masterpiece was a great book "Kāvya Prakāsa". It is divided into ten chapters. Each chapter is entitled "Ullāsa". There is a view expressed by some people that Mammtā wrote only the first nine chapters of this book and the last chapter was written by another scholar named Alaka. Numerous commentaries on Mammtā’s Kāvya Prakāsa have been published. It is said that Patañjali’s commentator Kyayata was the brother of Mammtā. "Sabda Vyāpāra Vicitra" is another book written by Mammtā.

MAMTA I. The disciple of Gautama and the guru of Ātreya. (Bṛhadāranyaka Upanisad).

MAMTA II. A devotee of Śiva. He was the father of the famous Kālabhūti. (See under Kālabhūti).

MĀNAGARVĀ. A celestial maiden who was born as a she-monkey in the vicinity of the Himalayas by a curse of Brahmā. She became the wife of a monkey named Kṣara. She was named Ațijānā and was the mother of Hanūmān. (For details see under Hanūmān).

MĀNAS A. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 5, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MĀNAS A II. A serpent born of the family of Dhrtāraṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MĀNAS A IV. (MĀNASASARASAS). A lake on the peak of the Himalayas. Arjuna visited this lake once. (Śloka 4, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva). In the precincts of this lake many devotees conduct Śiva-worship. They believe they would merge with Śiva at the end of the yuga. Those who bathe in that pond would acquire mokṣa. Mānasasara is called Ujñānaka also. Vasistha and Arundhati became realised souls at this place. (Śloka 14, Chapter 130, Vana Parva). A sage who lived in Mānasasara in the form of a swan visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 98, Chapter 119, Bhīṣma Parva). Once a Devī named Upaśuti pointed out Indra who was hiding amongst the lotus stems in Mānasasaras. It was Brahmā who made this lotus lake and the river Sarayū starts from here. (Bālākīṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MĀNASĀDEVI. A devi born of the mind of Kaśyapa Prjāpāti. She is known as Jaratkārū also. (For details see under Jaratkārū II).

MĀNASADVĀRA. A mountain near Mānasasaras. Because the entrance to the lake of Mānasasara was through this mountain it got the name of Mānasadvāra. In the centre of this was an aṭarāma of Parasurāma. (Śloka 12, Chapter 130, Vana Parva).

MĀNASAPUTRAS. The Prjāpātis created by Brahmā from his mind are called the Mānasaputras or spiritual sons of Brahmā. They are Bhṛgu, Pulastos, Puḥala, Kratu, Anīgiras, Maṛići, Dakṣa, Atri and Vasīṣṭha. They are nine in number. (Chapter 7, Aṛiśa I, Viṣṇu Purāṇa). They are all Prjāpātis and their wives are in order Khyāṭī, Bhūti, Sambhūti, Kṣamā, Priti, Sannāti, Īrijā, Aṇāṣī and Praṣūtī.

MANASVINI. A daughter of Dakṣaprjāpati. She became the wife of Dharmarāja, Candra was born of this Manasvini. (Śloka 19, Chapter 96, Vana Parva).

MANASYU. A King of the Pūru dynasty. He was the grandson of Pūru and the son of Pravīra. His mother was Sūrasenī. Manasyu begot of his wife Saurī three sons named Śakta, Suśāhana and Vāmī. (Śloka 6, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

MĀṆĀVA. A scholar and an authority on Dharmāśra. He was the author of three books namely, Māṇavapurāṇa, Māṇavārautasūtra and Māṇavavāstulakṣaṇa.

MĀṆĀVARĀ. She was the wife of Arthalaobha who was the house-keeper of Bāhubala, King of Kāṇeś. This Māṇavarā divorced her husband to marry one who was more wealthy. (Kathāśārītāgara).

MĀṆĀVĀRJĀKA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 50, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀVĪ. A prominent river of ancient India. (Śloka 32, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀDĀGA I. A river of Purānic fame. (Śloka 33, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀDĀGA II. A place in the island of Śaka. The Śādras who reside there are all virtuous people. (Śloka 38, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀDAKA I. One of the sons born to the Yakṣa Manibhadra of his wife Pūnayajī. (Śloka 43, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀDAKA II. A place of habitation of Purānic fame in ancient India. (Śloka 43, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀDĀKĀRNĪ (ŚATĀKĀRNĪ). A sage. Once this sage spent ten thousand years in a pond performing penance. Devas were bewildered and they sent five beautiful celestial maidens to divert the attention of the sage from his severe austerities. They enticed him and the sage constructed a grand and palatial house for them and stayed there with them. There was always music and dance there. The pond was thereafter known as ‘Paṇḍācāparā’. Rāma and Laksmanā during their exile in the forests with Śītā visited this place. (Sarga 11, Aranyakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ I. A maid who fell in love with Bhrīṛhari. (See under Bhrīṛhari).

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ II. A river which flows near the mountain of Citrakūṭa. If one bathes in this river one will have to one’s credit the benefit of performing one Aṣva-medha yajña. If one lives there bathing in that river daily, one will become possessed of Rājālakṣaṇī (wealth and majesty of a King). (Śloka 29, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ III. A river celebrated in the Purāṇas, taking its source from the chain of Kedāra mountains in Uttarā khaṇḍa. It is also known as Mandāgni and Kālīgaṅgā. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 89, Verse 34).

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ IV. Kubera’s park. Since this park is watered by Gaṅga, it acquired the name Mandākinī. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 82).

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ V. Ākāsa Gaṅgā.

MĀṆĀKĪNĪ VI. One of the two wives of Vitalavas, son of Pulastya. A son, Kubera was born to her by the blessing of Śiva. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa).
MANḌALAKA

MANḌALAKA, A serpent born of the family of Taśaka. This was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 8, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MANḌAPĀLA. A sage. This sage went to the land of the Manes by his powers of penance but returned to earth unable to obtain merit there. He then married a bird and led a family life. (For details see 8th para under Khaṇḍadvadāhā).

MANḌARA I. A tortoise which is a character in the book Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

MANḌARA II. A brāhmaṇa who is greatly extolled in Sivapurāṇa. (See under Śrāvaka).

MANḌARĀ. One of the wives of Viśvakarmā. The monkey named Nāla was the son of Mandarā. This monkey was the chief of those who helped Śrī Rāma to build a bridge to Lanka. Viśvakarmā had once blessed Mandarā saying that her son would one day become great. (Sarga 22, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MANḌARĀ I. Eldest son of Hiranyakāśipu. Receiving a boon from Śiva he fought with Indra for crores of years. Mahā Viṣṇu’s weapon Cakra and Indra’s weapon Vajra, were smashed to pieces when they hit his strong body. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 32).

MANḌARĀ II. A son of the sage Dhaumya. He married Śamikā, the virgin daughter of the Brāhmaṇa Auvra who was a native of Mālava land. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa, 2, 34, 14).

MANḌARALAKŚMI. Queen of the King named Siṁhadvajā. (See under Siṁhadvajā).

MANḌARAPARVATA (MANḌARĀCAŁA). A mountain of Purāṇic fame. The following information is gathered from Mahābhārata regarding this mountain: (1) This mountain rises up ten thousand yojanas and also goes down to ten thousand yojanas. (Chapter 18, Śloka 17, Ādi Parva). (2) During the time of the churning of Kṣīrādbhī (ocean of Milk) the serpent Ananta brought this mountain as per instructions from Mahāviṣṇu. (Śloka 6, Chapter 18, Ādi Parva). (3) It was this mountain that was used as the Mantha (churning stick) when the milk-ocean was churned. (Śloka 13, Chapter 18, Ādi Parva). (4) During the time of churning the Milk-Ocean many inhabitants of Pātāla and animals in the ocean were killed because of the rubbing of this mountain. (Śloka 26, Chapter 18, Ādi Parva). (5) This mountain resides in the court of Kubera as Devātmā. (Śloka 81, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva). (6) This mountain is situated near Kailāsa. Eighty-eight thousand Gandharvas and four times as much of Yaśakinnaras reside on the top of this mountain, along with Kubera and a yakṣa named Manīvara. (Śloka 5, Chapter 139, Vana Parva). (7) Once in a dream Arjuna conducted a trip to Kailāsa accompanied by Śrī Kṛṣṇa and on his way he halted at this mountain. The mountain then shone with the presence of nymphs and heavenly songsters. (Śloka 33, Chapter 80, Droṇa Parva). (8) In destroying the notorious demon trio called Tripuras, Śiva used this mountain as a bow. (Śloka 76, Chapter 202, Droṇa Parva). (9) Once when the Sage Aṣṭāvakra was conducting a tour of the northern parts he stayed on this mountain for some time. (Śloka 54, Chapter 19, Anuśasana Parva).

MANDĀRAVATI. A heroine in Kathāsarīṭāgara. She is the heroine of the story told by the second Vētāla to King Trivikramaśena. (See under Vētāla).

MĀNDAVI. Wife of Bharata. Rāma married Śrī Rāma married Sītā; Bharata, Māndavī; Laksmana, Urmilā and Sātrughna, Srutakirti (Sarga 73, Bālakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). Māndavī, Urmilā and Srutakirti were the daughters of Kuśadvajā, brother of Janaka. (Bīla Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). Bharata got two sons of Māndavī named Subhā and Śrūṣasena. Both of them defeated the Gandharvas and established cities one on each side of the river Sindhu. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀNDAVISARPİṇI. A louse, a character in a story of Pañcatantra. (For details see under Pañcatantra).

MĀNDAYYA. A sage. He is known as Anjāmāndavīya also. Once Rāvaṇa beat Māndavīya because of his not respecting Rāvaṇa. That day Māndavīya cursed him saying “You will also be beaten like this by a brave monkey”. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). (More details can be had from the entry Anjāmāndavīya). The āśrama of Māndavīya is considered a holy place. Once the King of Kāśi went to this āśrama and performed severe penance there. (Chapter 186, Udyoga Parva).

MĀNDEHA(S). See the 2nd para under Pakal.

MĀṇḍHĀTA. A King of pre-eminence in the dynasty of Ikṣvāku.

2) Birth. Yuvanāśva, father of Māṇḍhātā had a hundred wives. Still he had no children. Greatly grieftwrenched by the lack of a son he went to the forests to see people of virtue and piety. During his wandering in the forest he happened to reach a club of sages. Yuvanāśva went and sat in their midst. He was happy to be in their midst but was worried in his mind and so he sent up deep sighs as he sat there sad and silent. The sages asked him why he looked so sad and the King crying like a child told them the cause of his grief. The sages took pity on him and made him conduct the yāga 'Indra-devatāv'. They brought a jug of water made pot in front of the pot in the yāga-devatā. The yāga was coming to an end. One day the King felt unusually thirsty and unwilling to disturb the sages who were taking rest the King entered the yāga-devatā and finding a jug there full of water drank from it and quenched his thirst, little knowing that it contained the water made pot for a specific purpose by the sages. The next day when the sages went to the yāga-devatā they found the jug almost empty and were worried and started making enquiries. The King then confessed what he had done. The sages said that it was futile to fight against fate and somehow finished the yāga and went to their āśramas. The King became pregnant and after ten months a child came out bursting open the right side of his stomach. The King consulted his ministers as to what should be done with the child and on their advice the child was taken to the forests and left there. But the child was protected by the Devas and they enquired among themselves as to whose breast-feeding it would get when Indra appeared and said “Mām Dhātā”, meaning it would drink me. That was how the child got the name ‘Māndhātā’. Indra thrust the child’s big toe into its mouth and the child began to suck milk through it. Māndhātā who grew thus drinking its own toe became a mighty man of renown. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

3) Administration of the state and marriage. When Māndhātā became a man of great strength his father died and he ascended the throne and became an Emperor of great fame. He conquered many kingdoms. He made his enemies flee from him. Because he intimated the dasyus he got the name Trasadasyu. He married the perfect-figured chaste daughter Bindumati of Śaṭābindurāja. She got two sons named Purukutsa and Mucukunda.

The Purāṇas state that Māndhātā had another son named Āmbariṣa and fifty daughters who were all married to a sage named Saubhari.

4) How he caused rains in the country. Māndhātā ruled the country very virtuously without at any time going against truth and justice and his country became prosperous. Once it so happened that there were no rains for three successive years in the country and the greatly worried King went to the forests to know from the great sages there the reason for such a calamity. The sages told the King thus: "Oh King, of all yugas Kṛta-yuga is the best. This yuga is a brahmin-predominant one and Dharma stands on four legs. Penance is for brahmins only and no man of any other caste can do penance in this yuga. But in your country a Śūdra is performing penance and that is why the clouds refuse to shower rains. Kill him and then the evil will go". Hearing this Māndhātā replied, "I will never kill an innocent ascetic. Teach me my duty at this time of peril". The sages were pleased at the reply of the King and advised him thus: "Oh King, start observing Vṛata on the ekādaśī day. (Eleventh day in each half of a month). The ekādaśī which falls in the bright half of Bhādrapada is called ‘Padmanābha’, and if you observe it by its cogency you will get not only rains but prosperity and happiness free from misery of any kind. You must persuade your subjects also to observe this".

The King on returning to his palace started observing ‘ekādaśī’ along with his subjects of all the four castes and then it started to rain. Rains came in plenty and all the crops were rich. The subjects became happy. (Chapter 59, Padma Purāṇa).

5) Other details.

(i) Māndhātā had to fight once against Lavaṇāśura but had to accept defeat before the god-given spear which Lavaṇāśura possessed. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

(ii) Aśvinidevas once helped Māndhātā in his work as an owner of land. (Ślokta 112, Anuvāka 16, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(iii) Māndhātā became pure by yajña and attained Svarga. (Ślokta 5, Chapter 257, Vana Parva).

(iv) Once Nārada spoke to Saṁjaya about the greatness of Māndhātā. (Chapter 62, Droṇa Parva).

(v) At another time Śṛ Kṛṣṇa spoke in glowing terms about the yajña of Māndhātā. (Ślokta 81, Chapter 29, Śanti Parva).

(vi) Once Mahāviṣṇu came to Māndhātā disguised as Indra and conversed with him on ‘Rajadharma’ (duties and responsibilities of a King.) (Ślokta 16, Chapter 61, Śanti Parva).

(vii) Utatthya, son of Āṅgiras, once taught Māndhātā the outlines of Rajadharmā. (Chapter 90, Śanti Parva).

(viii) Māndhātā conquered the whole world in one day. (Ślokta 16, Chapter 124, Śanti Parva).

(ix) On another occasion Bṛhaspati conversed with him on the subject of Godāma. (The giving away of cows as gifts). (Ślokta 4, Chapter 76, Anuśāsana Parva).

(x) Māndhātā gave away as gifts millions of cows. (Ślokta 5, Chapter 85, Anuśāsana Parva).

(xi) Māndhātā hated non-vegetarian food. (Ślokta 61, Chapter 115, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀNDODARĪ I. (MĀNDODARĪ). (In South India the name Māndodarī is current). Wife of Rāvana. The Uttrā Rāmāyaṇa contains a story about the previous history of Māndodarī.

Māya, an asura, was born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Danu. Once Māya went to Devaloka to see the dances of the celestial maidens there. Devas came to know that Māya was in love with the nymph Hemā and they married her to Māya. Māya went to the southern valley of Himāvān and lived there with Hemā constructing there a city called Hemapura. They got two sons Māyāvi and Dundubhi. But they grieved over the lack of a daughter and she went to a side of Himāvān and started penance there to get the blessings of Śiva. Once a celestial damsel named Madhurā after observing Somavāravāta went to Kailāsa to pay obeisance to Śiva. Pārvatī was absent from the place then, having gone to attend the birthday celebrations of one of her sons. So Madhurā met Śiva sitting lonely and this led to a clandestine sexual union between them. When Pārvatī returned she saw traces of the ashes from the body of Śiva on the naked breast of Madhurā and Pārvatī in her anger cursed Madhurā to live in a well for twelve years as a frog. Śiva was stupefied at the curse and he went to the well and consol ed her by saying that she would after the twelve years of life as a frog become a very beautiful maiden and would be married by a man of great fame and valour. It was near this well that Māya and his wife were performing penance to get a daughter.

After twelve years the frog changed itself into a beautiful maiden and cried loudly from the well. Hearing the cry Māya and Hemā, who were nearby peeped into the well and seeing the young girl took her home and brought her up giving her the name Māndodarī. Rāvana returning after his victory march by that way visited Māya and seeing the girl fell in love with her and married her according to Vedic rites and took her to Lanka. Rāvana got three sons of her, Meghanāda, Aśvatthāya and Aśkatumūra. Māndodarī was a very beautiful woman. Haṁmān when he entered the bed-room of Rāvana in search of Sītā was dumb-founded at the beauty of Māndodarī and mistook her for a second for Sītā. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀNDODARĪ II. A virtuous princess of the kingdom of Siṁhala. She determined to live an unmarried life.
but was forced by destiny to marry a cruel and uncharitable husband. The story of this Mandodari as related to Devī by Mahāśīvā is given below.

Candrasena, King of Sinhala, got of his wife Guṇavatī a very beautiful daughter named Mandodari. Even when she was ten years old the King started searching for a suitable husband for her. He found out Kambu-grīva son of Sudhanvā, King of Madrādeśa and informed his daughter about his desire to make him his son-in-law. But Mandodari replied that she never intended to marry and desired to spend her life worshipping God. Candrasena felt miserable at her reply.

Years went by and Mandodari became a blooming lady and yet she remained firm in her determination. One day she was playing in the royal gardens with her companions when the prince of Kosala, Virasena came that way by mistake. The extraordinary beauty of the princess attracted him and he made a request to her through her companions to marry him. But Mandodari refused.

Time rolled on, and soon the marriage of her younger sister Indumati came. Candrasena invited all the neighbouring Kings for that. The King of Madrādeśa was also present for the marriage. The King was very charming to look at but was very bad in character. Mandodari was attracted by his external beauty and she expressed her willingness to marry him. Her father was immensely pleased and on the nearest auspicious day she was given in marriage to Cārudeśa.

Mandodari went to the palace of Cārudeśa and they lived happily for some time. One day she saw her husband having sexual acts with the wife of one of the palace servants. She reproached her husband and yet two days later she saw her husband with another servant girl. She was greatly disappointed and she left the palace for the forests where she started performing penance.

MĀḌḌUKA. A class of horse. These high-class horses helped Arjuna in his campaign of victory. (Ślokā 6, Chapter 28, Sabhā Parva).

MĀḌḌUKA (S). A tribe. The King of this tribe was Ayus. The daughter of Ayus, Suśobhā was married to Parīkṣita of Ikṣvāku dynasty. They had three sons, Saḷa, Dala and Bala. (Chapter 190, Vana Parva).

MĀṆGALA. A deity in the form of Kuja or Planet Mars. There are different versions in the Purāṇas regarding the birth of Maṅgala.

(1) Sati committed suicide at the Dakṣayāṇa and Śiva greatly grieftrenched at the loss of his wife started penance. A sweat drop fell from the forehead of Śiva doing severe penance and Maṅgala was the son born of that drop. Śiva then installed Maṅgala among the Navagrahas and according to the science of astrology this Graha is considered the protector of the landed property and the wife of a person. (Śiva Purāṇa, Rudra Sāṁhitā 1-10 and Skanda Purāṇa 4-1-17).

(2) Śiva married Viśekā daughter of Hiranyāṅkā. One day while they were engaged in sexual plays Agni came to their presence. Enraged at this the eyes of Śiva blazed with anger and a drop of hot water from his eyes fell on the face of Viśekā and she became pregnant. After some days Viśekā found it impossible to bear the embryo of Śiva thus formed and she aborted it. A child was born and the goddess of earth took it and fed it with breast milk. It was that child who later on became Maṅgala. (Skanda Purāṇa).

(3) Maṅgala was born of the blood drops of Śiva. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

(4) Maṅgala was the son of Bhūmidevi. (Ganeśa Purāṇa).

(5) Maṅgala was the son of Bhūmidevi. Devas, sages, Brahmans, Manus and Gandharvas all worshipped him at the time of Varāhakalpā. It is also said in the Vedas that Bhūmidevi is the wife of Mahāviṣṇu's incarnation as Varāha. Maṅgala alias the planet Mars was born to Bhūmidevi of Mahāviṣṇu as Varāha. (9th Skanda, Devī Bhāgavata).

MĀṆGALACANDIKĀ. A devī. Vedas and Vedavīds alike praise this goddess who is always interested in granting the requests of her devotees. Because she shows prosperity on her devotees she became known as Maṅgalacandikā. There is another version that she got the name because she was worshipped by Maṅgala (Kuja) and because she grants the requests of Maṅgala. Yet another version is that she got the name because she was worshipped by the King Maṅgala chief of the seven islands. Born of the species of Durgādevi she is very kind and affectionate to her devotees. Paramaśiva worshipped this Devī before he went to destroy the demon-trio Triputras. (9th Skanda, Devī Bhāgavata).

MĀṆI I. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death in the Saropasatra of Jannomajaya. (Ślokā 19, Chapter 57, Aḍi Parva).

MĀṆI II. A sage. This sage was a member of the Brahmasabhā. (Ślokā 24, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).

MĀṆI III. One of the two Pāṇḍadas given to Subrahmanyā by Candra. The other one was named Sumanī. (Ślokā 32, Chapter 45, Śaḷya Parva).

MĀṆI IV. A son born to Kaśyapaprājapati of his wife Kadrā. Maṇi lived near the city of Girivraja. This serpent did penance to please Śiva and obtained a boon that Garuḍa should give refuge to him. (31 : 6, Aḍi Parva and Brahmapāḍa Purāṇa).

MĀṆĪBHADRA I. A Yakṣa. He who worships this Yakṣa would get his desire fulfilled. This Yakṣa is installed in a temple near the city of Tāmrālīḍi. If anybody commits adultery in that place Maṇībhadra would take him to the temple and keep him there for the night. Next morning he would take the couple before the King and exposing the sin would get them killed by the King.

Once a Vaiśya named Samudradatta committed adultery and another house-holder found it out and took them to the temple of Maṇībhadra and kept them there. Śaktimati, the virtuous wife of Samudradatta, came to know of the mishap to her husband and the intelligent woman went to the temple with materials for worship and under the pretext of worshipping made the priest of the temple open the doors. When she entered Samudradatta felt ashamed and sat with his head bent down. Śaktimati gave the other woman her own dress taking hers in return and sent her out as Śaktimati without raising the least suspicion in the priest. Then she remained with Samudradatta, and when in the morning officers of the King came to take them they were surprised to find that the culprits were really husband and wife. The house-holder was punished for giving wrong information and Samudradatta was set free with his wife. (Kathamukhalambukâ, Kathásarsítâgâra).

MAÑIBHADRA II. A King of the Lunar dynasty. This King had many children of his wife Kavikâ. Of these seven sons learned magic from Maya. The seven palm trees which Śrī Rāma broke by an arrow while on his search for Śītā were but the cursed forms of these seven sons. The Pûrâṇic story relating to Śrī Rāma giving them relief from the curse is narrated in the Kiśkindhâ Kânda of Kamba Râmâyana.

The seven sons of Manibhadra after learning magic from Maya created a huge cobra and travelled all over the world on it. One day they reached a mountain near Rşıamûkâcala. They saw the sage Agastyâ coming that way and just to tease him they coiled that cobra and hid it beneath the ground in the form of a circle and they themselves stood on it as seven palm trees in a circle and caused obstruction to the sage in his path. The sage as he came near the trees knew by his spiritual powers what trick had been played on him and said cursing, “May you stand like this for ever”. The princes knew the hideousness of the curse and pleaded for redress and the sage said, “After centuries the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Śrī Rāma would come and give you salvation”.

The princes stood there as trees grown to unusual heights with round black trunks casting shades all around. Underneath grew a shrubbage deep and thick and the seven trees stood there presenting to the onlookers a sight of wonder. Śrī Rāma and party reached the place of the seven trees. Suddenly Rāma took his bow and arrows and pressing his foot on a stone beneath sent an arrow and to the wonder of all, the seven trees standing in a circle fell all together and the arrow returned to his quiver.

When Râma pressed the stone on the ground with his foot he was pressing on a vital point on the head of the cobra lying coiled in a circle under the ground bearing the seven trees. The cobra got a shock and instantly straightened itself for a second and the trees thus came in a row straight on the path of the arrow of Śrī Râma. They were all cut at once and before they had time to fall down the serpent coiled itself again and regained his original position and so the trees fell down in the circle in which they stood. All these happened so quickly that nobody was able to see what happened and so every body was surprised to see all the seven trees in a circle falling down by a single arrow. The princes were thus relieved from the curse.

MAÑIBHADRA III.

1) General information. A Yakṣa. He was a deity of merchants and travellers. (Śloka 130, Chapter 64, Vana Parva).

2) Other details.

(i) He stays in the court of Kubera. (Śloka 15, Chapter 10, Sâbha Parva).
(ii) Once this Yakṣa on the request of a cloud named Kunḍadhâra gave a boon to a brahmin. (Śloka 21, Chapter 171, Sânti Parva).
(iii) The sage Aṣṭâvaktra once welcomed this Yakṣa. (Śloka 33, Chapter 19, Añusâsana Parva).
(iv) When Arjuna went to Marutta to bring his wealth Arjuna worshipped this Yakṣa and the Yakṣa blessed him. (Śloka 7, Chapter 65, Asvamedha Parva).

MÂNIKYAVÂCAKAR. A Pârśada of Śiva. (See under Candra-sena II).

MÂNICÂRA. A Yakṣa. In the fight between Râvana and Kubera this Yakṣa helping Kubera created great havoc in the army of Râvana. (Uttara Râmâyana).

MÂNIDVIPA. The abode of Devî. Devi resides in this island which is far beyond Kailâsa. (3rd Skandha, Devi Bhâgavata).

MÂNIGRIVA. A brother of Nalakûbara. (See under Nalakûbara).

MÂNJALÂ. A prominent river in Śâkadvipa. (Śloka 32, Chapter 11, Bhirâma Parva).

MÂNIKÂNCANA. A land portion of Śâkadvipa situated near Śyâmâgiri. (Śloka 26, Chapter 11, Bhirâma Parva).

MÂNIKÛTTIKÂ. A follower of Subrahmanyâ. (Śloka 20 Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MÂNIKYAVÂCAKAR (MÂNIKKA-VÂSAHAR). A devotee and poet who lived in Tamilnâdu. He is believed to have lived during the period between the eighth and ninth centuries A.D. He was born in Tiruvâdâvûr in an Adîśâva brahmin family. Tiruvâdâvûr was a village near Madura, the capital of Pândya kingdom. His father was Sambhupâdâsrîta and mother Sivajâhnanavatî. The name given by his parents to Mâniyâvâcâkar is still unknown. Because he was born in Tiruvâdâvûr everybody called him Tiruvâdâvûr. He became a scholar in his sixteenth year. The Pândya king called him to his palace and appointed him as his minister. He gave him the honour of the title ‘Tennavar Brahma-râyâr’. Mâniyâvâcâkar showed more interest in devotional matters than in matters of the state.

Once when the King was holding his durbar he got information that in one of the eastern ports had landed a set of good war-horses for sale. He sent Tiruvâdâvûr to that place. The minister, when near the port of Tirupperundural, heard a sound of Vedic utterances and he immediately went to the place from where the sound came. He saw Lord Śiva sitting under a tree in the guise of a Guru. Forgetting all state affairs he became engrossed in the meditation of Śiva. Suddenly he developed a talent for poetry and music and sweet attractive poems in praise of Śiva started flowing from his tongue. Śiva was immensely pleased and gave him the name Mâniyâvâcâkar meaning that every Vâcaka (sentence) coming out of his tongue was equal in value to a mânîkya (Ruby). The guru gave him a ruby too. Mâniyâvâcâkar in the garb of a mendicant joined a troop of Śiva devotees and spent all the money he had for the service of the devotees of Śiva and also for the reconstruction of a dilapidated Śiva temple in Tirupperundural.

Mâniyâvâcâkar reached Madura and informed the King that the horses would arrive at the palace on the day Avâni-mûlâ (Mûlâ star in the month of Srâvana) and presented the king with the ruby which his Guru had given him. The king was not satisfied and he imprisoned him. On the Avâni-mûlâ day at the stipulated time the horses arrived at the palace. The horses were led by strange foreigners. It was Śrî Paramêsvara himself who had come as the chief of the horsemen. Mâniyâvâcâkar was released from jail and he also came to see the horses. The King gave the leader of the troopers a silk shawl as present. The head of the troopers received it by the end of his whip. The King resented this but the troopers went back without any trouble. The horses were put in stables and Manikyavacakar went to his āśrama.

At midnight all the new horses in the stables turned into jackals and roamed about in the streets howling loudly and disturbing everyone. After some time they all disappeared. The anger of the king knew no bounds. He imprisoned Manikyavacakar again. The servants of the king took him to river Vaigai. That day there was an unusual flood in the river and the city of Madura was submerged in waters. The king then realised his mistake and begged pardon of Manikyavacakar. Manikyavacakar asked the king to repair the dam in the Vaigai. The king assented to the proposal but to save money the work was entrusted to the citizens of Madura.

At that time there was an old woman in Madura called Vanti. She earned her livelihood by selling sweetmeats. The servants of the king ordered her also to join the work of the dam. She prayed to Paramāśiva and then a young man came to the old woman and offered to work for her in her stead. The young man representing Vanti went to Vaigai and started to work for her. When the king came to inspect the work he found the young man not doing his work satisfactorily and struck him on his back with a whip. A basketful of sand the young man was carrying fell down and the work of the dam was instantly completed. Not only that; all the persons including the king felt as though they were struck. Vanti attained Svarga and Manikyavacakar went to Cidambaram. The king repented.

Manikyavacakar saw Siva in person several times. Many wonderful events happened at the Cidambaram temple after the arrival of Manikyavacakar there. The King of Lāṇkā hearing about the greatness of Manikyavacakar brought his dumb daughter to him and he gained the power of speech. The Buddhist saints of Lāṇkā came to Manikyavacakar and entered into philosophical discourse with him. They became dumb. The king of Lāṇkā and his followers became devotees of Siva. Manikyavacakar sat in his āśrama and composed divine songs. Once Siva in the guise of a brahmin came there and copied the songs written by him. Even while he was reciting his divine songs to the devotees his soul left his body and merged with that of Siva. The divine songs in praise of Siva by Manikyavacakar constitute the eighth Khaṇḍa of Śaivite hymns by name “Tirumurai”. They include “Tiruvacakam” and “Tirukkovaṭṭam”. The Tiruvacakam contains 654 verses in 51 hymns and the Tirukkovaṭṭam contains 400 verses. All these are songs in praise of Siva sung on different occasions. (Divyacaritam).

MANIMĀṆ I. A king, Mahābhārata gives the following details about him.

(i) ManimāṆ was born of an aspect of Vṛtra, son of the asura Danāyū. (Sloka 44, Chapter 67, Adi Parva).
(ii) This king was present at the marriage of Draupadi. (Sloka 22, Chapter 185, Adi Parva).
(iii) Bhīmasena while on his early victory march defeated this king. (Sloka 11, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).
(iv) This king fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas during the great Kurukṣetra battle. (Sloka 20, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).
(v) ManimāṆ was killed in the fight between ManimāṆ and Bhūrīrāvas. (Sloka 53, Chapter 23, Drona Parva).

MANIMĀṆ II. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Sloka 9, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

MANIMĀṆ III. A sacred place. If one spends a night there one would get the benefit of performing an Agni autobiography. (Sloka 101, Chapter 82, Vana Parva).

MANIMĀṆ IV. A Yakṣa who was a friend of Kubera. Once the sage Agastya cursed him that he would be killed by the hand of a man. The yakṣa was killed by Bhīmasena. (Sloka 59, Chapter 160, Vana Parva and see under AGASTYA, Para 10).

MANIMĀṆ V. A mountain. Once, when Arjuna went on a pilgrimage to Siva’s presence with Kṛṣṇa in a dream, he saw this mountain ManimāṆ. (Sloka 24, Chapter 9, Drona Parva).

MANIMĀṆ VI. A pāṛśava of Siva. This pāṛśava joined hands with Virabhadra to injure the sage Bṛgū at the Dakṣayāna. (4th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

MANIMĀṆTHA. A mountain. (Śrī Kṛṣṇa performed penance here to please Siva for crores of years together. (Sloka 33, Chapter 18, Anuśāsana Parva).

MANIMATĪPURĪ (MANIMATĪPATMAN). A meeting place of the asuras. The notorious asura Ilavala lived here for some time. (Sloka 4, Chapter 94, Vana Parva). The demons Nivātakavacas hid here in this city and Rāvana challenged them to a fight after coming to the gates of the city. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANIMAYA. Father-in-law of a demon called sukėśa. Sukėśa married Devavati daughter of Manimaya and had three sons, Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANINĀGA. 1. A serpent born to Kaśyapa Prajāpati of his wife Kadrū. This serpent resides near Girivraja (Sloka 50, Chapter 21, Sabhā Parva).

MANINĀGA II. A sacred place. If one spends a night here one would get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. If one eats from the offerings made to a deity there one would be free from the effects of any snake poison. (Sloka 106, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MANINI. Mother of Viśravas, father of Rāvana. She was the daughter of the sage Trāṇabindu. (See under Trāṇabindu).

MANIPARVĀTA. A mountain of Purānic fame. Narakāsura kept the sixteen thousand and one hundred maidens he had stolen in this mountain. (Dākṣśinātīyā Partha, Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

MANIPRAVĀLA. A kind of language formed by mixing Sanskrit and Malayalam together. “Bhāṣāsaṁśkrta-yogo manipuravālam”. This is its definition. A great many of the important literary works in Malayalam are in Manipuravālam.

MANIPURA (MANIPUR). The birth place of Citrāṅgadā wife of Arjuna. Arjuna during his pilgrimage came to this place and after marrying Citrāṅgadā stayed there for three years. Bābhrvahāna was the son of Citrāṅgadā. (See under Citrāṅgadā).

MANIPUSPAKA. Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas, used to blow a conch named Manipuspaka. (Sloka 16, Chapter 25, Bhīṣma Parva).

MANISKANDHA. A serpent born of the family of Dhrārāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Jānaneśvara. (Chapter 52, Adi Parva).
MANIVĀHANA

MANIVĀHANA. Another name for King Kuśāmba. (Chapter 63, Ādi Parva).

MANİVARA. One of the sons of the Vasu, Āpa.

MĀNIVĀRA. One of the sons born to Rājataṇaṇha of his wife Mānivarā. This Yaksā married Kṛutāśhālī's daughter Devajāni. The sons born to them are called 'Guhyakāṇa'. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, 3.7.127-131).

MĀNIVĀR. A Yaksā. He lives on the mountain of Mandara. (Śloka 5, Chapter 139, Vana Parva).

MĀNIVĀTAPPĀ. A rock of Purāṇic fame. Rāvana spent one night on this rock with Rāmbha. Rāmbha was going to her lover Nalakūbarīa one night alone and Rāvana seeing her on the way carried her away to this place. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

MAŅJULĀ. A river of Purāṇic fame. (Śloka 34, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

MĀṆJUḤOSĀ. A nymph. The sage Mēdhāvī cursed this nymph and made her into a devil. (See under Mēdhāvī).

MĀṆKA. A place of habitation in the island of Śaka. This place is inhabited mostly by dutiful brahmins. (Chapter 11, Bhiṣma Parva).

MĀṆKĀṆA (MĀṆKANA). A barber of Vāraṇaṇi who was a great devotee of Ganesa. During the time of King Divodāsa II Śiva wanted to destroy the city of Kāśī and deputed his son Ganesa (Nikumbha) for the same.

Ganesa came to Kāśī and appearing in person before his devotee Mānikaṇa, asked him to build a temple on the outskirts of Kāśī. Mānikaṇa completed the temple and Ganesa (Nikumbha) installed himself in that temple getting for it the name Nikumbhamandira. Devotees began to flow into the temple and Nikumbha sitting there answered the prayers of all. But he never fulfilled the prayer of the King to have a son. This annoyed Divodāsa and he destroyed the temple and then Nikumbha cursed that the city of Kāśī would become desolate. Śiva's desire thus became fulfilled. (92, 33, Vāyu Purāṇa and 3; 67, 43, Brahmadā Purāṇa).

MĀṆKĀṆA (MĀṆKANA). A sage

1) General information. He was born to Vāyubhagavān of his wife Sukanya. (Śloka 58, Chapter 38, Śalya Parva).

Vāmana Purāṇa, 38th Chapter states that Mānikaṇa was one of the spiritual sons of Kāyaprapāpiṇi. 2) Juice of potherb flows from finger. The sage was living in Saptasārasvatāṭhira and one day by accident his thumb was cut off from his hand by the sharp edge of Kuśa grass. But instead of blood, the juice of potherb began to flow from the thumb and the sage, overjoyed at this strange phenomenon, started dancing. Along with Mānikaṇa the earth and the sky also started dancing and the dancing showed no signs of stopping. Śiva then appeared before Mānikaṇa and asked him the cause of his non-stop dancing. Śiva was in disguise and Mānikaṇa did not recognise the new-comer and the sage told him about the strange phenomenon. As they were talking Śiva touched the thumb of the sage with his little finger and let the flow from the finger changed from potherb juice to sugar-candy juice. Vāmana Purāṇa states that it was ashes which flowed from the finger. The hermit was ashamed. He understood that the guest was Śiva and he fell at his feet. Śiva blessed the hermit and granted him boons.

3) Mānikaṇa falls in love with Sarasvatī Devī. One day Sarasvatīdevī came to the place of his residence in the guise of a very attractive woman. Mānikaṇa had seminal emission on seeing her and the semen fell on the surface of the water. The sage stored the water with semen in a pot and soon seven sons were born from it. They all became sages named Vāyuvega, Vāyubala, Vāyu, Vāyunaṇḍala, Vāyuvāla, Vāyuretas and Vāyucakra. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva and Chapter 38, Śalya Parva). Mānikaṇa was born as a sage also.

4) Birth of Kadaliḍgārbha. Besides the seven sons Mānikaṇa got a daughter named Kadaliḍgārbha. Menakā was her mother. (See under Kadaliḍgārbha).

5) Mānikaṇa diverts the river Sarasvati. It was said Mānikaṇa who invoked the river Sarasvati and made it flow through Kurukṣetra. (Chapter 38, Vāmana Purāṇa).

MAṢKI I. A great sage. It was Bhiṣma, while he was lying on his bed of arrows who narrated the story of this Sage. Maṣki was an aspirant of worldly things and once he got two bullocks. He was ploughing with them one day when a camel came and carried them away. Disappointed he came to the ārama and lamented deeply over it. This lamentation became known later as the famous Maṣkikīti. By the time the gītā reached its end the mind of the sage was changed and he became one bereft of all worldly desires and he acquired mokṣa. (Chapter 177, Śānti Parva).

MAṢKI II. A sage who lived in Tretāyūga. He was the son of Kauṣṭikābrhāmaṇa and was a Vaiṣṇavite of great virtue. This sage had two wives named Surūpā and Viṅgar. Both had no sons and as per the advice of his guru he went to Sabarmatiṣṭa and did penance there. After several years of rigorous austerities he got very many children. The place where Maṣkīmaharṣī sat and did penance was known later as Maṣkītirthā. It is also called Saptaśārasvata. In Divāparuyugya the Panjāvas visited the place and gave it the name Saptaśārasvata also. (Uttara Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

MANMATHAKARA. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. There is a reference to this warrior in Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 72.

MANODARI. Wife of Dārukasūra. (See under Ghanṭakārṇa).

MANOGUNA. Man may do many things, right or wrong, good or bad, but it is the purity of your mind that matters. The following story is to illustrate how much your life depends on the quality of your thoughts (Manoguna).

Once on the shores of Gaṅgā a Brahmaṇa and a Cauḍāla sat side by side and performed penance. After some days of foodless penance the Brāhmaṇa felt hungry and his thoughts went to the fishermen he had seen earlier. He thought thus, "Oh how happy are these fishermen. They catch good fishes and eat to their heart's content and are happy. They are the luckiest people of this world". The thoughts of the Cauḍāla also went to the fishermen. But he thought thus: "Oh how cruel are these fishermen! How many innocent lives do they destroy to fill their belly. They must be demons to do so." Both of them died after some days and the Brāhmaṇa was born as a fisherman and the Cauḍāla a prince. Both of them were re-born near their abodes in their previous birth and both remembered their previous lives. The Cauḍāla was happy but the Brāhmaṇa regretted his fault. (Taraṅga 1, Madanamāṇcukālamba, Kathāsārītāgāra).

MANOHARĀ I. Wife of the Vasu, Soma. Varcas was born of her first. Then she had three more sons named Śiśira, Prāṇa and Ramaṇa. (Sloka 22, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MANOHARĀ II. A nymph of Alakapūrī. Once when Aśṭāvakra went to the court of Kubera this nymph gave a performance in dancing in honour of that sage. (Sloka 45, Chapter 19, Anuśasan Parva).

MANOJAVA I. The eldest son of the Vasu Anila. Anila begot this son of his wife Śivā. (Sloka 25, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MANOJAVA II. During the Manyvantara of Cākṣuṣa, the sixth Manu, Indra was Manojava, the leader of the Devas. (Āniśa 3, Chapter 160, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

MANOJAVA III. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 17, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MANOJAVA IV. A sacred place situated in Vyāsavana in Kurukṣetra. If one bathe in a pond there one will have to one’s credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. (Sloka 93, Chapter 96, Vana Parva).

MANONUGA. A place near the mountain Vāmana in the island of Kuraṇa. (Sloka 11, Chapter 12, Bhīma Parva).

MANORAMĀ I. Wife of Dhrusavanabhī, King of Kosala. (See under Dhrusavanabhī for details).

MANORAMĀ II. A celestial woman. She was the daughter of Kaśyapa Prājāpati, born of his wife Pradhā. (Sloka 50, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva). She participated in the Jannottava of Arjuna. (Sloka 62, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

MANORAMĀ III. Once by his spiritual powers the sage Uddālaka brought the river Sarasvatī to his place of yajña and that diversion was then known as Manoramā. (Sloka 25, Chapter 38, Śalya Parva).

MANORATHA. A calf once created by Śri Kṛṣṇa by his spiritual powers. (See under Surabhi).

MANOVATĪ. The city of Brahmā. This city is situated in the centre of the nine cities on the top of the mountain Mahāmeru. Around it are the cities of the Aṣṭadīkplakas. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MANTHARĀ I. A maid of Kaikēyi the wife of Daśaratha. This huncilbacked woman was born of the species of a Gandharvī named Dundubhi. (Sloka 10, Chapter 276, Vana Parva). When everything was made ready to crown Śri Rāma as the heir-apparent of Ayodhya, it was Mantharā who persuaded Kaikēyi to go to Daśaratha and ask him to send Śri Rāma to the forests. Had not the cruel tongue of Mantharā played like that, the history of the solar dynasty itself would have been different. (See under Kaikēyi).

MANTHARĀ II. Daughter of Virocana. (Sarga 25, Bālakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). Indra killed this Mantharā.

MANTHINI. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 28, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MANTRA. See under Veda.

MANTRAPĀLA. See under the great King Daśaratha. The other seven were: Jayanta, Dhrṣṭi, Vijaya, Asiddhārtha, Arthaśādha, Aśoka and Sumantra. (Sarga 7, Bāla Kaṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MANU I. See under Manvantara.

MANU II. Son of the Agni Pāṇcājanya. Pāṇcājanya had three wives Suprajā, Bṛhadbhāṣā and Niṣā. He got of his first two wives six sons and of his third wife Niṣā, a daughter and seven sons. (Chapter 223, Vana Parva).

MANU III. A celestial maiden born to Kaśyapa of Pradhā. (Chapter 59, Verse 44, Ādi Parva).

MANUŚATIRTHA. A sacred pond lying on the outskirts of Kurukṣetra. There is a legend showing the origin of this pond. Once a hunter wounded a deer with his arrow and the deer ran and dropped itself into the pond. When it rose up from the water it became a man. From that day onwards the pond became holy and got the name Manuśatirtha. (Sloka 65, Chapter 86, Vana Parva).

MANUSMRĪTI. A code of conduct written by Manu alias Māṇavācārya who was the father of man-kind for the harmonious existence of a social life. The book contains twelve chapters. The first chapter deals with the origin of the Śmrī and the origin of the world. No other Śmrī begins like this and so it is believed that this chapter must have been added to it later. The contents of each of the other eleven chapters are given below :

Second chapter. It deals with the sense organs and stresses the importance of conquering and controlling them. It describes the qualities of a brāhmaṇ.

Third chapter. It contains the duties of a householder after his course of study of the Vedas. Eight different kinds of marriages are described in it. It also deals with methods of giving protection to women and children.

Fourth chapter. Duties of a brāhmaṇa, study of the Vedas and responsibilities of a Śnātaka are all described in this chapter.

Fifth chapter. This deals with pure and impure foods, impurity and methods of purification, women and their responsibilities.

Sixth chapter. This contains the duties of those who have entered the āśrama of Vānaprastha and also of ascetics.

Seventh chapter. It deals with the duties of Kings and ministers.

Eighth chapter. It deals with law and justice. It contains laws for the proper conduct of justice and includes ways and means of settling disputes and handling cases of debts, sale without right, partnership, duels, theft, prostitution, boundary disputes and all such matters as are to be decided by a court of law.

Ninth chapter. It deals with the duties of a husband and wife. It also contains matters relating to property rights, partition and the duties of a King with regard to these.

Tenth chapter. It deals with the duties of the different castes, mixed castes and the duties of one in times of danger.

Eleventh chapter. It deals first with penance, observation of Vratas, Yāgas, Yajñas and fee to the priests. It then deals with punishments of crimes, expiation for murder, prostitution etc.

Twelfth chapter. It deals with the theory of births and describes how your deeds in the present life are directive of the nature of life of your next birth. What deeds would fetch you what life is also explained. It contains instructions on Ātmajānā and the way to obtain mokṣa (absolute bliss).

The basis of the present Hindu Law is Manusmrīti and it is believed to have been written in B.C. 500.
MANUŚYA (MAN) The Purāṇas have not given a definite explanation regarding the origin of Man, the most important of all living beings. Many stories regarding the origin of Man were current among the ancient people. According to Hindu Purāṇas Man was born of Śvāyambhuva Manu who in turn was born of Brahmā. According to Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa (Sarga 14, Aranya Kāṇḍa) all the living beings including man were born to Kaśyapa-prajāpati of his eight wives, Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālikā, Tāmārā, Krodhavāsā, Manu and Analā. From Aditi were born the devas; from Diti, the daityas; from Danu, the dānavas; from Kālikā, the asuras Kālaka and Narakā; from Tāmārā, the bird-flock Krauṇcī, Bhāṣi, Śyenī, Dhratarāṣṭri and Sukī; from Krodhavāsā the animal flock, Mrgī, Mrgamedā, Hāri, Bhadramadā, Mārtaṇḍi, Śrāvasti and Suraḥi; from Manu, mankind and from Analā, the flora.

There is basis to believe that the Greeks and the people of Bhārata accepted with slight modifications the theory of evolution. The Daśāvatāras of Viṣṇu almost represents the progressive changes in the form of a living thing from a fish to man. The theory of Darwin that life was first formed in water was current among the sages of ancient Bhārata, even from very early times.

Apa eva sasarjadiau
Tāsu vīramāpāsajāt
(He created water first and cast virility therein).

In the Daśāvatāras (ten incarnations of Viṣṇu) the first avatāra is Mātṣya (Fish). The next one is Kūrma or Tortoise which is a progress in the form of fish. The third is Varāha or boar which is another step forward in evolution. The fourth is Narasīrha (Man cum lion) which is the first step towards the formation of Man. That avatāra has got the traits of both man and animal. The next one is Vāmana or a small man. Then Śrī Rāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa, both fully grown men but with different kinds of culture.

MANVANTARA (M).

1) Kalpa, Manvantara and Caturyuga. The Prapāṇa (universe) is perishable. At one time, it takes its origin, at another time it perishes. Brahmā, the creator of the universe has birth and death. The period between the birth and death of a Brahmā is known as a “Mahākalpa”. The flood that comes at the death of a Brahmā is called “Mahāpralaya”. One day of Brahmā is called Kalpakāla. In the Purāṇas one Kalpa or one day of Brahmā is divided into fourteen parts. The master or ruler of each of these divisions is a Manu. There are fourteen Manus. The life-span of each Manu is called a “Manvantaram”.

There are seventy one Caturyugas in each Manvantara. The four yugas namely Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kaliyuga make up one Caturyuga. At the end of seventyone such Caturyugas, that is, at the end of every two hundred and eightyfour (71 × 4) yugas, a Manu completes his life-span. Along with that, the Devas who were born at the time of the birth of that Manu, also come to the end of their lives. Fourteen such Manvantaras make one day of Brahmā. It is at the end of that day that the original universe perishes. Brahmā's life-span is 120 years. At the end of that period, that Brahmā perishes. That is to say, at the end of every 42,200 divine days (120 × 360) which is the life-span of a Brahmā, a deluge takes place. Thus in one Brahmā's time 42,200 Kalpas take place. A Brahmā's life span is known as “Mahākalpa” and the close of a Brahmā's period is called “Mahāpralaya”.

2) Human year (Manuṣya varṣa) and Divine year (Deva varṣa). When two leaves are placed one over the other and they are pierced by a needle, the time required for the needle to pass from the first leaf to the second is called “Alpakāla”. Thirty such alpakālas make one “Truti”. Thirty truti make one “Kalā”. Thirty Kalās make one “Kāsthā”, which is also known as “Nimaśa” “Noṭi” or “Mātrā”. Four “Nimisās” make one “Gaṇīta”. Ten Gaṇītas, one “Netuvirppu”. Six netuvirppus, one “Vināzhīka”. Sixty vināzhīkās one day (and night together). Fifteen days, one “Pakṣa”. Two Pakṣas, one “Candra māsa” (lunar month). One Cāndramāsa for human beings is one “ahorātra” (one day and night making up one full day) for the Pitts. Twelve Cāndras māsās make one year for human beings. One year for human beings is one ahorātra for the gods. Three hundred ahorātras of gods make one “Deva Vatśara” or “Divya vatśara”. 4,800 devyavatśaras make one Kṛtayuga. 3,600 divyavatśaras make one Tretayuga, 2,400 divyavatśaras make one Dvāparayuga, 1,200 divyavatśaras make one Kalīyuga. 12,000 divyavatśaras comprising a set of Kṛt, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kalīyugas make one Caturyuga. A Manu’s period is completed at the end of 71 Caturyugas. With that, the first group of gods also comes to an end. At the end of fourteen such Manus, one “Kalpa” is over and a deluge takes place. The whole of this period comprises one night for Brahmā. Night is the time of complete inactivity. With the end of the night, creation is started again. When 360 such ahorātras of Brahmā are completed, he completes one year. After completing 120 such years, a Brahmā perishes. Again a period of absolute inactivity follows for the length of a Brahmā’s life-span. After a period of 120 Brahma varṣas (the life-span of a Brahmā) another Brahmā comes into being. The life-span of Brahmā is shown in the following tabular form:

It is said that a Manu’s period of reign is 43,020 Manuṣyarvarṣas. (Bhāgavata, 3rd Skandha).

3) The caturyuga schema. A caturyuga consists of the four yugas, namely Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kaliyugas. At the end of each Caturyuga, the Vedas perish. Then the “Saptarṣi” (seven sages) come down from heaven to the earth and restore them again. Manu who is the propounder of Dharma śāstra, is also born in every Kṛtyuga. The Devas of each Manvantaram feed upon the share of Havis (offerings at sacrifices) of the yāga till the end of that Manvantara. During the whole period of the Manvantara, the earth is protected and preserved by the sons of Manu and their descendants. Thus Manu, the Saptarṣis, Devas, Indra and the Kings who are the sons of Manu are the authorities of the Manvantara. After 14 Manvantaras a Kalpa of about 1,000 yugas, comes to an end. After that there is a night extending over the same period in duration. At that time Mahāviṣṇu sleeps on his bed Ananta in the ocean of deluge. After that, he wakes up again and performs creation. Manus, Kings, Indra, Devas and Saptarṣis are the Śātvika aspects of Mahāviṣṇu, who performs the work of protecting the world. In Kṛṣṇa yuga, Mahāviṣṇu assumes the form of Kapila and others and preaches "Paramājñāna". In Tretā yuga he assumes the form of an emperor and destroys the wicked people. In Dvāpara yuga, he assumes the form of Vyāsa and after dividing the Veda into four sections, classifies each of the sections into the various branches. At the end of Kaḷīyuga, Mahāviṣṇu assumes the form of Kali and restores the vicious to the path of righteousness. This is the "Caturyuga scheme" of Mahāviṣṇu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

4) The fourteen Manus. The names of the fourteen Manus of one Kalpa are given below:

(1) Śvāyambhuva (2) Śvārociṣa (3) Utama (Auttami)
(4) Tamasa (5) Raivata (6) Cākṣuṣa (7) Viśvavata (8) Sāvarṇi (9) Dākṣaśāvarṇi (10) Brāhmaṇaśāvarṇi

Each of the above Manus is described below:

1) Śvāyambhuva.

(a) General. Śvāyambhuva was born as the spiritual son of Brahmā. This Manu got his name because he was "Śvāyambhuva" or born from Brahmā. He married the goddess Sataṭrāpā, the spiritual daughter of Brahmā. After that, he went to the shore of the ocean of milk, made an image of Mahādevī there and worshipped her by chanting Vāgbhava mantra and performed an austerely penance. After a hundred years of such worship the goddess was pleased. She appeared before Śvāyambhuva and granted him boons. She blessed him to attain the highest place in Heaven (Paramapada) after begetting vast progeny. Then the goddess went to Vindhyā mountain and became the deity of Vindhyā. Śvāyambhuva returned and started his reign by worshipping the goddess.

This Śvāyambhuva is regarded as the author of the famous work "Manuṣmṛti". Kālidāsa says that the Kings of the Raghu dynasty lived in strict obedience to the laws laid down by this Manu. (Devī Bhāgavata, Daśaṁa Skandha).

(b) Other details.

(i) The Saptarṣis of first Manvantara were—Marci, Aṅgirās, Atri, Pulahā, Kratu, Pulastyā and Vasīṣṭha. Devas are known as Yamas. The first Manu had ten sons namely Agniḍhṛa, Agnibhū, Medhā, Medhātithi, Vasu, Jyotiṣmān, Dvutimān, Havya, Savana and Putra and they ruled over the country. (Harivaṃśa, Chapter 7).

(ii) Emperor Pṛthu turned Śvāyambhuva Manu into a calf and obtained medicine from Bhūmi by milking her as a cow. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

(iii) Born from Virāṇa. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 1, Verse 32).

(iv) Sage Cyavaṇa married this Manu's daughter. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 60, Verse 46).

(v) This Manu taught Soma, the art of Cākṣuṣi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 169, Verse 43).

(vi) Since this Manu had blessed the clouds of the Magadha country they sent periodical rains to that region. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 10).

(vii) Manu came to the world, riding in the chariot of the gods to see Arjuna's fight. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).

(viii) This Manu had a wife named Sarasvatī (Satārūpā). (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 14).

(ix) This Manu lives in Bindusaras. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 46).

(x) He came at the time of Subrahmanyā's birth. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 10).

(xi) Manu held discussions with Siddhas. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 36).

(xii) He was the King of men. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 21).

(xiii) This Manu is called "Prajāpati Manu". Once he had a talk with Bṛhaspati on the subject of Dharma. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 201).

(xiv) Upamanyu saw Śvāyambhuva Manu sitting by the side of Siva. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 290).

(xv) He talked with the sage Suparnā about the greatness of flowers, fumes, lights, offerings and gifts. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 45).

(2) Śvārociṣa.

(a) General. Śvāyambhuva had two great sons Priyavrata and Utānapāda. The second Manu was the son of Priyavrata and his name was Śvārociṣa. He was a glorious and adventurous man. He went to the banks of the river Kālindī, made a hermitage there, installed an idol of Devī made of earth and offered worship most fervently. At the end of 12 years of taps when he ate only dried leaves, Devī appeared before him in her dazzling brilliance and blessed him. The name of this Devī was "Bharinīdevī". After a reign of many years this King went to Heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(b) Other Details.

(i) Pāravatas and Tuśitas were the Devas in this Manvantara. The mighty Vipaçāt was Devendra. The Saptarṣis were Urja, Stambha, Prāṇa, Rāma, Ṛṣabha, Niraya, and Parivān. Caitra, Kimpuruṣa and others were the sons of Śvārociṣa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 1).

(ii) In Harivaṃśa, Chapter 7 we read that the Saptarṣis of this Manvantaram were Aurvā, Stambha, Kaśyapa, Prāṇa, Bṛhaspati, Datta and Nīcēyavana.

(iii) Brāhma taught this Manu, Sātvatādharmā. Śvārociṣa taught this dharma to his son Šānkhaśadana. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 348, Verse 36).

(3) Auttami (Uttama).

(a) General. Uttama was also the son of Priyavrata. He went to Gaṅgā tirtha and offered worship to Devī for three years with Vāgbhaja mantra. At the end of it, Devī was pleased and blessed him with worthy sons and a kingdom without the threat of enemies. After a happy reign of many years, at the close of the Manvantara, he reached the highest place in Heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).
Other details. Suśānti was the name of the Devendra of this Manvantara. There were five groups of Devas, namely Sudhīmans, Satyas, Japas, Pratardana and Śivas, each group consisting of twelve Devas. The seven sons of the sage Vaśiṣṭha were the saptārṣis of this Manvantara. These seven sons of Vaśiṣṭha by his wife Uṛjā were Rājas, Gotra, Urdhva-bāhu, Savana, Anagha, Suta-pas and Śukra. Āja, Parāsaudipta and others were the sons of the Manu Uttama. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 1).

4 Tāmasa.
(a) General. The fourth Manu Tāmasa was the son of Priyavrata. That King performed penance on the northern bank of the river Narmadā with Kāmārajā mantra. As a result of Devī's blessing, he obtained a prosperous Kingdom and worthy sons. After a long reign he attained heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).
(b) Other details. At the time of this Manu, there were four groups of Devas, namely—Suṣjāras, Harīs, Satyas, and Sudhīs. Each of these groups contained 27 Devas. Sibi who had performed a hundred yāgas was the Indra. The Saptārṣis of this Manvantara were: Jyotimān, Prthu, Kaśyapa, Caitra, Agyavanka, and Vīvara and Nara, Khyāti, Keturūpa, Janaūjagha and others were the sons of Tāmasa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 4).

5 Raivata.
(a) General. The fifth Manu Raivata was the younger brother of Tāmasa. He worshipped Devī with Kāmābijā mantra on the banks of the river Kālindī. With the blessing of Devī he ruled for many years and then attained heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).
(b) Other details. The name of the Indra of this Manvantara was Vībhū. There were four groups of Devas—Amitābhās, Bhūtarayās, Vaikuṇṭhas and Sumedhas. Each of these groups contained fourteen Devas. The Saptārṣis of Raivata Manvantara were—Hiraṇyāromos, Vedasrī, Urdhva-bāhu, Vedābha, Sudānā, Parjanya and Mahāmuni. The sons of Raivata Manu, Baḷabandha, Sambhāvyā, Satyaka and others were mighty kings. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 1).

6 Čākṣuṣa.
(a) General. This Manu was the son of Aṅga. Once he went to the Rājārṣi (royal saint) Pulaha and prayed for prosperity, mastery of the whole world, invincible power and profound scholarship. Pulaha sent him to Devī. The Rājārṣi taught him the worship of Devī. After acquiring the mantra Čākṣuṣa went to the banks of the river Virāja and offered worship to Devī. At the end of twelve years, Devī appeared before him and blessed him with “Manuḥhood”, mastery of the Manu kingdom and brilliant sons. After many years he distributed his kingdoms among his sons and at last attained “Devīpada”. (Devī Bhāgavata, Daśama Skanda).

(b) Other details.
(i) The following account is given in Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 13, about the birth of Čākṣuṣa Manu. Dhruva and his wife Sambhu had two sons, namely Siṣṭi and Bhavya. Succhāya, the wife of Siṣṭi gave birth to five sons, Ripu, Ripūnījaya, Vīpra, Vṛkala and Vṛkaṭejas, who were all sinless. Čākṣuṣa was born to Bṛhatī, the wife of Ripu. Čākṣuṣa begot Manu by Puṣkariṇī, daughter of Virāṇa Prājāpati. This was the sixth Manu. By his wife Nadvāla, the daughter of Vairāja Prājāpati, he had 10 sons, namely: Kuṇa, Kuṇa, Śatādyumna, Tapasvi, Satyāvān, Suci, Agniśṭoma, Atiśatra, Śudāyuṇa and Abhīmānyu. Āgneyi, wife of Kuṇa, gave birth to six sons who were Aṅga, Sumanas, Khyāti, Krauṭa, Anigras and Sibi. Sunīthā, wife of Aṅga, gave birth to Vena. Prīthu was the son of Vena. He is also known as “Vainya”.
(ii) The Indra of that period was Manojava. There were five groups of Devas—Ākhyas, Prasūtas, Bhāyas, Prīthukas and Lekhas, each group consisting of eight Devas. The Saptārṣis of this Manvantara were—Sumedhas, Virājas, Īvīṣman, Uttama, Madhu, Atināman and Sāhiṣṭu. Śatādyumna and other mighty Kings were the sons of Čākṣuṣa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 3).
(iii) The sons of this Manu became famous under the name “Varisṭhas” (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 18, Verse 20).

7 Vaivasvata.
(a) General. He was born from Śūrya. It is this Manu which rules the world today. All living beings that we see today were born from him. Vaivasvata Manu is Satyavrata Manu who escaped from the last deluge. To save him Viṣṇu took up the incarnation of Matsya (fish). Vaivasvata Manu was also the first of the Kings of the Śūrya vana (Solar Dynasty) who ruled over Ayodhya.
(b) Other details. (i) In Devī Bhāgavata, Saptama Skandha, we see that the sons of Vaivasvata namely Ikṣvāku, Nābhāga, Dhṛṣṭa, Śaryāti, Nārisyanta, Prārṇa, Nṛga, Diṣṭa, Karūṣa and Prśadha were also called Manus.
(ii) This Manu worshipped Devī and received her blessing and attained heaven after a long reign. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).
(iii) Vaivasvata Manu had another name, “Śrāddhadēva.” The Devas of this Manvantaram are Ādiyātas, Vaśus and Rudras. The name of the Indra of this period is PURANDARA. The Saptārṣis are, Vaiṣṣṭha, Kāśyapa, Atri, Jamadagni, Gautama, Viśvāmitra and Bharadvāja. The nine Dhārmikas (virtuous ones), Ikṣvāku, Nṛga, Dhṛṣṭa, Śaryāti, Nārisyanta, Nābhāga, Arīṣṭa, Karūṣa and Prśadha are the sons of Vaivasvata Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 8, Chapter 1).
(iv) Ten sons were born to this Manu who were Vena, Dhṛṣṭu, Nārisyanta, Nābhāga, Ikṣvāku, Karūṣa, Śaryāti, Ila, Prśadha, and Nābhāgarīṣṭa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 15).
(v) Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Matsya for the sake of Vaivasvata Manu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 187).
(vi) He received Yogavīḍiyā from Śūrya and Ikṣvāku received it later from him. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 38).
(vii) At the beginning of Tretāyuga, Śūrya taught “Śātvata Dharma” to Manu and Manu taught it to Ikṣvāku for the protection of all creatures. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 348, Verse 51).
(viii) The sage Gautama taught Śivasahasranāma to Vaivasvata Manu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 177).
(8) Sāvārni.

(a) General. Even in his previous birth he was a devotee of Devī. In his former birth (during the period of Śvārociṣa Manvantara) Sāvārni was born as a King of Caitravāśiṇā under the name Suratha. The origin of the dynasty known as Caitravāśiṇā was as follows:—Atri, son of Brāhma had a son named Niśākara. This Niśākara became an emperor by performing Rājasūya. Emperor Niśākara had a son Budha and Budha had a son named Caitra, both of whom were greatly renowned. It was Caitra's family which later on became the reputed Caitra dynasty.

The son of that Caitra was Viratha. Suratha was the son of Viratha. This was the previous birth of Sāvārni Manu. Suratha was a great hero and poet. Once another King besieged his city and destroyed it. Suratha left his kingdom and went alone on horseback and took shelter in a dense forest. While wandering in the forest like a mad man with a broken heart, he happened to reach the āśrama of the sage Suncudhas. The sage advised him to worship Devī in order to retrieve his lost kingdom and prosperity. Accordingly the King worshipped Devī who was pleased and restored to him his kingdom and prosperity. Besides, she blessed him that in his next birth he would become Sāvārni, the King of the Solar dynasty and would be revered as the eighth Manu. Thus the eighth Manu Sāvārni will be the second birth of Suratha. (Devi Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(b) Other details. Sāvārni is also the son of Śūrya. How he came to be called Sāvārni is explained below:—Śūrya had three children Manu, Yama and Yāmī by Śarīrīnā, the daughter of Vaivasvata. This Manu was Vaivasvata Manu, the seventh Manu. Unable to bear the intense heat of Śūrya, Śarīrīnā once sent her maid Chāyā to Śūrya in her own disguise and went to the forest for tapas. Śūrya had three children by Chāyā, Naiśācara, another Manu and Tapati. This Manu is known as Sāvārni who will become the eighth Manu. In his time there will be three groups of Devas—Sutapās, Amītābhas and Mukhyas. Each of these groups will consist of twelve persons. The Saptārṣis of the eighth Manvantara are Dīptūman, Gālava, Rāma, Kṛpa, Āvatthāmā son of Droṇa, Vyāsa son of Parāśara and Śrasṭṛīga. Mahābali, son of Virocana will be the Indra. Virajas, Urvarīyān, Nirmoka and others are the Kings who are the sons of Sāvārni Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

(9) Daksā Sāvārni.

General. At the time of this Manu there are three groups of Devas namely, Pāras, Maricigarbhas and Sudharmans. Each of the groups contains 12 Devas. The Indra who is the king of those Devas is the mighty Adbhuta. The Saptārṣis of this Manvantara are:—Savana, Dyuṭumān, Bhavya, Vasu, Medhātithi, Jyotīśmān and Satya. Dṛḥtašū. Dhīptiḥ, Paṇahastra, Nīrāmayā, Prthuśravas are the sons of Daksasāvārni Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

(10) Brahma Sāvārni.

General. In this Manvantara, the Devas are Sudharmans and Viśuddhas. Each of these groups will contain 100 Devas. Their Indra will be the heroic Sānti. The Saptārṣis will be Hāvīśmān, Sukṛta, Satya, Tapatmūrti, Nabhāga, Aṃprātmanuj and Satyaṇāṭa. Brahma Sāvārni will have ten sons, three of whom are, Sukṣetra, Uttama-Tuṣitas. In Uttama Manvantara that divinity Tuṣita him self was born again under the name of Satya as the son of Satyā in the group of Devas called Satyas. When Tāmasi Manvantara began, that divinity was born again as the son of Haryā as a Ḥari in the group of Devas called Haris. It was that divinity Hāri himself who was born in Sambhitā under the name of Mānasam among the Devas called Raivatas in Raivata Manvantara. In Cākṣusā Manvantara that Viṣṇu Bhāgavān took birth in Viṅkuṭī as one of the Vaiṅkuṭhas. In the present Vaiṅsvata Manvantara, Viṣṇu has incarnated in Āditi as Vāmana, the son of Kaśyapa. That great Vāmanā conquered all the three worlds and presented them to Devendra. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

Besides the fourteen Manus mentioned above, certain other Manus are also referred to in the Purāṇas. Some details about them are given below:

1) It is seen from Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, 14th Sarga, verse 11, that Kaśyapa had a wife named Manu.

2) There is a reference to a Rājārṣi (Saintly king) named Manu in Rgveda, first Maṇḍala, 16th Anuvāka, 112th Śūkta.

3) A son named Manu was born to the Agni Tapa or Pāñcājanya. This Manu has another name Bhumī. He had three wives named Suprājā, Bhṛdbhadāsa and Niśā. Six sons were born to him by the first two wives. By his third wife he had one daughter and seven sons. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 4).

4) In Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva, Chapter 57, verse 43, we find a reference to another Manu named Pracetās.

MĀNYAVATI. Wife of Avikṣit, son of Karandhama. Mānyavatī daughter of Bhimārāja was carried away by force by Avikṣit from the marriage hall on the marriage day. (Mārkandeya Purāṇa).

MANYU I. A Vedic god. The origin of this god is described in Brahma Purāṇa as follows:

Once a terrible war broke out between Devas and Asuras. The Devas who were defeated, went to the Gautami river valley and performed penance to Śiva praying for victory. Śiva produced Manyu from his third eye and presented him to the Devas. In the battle which followed they defeated the Asuras with the help of Manyu.

MANYU II. A king of the Pūru dynasty. Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha states that Manyu, the son of Bharadvāja, had five sons including Bhṛhatśāya.

MANYUMĀN. Second son of the Agni Bhānu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 11).

MARAṆA (M) (DEATH). Death is a goddess whose name is Mrtyu. The Purāṇas state that there was no death in the world before the birth of this goddess. In Mahābhārata, Droga Parva, Chapter 53 there is the following story about the circumstances in which Brahmā created Mrtyu.

Living beings multiplied endlessly on earth. As they had no death, the goddess Earth found their weight too much for her to bear. She went weeping to Brahmā and prayed for his help. At that time, Rudra and Nārāyaṇa were present in Brahmā’s assembly. Brahmā said that he did not like destroying living beings. Because of the pressure of Rudra and Nārāyaṇa, Brahmā created out of Visvaprakāśa (Cosmic Light) a woman. She was born from the south and Brahmā gave her the name “Mrtyu”. He gave her permission to destroy human beings.

When she heard that she was to kill living beings, she shed tears and Brahmā gathered those tears. She went to Dhemukāśrama and other places and performed tapas. At last Brahmā called her back and assured her that it was not against Dharma to kill living beings. He changed the tears he had gathered from her face into the various diseases and returned them to her. He gave those diseases and the god Yama as her companions. Thus the goddess Mrtyu started her dance of destruction. (See also under the word PUNARJANMA).

MĀRDAMAHARŚI. One of the sons of Vīśvāmitra who was a Brahmavādī. (Sloka 57, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRGĀṆAPRIYĀ. A daughter born to Kaśyapa Prajāpati of his wife Pradhā. (Sloka 45, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

MĀRGASIRŚAMĀSA. The month of Dhanu (December). The month has got great Purānic importance. If one lives taking food only once during the whole of this month one will be free from all sins and diseases. (Sloka 17, Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva). If on the Dwādaśī day in this month one fasts the whole day and night and worships Keśava one will get the benefit of conducting an Āśvamedha yajña. (Sloka 3, Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRICA. A Dānava. There is a reference to him in Uttara Rāmāyaṇa.

MĀRICA I. The uncle of Rāvana.

1) Birth. On the banks of the river Sarayū, there were two states lying adjacent called Malada and Karuṣa. The great sages conducted Jaladhārā (showering of water) on the head of Indra to absolve him of his sin of killing Vṛtrāsa at this place. At that time Mala (excreta) and Karuṣa (spittings) of Indra fell at those places and so they got the name of Malada and Karuṣa. At that place was born after a few years a demoness named Tātākā who had the strength of a thousand elephants. A demon called Sunda married Tātākā and she got two sons named Mārica and Subāhu. (Sarga 24, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa and Bāla Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

2) Mārica in his previous birth. Mārica was the servant of the gate-keepers of Vaikuṇṭha. One day Mahāviṣṇu was displeased by a conduct of his and he cursed him to be born as a demon on earth. But he added that Māricawould get salvation from the curse when he was killed by Śrī Rāma in which capacity Viṣṇu would incarnate soon. He would then return to Vaikuṇṭha to his original place. That was how Mārica was born as the uncle of Rāvana.

3) Āśrama life. Mārica and Subāhu were two inseparable brothers. They learned all tactics of war and their hobby was to torment the innocent sages of the forests (Sarga 19, Bālakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). When the exploits of Mārica became unbearable, Viṣvāmitra brought Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa from Ayodhyā for help. The instant Mārica heard the fierce twang of Rāma’s bow he fled to the other shore of the sea. From that day onwards Mārica grew matted hair and wore barks of trees and spent his life in an āśrama. (Sargas 35 and 36, Aranyakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

4) Death. When Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were living in the Daṇḍakāraṇya with Śītā they were annoyed by a Demoness named Sūrpaṇakhā. In the fight that ensued very many demons were killed. Sūrpaṇakhā complained to Rāvana who decided to kill Rāma and carry away Sitā. For this he sought the help of his uncle Mārica. Flying in his golden Vimāna and crossing mountains and oceans he approached Mārica and told him of his plan. Mārica who was aware of the force of Rāmabāna dissuaded Rāvana from such a venture. But Rāvana persisted in his plan and gave Mārica the following instructions: "Become a golden deer with beautiful white spots all over the body and roam about near the aśrama of Rāma for his wife Sitā to see. I am sure Sitā will request her husband Rāma to catch hold of you. Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa will follow you and Sitā will be left alone. I will then carry away Sitā as Rāhu takes Candrikā (moonlight) and live happily with her. I will be contented if I can then cease Rāma who will be lamenting over his separation from his wife". Thinking that it would be better to die at the hands of Rāma than at the hands of Rāvana, Mārica agreed to do as his nephew desired.

Rāvana and Mārica came near the aśrama of Rāma in Rāvana's aerial chariot. Mārica on alighting from it took the form of a beautiful fawn and entered the precincts of the aśrama. The false fawn was capable of attracting the attention of anybody. It is described thus: "It appeared as a wonder to those who saw it. It was golden in colour with blue horns with white lines on it. The ears were like leaves of blue lotus and the face was of the colour of red lotus. The lips were like sapphire and the body beautifully shaped with sides like yellow flowers. The waist was thin and well-shaped and a rain-bow-coloured tail adorned its back. The whole body was silver-spotted and the deer was a feast for the eyes of anybody."

The deer went and grazed in places where it could be seen by Sitā. It would run away from the aśrama and graze hidden from Sitā but would come back again to the vision of Sitā. It would mix with the deer of the aśrama for some time and run away from them to distant places. Like a butterfly it flitted about always trying to attract the attention of Sitā. Other deer approached it but on getting its scent flew away from it. The false deer suppressing the demon-instinct in him to kill and eat the animals which came near it played well the role of a fawn.

Sitā was enamoured of the deer and expressed to Rāma her desire to get it. Rāma followed it and finding it keeping a distance always got suspicious and shot it down with an arrow. The deer cried "Hā Lākṣmaṇa" and fell down dead. The cry was intended to mislead Lākṣmaṇa and draw him also away from Sitā. (Chapters 43-44, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmikī Rāmāyana).

MĀRĪ CA II. Kaśyapaprajāpati. Marici was the father of Kaśyapa and so Kaśyapa was known as Mārica also. (Sarga 46, Vālmikī Rāmāyana).

MĀRĪ C A I. A Maharsi (sage) born from Brahmā's mind.

1) Birth and Genealogy. The six great sages born from Brahmā's mind were:—Marici, Āṅgiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kauṭu, according to Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva.

2) Domestic life. Marici had several wives and children. He married Kālā, the daughter of Kardama Prajāpati by his wife Devahūti. Marici had two sons Kaśyapa and Pūrṇima by Kālā. This Kaśyapa was the original ancestor of all living beings. But Pūrṇima's family did not become well-known. Pūrṇima had two sons, Virajas and Vīvāga and a daughter Devakulīyā. Devakulīyā washed the feet of Mahāviṣṇu and merged with Akāśa Gaṅgā.

Urmā was another wife of Marici. Six sons were born to Īrnu. Under a curse of Brahmā they were born first as the sons of Hiranyakāśipu and in their next birth as the sons of Vasudeva and Devaki. It was these six children who were born as Śrī Kṛṣṇa's elder brothers whom Karīsa killed immediately after their birth. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

Marici had another wife named Sambhūti. She gave birth to Paurṇamāsa. In Viśnu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10, we see that Paurṇamāsa who was a Mahātma had two sons Virajas and Parvata. Dharmavrata was yet another wife of Marici. She was a daughter born to Dharmavrati by Dharmadeva.

3) Dharmavrata cursed. Marici lived happily for long with his wife Dharmavrata. Once he returned from the forest, carrying darbha grass, flowers etc. He was tired after a long walk. After taking food, he wanted his wife to massage his legs. While she was massaging him Marici fell asleep. Just then Brahmā happened to come there. Dharmavrata was in a fix. She had to attend to her husband and at the same time receive Brahmā with due respect. She could not leave her husband's guru (Śīrṣa). It was her duty to honour him properly.

At last she got up and welcomed Brahmā, offering him the customary honours. Meanwhile Marici woke up and not finding his wife near him cursed her to be turned into a stone. Dharmavrata who was distressed at the curse pleaded innocence and explained to him that she had been honouring his guru. She warned him that he would incur the curse of Śīva.

Under Marici's curse Dharmavrata was separated from him. She performed penance in the midst of fires. Mahāviṣṇu appeared before her and asked her what boon she wanted. She prayed that her curse might be lifted. Viṣṇu replied:—"It was Marici who cursed you. That curse cannot be withdrawn. You will be turned into a sacred stone. Your name "Dharmavrati" will be changed into "Devavrati". In future, that stone will become famous under the name "Devavrati" or "Deva-śilā". Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Maheśvara and goddesses like Lākṣmi will dwell in that stone."

After saying this, Mahāviṣṇu disappeared. Once Dharmadeva held this Devaśilā above the demon Gaya and the place became famous under the name of "Gaya tirtha". (See under Gayātīrtha).

4) Other details.

(i) Marici had participated in the celebration connected with Arjuna's birth. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 52).

(ii) Marici was a member of Indra's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 17).

(iii) Marici attended the celebration connected with Subrahmaṇya's birth. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 10).

(iv) After the Bhārata Yuddha, Marici visited Bhīma who was lying on "Śara Śayā" (bed of arrows). (M.B, Śānti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).
(v) Mahabharata, Santi Parva, Chapter 334, Verse 35, mentions that Markandeya is a Prajapati.
(vi) Marici is one of the group of sages known as Citra-skikhandins. (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 335, Verse 29).
(vii) Mahabharata, Santi Parva, Chapter 340, Verse 44, describes Marici as one of the Ashtarakhritis.
(viii) Marici once visited Dhruva who was performing penance and gave him advice. (Visnus Purana, Part I, Chapter 11).

MARICI II. A celestial woman. In Mahabharata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 62 we find that she attended a dance at the celebrations at the time of Arjuna's birth.

MARICI III. An author of Dharmas Astra. His statements are quoted in Aparakrka, Smritiandrik, Mitakshara and other works.

MARISA. A nymph created as a maiden of the Flora (See under Kan'du).

MARISA. A river of Puranic fame. (Sloka 36, Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

MARISA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhartara. (Sloka 69, Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

MARRAKA. Son of Jambavan. It is said in Brahmapurana that the marjaras (cats) have their origin from this son of Jambavan.

MARKA. See under the word Sandamarka.

MARKANDEYA. The son of Mrkan'du. He was a great devotee of Siva.

1) Genealogy. Bhrgu, son of Brahma, begot of his wife Khyaati a daughter named Laksmi and two sons named Dhaita and Vidhata.

Dhaita and Vidhata married Ayati and Niyati daughters of Mahameru. Dhaita begot of his wife Ayati a son named Prana and Niyati bore Vidhata a son named Mrkan'du. Markandeya was the son of Mrkan'du and Vedas thras was the son of Markandeya.

2) Birth. Mrkan'du did not have sons for a long time and so he performed penance for several years to please Siva to get a son. Siva appeared before him in person and asked him thus "Do you desire to have a virtuous, wise and pious son who would live up to sixteen years or a dull-witted evil-natured son who would live long?" Mrkan'du chose the first type and soon a son was born. He was named Markandeya. Even from boyhood Markandeya knew all the Vedas and Asthas. His pleasing manners got the approval of his teachers and the boy was liked by one and all. But the parents were sad and whenever they looked at their son a gloom spread over their face. The secret of the short span of his life was hidden from him.

The sixteenth year was fast approaching and one day unable to control their grief they wept before him. Markandeya asked them the reason why they wept. Mrkan'du with tears running down his cheeks told him the story. From that day onwards Markandeya started performing penance wearing barks of trees for his dress and growing matted hair. The boy was soon engrossed in severe austerities.

The day of his death came and the boy sat before the idol of Siva in deep meditation. The servants of the god of Death could not approach Markandeya for the radiation from him was too hot for them. So Yama, the god of Death, himself came to fetch him. Then Markandeya crying loudly for help embraced the idol before him. Yama threw his rope in a loop and it went and circled round the idol also. Angry Siva rose from the idol and coming down killed Yama to save the child. From that day onwards Siva got the names Mrtyunjaya and Kala-kala. After that at the request of the devas Siva gave life to Yama again and made Markandeya to be of sixteen years for ever.

3) Penance of Markandeya. The Puranas state that after getting the blessing from Siva, Markandeya lived for ten crores of years. While he was in deep meditation six Manvantaras passed away. When Markandeya continued his meditation to the seventh Manvantara Indra got frightened and he made an attempt to abort the penance of Markandeya. Indra sent his troops of Gandharvas, nymphs, Manmatha and Vasanta to the aśrama of Markandeya. The aśrama of Markandeya was at a place which was on the northern side of the Himālayas and was famous by the presence there of the river Puspabhadra and the rock Citra. The agents of Indra came there and tried to entice him with many temptations. Beautiful celestial maidens danced around the aśrama. Flowers fell from their hair when their waists shook by the weight of their heavy breasts. Enchanting girls played with balls here and there. As they played the bracelets on their waists fell down and the thin garments that hid their bodies flew up showing an alluring nakedness. Kama (God of Love) sent his arrows at that time against the sage. But Markandeya sat unconcerned as rigid as a rock and Indra accepted defeat.

When Indra and his troops returned disappointed Mahāviṣṇu with many sages went to Markandeya. He awoke from his meditation and worshipped Viṣṇu.

4) Vision of Praṇaya. On one evening at dusk Markandeya was sitting at Puspabhadraśrama when from somewhere a wind began to blow. The wind increased in strength and the sky became covered with clouds. The place resounded with peals of thunder and soon it began to rain. Rains became heavy. Rivers became flooded and water-level in the oceans rose. Everything around was submerged in water and Markandeya alone stood there with his matted hair swinging in the wind. It was impossible to know the directions and Markandeya started walking. He fell into whirlpools but was the next instant thrown up on to the top of surging waves. Then he saw on the top of a high wave a banyan tree. On a branch on the north-east of the tree he saw an infant lying, devouring the darkness by its effulgence. He was attracted to the infant by its vital force and went inside the infant as it inhaled. Inside the belly of the kid Markandeya had a vision of the entire universe. He saw the sky, the horizon, the stars, the oceans, the mountains expanses of land, Suras, Asuras, forests and all that the universe contained in its proper set-up. He saw passing before his eyes the elements, the Yugas and the Manvantaras. After some time he was thrown out by an exhalation of the infant. He stood on the waters. The old banyan tree was still there. An infant was still lying on a leaf on that tree. Markandeya then knew it was Mahāviṣṇu. He rushed to embrace the child; but the child disappeared before he reached it. Markandeya praised Mahāviṣṇu.

5) Pārvati and Paramesvara come to Markandeya. When Mahāviṣṇu disappeared from his vision he felt he was sitting at Puspabhadraśrama and he again went into meditation. At that time Pārvati and Paramesvara came that way and appeared before Markandeya. The sage worshipped them and they both blessed Markandeya.
and said "Every desire of yours will be fulfilled. You will never be rugged or grey-haired and will live virtuous and famous till the end of the world. Omniscience will be an asset for you". After having said so much Pārvatī and Parameśvara disappeared. The Purānic belief is that the realised soul of Markandeya is moving about in the universe. (10th Skandha, Chapters 8 to 11, Bhāgavata).

6. Details from Mahābhārata relating to Markandeya,

(i) This sage shone in the court of Dharmaputra, (Sloka 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) He sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him (Sloka 12, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).
(iii) Once Markandeya gave Dharmopadeśa to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 25, Vana Parva).
(iv) Markandeya sitting on the banks of the river Payoṣṇī sang praises about river Payoṣṇī and king Nṛga. (Sloka 5, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).
(v) Once Markandeya narrated to Dharmaputra stories about Kings and Rṣis. (Chapters 186 to 232, Vana Parva).
(vi) Markandeya had a vision of the great deluge. (Chapter 188, Vana Parva).
(vii) This sage entered the belly of Bālamukunda, (Sloka 100, Chapter 188, Vana Parva).
(viii) Markandeya gave a description of Kāliyuga. (Sloka 7, Chapter 190, Vana Parva).
(ix) He described at another time the incarnation of Kalki. (Sloka 93, Chapter 19, Vana Parva).
(x) Once Markandeya narrated the story of Tripuravadha to Dharmaputra. (Sloka 2, Chapter 33, Karuṇa Parva).
(xi) Markandeya was also one among the several sages who visited Bhiṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 11, Chapter 47, Sānti Parva).
(xii) Markandeya learnt Sahasranāma (thousand names) of Śiva from Naciketas and taught the same to Upamanyu. (Sloka 79, Chapter 17, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xiii) Once Markandeya discussed with Nārada topics on many different subjects. (Dākṣinātya Pātha, Chapter 22, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xiv) Once Markandeya explained the evils of taking flesh as food. (Sloka 37, Chapter 115, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xv) The name of the wife of Markandeya was Dhūmornā. (Sloka 4, Chapter 146, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xvi) Yuddhiṣṭhīra worshipped Markandeya also when he worshipped great sages before commencing the Mahāpratāhāra. (Sloka 12, Chapter 1, Prathāna Parva, M.B.).
(xvii) Mahābhārata gives the following synonyms for Markandeya:—Bhārgava, Bhārgavasattama, Bhrgukulaśārdūla, Bhrigunandanā, Brahmarśi and Vipraśrī.

MARKANDEYA (M). A famous holy place. This place is situated about sixteen miles to the north of Kāṭi at a place where the rivers Gaṅgā and Gomati meet. He who visits this place would get the benefit of doing an Agniṣṭoma yajña. Not only that, he would lift the prestige of his family. (Sloka 80, Chapter 34, Vana Parva).

MARKANDEYAPURĀNA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. The number of granthas in it is nine thousand. It contains a critical study of Dharma and Adharma. It is considered to be very good to give this Purāṇa as gift on the full-moon day in the month of Kārttika (November). (Chapter 272, Agni Purāṇa).

MARKANDEYASAMYĀŚĀVARVA. A sub-Parva of the Vana Parva of Mahābhārata. This contains chapters 82 to 242 of Vana Parva.

MARMAN. According to Indian Śāstras there are 108 Marmanas in the body of a living being. Of these the most important are forehead, eyes, eye-brows, armpits, shoulders, heart, chin etc. Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, Chapter 34 says that a snake-bite or a heavy blow on any one of these marmans would prove fatal.

MĀRTTIKĀVANA (M). An ancient country in Bhārata. During the time of the Pāṇḍavas this country was ruled by King Śalya. (Sloka 14, Chapter 16, Vana Parva). Paraśuṛāma killed all the Kṣatriyas of this country. (Sloka 12, Chapter 70, Drona Parva). Arjuna once made the son of Kṛtavarmā the King of this country. (Sloka 69, Chapter 77, Mausala Parva).

MARU I. A king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty, the father of Prasūrūta and son of Śighra. He had become "Ciraṅjaṭīti" (immortal) by his Yogic power. According to Bhāgavata Purāṇa, all Kṣatriya families would perish in Kaliyuga. At that time, Maru would come back to the world to revive the Kṣatriya race. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MARU II. A Videha king of the Nimi dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MARU III. One of the chief lieutenants of Narakāsura. He was slain by Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

MARUBHŪMI (MARUDHANVA). The ancient name of the present Rajāsthān. In Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 5 we see that Nakula had won a victory over Marudhanva during his triumphal march over the western country. Kāṃkavāna in which is included Trāpabindu sarovara, is in Marudhanva. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 258, Verse 13). Marudhanva was also known as "Mārvāta". The sage Utauika lived in Mārvāta. In Mahābhārata, Aśvamedha Parva, Chapters 53, 54 and 55 it is stated that once Śrī Kṛṣṇa showed his Viśvarūpa to this sage at Mārvāta.

MĀRUDHA. A country of Purānic fame. Sahadeva conquered this place while he was on his victory march to the south. (Sloka 14, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).

MĀRUTA. The fortynine Vāyūs. (For details see under DITI).

MĀRUTA (M). An ancient place of habitation of south Bhārata. Those who stood on the right side of the Kṛauṇārūpa Vṛuṇa (a battle array) constructed by Dṛśṭadyumna in the Kuruksetra battle were the people of Māruta from south Bhārata. (Sloka 57, Chapter 50, Bhiṣma Parva).

MĀRUTAGAṆATĪRTHA. (MARUDGAṆATĪRTHA) A sacred place. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 38).

MĀRUTANTAVYA. One of the sons of Viśvāmitra. (Sloka 54, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRUTASANA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 62, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MĀRUTASKANDHA. An army of the Devas. The commander of the forces was Subrahmanya. (Sloka 55, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

MĀRUTS. In the Purāṇas there are references to 49 gods who are known as "Maruts". All of them are the sons of Kaśyapa. The story of how the child in Diti's womb was cut into 49 pieces which became 49 Maruts. It is given in Chapter 71 of Vāmana Purāṇa, as follows:

Kaśyapa's first wife Aditi became the mother of Devas and his second wife Diti became the mother of Daityas. The chief of the Devas was Indra and the chief of Daityas were Hiranyakṣa and Hiranyakāśipu. At the request of Indra, Hiranyakṣa and Hiranyakāśipu were slain by Mahāviṣṇu. Diti who was grieved at the death of her sons, approached Kaśyapa and requested him to give her a son who would be strong enough to kill Indra. Kaśyapa told her that if she could perform tapas for 10,000 Divyavarṣas with due observances, she would get a son who would be able to, kill Indra and conquer the three worlds. He gave her a long list of conditions to be observed during the tapas, some of which were as follows:—Do not injure any creature; do not curse; do not tell lies; do not cut nails or hair; do not touch any unclean object; do not get angry; do not speak to wicked people; do not wear soiled clothes; do not wear garlands used by others; do not eat what is left over by another; do not eat meat touched by a Śūdra woman. Putting on clean, white dress, carrying auspicious substances, everyday before breakfast, cows, Brāhmaṇas, goddess Lakṣmī and Kaśyapa himself should be worshipped." This observance is known as "Pūṃsavana." He said that if she performed the tapas with this austere observance, a son capable of killing Indra would be born to her.

Diti started the observance as advised by her husband, Kaśyapa left for Udaya mountain. After his departure, Indra came to the Āśrama and pretending friendship offered to serve Diti as an attendant. Diti accepted his offer and allowed him to serve her. One day Diti, who was utterly tired fell asleep and Indra took advantage of this opportunity and got entranced into her womb through her nostrils. He cut the child in Diti's womb with his weapon Vajra into seven pieces. At that time the child cried aloud and Indra said to it, "Mā rudra" which means "Do not cry". He cut each of the seven pieces again into seven pieces and thus 49 Maruts were born out of the 49 pieces. Since Indra said "Mā rudra", they came to be known as "Maruts". All these Maruts subsequently became Indra's servants.

After this, Indra with his weapon came out of Diti's body. With joined palms he begged Diti's pardon and explained to her that he destroyed the child in her womb since he was destined to be his (Indra's) enemy.

MARUTTA I. A wealthy king who lived in Kṣayauga.

Genealogy. Descended from Vīśu in the following order:—Brähmā, Marici, Kaśyapa, Vīyavān, Vaivāvari, Manu, Mahāhū, Prasandhi, Kṣupa, Iksvāku, Vībhā, Kalyāṇa, Khaṇḍeru, Suwarca, Kārandaṇa and Marutta.

2) How Marutta got gold. As soon as Marutta became king he began to perform a Yāga. Money was required for it. He was puzzled as to how to raise funds. Besides, Indra was trying to obstruct the Yāga. At last he consulted Nādara who told him that Bhṛṣapati's brother Śaṅvartaka was performing tapas in the forest and if Marutta approached him, he would give him enough money for this purpose. So Marutta went to Śaṅvartaka. He advised Marutta to worship Śiva. Accordingly Marutta went to Kālalasa and got plenty of gold by worshipping Śiva and returned with it and began his Yāga. In spite of their efforts, Indra and other gods were not able to spoil Marutta's Yāga. After the Yāga Marutta stored up the surplus wealth in the neighbourhood of Himalayas, where his capital was situated.

After the Bhārata Yuddha, Dharmaputra was in need of money to re-establish his administration and for conducting an Āśvamedha yāga. At that time sage Vyāsa informed him about the gold which Marutta had left in the neighborhood of the Himalayas. It was by fetching that gold that the Pāṇḍavas conducted their Āśvamedhāyāga. (M.B. Āśvamedha Parva, Chapters 3-10).

3) Marutta and Rāvana. Once Rāvana started on a triumphal tour in his Puspaka Vimāna with his followers. It was at that time that Marutta was performing his famous Yāga. The various gods were also present on that occasion. Alarmed at the sight of Rāvana who was invincible by virtue of a boon he had received, the gods assumed the shape of different animals and birds. Indra became a peacock, Dharmarāja (Yama), became a crow; Kubera became a chameleon; Varuṇa transformed himself into a swan, and so on. Rāvana entered the precincts of the Yājña and said to Marutta:—"Either you fight with me, or else admit defeat from me." To this Marutta replied calmly:—"May I know who you are?" Rāvana answered with a smile of contempt:—"I am amused at your strange pretence! Do you mean to say that you do not know Rāvana who is the younger brother of Kubera? There is no one but you in all the three worlds, who does not know me. I have won the Puspakavimāna after defeating my elder brother." Marutta retorted with bitter irony:—"As a younger brother who has defeated his elder brother, you are certainly a great man. There is no praiseworthy hero equal to you in all these three worlds. Do you brag that you have defeated your elder brother? I do not know whether you have received the boon by your righteous conduct. I have not heard the stories which you have told just now. You wicked fellow, stop there! I don't think that you will return alive!" Saying this Marutta took his bow and arrows and got ready for a fight.

But Śaṅvartaka stopped Marutta saying "O King! If you would please heed my advice, do not prepare for a fight here. We have started "Mahē-varasatāra". If we do not bring it to a conclusion, the whole family will come to an end. One who performs this Yāga should not be engaged in a fight. He should not even become a victim to anger. This is Ārakasa (Rāvana) is invincible. Your victory is doubtful." At this, Marutta put down his bow and began to occupy himself again with the affairs of the Yājña. Just then Śukra shouted, "Rāvana has won." The Ārakasas and their leader Rāvana continued their tour after eating the Mahārājas who had come to take part in the Yāga. After Rāvana left the place, the Devas resumed their own forms (Uttara Rāmāyana).

4) Other Details.

(i) Marutta flourished in Yama's assembly. (M.B. Sābhā Parvā, Chapter 8, Verse 16).

(ii) Marutta is considered as one of the "Pāñcamahā-saṃrāṇa" (five great emperors). The five great emperors are—Yuvanāśva, Bhagiratha, Kārtuva, Vyāha, and Marutta. (M.B.: Śatā Parva, Chapter 15)
MARUTTA II

(iii) Once Siva presented him a golden peak of the Himalayas. Indra, Bhupati, and other Devas attended Marutta’s assembly. His Vajrānandapās were all golden. His cooks were groups of Marut, He was able to make all his subjects strong and healthy. In Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 55, we see that Marutta ruled over the country for 1000 years as an ideal emperor.

(iv) Once Marutta received a sword from King Munekunda. Marutta gave it to Raiva. (M.B.: Sañči Parva, Chapter 166, Verse 77)

(v) Marutta gave his daughter to Angiras and attained Heaven according to Mahābhārata. Śānti Parva, Chapter 234. Verse 18.

(vi) In Bhagavata, 9th Skanda, we find a passage which says that since Marutta had 18 sons he had adopted Duyanta, a king of the Pūru dynasty, as his son.

MARUTTA II. A great sage. He entered into a dispute with Śri Kṛṣṇa who was on his way to Hastinā-pura as the messenger of the Pandavas. (M.B.: Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 27)

MARUTVĀMALA. In south India, at the southern tip of the Sahya ranges, a mountain reputed to contain medicinal herbs, may still be seen. This mountain is known by the name “Marutvāma”-A legend connected with the origin of this mountain, is given in Utara Rāmaśāna, as follows:

It was the time of the battle between Śri Rāma and Rāvana. Rāvana’s younger brother Vībhīṣana joined the side of Rāma and fought against Rāvana. The enraged Rāvana shot his arrow at Vībhīṣana. In his endeavour to save Vībhīṣana, Laksmana fell down unconscious. Rāma and his followers discussed how Laksmana could be revived. Jāmbavān observed that there was a herb called “Drōna” in one of the peaks of the Himalayas and if it was brought at once, Laksmana could be restored to his senses. Hanūmān flew to the Himalayas immediately. But although he combed the forests there, he was not able to find the herb “Drōna”. So he tore away and lifted a whole peak which was full of all kinds of medicinal herbs and returned to Lānkā. Jāmbavān took the needed herbs from it and deposited the peak at the southern end of India. This is the present Marutvāma. (Mala means mountain).

MARUTVĀN. See under MARUTVATI.

MARUTVATI. The mother of two Marutvāns. This Marutvati was the daughter of Dākṣa, and the wife of Dharma. The ten daughters of Dākṣa, namely, Arundhā, Vāsu, Yāmi, Lāmba, Bhānu, Marutvati, Sānkālpā, Muhūrtā, Sādhya, and Viśā were the wives of Dharma-deva. Vīśādevas were born to Viśā; Siddhas were born to Sādhya, Marutvati were born to Marutvati, Vasus were born to Vāsu, Bhānus were born to Bhānu, Ghosha was born to Lāmba and Nāgavīthi was born to Yāmi. (Viśā Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

MARYĀDĀ I. A princess of Vidarbha. She was married by the king named Arvācīna. In Mahābhārata, Ādī Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 18, it is said that a son named Ariha was born to them.

MARYĀDĀ II. A daughter of the king of Videha, Devāthi a king of the Pūru dynasty married her. Mahābhārata, Adī Parva, Chapter 95, verse 23 says that a son, Ariha was born to them.

MĀSA. A measure of weight in ancient Bhārata. (See under Trāsareṇu).

2. What the names of the months indicate.

1. Malayalam months. The months are named based on certain beliefs. It takes twelve months for the earth to go round the Sun once. When the earth passes through the twelve divisions, it faces a separate set of constellations in the universe in each of these divisions. In the month of Chinnam the earth faces a cluster of constellations in the shape of a lion and so the month is called Simha (lion) or Chinnam. In the next division the earth faces the constellations in the shape of a Kanyakā and so the month was called Kannī. The earth faces next the constellations in the shape of a balance and so the month was called Tulām (Tulā = balance). In the next division the earth faces the constellations in the shape of a scorpion and so the month was called Vṛśčikam (scorpion). The set of constellations which faces the earth in the next division is shaped like a bow (dhanus) and so the month got the name Dhanu. In the next division the earth faces a set of constellations in the shape of a Makaramatsya (makara-fish) and so the month was called Makaram. Kumbha means a jar and Minam means a fish and Meṣam (Meṣa) means a goat and Idavam (Rṣabha) means an ox. The shapes of the constellations in those divisions are like the things mentioned and the months were so named after them. In the next two divisions the constellations appear as twins and a crab respectively and the months were so called Mithunan (twins) and Karkatakam (crab).

2. English months.

i) January has come from the word Janus, the name of a Roman devatā. Janus is twin-faced, one facing the front and the other back.

ii) February means ‘to purify’ and the festival of purification of the Romans is conducted in that month.

iii) March is Mars, a devatā of War. Rome was built by the brave warrior Romulus. In his time there were only ten months in a year and the number of days in a month varied considerably. There were months with twenty days and thirty-five days. It was in the year 700 B.C. that the then King of Rome, Numa, divided the year into twelve months and added January and February to it. Till then March was the first month of the year.

iv) April—Aperi means ‘blossoming’ and since the trees and plants blossom in that month it got the name of April.

v) May is named after Maia daughter of the demigod (devatā) Atlas. There is an opinion that it is named after Māia, another name of Jupiter.

vi) June gets its name after the devatā Juno though there is a version that it is named after a Roman tribe called Junius.

vii) July was formerly known as Quintilis meaning the fifth counting from March which was the first month of the year till the time of Numa. It was to commemorate the name of Julius Caesar that the name was changed to July.

viii) August. This month was formerly known as Sextilis meaning the sixth month. But it was renamed August in honour of Augustus Caesar. But it still lacked the importance of July as it contained thirtyone days and August only thirty days. So Augustus took one day from February and made the number of days in August thirtyone.

ix) September means the seventh month from March.

x) October means the eighth month.

xi) November means the ninth month.

xii) December means the tenth month.

MĀSAKA (M). A place in the ancient island of Śaka. Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11 says that in ancient times, Kings used to live there for the fulfillment of their desires.

MĀSARŚĀRA. A king of the Rgveda period. Rgveda, 1st Manḍala, 18th Anuvāka, 122nd Sūkta says that this king used to persecute the Aryans.

MĀSAVRAṬOPĀVĀSA. Purāṇas mention about the months in which Vratas are to be observed with efficacy and the details are given below:

1. He who fasts for half a day in the month of Tulam will get children and vehicles in plenty and would become pure. (Ślokā 29, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).

2. He who fasts the whole day of the Dvādaśī in Tulām and worships Viṣṇu will get the benefit of making a Sahasragodāna (giving away thousand cows as gift). (Ślokā 3, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).

3. He who fasts for one time of the day in Vṛśčikam will become a very brave and valorous man and acquire many wives and fame. (Ślokā 30, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).

4. All men and women who worship Viṣṇu on the dvādaśī day in Vṛśčikam fasting for the whole day will get the benefit of a Godānayajña. (Ślokā 14, Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).

5. He who fasts for one time a day during the month of Meṣa will get gold, diamonds and pearls in plenty and will be born in a high family in his next birth. (Ślokā 23, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).

6. If one fasts the whole of the Dvādaśī day in the month of Meṣa one would get the benefit of conducting a Puṇḍarīka. (Ślokā 7 Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).

7. He who fasts for one time in a day in the month of Mithuna will become very prosperous. (Ślokā 25, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).

8. If one fasts the whole day and night of the Dvādaśī in Mithuna and does Trivikrama pūjā one would not only get the benefit of conducting a Gomedayajña but will be able to enjoy sexual pleasures with celestial maidens. (Ślokā 9, Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).

MĀSI RAM. A place of habitation in ancient India. There is a reference to this region in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 53.

MATAṆGA I. An ancient sage. The Rāmāyana in Araṇya Kānda describes the āṣrama of Mataṅga. Rāmalakṣaṇas after crossing the forest of Krauṇḍa came to the āṣrama of Mataṅga. Kabandha was slain at this place after abandoning his demoniac body Kabandha extolled the greatness of Mataṅgāāṣrama to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. "The flowers of this āṣrama are never plucked and worn on heads. Even if they are not plucked they never fade. They remain fresh always. There is a reason for this. The disciples of Mataṅga once brought a heavy load of fruits for their guru and when they reached the āṣrama they were tired and drops of perspiration fell on the plants and they became flowers. Sabarī is performing penance in this āṣrama." Mataṅga once cursed Bālī. It happened that while the sage was living on the mountain of Ṛṣyamukha Bālī and the asura Ḍundubhi fought against each other and blood flowing from the body of Ḍundubhi by a blow of Bālī spurted out and fell on the hands of the sage.
Mataṅga then cursed Bāli saying that his head would blow off if he entered Rṣyumūkācal a again. (Sarga 46, Kṣiṅkdhā Kāndā, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa and Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Pūrva Kāndā). Mataṅgārāma was a holy place. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀṬAṆGĀ II. Another name of Trīśāṅku. The name of Mataṅga is used for Rājaṛṣi Trīśāṅku in Verse 31, of Chapter 71, of Ādi Parva. For more detail see under Trīśāṅku.

MATAṆGA III. A mahārṣi born to a barber of a brahmin woman. This clandestine birth was not known either to the brahmin husband or Mataṅga for a long time. Once his brahmin father sent him to the fields for ploughing. He put a donkey to the yoke and ploughed. When the donkey slowed down its work Mataṅga beat it hard. The mother of the donkey saw it and wept. She called Mataṅga to her side and told him that he was the son of a barber and that was why he behaved like a caṇḍāla showing no kindness towards the animal. Mataṅga ran to his house and told his parents what the mother-donkey said. After that he left his house and did penance to become a brahmin. Indra was pleased and he asked Mataṅga what he wanted and he replied he wanted to become a brahmin. Indra made him a brahmin and sent him back. (Chapter 27, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀṬAṆGĀ IV. A preceptor. He was the guru of Śabarī. (Araṇya Kāndā, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀṬAṆGA. Sage Mataṅga was known by this name also. (See under Mataṅga).

MĀṬAṆGĀKEDĀRA. A sacred place. He who bathes in a pond there would get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

MĀṬAṆGI. The great grandmother of the elephants. Mataṅgi was the daughter of Krodhavāṣa, daughter of Dākṣa and wife of Kadāyaprapājapati. Mataṅgi had nine sisters. Elephants were born of Mataṅgi. (Sarga 14, Araṇya Kāndā; Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀṬALI. Charioteer of Indra. Chapter 69 of Vāmana Purāṇa gives the following story about the birth of Māṭali.

A child was born to sage Śamika. It was the time of Devāsa war. A great army of asuras under the leadership of Andhaka attacked Devaloka and conquered it. In the great battle with Andhaka the Vairāgyudha of Indra broke into two. Indra was thinking of a new weapon for him. Mahāviṣṇu then appeared before him and advised him to praise the glory of Agni. Indra did so and then a divine weapon rose from the fire. Indra flew at the asuras carrying the new weapon. There was no clever charioteer to drive the chariot of Indra. Still, seated in the golden chariot given to him by the Vasus Indra drove very swiftly against the asuras. The earth shivered by the din of the chariot-wheels.

When the earth began to quake the sage Śamika following directions of his wife Tapasvini placed the child on the ground outside the hermitage. An astrologer had told her that a child would become two if it was placed in an open ground at the time of earth-quake. Tapasvini wanted one more child. As soon as her child was placed on the ground another child identical in every respect with the first one was born by the side of the other. But the second child, as soon as it was born rose up and ran to Indra for driving his chariot.

When the Gandharvas knew he was coming to help Indra, they showered him with brilliance and the child approaching Indra said “Oh, Lord of the Devas, I shall be your charioteer.” Indra asked him, “Child, whose son are you? How will you drive my horse? I doubt your competence.” The child replied, “I am the son born to Śamika on the ground. I have been given power and brilliance by the Gandharvas and so I am capable of driving your chariot.” On hearing this, Indra accepted him as his charioteer and named him Māṭali.

MĀṬAṆIRAŚVAN. A devatā (demigod). There are several stories in the Vedas regarding the birth of Agni (fire). Though Agni originating from the clouds reaches the earth as lightning it hides itself making it invisible to man. It was Māṭaṅiraśvan who took its form from the earth and gave it to the Bhrigu family and made it possible for them to make it as and when it was required. (Rgveda).

This Māṭaṅiraśvan was one of the prominent sons of Garuḍa. (Śloka 14, Chapter 10, Udvyoga Parva).

MĀṬHANA. An asura on the side of Tārakāśura. Mahāviṣṇu killed him. (Chapter 152, Matsya Purāṇa).

MĀṬHĀRA I. A demigod deputed by Indra to serve Sūrya (Sun). This demigod always sits on the right side of Sūrya, (Brahma Parva, Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

MĀṬHĀRA II. One of the Aṣṭādaśavinayākas (Eighteen Vinayākas). (Sāmba, 16).

MĀṬHĀRA III. An aśāraya (teacher). He is believed to be the author of the book Śaṅkyakārikāvṛtti. (Kausitaki Brāhmaṇa).

MĀṬHĀRAVANA. A holy place in Dākṣiṇa Bhārata. The victory pillar of Māṭhāraka, an aide of Sūrya, is situated here. (Śloka 10, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

MĀṬHURĀ. The birth place of Śri Kṛṣṇa.

MĀṬI. A daughter of Dākṣa-prapājapati. She became the wife of Dharmarāja. (Śloka 15, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MĀṬINĀRĀ. A King of Puruvarāśa. The line from Pūru is as follows: Pūru - Jana-meya-Praćīnvan-Manasvya-Vitabhaya - Śūndu - Bahuvidha - Saṁyati-Rahovādi-Bhadraśa-Rkṣeyu-Rkṣeyu-Sannat eyu-Ghṛteyu - Śhan-dileyu-Dharm eyu-Saṁvidheyu-Kṛteyu-Matināra. Matināra got two sons, Santurodha and Pratirathasha. Duṣyanta, husband of Śakuntalā, was the son of Santurodha. (Chapter 278, Ādi Parva).

MĀṬKULIKA. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 467, Śalya Parva).

MĀṬTĪRTHA. A sacred place situated on the outskirts of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a holy pond there one would be rich in children. (Śloka 58, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀṬSYA I. The first and foremost incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu. (See under Avatāra).

MĀṬSYA II. An ancient country of Purānic fame. The people of this country are called Māṭyas. The details available regarding Māṭyasdeva from the Mahābhārata are given below:

1. The Pāṇḍavas wandering through the forests came to Māṭyasdeva. (Śloka 2, Chapter 153, Ādi Parva).
2. The people of Māṭyasdeva in fear of Jārāsandha migrated from the north to the south. (Śloka 28, Chapter 14, Śabhā Parva).
The MATSYA incarnation, Danava Hema, was born a Satyavati, the Ksatriyas. Virata was the chief of Matsye's during the time of Mahâbhârata. (Sloka 12, Chapter 7, Virâta Parva).

In the Kuruksetra battle Virâta, King of Matsuysa, came to the help of Yudhiṣṭhira with an Aksauhinî (army). (Sloka 12, Chapter 18, Udyoga Parva).

The Pândavas spent a year of their life incognito in the palace of Virâta king of Matsyaedeśa. (Chapter 7, Virâta Parva).

Matsyasarâyya was one of the prominent kingdoms of ancient Bhûrâta. (Sloka 40, Chapter 9, Bhûrma Parva).

Brhûma slaughtered many soldiers from Matsuysa.

Dronâcârya killed at a stretch five hundred Matsyas in the great battle. (Sloka 31 Chapter 190, Drona Parva).

Karna once conquered Matsyeśa. (Sloka 18, Chapter 8, Karna Parva).

The people of Matsyeśa were honest and charitable. (Chapter 45, Sloka 28, Karna Parva).

Those who were left out among the Matsyas in the great battle were killed by A:nvatthânâ. (Sloka 158, Chapter 8, Sauptika Parva).

MATSYA III. A King. He was the brother of Satyavati, mother of Vyāsa. Satyavati and Matsya were both found in a fish by the same fisherman. (See under Adi.)

MATSYAGANDHĪ (MATSYAGANDHA). Another name for Satyavati, mother of Vyāsa. (See under Satyavati).

MATSYAKĀLA. A King of Pûruvamâ. He was one of the seven celebrated Kings known as Giri-kâputras. The others were : Bhradratha, Kuśâ, Yadu, Pratyaggra, Bala and Vira. The seven sons were born to Girika of her attendants. (Chapter 278, Agni Purâna).

MATSYAPURÂNA. One of the eighteen Purânas. This Purâna was told to Manu Satyavrata by Mahâvîśu during his incarnation as Matsyu. There are thirteen thousand slokas in it. For prosperity this Purâna should be given as gift on the Viṣuvat day along with a golden image of Matsya. (Chapters 2 and 272, Agni Purâna).

MATSYOYÂRA. Another name for Satyavati, mother of Vyāsa. (See under Satyavati).

MATTA. A demon. He was born to the demon Mâlayavân of his wife Sundarî. Matta had six brothers named Vajravamû, Virûpâkṣa, Durmukha, Suptaghna, Yajînakosa and Unmatta. This Matta was killed in the Râma-Ârvâna battle. (Chapter 10, Agni Purâna).

MATTAMAYÂRÂ(S). A special tribe of Ksatriyas. Nakula, one of the Pândavas, defeated these people during his victory march to the west. (Sloka 5, Chapter 32, Sabhâ Parva).

MAUDGÂLA (MAUDGALÂ). A mahârâśi. This mahârâśi once cursed Râvana.

Once Maudgalya was sitting in Svastikâsana resting his shoulders on his yogic staff in the forest of Kadamba. Râvana returning after his victory march came that way. Seeing the sage sitting in a wonderfully queer posture Râvana was amused and playfully tapped the staff with his Candraahâsa. The staff broke into two and Maudgalya fell flat on the ground breaking his spine. The sage was furious and he cursed Râvana saying that his Candraahâsa would thenceforth have no effect at all. (Yuddhisrâ Kândâ, Kamba Râmâyâna).

MAUHURTITIKÂGATI. When the Sun passes through the centre of Puṣkaradvîpa it covers a path equivalent to a thirtyieth part of the earth and this journey of the Sun is called Mauhurttikâgati. (See under Sûrya).

MAUJÂYANA. A mahârâśi. This sage shone in the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 13, Chapter 4, Sabhâ Parva).

MAURAVAPÂSA. See under Mura.

MAURVI. A kind of grass. It is with this grass that ascetics make mekhalâ (waistlet). (Sloka 33, Chapter 17, Drona Parva).

MAUSALAPARVA. A Parva of Mahábhârata. This Parva contains the story of the end of the Yâdavas by killing each other.

MÂVELLA. The fourth son of Uparicaravas. Mâvela attended the Râjasûya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Chapter 63, Âdi Parva and Chapter 34, Sabhâ Parva).

MÂVELLAKA. An ancient place of habitation in India. Suârmâ, King of Trîgarta, fought against Arjuna taking along with him the warriors of Mâvellaka. Arjuna killed them all. (Sloka 20, Chapter 17, Drona Parva).

MAYA. A Dânava king who served Devas and Aṣuras as their architect and builder.

1) General. Kaṣyapa Prâjâpati, son of Marîci and grandson of Brah mã married the thirteen daughters of Daksa. Among them, the first was Aditi, the second was Diti and the third was Danu. Añâtayas were born to Aditi, Añâtayas were born to Diti and Dânavas were born to Danu. The chief among the sons of Danu was Maya.

Maya was found to be very proficient in the art of architecture even from his boyhood. He worshipped Brah mã in the Himâlayas to gain unrivalled skill in architecture. Brah mã was pleased and appeared before him. He blessed Maya to become the unequalled architect of the Devas. Aṣuras and Dânavas. After that Maya was engaged in building magnificent mansions for Devas and Aṣuras. He was also anointed King of the Dânavas.

It was a period of friendly co-operation and brotherly relations between Devas and Aṣuras. Once there was a dancing show in Devaloka. Maya was also invited to see the performance of the women of Devaloka. All the dancers acquitted themselves creditably. But what attracted Maya most, was the dance of Hemâ, the Apsârã woman. Maya and Hemâ were mutually attracted and fell in love with each other. The Devas who came to know of this, gave Hemâ in marriage to Maya. (Uttra Râmâyâna).

2) Domæstic life. Maya and Hemâ went to the valley south of Himâvân and built there a city named "Hema-pura". While leading a happy life there, two sons, Mâyâvî and Dundubah were born to them. But they had no daughter. So they worshipped Siva, praying for a daughter.

At about that time, one day, an Apsârã woman, Madhurâ, after observing Somavâra Vrata, came to Siva and did obeisance to him. Pârvatî was not at home at the moment. Fascinated by Madhurâ's charm, Siva embraced her. Pârvatî who came to know of it, cursed
In Maya, loyal river built was the brahmin its name little him. Wonderful Birth. Protection. Other woman life Mahesvara gave Devi Arjuna told long tale. (M.B. Bhavisya Parva, Chapter 55)

MAYA

1) General information. A consort of Mahävișṇu, Mäyä has got a very prominent place in Hindu Purânas. The Purânas state that this whole universe is unreal, illusory and if we feel it real it is because of the working of this Mäyä.

2) Birth. How was Mäyä born? Agni Puräṇa in its twentieth chapter gives a genealogy of Mäyä. Hirämä (injury) is the wife of Adharma (evil). They got two children named Anrta (falsehood) and Nïkṛti (wickedness). From them were born Bhaya (fear), Naraka (hell) Mäyä (illusion) and Vedanä (pain). Mäyä in turn gave birth to Death, the destroyer of all pain produced from Hate or Misery. Mṛtyu (death) produced Vyädi (disease), Jarä (ruggosity), Soka (sorrow), Trṣṇä (desire) and Krodha (anger).

3) Exhibition of Mäyä. Mahävișṇu once told Närada thus: “There is nothing like living beings on earth. All is an illusion due to Mäyä.” Närada requested Mahävișṇu to show him that and Viṣṇu took Närada to the banks of a river and exhibited the wonderful working of Mäyä. (For details see under Täladvajā 1).

4) How Gāthi, a brahmin, saw Mäyä. In the country of Kosala there was once a brahmin named Gāthi. He went to the forests and standing there in water in a pond, immersed up to his neck, started doing penance. For eight months he did penance thus and then Mahävișṇu appeared before him and asked him what soon Madhurä and turned her into a frog. But she said that after twelve years, the curse would be lifted and she would become a woman again. It was in a well near the place where Maya and Hemä were performing tapas that Madhurä fell as frog. After twelve years, the frog recovered her former shape as a woman. At that time Maya saw her, and having taken her to be the daughter given to him by Siva, took her with him to his palace. He gave her the name “Mandodari”! It was this “Mandodari” whom Rävana married later. Besides these three children, Maya had some other sons and daughters. In Devi Bhâgavata, 8th Skandha there is a reference to the Dänava named Bala, the son of Maya, living in Atala, a section of Pâtala. In Kathä sarîtäsâgara, Madanaamañcukâlambaka, 3rd Tarânga we find that Maya had two daughters named Savyamprabhä and Somaprabhä. Of them, Somaprabhä was married by Nalakûbara, the son of Vaiśravana.

3) Alliance with Arjuna and construction of Indraprastha. Once Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna offered Khañḍavaavana to Agnideva as a feast. (See under the word “Khañḍavadâhâ”). While Agni was furiously feeding upon the forests, the human animal inhabitants in it began to flee from it. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna shot them down with arrows. At that time Maya was hiding himself in the disguise of Taksaka. When the flames of fire approached that place Maya left his shelter and rushed out. Śrî Kṛṣṇa aimed his weapon Cakra at him. Crying aloud with fear, Maya ran to Arjuna praying for protection. Arjuna stopped Agnideva and Śrî Kṛṣṇa and thus saved Maya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 240).

From that time, Maya became a loyal follower of Arjuna. After Khañḍavadâhâ, Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were taking rest when Maya approached them with joined palms and asked Arjuna what he should do in return for saving him from the fury of Kṛṣṇa and the blazing fire. Arjuna replied that he expected no return from Maya for saving his life but wanted only his friendship. Maya was not satisfied. He insisted that Arjuna should accept some service from him as a token of his deep gratitude. On hearing this, Śrî Kṛṣṇa suggested that Maya should build a beautiful palace for the Pândavas. Accordingly he built a magnificent palace for the Pândavas at the place called Khañḍavaprastha. (M.B. Sbhâ Parva, Chapter 1).

4) Maya settled down in Vindhya. Once Maya sought shelter from Mahävișṇu. Viṣṇu offered shelter to Maya and so he built a mansion called “Sudharmä” for all the Devas. It was a building of inexpressible beauty and rare architectural workmanship. The Asuras who became angry with Maya for his alliance with the Devas made preparations to attack him. Alarmed at it, Maya fled southwards with his family and reached Vindhya. There he built a lovely mansion and settled down in it. (Kathäsarîtasâgara, Madanaamañcukâlambaka, 3rd Tarâha). In Vâlmiki Rämâyana, Kiśkindhâ kânda, 50th sarga also there is a reference to this wonderful mansion which Maya built on the Vindhya mountain. In their search for Sîtä, Hanûmân and the other monkeys reached the Vindhya mountain. There they combed the forests and caves to find out Sîtä. When they came to the peak to the south west of the mountain, they saw a huge dark cave. They entered it and cautiously moved forward. After a long and tedious walk the monkeys were exhausted with hunger and thirst. When they proceeded a little further, they came across a bright place. There they saw a woman sitting alone, dressed in deer skin and barks of trees. She greeted them and in the course of her talk with the monkeys she told them that the cave was made by the magician Maya and that her name was Savyamprabhä. Her mother was Merusâvârni and that she (Savyamprabhä) was entrusted with the task guarding the wonderful mansion. Then she gave them fruits and fresh water.

5) Building of Trîpuras. It was Maya who built three magic dwellings for the three Dänavas, Kamalâkâ, Tarákâkâ and Vidyunmâlî. (For details see under the word Pura).
he wanted. The brahmin said he wanted to see Māyā-devi. Viṣṇu granted the boon and disappeared.

Several years passed after that and nothing happened. One day the brahmin as usual went to bathe in a pond. When he took a dip in the waters he forgot all his prayers and mantras. I there was a change of mind. He felt he was lying dead in his house. Relatives were sitting around weeping. His wife was in tears and was holding his legs. In an atmosphere of mourning, his own people weeping bitterly carried his body to a frightening burial ground and put it on a funeral pyre. It was burnt to ashes. He then felt himself in the womb of a Cāndāla woman living in a village near Hūṇamandalā. The foetus developed and a black boy was born. The boy grew passing the stages of infancy, childhood and boyhood and became a man, black and stout. He started enjoying sexual life with a beautiful Cāndāla girl. The amorous plays were done on leaf-beds, in creeper-huts, bushes and in caves and soon many evil-natured sons were born to him. Gradually his health faded and he constructed a hermitage and lived there as a hermit. His children grew up and he became old and then all on a sudden all his children and wife and other members of his family died and he was left alone. He then left the place and travelling much reached the capital city of Kīraṇamandalā. The city gates were decorated and inside people stood in groups. The road to the palace from the gate had been beautified and as he reached the palace gates he saw an elephant as big and black as mountain standing there well caparisoned. It was customary in those days to post an elephant well bedecked before the palace gates when a King died. The elephant he saw was one who had been let loose to select a new King in the place of the one who had just died. The elephant on seeing him took him by its trunk and placed him on its back. The people when they saw it shouted "The King", "The King". Drums were beaten and people shouted with joy. He was taken to the palace where he was received by young and beautiful girls. He was dressed in royal robes and he took over the administration of the state. Gradually he accepted as his wives the wives of the former King and lived there accepting the name of Gālava. He ruled the state to the satisfaction of all for eight years. One day the King went out for a stroll dressed as an ordinary man. Just outside the gate of the palace a set of Cāndālas were sitting singing songs to the accompaniment of a violin. As soon as they saw Gālava one of the Cāndālas, a red-eyed old man, got up from the group and addressing the King as "Hi, Kalaṇjū" shouted loudly, "Friend, where had you been all this time? It is a long time since we saw you. It is our luck we saw you at least now". The King of Kīra did not like the words of the Cāndāla and he rebuked the old man. The queens and others standing on the terrace of the palace could see this scene. They were shocked. They regretted they had all along been serving a Cāndāla. The news spread like wild fire in the state. The King had to live in the palace without the help and co-operation of anybody inside or outside the palace.

People wanted to atone for the crime they had committed in installing a Cāndāla as their King. They made small fire-pits throughout the country and started committing suicide by jumping into it. The King lamented that such a mass suicide was due to him and he also made a fire-pit and jumped into it. The heat of the fire-pit woke him from his day-dream and Gāthī found himself in the pond where he had come to bathe. "What! Who am I? What all roles did I take just now?" These puzzling thoughts filled him and he went back to the āśrama and started life as usual. One day an old friend of his came to the āśrama and after the daily routine they lay down to sleep. During their conversation Gāthī asked his friend why he had become fleshless and so lean. Then his friend narrated a story exactly similar to the experiences which Gāthī had in the country of Kīra. He added that to atone for the sin of his association with the Cāndālas he was conducting Prayāgasanāna (bath in Prayāga), Japa and Cāndāvanamahāvratā. All those things he explained, made him lean.

Gāthī knew that the story of the guest related to him and he was eager to visit the country of Kīra. When he went to Kīra he saw everything there in the same way as in his dream. Then he realised that it was an exhibition by Viṣṇu of the working of Māyā. Gāthī then renounced everything and went into a cave and started doing penance there. After some years Mahā Viṣṇu appeared before him and blessed him. (Jñānavāṣīṣthā).

MĀYĀDARŚANAPARVA. A subdivision of Ādi Parva, in Mahābhārata. Chapters 227 to 233 of Ādi Parva, are included.

MĀYĀDHARA. An asura. Indra got down Pururavas to fight against this demon who was always giving trouble to the devas. Pururavas killed Māyādhara in a battle. The day the demon was killed Indra gave a banquet in honour of Pururavas. After the banquet there was a dance performance by Rāmbhā and as she was dancing before Ācārya Tumburu, Pururavas openly criticised Rāmbhā for the mistake in dancing she committed then. Tumburu did not relish it and he cursed Pururavas saying that Pururavas would bear a separation from his wife Urvāśī. It was because of this curse that Urvāśī was once carried away from the palace of Pururavas by the Gāndharvas. (Kathāsārīta-gaṇa, Tarāṅga 3, Lāvānakalambaka).

MĀYĀMRGA. Mārica, uncle of Rāvaṇa, took the form of a beautiful deer to tempt Sītā and went to the āśrama where Sītā was staying. This deer is called Māyāmrga. (See under MĀRICA).

MĀYĀPURĪ. A city of the asuras. (See under Kraunca).

MĀYĀŚṬA. When Rāma and Laksmana were in exile in the forests with Sītā, Rāvaṇa came to carry away Sītā. At that time the real Sītā disappeared in Agni and in her place a false Sītā was installed. It was this phantom Sītā who was carried away by Rāvaṇa and who lived in Lanka till the time of Rāvaṇa's death. It was this Māyasīṭa whom Rāma asked to jump into the fire to test her purity. At that time Māyasīṭa disappeared and the real Sītā came out from the fire. (See under SĪTĀ).

MĀYĀŚIVA. Padma Purāṇa gives a story of how once an asura named Jalandhara approached Parvatī as Sīva to induce her to surrender to his desires. This Sīva was called Māyāśiva. A great battle between the devas and asuras was going on. The asuras were winning and the devas got frightened at the strength of the asuras and so Sīva himself entered the battlefield. Jalandhara who led the army of the asuras found the fight against Śiva very tough and smelt defeat. He decided to cheat Pārvatī, the consort of Śiva, to compensate for his defeat in the battle-field and so making an asura named Sumbha as the chief, he left for Kailāsa. Sumbha became a māyā Jalandhara and continued the fight.

Taking another asura named Durvāraṇa, Jalandhara went to a cave in Kailāsa and there changed himself into an exact replica of Śiva. He made Durvāraṇa look like Nandikesa.

Then they went to the top of the mountain where Pārvatī and her companions were staying. Śiva approached Pārvatī on the shoulders of Nandikesa with wounds all over his body and blood oozing from them. Pārvatī seeing Śiva thus, with tears rolling down her cheeks asked him, "Oh, Lord of the gods what happened to your lordship? Who defeated you in the battle? Why do you weep like a low-bred man?" Mayāśīva took from his body all his ornaments like Vāsuki and gave them to the companions of Pārvatī. When Pārvatī saw the heads of Gaṇapati and Subrahmanya in the hands of her husband she cried in bitterness. Śiva told her that all his pārśadas like Maṇibhadra, Virabhadra, Pūṣpadanta, Damana, Dhūmatārama and Kūṃmanda were killed in the battle. Caṇḍī, Bhṛgī, Kīrīṭi, Mahā-kāla, Śrīṇkali, Caṇḍīśa and Gupтанetera were all killed.

Mayāśīva told her that he had picked up the heads of Gaṇapati and Subrahmanya found lying in the battle-field. He requested Pārvatī to console him by embracing him. Pārvatī resented the request. She said, "What you say is unfit for the situation. Sexual enjoyment is forbidden in times of misery, fear, meditation, vomiting fever, performing offering to the manes, journey, royal visits, marriage festivities and in the presence of elders and teachers. Why do you make this request to me when I am mourning the death of my sons?"

 Pretending to be grief-stricken Mayāśīva said "She who does not give sexual pleasure to a man in distress would go to hell. I have no pārśadas now. I have lost my sons also. I lost my house. Now you also hate me. I am going to my cave. Let me end my life there. Come on, Nandikesa, Vajra, we will go.

Hearing this Pārvatī went near him.

At this time there happened a few bad omens in the ocean of milk where Viṣṇu was residing, and calling Gaṇḍa to his side Viṣṇu asked him to go and enquire about the battle that was going on between the devas and asuras. To prevent him from being deceived by the magic of the asuras Viṣṇu dropped into the mouth of Gaṇḍa a pill of great potency. Gaṇḍa reached the battle-field very soon but could not find anything out of the way and so flew to Kailāsa. He did not see Pārvatī first but hearing a noise from somewhere else peeped in and saw Mayāśīva. Gaṇḍa could understand him because of the power of the pill and so flew swiftly back to Mahāviṣṇu and told him what he saw.

Mahāviṣṇu knew that Pārvatī had been deceived by Jalandhara. So he decided to cheat Viṣṇu, wife of Jalandhara. Mahāviṣṇu filled with amorous desires, avoiding Mahālakṣmi, covering his head with a yellow scarf and taking the figure of another person by his yōgic powers stepped out of his abode taking Ananta for his company. He went to Durgākānana the abode of Viṣṇu. They constructed an āśrama there and the wild animals like the lion, tiger, boar, bear and monkey became their disciples taking human form. Then Viṣṇu created mental agony in Vṛndā to attract her to his āśrama. Vṛndā started getting hot and her maids fanned her continuously and anointed her with sandal-wood paste. She thought of her husband in the battle-field and often fainted. She had a very bad dream. She saw her husband Jalandhara lying wounded on his head, ears and nose, with his body smeared with ashes and his eyes pecked by vultures. She saw Kālī, with her hair lying lose, her face reddened with blood, with a skull in her hand dancing before the body of her husband before starting to eat it. At this moment she was awakened by the music of the Māgadhas and loud chanting of family praises by Kimpuruṣas. She at once stopped the music and prayers and paid them off. Then she sent word for pandits to explain the dream she saw. The Pandits said "Devi, this appears to be a dream giving unimaginable fear. To calm the fear give as gifts to brahmans, diamonds, garments, cows and elephants."

Then the brahmin pandits sprinkled on her water made potent by mantras. There was no waning of the fever. Dismissing the pandits, queen Vṛndā went and sat alone upstairs. She felt the whole palace burning and by the craft employed by Viṣṇu she found living inside the palace unbearable.

She got out of the palace and boarding a chariot drawn by mares she went to her play-garden. The sight of the garden filled with beautiful flowers and celestial maidens where no one else but pleasing breeze could enter made her remember her husband. She then brooded on how to find out Jalandhara, and there also she did not get peace of mind. So she accompanied by her maids started for another garden. That garden gave a ghastly sight with huge trees standing crowded interspersed with black rocks and the place resounding with the roars of lions and tigers. Vṛndā got frightened and she hastened to say "Smarakūti, I feel frightened. Please drive back the chariot home."

Hearing this Smarakūti said, "Oh, Devī, I do not know the place. I do not understand the directions also. To which direction am I to drive? The horses look tired. There is no way here. Anyhow let it go as directed by God. If we stay here we will be eaten by man-eaters."

So saying the maid drove the chariot and soon they reached a forest more grisly than the former. It was a forest where great yogins lived. There was no light there neither water nor wind. No sound came. Even the sounds of the bells on the horses and the chariot stopped. Vṛndā moaned, "Where are we to go now, maid! There is no peace of mind for me anywhere in this world."

Smarakūti looking ahead cried, "Look Devī, there is a great black mountain in front of us. The horses refuse to move, for they are afraid of it."

Cold with fear the queen stood up from the chariot and keeping her hands on the pearl necklace on her breast jumped out of the chariot. Then a very fierce demon came towards them. He was yellow in colour with three legs, five hands, seven eyes and ears like a tiger's and the shoulders and chin like those of a lion. It was a horrible sight and Vṛndā hid her eyes with her hands and trembled like a plantain leaf. The maid jumping out of the chariot cried aloud "Oh, my queen, help me. This demon is going to eat me." The demon approaching them took the chariot with the horses and whirled it round in the air. Both the queen and the maid fainted at this exhibition of strength. The demon ate all the horses and then catching hold of the hands of the queen he roared, “If you want your life make me your husband. Your husband has been killed by Siva in the battle. If you join me you can live for years together without fear. Come on, drink this sweet liquor with flesh”. Vrnda became half dead when she heard that.

At that time Mahavisnu in the guise of an ascetic wore bars of trees and matted hair appearing before them. An angered look from Visnu sent the demon away from the place. Vrnda took refuge in the ascetic and the false ascetic said, “I am DeVasarma, son of Bharadvaja. Renouncing all worldly pleasures I have come here to do penance and if it pleases you, you can come and stay in my aśrama and do penance. We can go to another forest far away from here.” As soon as they reached the aśrama Mahavisu appeared before her in the figure of Jalandhara. They embraced each other and lived there joyfully for many days. One day at the end of a sexual act Vrnda saw instead of Jalandhara the ascetic in embrace with her. She was shocked and stood up separated from him. Then Mahavisu said “Vrnda, I am Visnu husband of Laksmi. Your husband has gone to conquer Siva and get Pārvati for himself. I am Siva also. We appear separate. Your husband Jalandhara has been killed in the battle. Join with me.”

Vrnda got angry. She cursed Visnu; she said, “You cheated me by pretending to be an ascetic. Let your wife also be once cheated by a false ascetic.” The cursed Visnu disappeared and Vrnda started penance. Many Gandharva ladies came with temptations to dissuade Vrnda from continuing the penance. But all such attempts failed and Vrnda ended her life doing penance. The nymphs showered flowers on her from above and the dead body of Vrnda was cremated by Smaranaduti and Smaraduti jumped into the funeral pyre of Vrnda and gave away her life. The nymphs made an image of her with the ashes from the funeral pyre and floated it on the river Gaṅgā.

Pārvati did not consent to having any sexual enjoyment with Māyavi and she escaped from the place and went to Ākāsagaṅgā and started doing penance there. One day Pārvati called her maid Jayā to her side and said “Jayā you go in my dress to Siva and find out whether he is really Siva or not. If he kisses you and embraces you he will surely be a dānava come in disguise by his Māya. But if he asks you about my welfare he will be real Siva. Go and tell me what happens.”

Jayā went to Māyavi. Jalandhara when he saw her mistook her for Pārvati and caught hold of her and immediately semen flowed out from him. Jayā returned and told Pārvati that it was Jalandhara and not Siva. Pārvati afraid of Jalandhara hid in a lotus and her companions became beetles sitting on the lotus. In the meantime the guards of the palace finding the queen absent from the palace reported the matter to Subha fighting against Siva. He sent Candraśakas to Jalandhara to inform him of the situation. Jalandhara came back to the battle-field running and took up the fight against Siva again.

Māyāsura. An asura. He had a daughter named Somaprabhā. (Kathāsāríṣṭigāra).

Māyāvasiṣṭha. There was once a king called Mitrasaḥ among the Kings of the Solar dynasty who ruled Ayodhyā. One day while he was hunting he saw two demons roaming about as tigers and Mitrasaḥ killed one of them. The other demon waited for an opportunity to wreak vengeance and an opportunity presented itself. Mitrasaḥ was conducting an Aśvamedha yāga to which Vasiṣṭha was the chief priest. The demon went to the King as Vasiṣṭha and privately told him that he desired to eat meat and the King accordingly prepared meat which was greatly resented by the real Vasiṣṭha and the sage cursed Mitrasaḥ to become a demon. The false Vasiṣṭha who played the trick on the King is called Māyāvasiṣṭha. (See for details under Kalmāśapāda).

Māyāvati. An incarnation of Raṭidevi. An asura named Śambhara made her his wife. But Pradyumna, son of Kṛṣṇa, carried her away to Dwārakā. (See under Pradyumna).

Māyāvi. An asura.

1) Birth. Māyāvi was born to the great architect of the Dānavas, Maya, of his wife Hemā, a nymph. Maya fell in love with Hemā when he once found her dancing in Devaloka and the devas coming to know of it gave her in marriage to Maya. Maya took Hemā to the southern side of the Himālayas and constructing a city there called Hemapura stayed there happily. They got two sons named Māyāvi and Dundubhi. (Uttara Rāma-yaṇa).

2) Death. Valorous Māyāvi fought against anybody and everybody. He once challenged Bālī to a fight. But the mighty blows of Bālī were unbearable to him and the defeated Māyāvi ran away from Bālī and hid himself in a big cave. Bālī followed him and when he reached the mouth of the cave he posted his brother Sugriva there with instructions to shut tight the opening of the cave in case he died in the cave in the fight. He said that if blood flowed from the cave the dead person was Māyāvi and if milk flowed from the cave the dead person was himself. In the cave a great fight ensued in which Māyāvi was killed. But Māyāvi by his powers of magic made the blood that flowed out look like milk for Sugriva and the latter thinking that it was his brother who was killed shut tight the mouth of the cave and went his way. (Sarga 9, Kīṣkindhā Kānda, Vālmiki Rāma-yaṇa and Pūrva Kānda, Kamba Rāma-yaṇa).

Māyīl (Peacock). In Uttara Rāma-yaṇa there is a story about how the peacock got its beauty. Mayīl in Malayālam means peacock. Once Rāvana set out in his Puspaka Vimāna with his army of Rākṣasas, determined to gain victory over all Kings. They got down on the mountain called Uśtrivara. Rāvana examined the valley to see whether there were any Kings doing tapas anywhere there. A King named Mārutta was performing a yāga called “Māheśvara” in an aśrama. Indra and other gods were also present to receive the share of offerings (Hāvīrbhāga). At the sight of Rāvana, the gods took different disguises and fled in panic. At that time Indra assumed the form of a big peacock. As soon as Rāvana left the place, the gods reassembled there. From that time, Indra who put on the disguise of a peacock felt a special attachment to that bird. He called the peacock and said—“Till now you were blue in colour. But from today onwards, your feathers will have various colours. All my thousand eyes
I transfer to you. Besides, you will be immune from all diseases. Whoever kills you, will meet with death, soon after. You will dance at the commencement of the rainy season. People will greet you with enthusiasm.

It is because of Indra’s blessing that Peacocks are so beautiful in appearance and dance at the onset of the rainy season.

MAYŪRA. An aśvä who fought against Subrahmaṇya. Skanda Purāṇa, Viśvamihendra Kaṇḍa describes the terrible battle between Mayūra and Subrahmaṇya. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 65 says that after death, Mayūra was reborn in the world as a King named Viśva.

MAYŪRADHVAJA. A King of Ratnangarā. After performing seven Āśvamedha yāgas this King started another Āśvamedha in the Narmadā river valley. The task of protecting the sacrificial horse was undertaken by the King’s son Sucitra or Tāmradhvaja. He set out for the conquest of the world with the chief minister Bahudhvaja. On his return, he came across Yudhiṣṭhira’s Āśvamedha horse at the city of Māṇipura. The heroic Sucitra encountered Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna who were leading the horses. After making them unconscious, he entered the city with the sacrificial horse.

When they recovered their senses, Śrī Kṛṣṇa disguised himself as a Brāhmaṇa and Arjuna as a Brāhmaṇa boy and they went to Mayūradhvaja’s palace. The King welcomed them respectfully. Śrī Kṛṣṇa, in his disguise as Brāhmaṇa told the King that he was coming from Dharmapuri to meet the King’s priest, Kṛṣṇa who was to officiate at the marriage of his (Brāhmaṇa’s) son. He added that unfortunately on his way through a forest a lion caught hold of his son. Although he prayed to Lord Narasimhā, the boy could not be rescued. The lion told him that he would release his son, if the Brāhmaṇa persuaded Mayūradhvaja to offer one half of his body as food to the lion.

On hearing the Brāhmaṇa’s story, Mayūradhvaja agreed to give half of his body to the lion. Just then his queen Kumudvati appeared before them and said, “I am the left half (Vāmabhāga) of the King. You may take me and offer me as food for the lion.” But the Brāhmaṇa replied that the lion wanted the right half of the King’s body.

When the King heard this, he readily agreed to give the right half of his own body. Accordingly, they started cutting his body into two halves. Just then, seeing tears coming down from Mayūradhvaja’s left eye, the Brāhmaṇa said:- “I find that you are in great sorrow; I do not wish to accept a gift which is not given wholeheartedly.” Mayūradhvaja explained that his tears were not caused by pain or sorrow. His left side was disappointed in not being able to be of as much service as the right side.

When Śrī Kṛṣṇa heard these words of the King, he resumed his own shape and embraced him and blessed him. After that Mayūradhvaja completed his yāga and started with Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna, taking Yudhiṣṭhira’s sacrificial horse with them. (Jaimini; Āśvamedha: 41-46).

MEDA. A serpent of the clan of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpastrapas of Janamejaya. (Śloka 11, Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

MEDHĀ. One of the twentyfour daughters born to Daksaprājāpati of his wife Prasūti. Of these, thirteen daughters including Medhā were married by Dharmadeva. (Chapter 7, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

MEDHĀTITHI I. Grandson of Śvāyambhuva Manu. Śvāyambhuva Manu had two sons named Priyavrata and Utṭānapāda. Of these Priyavrata married Sarūpā and Barhiṣmati, daughters of Viśvakarmaprajāpati. Medhātithi was the son born to Priyavrata of Sarūpā. Agni, dhura, and others were the brothers of Medhātithi. Medhātithi became the King of Plaksadvipa after the death of Priyavrata. (8th Skanda, Devi Brīḍāgavata).

Medhātithi got seven sons named Sāntahaya, Siśira, Sukhodaya, Ananda, Śiva, Ksemaka and Dhruva. They all became Kings of Plaksadvipa. The countries they ruled were named after them as Sāntahayavarṣa, Siśiravāra, Sukhodayavarṣa, Anandavarṣa, Śivavarṣa, Ksemakavarṣa and Dhruvavarṣa. There are seven mountains showing the boundaries of these states and they are called Gomeda, Cāndra, Nārada, Dūndūbhi, Somaka, Sumana and Vaibhṛaja. In these beautiful countries and grand mountains live a great many Devas, Gandharvas and virtuous men. (Chapter 4, Anīśa 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

MEDHĀTITHI II. A Rajārṣi of the Pūrū dynasty.

This Medhātithi got two sons named Dusyanta and Pravīrā. It was this Dusyanta who married Śakuntalā. (Chapter 278, Agni Purāṇa).

Medhātithi was a celebrated sage of Bhārata. The mahārṣi referred to in Śukta 12, Anuvāka 4, Mandala 1 of Rygeda is Medhātithi son of Kanva. Once Indra coming in the form of a goat drank the soma of Medhātithi and the latter called him ‘goat’ (Meṣa) and thenceforth Indra got the name Meṣa. (Śukta 51, Anuvāka 10, Mandala 1, Rygeda).

We get the following details about Medhātithi from the Mahābhārata.

(1) He was a King in the court of Indra.
(2) Medhātithi had a son named Kanvamuni who was popular on the east coast of Bhārata. (Śloka 23, Chapter 107, Śanti Parva).
(3) Medhātithi observed Vānaprastha and attained Svarga. (Śloka 7, Chapter 336, Śanti Parva).
(4) Medhātithi was considered to be a sage deserving worship and when he went to see Bhīṣma once Dharmaputra received him with respect and worshipped him. (Śloka 3, Chapter 26, Anuśāsana Parva).

MEDHĀTITHI III. A river. This river is the place of birth of Agni. (Śloka 23, Chapter 222, Vana Parva).

MEDHĀTITHI IV. A sage who was the father of Arundhati, wife of Vasīṣṭha. This Medhātithi who was living in an āśrama on the banks of the river Candrabhāgā performed a Jyotiṣṭoma yajña. (Kalīka Purāṇa).

MEDHĀVĪ I.

1) General information. A fierce sage. His father was a sage known as Bālādhi. For a very long time Bālādhi had no children and so, griefstricken, Bālādhi did penance and Medhāvī was born as a result of his penance. Even from boyhood the child showed wonderful powers of grasping things and so he was named Medhāvī. (Chapter 135, Vana Parva).
2) How Medhāvī cursed a nymph. One day in spring, Mañjughoṣā (Śucismitā), a nymph, was playing with other companions in the Caitrarathodyāna. Medhāvī was doing penance in a place nearby and Mañjughoṣā fell in love with the sage and she went near him and made love to him by dance and music. Medhāvī was attracted by her and the sage accepted her advances and lived with her for a long time.

One day Mañjughoṣā sought permission to go to Devaloka. "Wait till daybreak" said the sage. When it was morning the nymph renewed her request and the sage said "Wait till I finish my evening prayers." Hearing this Śucismitā said "Oh, best of brahmans, how many mornings and evenings have gone by this time! Fifty five years nine months and three days have gone by since we started living together". The sage then counted the years and found she was correct. The astounding fact that his penance had such a long break made the sage angry and he cursed her and made her into an evil spirit. She begged for pardon and the sage said "If you observe with fasting the Caitrakṣṇaikādāsi called Pāpmocini it will absolve you of all sins and give you release from the curse". (Chapter 48, Part 4, Padma Purāṇa).

3) In Rgveda. The Aväñicdevas once gave rice to this sage. (Sāktā 117, Anuvāka 17, Mahādala 1, Rgveda).

MEDHĀVĪ II. A brahmin boy. This child once gave Tattvopadeśa to his father. (The philosophy that the human soul or material world is identical with the supreme spirit pervading the universe). Chapter 377, Śanti Parva).

MEDHYA. A holy place on the west coast. A river flows through this place. This sacred river is believed to be the place of origin of Agni. This is one of the rivers worthy to be remembered every morning and evening. (Chapter 155, Anuśāsana Parva).

MEDINTI. A synonym for Earth (Bhūmi). (See under Kaitabha for details).

MEGHĀHĀSA. A son of Rāhu. When he heard that Mahāviśnu had cut off the head of his father he went to the banks of the river Gautamī and practised severe penance. As a result of that Rāhu, his father, got a place among the other planets in the sky. (Chapter 142, Brahmānḍa Purāṇa).

MEGHAKARṇA. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 30, Chapter 46, Sālīya Parva).

MEGHAMĀLĀ. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 30, Chapter 46, Sālīya Parva).

MEGHAMĀLĪ I. A demon who fought against Rāma and Laksmanā in the forests. He was one of the captains of the army of the great demon Khara. The other captains were Śyenagāmi, Prthugrīva, Yajñāśatra, Vihaṅgama, Durjaya, Karavīrakṣa, Parigha, Kalakāmukha, Mahāmālī, Sarpāśya and Rudhirāśana. (Sarga 26, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MEGHAMĀLĪ II. One of the two pārṣādas given to Subrahmanya by Mahāmeru. The other was Kāñcana. (Sloka 47, Chapter 45, Sālīya Parva).

MEGHANĀDA. Indrajit, son of Rāvana. (Only portions which were left off under the entry Indrajit are given here.

1) Synonyms of Meghanāda. Kānna, Rāvanī, Māyāvī, Indrajit. The origin of each name is given below:

(i) Kānna. Son of a virgin. In olden times, once, the Sea of Milk was churned. From it arose a beautiful maiden called Sulakṣaṇā. She became an attendant of Pārvatī and one day while bathing in a pond in the garden she sent Sulakṣaṇā to fetch some clothes for her. Siva who was then in Pārvatī’s chamber alone, lost his control when he saw the beautiful Sulakṣaṇā and had intercourse with her. The maid was perplexed and then Siva assured her that she would give birth to a child only after her marriage.

But when Sulakṣaṇā returned with the dress Pārvatī felt suspicious and she cursed her and made her into a frog and pushed it into that same pond.

Time passed on. Once Maya performed severe penance to please Siva to get a daughter and Siva persuaded Pārvatī to release Sulakṣaṇā from the curse and she did so turning her into a beautiful maiden named Mandodarī and Siva gave her to Maya. Rāvana married her and their first son was Kāñcana.

(ii) Rāvanī. Son of Rāvana.

(iii) Meghanāda. (One having the sound of thunder). When he was born, he made a sound as loud as thunder and so he was called Meghanāda.

(iv) Māyāvī. He accepted Siva as his Guru and learned all the divine arts of magic like Mṛgendrajāla, Brah mendrajāla, Surendrajāla, Mahendrajāla Khagendra-jāla, Vāyustambha, Jalastambha, Agnistambha, Ākāsa-saṅcāra, Parakāyapraśāra, Rūpaḥbhedasvākāra and Tirodhāna. Because he knew all these tricks he was called Māyāvī.

(v) Indrajit. When Rāvana attacked svarga he pushed forward too much and so was caught inside an army of the Devas which surrounded him. When Meghanāda saw it he broke the army circle of the devas and getting in caught Indra as a prisoner and brought him to Lanka. Indra was later released by the mediation of Brahmā and the latter gave him the name Indrajit meaning "Conqueror of Indra".

2) Boons. When Rāvana was conducting his world campaign he performed at Nikumbhalī many yāgas and got from Brahmā many boons. Meghanāda acquired powers which had not been possible for mānavas, dānava, vāna or rākṣasas to acquire. He got a Vīmaṇa (divine car) which could travel in all directions, backwards and forwards, up or down. He received an armour against which no weapon would be of any use. He possessed a weapon which would be effective against anything. Above all these, he had the power to remain invisible. He could be killed by only one person of his age who had lived for fourteen years dutifully and virtuously without sleep. Only Indrajit knew about this.

In a battle Māyāvī would show many tricks. If one was found ineffective he would use another. He had in his stock over a thousand such tricks all of which he had acquired with very little effort. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

MEGHANĀDA II. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 57, Chapter 44, Sālīya Parva).

MEGHAPUṢPA. A horse of divinity drawing the chariot of Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Sloka 27, Chapter 45, Virāṭa Parva).

MEGHASANDHI. A prince of ancient Magadha. Once Meghasandhi fought against Arjuna and was defeated. (Chapter 82, Aśvamedha Parva).

MEGHAŠARMAN. A brahmin who was a great devotee of Śūrya. When there was a drought in the country during the reign of Santanu this brahmin by his worship of Surya brought rains to the country. (Bhavisya Purana, Pratishargasahsita).

MEGHASVAN. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 8, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MEGHAyAHANA. A King. He was a dependant of Jarasandha. (Sloka 13, Chapter 14, Sabhâ Parva).

MEGHAVîHÂNA. (MEGHAVASIN). A female follower of Skandadeva. (Sloka 17, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

MEGHAVAyâ. A character in a story of Pañcata mantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

MEGHAVAyâNA. II. A son of Ghatoṭkaca. Meghavarna was also present with Arjuna when he went to protect the sacrificial horse of the Aśvamedha conducted by the Pândavas.

MEGHAVâSîNA. An asura. This asura sits in the council of Varuna and worships him. (Sloka 19, Chapter 9, Sabhâ Parva).

MEGHAVEGA. A very brave soldier who fought against the Pândavas on the Kaurava side. Abhimanyu killed him. (Sloka 15, Chapter 48, Droṇa Parva).

MEKHALA (MEKALA). Mekhala was a country which had attained Paurânic fame in ancient India. The inhabitants of this place were called Mekhalas. They were the bodyguards of Bhisma. (Chapter 51, Bhisma Parva). They formed a separate division in the army of Bhânnala, King of Kosala. (Chapter 87, Bhisma Parva). Once Karna conquered this country. (Sloka 8, Chapter 4, Droṇa Parva). Mekhalas were Kyatriyas formerly. But they became persons of low caste when they showed jealousy towards the brahmins. (Sloka 17, Chapter 35, Anuśâsana Parva).

MENÎ. I. Wife of Himavân. Beautiful Menâ was the daughter of Mahâmeru. Himavân lord of the mountains and the seat of many minerals and fossils had two daughters of unparallelled beauty and their mother was the lovely Menâ, daughter of Mahâmeru and wife of Himavân. (Sarga 35, Bâla Kânda, Bâlâmâ Kâmâyana).

Râmâyana states that Menâ had two daughters of extraordinary beauty named Gaṅgâ and Umâ. They were both married by Siya. But Vâmana Purâna in chapter 51 states that Menâ had three beautiful daughters and a son named Sunâbha. Menâ's first daughter was Râgini with red body and eyes and wearing a red dress. Her second daughter named Kuṭilâ was white in colour, had lotus eyes, and wore white dress. The third was a girl of enchanting beauty named Kâlî. She was blue-black in colour with eyes like the blue lotus leaf. It can be surmised that the Umâ of Râmâyana and Kâlî were one and the same person by the following verse in the Amarakosa.

Umâ Kâtyâyâni Gauri
Kâlî Haimavati-varî //

When the statements of the two Purânas are taken together Menâ should have had four daughters, Gaṅgâ, Râgini, Kuṭilâ and Kâlî and a son named Sunâbha.

MENÎ. II. Daughter of the Pitrs (Manes). Pitrs are of two kinds: Anagnis and Sâignis. Anagnis are those who do not perform yâgas and those who perform yâgas are called Sâignis. Anagnis are called Agniṣvâttas and Sâignis are called Barhiṣadhas. Svadhā was the common wife of all the Pitrs. Svadhā got two daughters, Menâ and Dhârînî. They were both very well-learned, virtuous girls and were Brahmavâdinis (expounders of Vedânta philosophy). (Chapter 10, Amâśâ 1, Visu Purâna).

MENÀKâ. A nymph of extraordinary beauty. Taking instructions from Indra, Menakâ used to entice many sages and destroy their power of penance. There are innumerable stories of this kind in Purânas. Some important events connected with Menakâ are given below:

1) Mother of Pramadyâra. Once Menakâ became pregnant by a Gandharva named Viśvâvasu. On the day she delivered she threw the child on the banks of a river and went to Sarga. A sage named Sthulakâsa who was doing penance nearby took the babe and brought it up. When she grew up she was named Pramadvarâ and Ruru married her. (See under Pramadvarâ).

2) Birth of Śâkuntalâ. When Viśvâmitra was performing penance in the forests, Menakâ, under instructions from Indra, went and enticed Viśvâmitra and broke the continuity of his penance. A girl was born to Menakâ and became later the celebrated Śâkuntalâ. (See under Śakuntalâ).

3) Again with Viśvâmitra. Once again when Viśvâmitra was performing penance in Puṣkaratirtha, Menakâ approached him and again Viśvâmitra fell in love with her and they lived together for ten years. Then one day Viśvâmitra realised his folly and leaving her went again to the forests for penance.

4) Mankâna was enticed. See under Mânkâna.

5) Other details.

(i) When once Durvâsas visited Devaloka it was Menakâ who presented him with a flower garland. This incident led to the churning of the milk ocean at a later period. (See under Amâśâ).

(ii) Menakâ was one among the six prominent celestial maidens. Urvâsî, Pârvacitti, Sahajânyâ, Menakâ, Ghrâcchâ and Viśvâcch are the six. (Sloka 68, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva).

(iii) Menakâ attended the Janmotsava of Arjuna and sang on the occasion. (Sloka 64, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

(iv) Menakâ was a dancer in the court of Kubera (Sloka 10, Chapter 10, Sabhâ Parva).

(v) Menakâ once gave a music performance in the court of Indra in honour of Arjuna. (Sloka 29, Chapter 43, Vâna Parva).

MENDA (MENDHA). A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 5th century A.D. Among his works only one is known viz. Hayagrivaradvadha (the assassination of Hayagriva). This book is known by another name "Hastipâka".

MEPPATUR NÄRAyANA BHÂTTATIRI. A Sanskrit poet who lived in Kerala.

1) General information. It is believed that this poet lived during the period from 1560 to 1648 A.D. He was born in the village of Kurumattār in Malabar district. The illam (house of nambūtiris) which became famous by his birth was a mile to the east of the Bhagavati temple, Cândanakkâvu, which itself is situated just two furlongs to the north of the well known Tirunâvâya temple. Meppattur illam became impoverished and was merged with another illam of name Maravaicēri Tekkeṭattu. Nârâyana Bhâttatirī had a brother named Mâtradhata. He was younger to Nârâyana and his work was to take down the verses which Narayana composed. Meppattur (Narayana is more well-known under the name of his illam) studied under different preceptors. His father taught him Mimmamsa and such other subjects. He studied Veda under Madhavaacarya and Tarka under Damarodiacarya. Aeyuta Pişaroti taught him Vyakarana. The poet became a rheumatic patient in his old age and he stayed in the Guruvayur temple worshipping the deity there. His famous work Narayaniyam was written sitting in the temple of Guruvayur and the mañjapa (raised dais) where he sat and wrote is even now preserved for pilgrims to see. He took hundred days to write the Narayaniyam.

MERUBHÜTA. A place of habitation of ancient Bharata. (Sloka 48, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MERUDANA. Merudanas (gifts of heaps like Meru) are all very effective and productive of good results. The Merus for the dānas are the following:
1) Dhanayamra. A dhanayamra or a thousand dronas of dhānya (grass) is considered the best; a dana of half that quantity (i.e. 500) was fair and half of the latter.
2) Lavamanera. A dana of sixteen dronas of lavaṇa (salt) is considered to be Uttama (best); with half of that as Madhyama (fair) and with half of the latter as Adhama (worst).
3) Gudameru. One with ten bhāras of guḍa (jaggery) is considered Uttama; with half of that as Madhyama and with half of the latter as Adhama.
4) Svaramanera. A svaramanera with a thousand palas of Svarna (gold) is considered Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
5) Tilameru. One with ten dronas of tila (gingelly) is considered Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
6) Kārpaṣamera. A Meru with twenty bhāras of Kārpāsa (cotton) is considered Uttama; with ten as madhyama and with five as adhama.
7) Ghranmeru. One with twenty jars of ghṛta (ghee) is Uttama; with ten, madhyama and five, adhama.
8) Rajatameru. One with thousand palas of silver is deemed Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
9) Sātkarakamera. One with eight bhāras of sugar is deemed Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama. (Chapter 210, Agni Purāṇa).

MERUDEVI. A daughter of Mahāmeru. The nine daughters of Mahāmeru are: Merudevi, Pratirūpā, Ugradaṇḍini, Lata, Ramya, Sīvāma, Nāri, Bhadrā and Devavīthi. They were married to Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hari, Hāvyā, Ramyaka, Hiraṇmayā, Kuru, Bhadrāśva and Ketumāla respectively. All these nine Kings were born to a King Agnidhra of the nympha Pārvacitti. (Paścima Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MERUMANDARA. A mountain. This supports Mahāmeru. The mountains which support it from the four sides are Mandara, Merumandara, Supārśva and Kumuda. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MERUPRABHA. A forest. There were three beautiful forests about the waist of the mountain Latāvesṭa, situated to the south of Dvārakāpurī. Meruprabha is one of them. The other two are Tālavana and Purapakvana. (Chapter 26, Saṁbha Parva, Dāksāṇyāṭa Pāṭha).

MERUSĀVARṆI. A Manu. (See under Manvantara). The daughter of this Merusāvarṇi named Svaṇyaprabha was met by Hanūmān on his way in search of Sītā. (Sarga 51, Kiśkindhā kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MERUVRAJA. A city of ancient India. A demon named Virūpākṣa lived there. (Sloka 19, Chapter 17, Sānti Parva).

MESA I. A synonym for Indra. Once Indra taking the shape of a goat went and drank the Soma of the sage Medhatīthi. Then that sage called Indra 'goat' (meṣa) and that name of Meṣa stuck to him. (Sūkta 51, Anuvāka 10, Maṇḍala 11, Rgveda).

MESA II. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 64, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

MESAHR. A son of Garuḍa. (Sloka 12, Chapter 101, Salya Parva).

MIŚRAKA I. A special tribe of horses. (Dāksāṇyāṭa Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Saṁbha Parva).

MIŚRAKA II. A garden in the city of Dvārakā. The city shines more by this divine garden. (Dāksāṇyāṭa Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Saṁbha Parva).

MIŚRAKA III. A sacred place within the boundaries of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a holy pond there one would get the benefit of bathing in all the sacred ponds in India. (Sloka 91, Chapter 81, Vana Parva).

MIŚRAKESĪ I. A celestial woman. She was the beautiful daughter born to Pradhā wife of Kaśyapaprājāpati. Raurdrāśva son of Pṛu married Miśrakesī and begot a son named Anvagbhāṇu and nine sons more who were all good archers. When once Arjuna went to Indraloka Miśrakesī gave a dance performance in his honour. (Chapter 65, Ādi Parva and Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

MIŚRAKESĪ II. Wife of King Vatsaka, brother of Vasudeva, (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata, and Chapter 59, Ādi Parva).

MIŚRI. A serpent. This serpent was also among those serpents which came to take away the soul of Bala-bhadrārama to Pātāla at the time of his death. (Sloka 15, Chapter 4, Mausala Parva).

MITADHVAJA. A King of Videha. According to Bhāgavata Mitadhvaja was the son of Dharmadhvaja Janaka.

MITHI (MITHI JANAKA). Son of King Nimi. The sixth chapter of Devī Bhāgavata gives the following story about the birth of Mithi.
There was once an emperor of great renown in the line of Ikṣvāku named Nimi. He was the twelfth son of the celebrated Ikṣvāku and was devoted to the welfare of his subjects. He was a very honest, virtuous, righteous and good-natured man of a charitable disposition. The agrahāra (village where brahmans reside) named Jayantapura near the āśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi was constructed by this emperor. This emperor of a Rājasic mind decided to perform a yāga which would take years for its conclusion and in which land was to be given as gifts. He went to his father Ikṣvāku, and took permission from him to conduct the yāga. He made all preparations for the yāga. He invited Bhīma, Aṅgiras, Vāmadeva, Pulastya, Pulaha and Rṣiṣka all of whom were well-versed in the Vedas and were worthy of being priests in a Yāga of the kind he was conducting. He then went and invited his Kulaguru (family priest and preceptor) Vasiṣṭha for the Yāga. But Vasiṣṭha had to officiate at a Yāga conducted by Indra and so he commanded Nimi to postpone the Yāga by five hundred years. Nimi did not act according to it and he performed the Yāga with the help of the other sages and completed it successfully. After five hundred years when the Yāga of Indra came to a close, Vasiṣṭha came to see Nimi. Nimi was asleep then and the servants in the palace hesitated to go and inform him of the arrival of the sage. Vasiṣṭha got angry and cursed him and made him Videha (without body). At once the body of the King fell to the ground and the soul got out of it. But before the soul separated from the body Nimi cursed Vasiṣṭha also and separated his soul from his body. Vasiṣṭha was again born as the son of Mitrāvarūṇa. The other sages present there took the lifeless body of Nimi and after sacrificial ceremonies and worship of gods started to churn the body. After some time a mighty and perfect man of great brilliance was born out of it. Because he was born by Mathana (churning) he was named Mithi. Because he was born from his father (Janaka) he was called Mithījanaka and because he was born of Nimi, a Videha, he was called Videha also. The country which was ruled by Mithi got the name of Mithilā. It is the country of Sītā.

MITHILĀ

1) General information. A celebrated country of ancient Bharata. This is situated on the north-eastern side of Bārātā. Its modern name is Tīrāta. Mithilā was ruled by the renowned Janaka Kings. See under Mithi to know how the country got the name Mithilā.

2) The wealth of Mithilā. Mithilā was the capital of the extensive country of Videha. Successive generations of Janaka ruled the country. Mithilā was noted more for its sāttvic virtues than for the pomp and glory of kings. Everyday on the protruding breasts of an idol of Rājasa-rājalaḵmi (embodiment of royal prosperity) bhasma (ashes) and candana (sandalwood paste) would be smeared. In the middle of Tretāyuga Videha was ruled by a Janaka who brought fame and prosperity to the successive generations. A devotee of Śiva and of a sāttvic disposition he was a Nityabrahmacāri (observing celibacy throughout life) and his wife a disciple of Maitreya and well-versed in Advaitavedánta was a Nīt abrahmacārīni.

Videha grew prosperous with agricultural wealth by hard work put up by the peasants and divine wealth by the virtuous deeds of the King and the people. Agriculture was given importance, so much so that the royal emblem itself was the figure of a plough. Rains were there in season and in plenty because of the yāgas conducted properly by the King. (Bālakāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Other details.
   (i) Once Pāṇḍu, father of the Pāṇḍavas, attacked this country and conquered it. (Sloka 28, Chapter 112, Ādi Parva).
   (ii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna and Bhīma once visited this country when they were on their way to Magadha from Indraprastha. (Sloka 28, Chapter 20, Śabhā Parva).
   (iii) Karṇa once conquered and captured the country of Mithilā. (Sloka 8, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).
   (iv) Sītā was born in Mithilā. (Sloka 9, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).
   (v) Because she was born in Mithilā she is known by the name of Māithilī. (Sloka 2, Chapter 277, Vana Parva).
   (vi) Once Mithilā was ruled by a King called Dharmadhvaja. Hearing about his great Dharmajñāna (knowledge about virtues and duties) a female ascetic named Sulabhā visited him in the guise of a beggar woman. (Sloka 4, Chapter 320, Śānti Parva).
   (vii) Sūka the great sage, with the permission of his father Vīṣṇu came to Mithilā and took Dharmapadeśa from King Janaka. (Sloka 6, Chapter 325, Śānti Parva).

MITHU. A very valorous dānava. Once Bharata son of Arṣiṣeṇa was making preparations for an Aśvamedha on the banks of the river Sarasvatī with Upamanyu as his priest when Mithu came and took them both to Pātāla. Then Devāpi, son of Upamanyu, got his father and the King released from there by continuous worship of Śiva (Brahma Purāṇa—127. 56-57).

MITRA.

1) General information. One of the twelve Śūryas. The twelve Śūras born to Aditi of Kaśyapprajapati are Viṣṇu, Śakra, Aryāmā, Dhātā, Tvaśṭā, Pūṣā, Vivasvān, Savitī, Mitra, Varuṇa, Bhaga and Arīśa. (Chapter 15, Arīśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

Mitrāvarūṇas are two devatās of great intimacy. They are always found together. If you pray to Mitrāvarūṇas you will get plenty of rains. (Sūktā 2, Anuvākā 1, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

See para 2 under Agastya to understand the story of how Mitrāvarūṇas became the father of Agastya.

2) Other details.
   (i) Mitra came and stood in the sky at the time of the birth of Arjuna. (Sloka 66, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).
   (ii) Mitra was one among those sent by Indra to fight against Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna at the time of the burning of the forest Khāṇḍava. (Sloka 36, Chapter 226 Ādi Parva).
   (iii) Mitra was a member of the Indra sābhā. (Sloka 21, Chapter 7, Śabhā Parva).
   (iv) He presented two Pārṣadas named Suvarata and Sātyasandhā to Subrahmanyaya. (Sloka 41, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MITRA. A female companion of Pārvatī. (Sloka 41, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

MITRABHEDA. See under Pañcatantra.

MITRADERVA. Brother of Suṣarmā, King of Trigartta. Arjuna killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 3, Chapter 27, Karṇa Parva).
Mitaradharma. Son of the Agni called Panchajanya, (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

Mitraagni. A demon who fought on the side of Ravana in the Rama-Ravana battle. Sri Rama killed this demon. (Chapter 34, Verse 27, Yuddha Kanda, Valmiki Ramaayan).

Mitrajna. Son of the Agni named Panchajanya. He was one of the five Devavinayakas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

Mitraasaka (Mitraasaha). A King of the Solar dynasty. He was always known as Kalmashapada also. (See Under Kalmashapada).

Mitraasena. A King who fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. Arjuna killed him. (Sloka 20, Chapter 19, Karna Parva).

Mitravan I. Son of the Agni named Panchajanya. He was one of the Panchadeavinayakas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

Mitravan II. An ascetic who lived in the city of Saupura. He acquired complete peace of mind by reading the second Chapter of the Gitâ sitting in a Siva temple. Once a brahmin of name Devasarma approached a sage named Mukunthamukha seeking advice to obtain peace of mind. The latter directed Devasarma to Mitravan and Mitravan advised him to read the second Chapter of the Gitâ. (Padma Purâna, Uttara Khaanda, 176).

Mitravardhana. Son of the Agni called Panchajanya. He was one of the Panchadeavinayakas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

Mitravarman. Brother of Susharma, King of Trigarta. Arjuna killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 3, Chapter 27, Karna Parva).

Mitravaruna. The combined name of two of the Dwadasadityas (twelve Saryas) Mitra and Varuna. These two are always seen together. Agastya and Vasishta were born as sons of Mitravaruna. It was due to a curse by Mitravarunas that Urvasi had to marry King Pururavas, a man of the earth. Manu had no children and he performed a yaga to placate Mitravarunas. But since there were many faults in the ceremony a girl was born to him. (For details see under Ilâ, Nimi, Urvasi, Vasishtha and Mitra).

Mitravinda. A deva. The havis (clarified butter which is put in the Agni called Rathantara is intended for this deva. (Sloka 19, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

Mitravindâ. Daughter of Sri Kršna's father's sister. Mitravindâ's mother's name was Râjâdhîdevi. Râjâdhîdevi, queen of Avantî, got three children named Vinda, Anuvinda and Mitravindâ. In the Svayamivarapta Mitravindâ chose Kršna as her husband. Vinda and Anuvinda did not like it and joining the Kaurava side fought against Kršna. But Kršna defeated them all and took Mitravindâ to Dvârakâ. (10th Skandha, Bhagavata).

Mitreyu. A King of the Lunar dynasty. He was the son of Divodasa and father of Cyavana.

Mleccha. A tribe of people of ancient India. This tribe was born from the tail of the celestial cow Nandini, kept by Vasishta for sacrificial purposes when there was a fight between Visvamitra and Vasiśtha. Mahâbhârata gives the following information regarding them.

(1) The mlecchas who sprang up from the tail of the celestial cow Nandini sent the army of Visvamitra flying in terror. (Sloka 38, Chapter 174, Adi Parva).

(2) Bhîmasena defeated the mlecchas living in the coastal regions and took from them several valuable diamonds as tax. (Sloka 25, Chapter 30, Sahhâ Parva).

(3) The mlecchas living in the coastal area were once defeated by Sahadeva, one of the Pâñcavas. (Sloka 66, Chapter 31, Sahhâ Parva).

(4) Nakula also once defeated the mlecchas. (Sloka 16, Chapter 32, Sahhâ Parva).

(5) Bhagadatta was the King of the mlecchas. (Sloka 14, Chapter 51, Sahhâ Parva).

(6) Bhagadatta accompanied by the mlecchas living on the coast attended the Râjasya of Yudhishtira. (Sloka 14, Chapter 51, Sahhâ Parva).

(7) Different tribes of mlecchas will be born on earth at the beginning of the era of Pralaya. (Sloka 34, Chapter 168, Vana Parva).

(8) Kalkî, the incarnation of Viṣṇu, will destroy the mlecchas who are found everywhere in the world. (Sloka 97 Chapter 190, Vana Parva).

(9) Karna during his world campaign conquered many mleccha countries. (Sloka 19, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

(10) A place of habitation in Bhîrata is called Mleccha. (Sloka 57, Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

(11) Aiga, a mleccha warrior was killed in the battle by Bhîmasena. (Sloka 17, Chapter 26, Drohna Parva).

(12) Once the mlecchas attacked Arjuna with arrows. Arjuna killed the hairy soldiers. (Sloka 43, Chapter 93, Drohna Parva).

(13) Sâtyaki killed many mleccha soldiers in the great war. (Sloka 43, Chapter 119, Drohna Parva).

(14) Nakula killed Aiga, a mleccha King. (Sloka 18, Chapter 22, Karna Parva).

(15) Arjuna had to face a great army of mlecchas to protect the Yâgâśva. (Sloka 23, Chapter 73, Aśvamedha Parva).

(16) The wealth that remained in the Yâgaśâlā of Yudhishtira after the distribution as gifts to brahmîns was taken away by the mlecchas. (Sloka 26, Chapter 89, Aśvamedha Parva).

(17) The mlecchas drove angry elephants on to the army of the Pâñcavas. (Sloka 10, Chapter 22, Karna Parva).

Moda I. A demon who was a companion of Hiraṇyâkṣa. In the Devasura battle Vâyu killed him.

Moda II. A serpent born of the clan of Airâvata. This serpent was burnt to death in the sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 10, Chapter 52, Âryamavâsikâ Parva).

Modâgiri. A country of ancient Bhîrata. The King of this country was killed by Bhîmasena. (Sloka 31, Chapter 30, Sahhâ Parva).

Modâki. A vast area of land in Sâkadvîpa near the mountain Kesara. (Sloka 26, Chapter 11, Bhishma Parva).

Modâpurâ. A country of ancient Bhîrata. Arjuna defeated the King of this country once. (Sloka 11, Chapter 27, Sahhâ parva).

Mohâ. A son born of the lustre of Brahmana. (3rd Skandha, Bhagavata).

Mohaka. Son of Suratha, a devotee of Śrî Râma. When Suratha blocked the Aśvamedha horse of Śrî Râma, a fight ensued in which Mohaka also took part (Padma Purâna, Pâtala Khaanda).
MOHANA. An ancient place of habitation in Bhārata. This place was conquered by Kaṇḍa. (Sloka 10, Chapter 234, Vana Parva).

MOHANA. Wife of Sūrīva. Mohāna helped her husband in bringing water from the Sarayū river to bathe the Asvamedha horse of Śrī Rāma. (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭalā Khaṇḍa).

MOHINI. The female form of Mahāviṣṇu. Devas and Asuras quarrelled with each other over the right of partaking the Amṛta (nectar) obtained from the sea of Milk. At that time Mahāviṣṇu appeared before them in the guise of a beautiful maiden of maddening charm and the asuras were guilefully made to turn their attention on her for some time during which time the nectar was carried away by the Devas. The female form of Mahāviṣṇu was called Mohini.

Śiva fell in love with Mohini and by the union of the two was born Sāstā. (See under Amṛtam). (8th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MOKSA I. One of the seven divisions of the island of Plakṣa. The seven divisions are Śiva, Yavasaka, Subhadra, Śanta, Mokṣa, Amṛta and Abbaya. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MOKSA II. Moksa means liberation and is generally meant to convey the meaning of the deliverance of the soul from recurring births. The Jīvātmā enshrined in the body has the delusion that it enjoys or suffers happiness or woe. In truth it neither suffers nor enjoys anything. It is detached from all. It is the Supreme Being (Para-brahman). When Jīvātmā deserts its woes it gets mokṣa i.e. Jīvātmā gets merged with Paramātmā. When once Jīvātmā merges with Paramātmā, Jīvātmā is devoid of happiness or woes. It need not be enshrined in any body. A Jīvātmā getting released from one body joins another new body and thus a Jīvātmā in succession enters thousands of bodies and each time without knowing the absolute Truth laments over its woes. In the words of a Śiṣṭ it is explained thus: “Jīvātmā, which is bliss in itself living in births after births searches for bliss elsewhere just as a person wearing a golden necklace round his neck searches for the same elsewhere.”

The passage of Jīvātmā from one birth to another and the bodies that enshrine it each time constitutes the worldly life. When once a Jīvātmā thus involved in Saṁśāra (mundane existence) gets real knowledge, the knowledge that Jīvātmā and Paramātmā are one and the same, then that Jīvātmā gets final emancipation, liberation from recurring births. It merges with Brahman. This is called Moksa.

MOKŚADHARMAPARVA. A sub-divisional Parva of Śaṁti Parva. It contains the chapters 174 to 365 of Śaṁti Parva.

MRGADHŪMA. A sacred place on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one goes there and worships Mahādeva one will get the benefit of conducting an Aśvamedhayajña. (Sloka 101, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MRGAMANDĀ. A daughter of Kāśyapa. (See under Mrgas).

MRGĀNKAKA. A sword. Once Kubera cursed a Yakṣa and making him a lion posted it to guard the palace-gates of Mahābali. He said he would be released from the curse when any man on earth defeated it. Once a brahmin warrior named Śrīdatta defeated this lion and at once the lion changed into a Yakṣa and the Yakṣa presented Śrīdatta with the sword named Mrgānkanaka. (Kathāpithalambaka, Kathāsaritsāgara).

MRGĀNKAVATI. Daughter of an ancient King called Śrī Bimbaki. (See under Śrīdatta).

MRGAS (DEER). All the animals originated from Kaśyapaprajāpati. Kaśyapaprajāpati, son of Marici, married the eight daughters of Dakṣa named Tāmēra etc. From Tāmēra were born birds. Krodhavāga gave birth to ten girls named Mrgī, Mrgamandā, Hari, Bhadramadā, Mātaṅgī, Sārdū, Śvētā, Surabhi, Suraskā, and Kadrā. Mrgas (deer) are the children of Mrgī. (Vālmīki Rāmāyana, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Sarga 4).

MRGAVPNODBHAVAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of the Vana Parva of Mahābhārata. Chapter 253 of Vana Parva constitutes this Parva.

MRGĀVATI. See under Udayana.

MRGAVYĀDHA. The disguise Śiva took when he went to test the devotion of Paraśurāma. Paraśurāma once went to the forests and did penance to please Śiva to learn archery from him. Śiva in the form of a Mṛgayādha (forest hunter) appeared before Paraśurāma and tested his sincerity in his penance in several ways. Śiva was pleased to find Paraśurāma’s devotion to Śiva unwavering and blessed him. He gave instructions in archery and also permitted him to go round the earth. (Chapter 65, Brahmānda Purāṇa).

MRGAVYĀDHA II. One of the Ekāṃdarudas (eleven Rudras). (Sloka 2, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MRGī. The mother of all types of deer. (See under Mrgas).

MRKANDU. Father of the sage Mārkaṇḍeya. (See under Mārkaṇḍeya).

MRṬAM. See under Pramāṇam.

MRṬASĀṆJĪVANI. This is a medicinal herb to give life to those who are dead. When in the Rāma-Rāvana battle Laksmaṇa and others fell dead, Śrī Rāma wanted MrṭasāṆjīvani to be brought to revive them back to life. Jāmbavān the oldest among the monkey-warriors then instructed Hanumān to get it from the mountain Mahāmeru explaining to him the way to reach there. He said: “If you go a hundred yojanas (1200 Kilometres) from here to the north you would reach Rāmeśvara the southernmost point of Bhārata. From there if you go to the north another thousand yojanas you would reach the Himālayas which is the northern-most point of Bhārata. Himavān is thousand yojanas high, two thousand yojanas wide and is long enough to reach the two oceans on the east and the west.

On that mountain is the marriage-dais of Pārvati and Parameśvara and you will find places where Parameśvara had sat for practising penances. On the northern side under a big Kūvala tree lies Kāmadhenu. This cow gives milk to the sages and tourists who go there.

1 Jīvātmā = The individual soul enshrined in the human body imparting to it life, motion and sensation as opposed to Paramātmā, Paramātmā = The Supreme spirit or Brahman Saṁśāra = The circuit of life consisting of births and rebirths with sufferings and enjoyments of woes and happiness.
Nine thousand yojanas to the north of this there are two mountains named Hemakūta and Ratnakūta. The centre of that is Rṣabhabārsa. On a big Kāraskara tree there will be hanging a king with his face downwards after being cursed by the sage Durvāsas. He will be released from the curse by you. If one eats the fruits of this tree one will be free from greying of hairs and rugosity.

If you go farther north from Hemakūta you will reach the mountain Niśadha. There is a lake there. If one bathes there one will be granted all prosperity by Lakṣmīdevī. Farther to the north is situated Mahāmeru. The greatness of this mountain is indescribable. Mahāmeru has got four supporting mountain pillars named Mandara, Merumandara, Supārśva and Kumuda. The abode of the three deities is on the top of this mountain. On a peak in the centre is living Brahmā with his wives Vāni, Gāyatī and Sāvītī as creator of the universe. This place is called Satyāloka and to the west of it is Śrī Vaikuṇṭha the abode of Mahāviṣṇu, Mādevī and Bhūdevī are his two wives. He is the god who protects us all. To the east of Satyāloka is Kailāsa, the abode of Śiva. He lives there with his wives Gaṅgā and Pārvatī and sons Gaṇeśa and Subrahmanya. To the south of Satyāloka is the city Śaṇiyamani the abode of Yamadhārmarāja. He lives there with his wife Kālīni and sons Viḍava, Mahimā and Đipaka. To the east of this is the wonderful Devaloka. There lives Īndra, his wife Śacīdevī and sons Jyanta with thirty-three crores of Devas. Celestial nymphs like Urvaśī, Rāṃbhā and Tīlottamā live there. Kāmadhenu, the Kalpa tree, Airāvata, Ucčāśravas, and Cintāmaṇi are all there. You will find Amāravatī, the Capital of Īndra and Sudhārmā his court there.

On the northern side of Meru is a tall Āvāttha tree. To the north of that is the Nila-mahāgiri (the great blue mountain). Kaśyapa has installed a deity named Śvetavarāhāmurti there. Beyond that is the Rṣabhadhāra (ox-shaped mountain). It is believed that a divine ox became a mountain there. Its two horns are like two peaks. This mountain contains many divine medicines of which Śālāyakaraṇi, Viśālakaraṇi, Sandhānakaraṇi and Mṛtasaḥjivāṇi are the most important.

Once the asuras defeated the Devas. Then Paramēvara and Mahāviṣṇu gave the Devas these four medicinal herbs. They planted them here and watered them from the Milk-sea. Around these precious plants stand guard the pārśadas of Śiva and the Discus Sodarśana of Viṣṇu.” (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

There is another statement in the Mahābhārata that Saḥjivāṇi is an art, the use of a mantra. Śukrācārya by this art brought to life all the asuras killed in a war with the devas. (Śloka 8, Chapter 76, Ādi Parva). Again Śukrācārya brought to life three times his disciple Kaca whom the asuras killed three times. Śukrācārya taught the art to Kaca. (Śloka 28, Chapter 76, Ādi Parva).

MRITTIKĀVATI. A place of habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 10, Chapter 23/4, Vana Parva).

MRṬYU. The goddess of Death. Agni Purāṇa gives details about the birth of Death. Hiṁsā was the wife of Adharma. They got a son named Anṛta and a daughter named Nikṛti. From them were born Bhāya, Naraṇa, Māyā and Vedanā. Of these Māyā gave birth to Mrṭyu, the destroyer of matter.

Mrṭyu has been described both as a god and goddess in Mahābhārata. The statements regarding Mrṭyu as a deva are as follows:

(i) Three sons were born to Nikṛti, wife of Adharma. One of them was Mrṭyu. Mrṭyudeva has neither wife nor children because he is the destroyer of all. (Śloka 54, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Once the son of an old Gautamī was bitten by a snake. A hunter seeing it rushed to kill the serpent but Gautamī objected to it. She advised him that it was a sin to injure any living being. The serpent then said, “It is not my fault that I bite the boy. I was persuaded by the god of death to do so.” The god of death Mrṭyudeva also appeared there then. He confirmed the snake’s statement and added that God had programmed all events beforehand and the boy’s death was not due to any mistake on anybody's part. (Śloka 50, Chapter 1, Anuśāsana Parva)

(iii) Once Mrṭyu followed the King Sudarśana, but Mrṭyudeva had to withdraw after accepting defeat because the King had been living a virtuous life of high standard. (See under Sudarśana).

The statements regarding Mrṭyu as a goddess are the following:

1) This devatā was born from the body of Brahmā in the shape of a woman. (Śloka 17, Chapter 53, Drona Parva).

2) Brahmā gave the work of destruction to Mrṭyu. When she got that work she wept aloud. (Śloka 21, Chapter 257, Śaṅti Parva).

3) The goddess of Mrṭyu once did severe penance. (Śloka 17, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).

4) Brahmā assured the goddess of death that any destruction by her would not be deemed as a sin. (Śloka 44, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).

5) The terrible strength of Mrṭyudevatā is described in Chapter 819, Śaṅti Parva, Mahābhārata.

MUCUKUNDA. A celebrated King of the Solar dynasty.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu—Brahmā—Marici—Kaśyapa—Viivasvān—Vaivasvata Manu—Iksvāku—Śaśāda—Puraṇāya (Kakutsha)—Anenas—Ṛṣṭhulāśva—Prasenajit—Yuvanāva—Māndhātā—Mucukunda. Māndhātā got three sons named Ambariṣa, Mucukunda and Purukutsa and fifty daughters and all the fifty were married to a sage named Saubhāri.

2) How Mucukunda attained salvation. (For the story see para 72, under Indra).

3) Other details.

(i) Mucukunda had a daughter named Candramukhi. She was married to Sobhana, son of Candrasena. Once, when Sobhana came to his wife’s house it was an Ekādaśī day and all were observing fasting and so Sobhana also did so. The next day Sobhana was seen lying dead. The soul of Sobhana went to the valley of the mountain of Mandara and started enjoying heavenly bliss. One day a pilgrim from the country of Mucukunda named Somaśārmā met the soul of Sobhana and coming to know that it was the son-in-law of their King he started making enquiries about him. Sobhana then said that all his happiness was

MUDGALA \\

MUDGALA. A sage of Purānic fame.
Mudgala the chief priest. (Chapter 130, Part IV, Padma Purāṇa).

MUDGARA PARŅĀKA. A serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MUDGARAPIḌAḌA. A serpent born to Kādru of Kaśyapa-prajāpāti. (Śloka 9, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

MUDĪTĀ. Wife of the Agni named Salia. (Śloka 1, Chapter 222, Vana Parva).

MUDRĀS. When he recites the mantras a Māṇtriṇa should use different kinds of gestures with his hands to suit the recital. They are called Mudrās. The Mudrās in general are given below:

The first mudrā is called Aṇjālimudrā. Aṇjali means a cavity formed by folding the hands and joining the open hands together. If the hands thus folded are placed on the breast it becomes a Vāndini mudrā. The hands should be placed on the breast with a slight slant to the left for Vāndini mudrā. The third mudrā is called Īrdhva mudrā. Hold the left hand first in such a way that the thumb comes on the top and then with the fingers of the right hand bind the thumb of the left hand. The thumb of the right hand should also come to the top. This is called Īrdhva mudrā. The lowering of the left palm opened up is called Varāhā mudrā. (Chapter 26, Agni Purāṇa).

MŪKA I. A serpent born of the family of Takṣaka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 5, Ādi Parva).

MŪKA II. An asura. This demon once went to Arjuna who was engaged in penance in the forests. He had assumed the form of a boar and Arjuna killed him. At once Siva appeared there in the guise of a forester and contended that the boar was killed by him. A quarrel ensued which ended in a fight between them. In the end Siva appeared before Arjuna in his real form and granted him the missile Pāśupata. (See under Arjuna).

MŪKA III. A Cāḍāla devoted much to his parents. A Brāhmaṇa named Narottama went to this Cāḍāla to learn moral lessons from him. (Srṣṭikhaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

MUKHAKARṆI. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 29, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MUKHAMANḌIKĀ. One of the evil spirits tormenting infants. This is called Diti also. (Śloka 30, Chapter 23, Vana Parva).

MUKHARA. A serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 16, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MUKHASECAKA. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 47, Śloka 16).

MUKṬĀPHALAKETU. A Vidyādhāra youth. The story of this young man who was born to kill Vidyuuddhavāja, a fire-brand of an asura, is told thus in Kathāsarītaśāgara.

An eminent asura of name Viduyutprabha performed penance to propitiate Brahmā to get a son. As a result of the blessings of Brahmā he got a son invincible to the Devas. He was named Vidyuuddhavāja. Even from boyhood he was very brave and daring. Once when he saw some demons standing guard to protect the asura family he said "At present our country is being protected by the hands of others. I shall, therefore, perform penance and obtain boons to remove dhvaja went straight to the forests and performed penance to propitiate Brahmā. When the austerities became severe, Vidyuddhavāja observed fasting without break and the whole world became excited due to anxiety. So Brahmā appeared before him in person and gave him many divine weapons like Brahmāstra. For Brahmāstra the only counter-missile was Paśupata and so Brahmā warned him that it should be used only when it was found absolutely necessary.

Vidyuddhavāja became arrogant with the possession of such divine weapons and started for Indraloka with his father and his army to conquer Indra. He knew that Indra was ready to face him with a big army headed by Candraketu and Padmaśekhara.

The battle that ensued was very grim. Even Brahmā and Rudra came to see the fight. In a combat with Indra, Vidyuttraprabha was killed. Vidyuddhavāja saw his father killed, got furious and sent Brahmāstra against Indra who in turn opposed it with Paśupata. Vidyuddhavāja became faint. Devas sounded the trumpets of victory and left the place.

After some time Vidyuddhavāja awoke from the swoon and lamented thus to those of his men who were around:—“My tapobala (strength resulting from penance) was of no use. I have decided to die fighting against Indra. I do not want to return to a country where my father is not alive. On hearing this his aged minister pointed out to him his mistake in having used the Brahmāstra untimely.

Vidyuddhavāja decided to attain more powers and so he went to the base of the Himālayas to perform penance to propitiate Śiva. Pleased at his penance of five thousand years Śiva appeared in person and asked him to name the boon he wanted. Vidyuddhavāja demanded “I must be able to kill Indra in a battle.” Śiva granted him the boon.

Vidyuddhavāja once again attacked Indra with a huge army. In the fierce battle that followed Indra fell down fainting by the weapons of Vidyuddhavāja. At once a voice from the air commanded, “Take away Indra from the battlefield. It is dangerous to keep him there.” Vāyu came and carried him away swiftly. When Indra awoke from fainting he went to Brahmaloka with all the other devas.

Vidyuddhavāja established himself in Amaraśatī, the capital city of Indra and lived there enjoying his life as Indra. In the meantime Candraketu, King of the Vidyādharas was sitting in Vāyu loka musing thus, “How long should we remain thus displaced from our positions! There is no waning of the power of Vidyudhavāja. My friend Padmaśekhara, King of Gandharvas, has gone to Śivapura to perform penance. I do not know whether he has been blessed by god. Anyhow I will act after hearing from him.”

As his musings came to an end Padmaśekhara himself appeared before him and said: “I have come to tell you the glad news that Śiva told me. Śiva said “Son, do not grieve. You will get your country back. You will get a son and a daughter. They will be top-ranking men in all activities. The husband of your daughter will kill Vidyuddhavāja.”

A happy Candraketu went to Kailāsa with his wife Muktaśati and started penance. Padmaśekhara went and mentioned to the devas all that had happened. The devas then went to Mahāvisnu and told him of the boons which Vidyuddhavāja had received from Śiva and how he was ruling Indraloka then. After hearing them patiently Viśnu said that only Śiva could do anything in that matter. They all then went to the temple of Siddhiśvara and sat there meditating on Śiva.

In the meantime Bhagavān appeared before Candraketu and blessed him and said he would get a very valorous son who would kill Vidyuddhavāja and restore Devaloka to the devas. But after that he would be born as a man on earth by a curse. Padmaśati daughter of a Gandharva King, would by the strength of her penance release him from the curse and help him to get his original state as a Gandharva. He would then marry Padmaśati and remain as emperor of the Vidyādharas for ten Kalpas together. Candraketu and wife came back to Vāyu loka.

At this time Śiva appeared in person to those sitting in the temple of Siddhiśvara and said that a son would be born to Candraketu from a part of his and that valorous youth would kill Vidyuddhavāja. Muktaśati wife of Candraketu became pregnant at that time and soon delivered a son. He was named Muktaphalaketu. Even from boyhood he became an ardent devotee of Śiva and started performing penance to propitiate Śiva. Śiva appeared before him and gave him the secrets of many techniques in archery.

Vidyuddhavāja was once bathing in a river when muddy waters flowed from up the river and the arrogant demon sent a servant to find out the cause thereof. When he went up by the shores he saw an ox and an elephant bathing in the river. They were the Vāhanas of Śiva and Indra. The elephant was the famous Airāvata. He came back and intimated to Vidyuddhavāja what he saw. The demon then ordered his people to bring the culpris to his side. But the Vāhanas killed those who went to capture them and then they went to their masters, Śiva and Indra. Hearing about this audacity of the demon-chief the Devas challenged the asuras to a fight. This time the army of the devas was led by Muktaphalaketu.

A Gandharva princess named Padmaśati grew up to be a beautiful maiden at that time. She was in love with Muktaphalaketu. Padmaśati was one day plucking flowers from a pond in the Gandharva land thinking about Muktaphalaketu who had gone to war against the asuras. A demoness who was going to eat flesh in the battle-field of the devas and asuras saw Padmaśati, took her and went up. Muktaśati coming to know of this went up with her and got back Padmaśati who was struggling in the hands of the demoness like streaks of lightning among clouds. Then he asked her maids about her and they said, “She is the daughter of the Gandharva King Padmaśekhara, Padmaśati is her name. She is unmarried. But she is betrothed to the son of Candraketu named Muktaphalaketu, who is born to destroy Vidyuddhavāja. She has come here to practise penance for the success of her father and Muktaphalaketu in this war between devas and asuras.”

Padmaśati recognised Muktaphalaketu from the words of his followers. But the latter had to go back to Devaloka under instructions from Indra. The Devasura war became fierce. By the valour and skill of Muktaphalaketu many of the asuras were killed. The war was won. Muktaphalaketu was given a grand reception at Devaloka.
and was then sent back. Muktāphalaketu did not seem to be happy and everybody thought that it might be due to his having killed Vidyauddhavaja. But the real cause was his separation from Padmāvati.

A sorrow-stricken Padmāvati sent her female companion Manoharikā to the country of Vidyauddharas to enquire about Muktāphalaketu. What she saw there was a sad Muktāphalaketu pining to see Padmāvati. Both now understood each other and Manoharikā returned with presents for Padmāvati from Muktāphalaketu. At that time Muktāphalaketu went to see a Mahārāṣṭra named Tapodhana. Disregarding the objections of the disciple Drdhavarta who stood guard outside the āśrama Muktāphalaketu entered the āśrama with his friend. Drdhavarta followed them. When they entered the āśrama they found the āśrama empty and at once Drdhavarta cursed them both to be born on earth as men. Padmāvati fainted when she heard the news. When she regained her consciousness she started practising austerities sitting in a temple devoted to Gaurī, wife of Siva. She meditated on her husband Muktāphalaketu in his life on earth and performed penance to propitiate Siva. By the grace of Śiva Muktāphalaketu got his original life and he married Padmāvati and led a happy married life. (Tārātuga 2, Padmāvati-lambaka, Kathāsārītāgāra.)

MUKULA. A King of the dynasty of Puru. Mukula, Śrījaya, Bhadisū, Yavinara and Kṛmila were the sons of King Bāhyāśa. All these five are known as Pañcālas. Of these the family of Mukula comprised of Maukulas. Mukula got a son named Pañcāśa. (Chapter 201, Agni Purāṇa.)

MURA I. A ferocious asura.
1) Birth and acquisition of boons. Mura was the asura born to Kaśyapa-prajapati of his wife Danu. Once Mura was shocked to find the huge heap of dead bodies of the asuras killed by the devas. Mura got afraid of death and did penance for years to propitiate his grandfather and Brahmā appeared before him and asked him to name the boon he wanted. Mura said “Lord, anybody whom I touch with my hands in a battle, even if they are immortal, should die.” Brahmā the father of the universe granted him the boon. (Chapter 60, Vāmanā Purāṇa).
2) Family life. Mura became the guard of the boundaries of Prājyotisā, the capital city of Narakaśura. Mura begot four thousand sons. Of these ten were posted to guard the palace of the queens. Mura performed penance and obtained boons. He fenced the boundary of Prājyotisā with six thousand ropes and arrested the approach of the enemies. These ropes were known in Purāṇas as the Māra-vapāsas. (Chapter 38, Daśaśāntīya Purāṇa, Sābhā Parva).
3) Dīgirīṣita. (Conquest of the quarters). Mura who became arrogant by the power of the boon he possessed went to Mahāmeru and challenged the Yakṣas and Gandharvas to a fight. But none dared to fight with him. Then he went to Aśāravati and challenged Indra. Indra also did not accept the challenge. Then he entered Aśāravati with a raised hand. Nobody stopped him. Going to the palace of Indra he said “Oh, thousand-eyed deva, fight with me or leave this place”. On hearing it Indra left his place and came to earth. Then Mura took possession of Aśāravati and Vajra. He lived in devaloka with Maya, Tāra and other danavas enjoying the luxuries there. Along with his wife, son and other devas Devendra established himself on the southern bank of Kālindī river.

Then one day Muraśura came to the earth on the Aśāravati and landed at a place on the banks of the river Sarayū where Raquila a king of the solar dynasty was conducting a yāga. Muraśura went to Raquila and said “Come on, fight with me or you should stop this yāga. You should not worship the devas.” Then the great and brilliant Maitrāravupi sage, Vasiṣṭha told him, “Daiyā, what use is there in conquering men of the earth? You should win against those who are never defeated. If you want to fight go and challenge Añkata, the god of Death. Oh, King of asuras, that boy of an Añkata would never obey your orders. If you conquer him you will have defeated all the world.”

On hearing the words of Vasiṣṭha, Mura started to fight Dharmarāja. Yama on hearing that Mura was coming to fight him went to Mahāviṣṇu on his buffalo as he knew he could kill him. Mahāviṣṇu asked him to send Mura to him. Yama returned to his place to see Mura there ready to fight. Yama told him that he would do whatever Mura ordered him and then Mura said “You should stop killing people or I will chop your head off.” Dharmarāja replied “Mura, if you had been the person who had appointed me for this job I would have willingly followed your instructions. But I am under the control of somebody else.” Mura asked “Who is the person superior to you? Tell me, I shall surely defeat him.” Yama said “There is an individual called Viṣṇu holding a Cakra and a Gādā in his hands living in Śvetādhvī. He is the person who has appointed me.” Mura anxiously asked “Where is his abode? I shall go there myself to conquer him.” Antaka replied “You go to the ocean of Milk. It is there that Viṣṇu, the omnipresent protector of the universe is residing.” Mura said “Well, I am going to him. But you should in the meantime discontinue your work of killing people.” Yama replied “Go and win him. If you defeat him I shall abide by your instructions.”

Mura went to fight Mahāviṣṇu. It was at this time that Śrī Kṛṣṇa the incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu attacked the capital city of Narakaśura, Prājyotisā. Mura went to the help of Narakaśura. The boundary of the city was well-fenced with ropes but Kṛṣṇa cut them all and removed the barrier. In the fight that ensued both Narakaśura and Mura were killed by the celebrated weapon Sudārśana of Kṛṣṇa. From then Kṛṣṇa got the name of Muramathana. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MURA II. Son of Tālajāṅga, an asura born of a part of Brahmā. The capital of this valorous Murāsura was in the city of Candravati. Murāsura who possessed the brilliance of Brahmā was a nightmare to the devas. Once Murāsura fought against Viṣṇu and in the fierce fight that took place Viṣṇu was defeated and he ran away from the battlefield and started sleeping in a cave named Siṁhavati in the neighbourhood of Badarikāśrama. Mura went there too. Then Mahāviṣṇu created a Dēvi through his Yogāṇī and made her kill Mura.
Pleased at the slaughter of Mura, Visṇu blessed her and said "From today onwards you will be known as 'Ekādaśī'. You will be capable of wiping off all sins on earth." (Padmapurāṇa, Uttarākhaṇḍa 36. 50-80).

MURA III. (MURU). A Yādava King. He was one of the neighbours of Jarāsandha. The daughter of this Yādava king called Kāmaṇḍākapāṭa was married to Ghatotkaca. (13. 13. Sabhā Purāṇa and Skanda Purāṇa).

MURA IV (MURU). A country of ancient Bhārata. A King called Bhagadatta was the King of this country. (Śloka 14, Chapter 14, Sabhā Purāṇa).

MURĀRI. A Sanskrit dramatist who lived in the 8th century A.D. in India. His father was Bhātrainaradhamāna. Murāri is the author of the drama 'Anārghāraṅghava'. This drama has eight acts. Murāri has mentioned in his works about Anārgharāṅgha who lived in 700 A.D. and Ratnākara who lived in 750 A.D. It is therefore, surmised that Murāri must have lived during the latter part of the 8th century. In the writing of dramas Murāri has excelled the Mahāvīraścārita of Bhavabhūti and his verses indicate he had the style of Māgha.

MURMURĀ. A river. Agni originated from this river. (Śloka 25, Chapter 222, Vana Purāṇa).

MŪRTI. One of the thirteen daughters of Daksaprajāpati. This girl was married to Dharma. Nara and Nārāyaṇa are the sons born to Mūrti of Dharma. (4th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

MŪSĀKA. An ancient place of habitation in Bhārata. (Śloka 56, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Purāṇa).

MŪŠAKĀDA (MŪŠIKĀDA). A serpent born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Kadru. This serpent sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. Once Nārada introduced this nāga to Mātali. (Śloka 10, Chapter 9, Sabhā Purāṇa and Śloka 14, Chapter 103, Īḍyoga Purāṇa).

MUSALA. A Brahmarshīd son of Viśvāmitra. (Śloka 53, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Purāṇa).

MŪŠIKA. An ancient merchant. In the Kathāpitha-lambaka of Kathāsārasīgara a story is told to demonstrate that even without any capital an ingenious and industrious man can earn money.

A merchant got this name by means of his industry. Once a poor man of no resources went to the house of a great merchant named Viśakhīla. He was then admonishing a young man of his own caste. The merchant was saying, "See, here is a dead rat on the ground. A clever man would earn money by using this as a capital. To you I have given money for business on several occasions. Not only that you have not increased it but also you have lost it."

The poor man who went to him requested the merchant to give him the dead rat. Viśakhīla greatly amused at the request gave him the rat. A rich man bought it for his cat to eat and gave him instead two measures of Bengal gram. He roasted it and made it palatable and then with a pot of water went outside the city gates and sat under a tree on the road-side. Wood-cutters were passing that way carrying loads and he sold the roasted gram and water to them who purchased it with eagerness to ease their weariness. They gave him in exchange firewood and in the evening he took it to the market and sold it. With the money he purchased more Bengal gram and continued the trade as before and after a few days he purchased from them a great stock of firewood. Suddenly there were heavy rains and there was a scarcity of firewood in the market and he sold his stock for good price. With the money thus received he purchased some goods and started a grocery shop. Gradually his business increased and he became a big merchant. Because he started the business from a Mūsika (rat) he got the nick-name Mūsika.

MŪSIKASTRĪ. See under Pañcatantra.

MŪŠIKA. An asura who was a servant of Kaṁsa. This asura was killed by Balabhadra. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

NA. In Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348, the meaning of this syllable is given as 'vynda' (collection) and 'Buddha'

NABHĀGA. A brother of Ikṣvāku, who had ten brothers named Nabāga, Saryātī, Dīṣṭa, Dhṛṣṭa, Niṁśyanta, Nābhāga, Prsadhra, Kavi, Karuṇa and Vasumān. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 8).

NĀBHĀGA. A brother of Ikṣvāku. The famous Ambariṣṇa was Nābhāga's son. After conquering all the worlds he ruled the kingdom strictly along the path of truth and righteousness. (Vana Purāṇa, Chapter 25, Verse 12).

In the evening of his life Nābhāga gifted away the whole land to Brahmins. Since she could not leave Nābhāga, Bhūmidevi herself assumed physical form and went to him on the occasion. This emperor never consumed meat. He lives in Brahmaloka according to Chapter 115, Anuśāsana Purāṇa. (Śānti Purāṇa, Chapter 96, Verse 124).

NĀBHĀΓARIṢṬA. A son of Vaivasvata Manu. (Ādi Purāṇa, Chapter 75, Verse 17).

NABHĀKĀNA. An ancient country in South India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Purāṇa, Chapter 9, Stanza 59).

NABHASVĀN. A son of Narakāśura. Tāmra, Antarikṣa, Śravaṇa, Vasu, Vibhāvasu, Nabhasvān and Aruṇa were the seven prominent sons of Narakāśura. (Bhāga-vata, Skanda 10).

NABHIODA. An eternal Viśvadeva. (A class of gods concerned in the Śrāddha offerings to the Mancs). (M.B. Anuśāsana Purāṇa, Chapter 91, Stanza 34).

NĀCIKA. One of the Brahmarshīd sons of Viśvāmitra. (Anuśāsana Purāṇa, Chapter 4, Verse 58).

NĀCIKETA (NĀCIKETA). A sage of olden days. Son of Uḍḍālaki, he lived for a long time in the āśrama serving his father, who devoted his time to performing yajñas. Nāciketa, who was once sent into the forest for flowers etc. did not find them anywhere there, and he returned to the āśrama without them. Angry at this his father cursed him to be taken to Yamaloka. Accordingly he went to Yamaloka. He waited at the gates for a long time to see Yama, who appeared at last when he sang the praises of Yama. The advice then given by Yama to Nāciketa forms the Kathopaniṣad. After studying the advice he returned to his father, who was pleased to him a great scholar. (Anuśāsana Purāṇa, Chapter 71).

NĀCIKETAS. A famous hermit. Kathopaniṣad is the exhortation given by Yamadeva (God of death) to this hermit. There is a story to substantiate this statement. The father of Nāciketas was the hermit Vājaśravas. This hermit gave as alms, cows which had grown lean by old age and lack of food, at the time of sacrifices. Nāciketas felt grieved at this action of his father. He went to his father and sadly asked him "Father, to whom are you going to give me?" The father got angry at the question of the son, and replied; “You are to be given to Yama.”

On hearing these cruel words of his father, the boy went to the palace of Yama who had been away. For three days and nights the boy waited there without food and drink. When Yama returned the boy was happy and cheerful and Yama was pleased with him. Yama promised the boy three boons and asked him what boon he wanted. The first boon he asked for was, “Give me the boon that father will be pleased with me and not angry with me.” The second was, “Advise me how to attain heaven.” The third was, “Tell me the solution of the mystery, whether the soul remains after death.” Yama granted the first two boons and said to him, “Boy, this is a difficult question. So ask for another boon such as long life, power over the world, all the pleasures of the world and so on.”

The boy replied: “The things you have promised to give me are useless things because after a while the organs of sense will become fragile. The life also will end. So, please tell me. I want the answer to my question.” Being greatly pleased at the reply of the boy Dharmadeva expounded to him about the immortality of the soul and the essence of things regarding God Almighty. (Kathopanisad).

NACINA. An ancient region of the country mentioned in Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva.

NĀDA. See under Pātu.

NĀDĀGIRI. An intelligent elephant with discriminative power. Mention is made about this elephant on several occasions in Kathāsāristāgara.

NĀDICAKRA. The ten nādiśs where the yūgi in meditation retains the five prāṇās form the nādicakra. At the bottom of the nābhi (nābhi kanda) innumerable nādiśs or nerves originate or sprout up. 72,000 such nādiśs exist at the centre of the nābhi (navel). The whole body is filled with these nādiśs spread out in parallel and horizontal positions, and they exist in the form of circles entwined with one another. Ten nādiśs are prominent amongst them, i.e. Ida, Pingalā, Vāsundhāra, Ādhi, Cakṣus, Mahānādi, Gāndhāra, Harhsā, Jāghū and Pārītha. Any defect or harm caused to any one of these ten nādiśs may lead even to death.

There are ten Vāyuḥs (winds) in the body. The five Prāṇās called Prāṇa, Āpāna, Samāna, Udāna and Vyāna, and the five Vāyuḥs called Nāga, Kūrma, Kṛkala, Devadatta and Dhanāṇjaya together constitute the ten Vāyuḥs. Prāṇa is the most important Vāyu. This vāyu does the emptying as well as the refilling of the other nine vāyus and thus sustains life. The prāṇavāyu has its existence ever in the chest of living beings and fills the body with air through breathing in, out, coughing etc. It depends on life and it is called Prāṇavāyu as it moves or travels with life.

Apāna leads vāyu downwards. It is Apāna which directs man’s food downwards. Also it keeps in its fold urine and semen. This vāyu is called Apāna as its function is adhonayana (leading downwards) as mentioned above. Samānavāyu conveys to the different parts in the body in equal manner the things which living beings eat, drink and smell as also blood, bile, phlegm and vāta. Udāna causes the shivering of lips, flushing of face and eyes and excitement of joints etc. Vyāna causes the limbs to be closed and stretched, and it excites diseases. Nāga exists in nausea, Kūrma in the bulging of the eyes Kṛkala in food, Devadatta in yawning and Dhanāṇjaya in sound. Dhanāṇjaya does not quit the body even after death.

Life, Prāṇa, travels through the nādiścakra depending on ten different courses, i.e. Saṅkṛantī, Viṣṇu, Ahar, Rātri, the two ayanas (Daksīṇa and Uttra), Adhīvāsa Rṣa, Unārāṭa and Dhanā. Unārāṭa means hicough, Rṣa cough, Dhanā breathing and Adhīvāsa yawning. Of the two ayanas, Uttra and Daksīṇa, the former is the course towards the left and the latter towards the right and Viṣṇu is the centre between the two. Saṅkṛantī is the change of position of Viṣṇu. On the left side of the human body is the nādi called Iḍa, on the right side Pīṇgalā and between the two Susumnā. The prāṇa above these three nādiśs is Ahar i.e. day and that below is Apāna, i.e. night. Thus every vāyu assumes ten different forms.

There are various kinds of prāṇāyāma (control of breaths). Prāṇāyāma practiced with the prāṇa contained in the centre of the body is called Candragrahnā; that which supersedes physical principles is called Śṛṣṭyagrāhnā. To fill the stomach with as much of vāyu as is desired is Pūrakaprāṇāyāma. To remain like a full pot, all breathing stopped, (Pot completely filled) having closed all the openings—‘doors’—of the body is Kumbhaka. The yogī practising Kumbhaka should direct the vāyu upwards in one breath, and that practice is called Recaka. He who does it should be conversant with the yoga of inhalation. Erudite people call it Japa, because when it is practised Śiva resident in one’s own body awakes within. Śiva, the King of yogins, chants the mantra (japa) 21,600 times within the course of one day and one night. The soul chants the mantra—Gāyatri—which Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva are the preceding deities, and that is called Ajapa. He who chants Ajapa will have no future births. Prāṇāyāma should be followed by Kūndalinīyoga, Kūndalini meaning primordial force. The force is a compound of Sun, fire and Moon and its seat is the heart, where it exists in the form of a sprout. Since creation is dependent upon this force power for creation should be invoked on it. The yogī should picture in his mind that nectar flows out of Kūndalini. He should also realise that the soul within the body possesses form while pure soul is formless. He should address this soul as ‘Hamsa Hamsa’. Hamsa means Śiva. Śiva exists and functions inside and outside the body just as oil is in the gingly seed and fragrance in flower. Soul possessing form is of five kinds. Accordingly Brahma’s seat is the heart, Viṣṇu’s the neck, Rudra’s, the centre of the throat; Mahēśvara’s the forehead; and Śiva’s, the tip of the prāṇa. Soul without form is just contrary to the above. Its place is where the prāṇa ends. By prāṇāyāma the formless soul may be experienced. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 214).

NADJA. An ancient King. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 15, it is mentioned that the Pāṇḍavas had sent an invitation to this King to take part in the Bhārata battle.

NADĪJANČHA I. A famous stork. It lives in the pond called Indrajyunnā as an eternal being, without death. (See under Indrajyunnā).

NADĪJANČHA II. A kite, who was a son of Kaśyapa. A friend of Brahmat, it was known as Rājadhartam as well. Nādijaṅgha was once killed for food by an ungrateful brahmin. (For details see under Gautama V).
NADVALĀ. (a) The wife of Manu, the son of Cākṣuṣa. Manu. Ten sons named Ěru, Pūru, Satādhyumna, Tapasvī, Satyavāk, Kavi, Agniṣṭu, Aṭirāṭra, Sudhyumna and Ātmāniyu were born to Manu by Nadvalā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).
(b) The daughter of Prajāpaṭi Vairāja, Manu married this woman. Kuru, Pūru, Satādhyumna, Tapasvī, Satyavān, Suci, Agniṣṭo, Aṭirāṭra, Sudhyumna and Abhirāmiyu were the ten sons born to Naḍvalā from Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Arīha 1, Chapter 13).

NĀGA I. An asura (demon). (See under Nāgastra).

NĀGA II. A class of serpents. It is stated in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aruṇya Kāṇḍa, Sarga 14, that the ten daughters of Kaśyapa, from Śurasā, the nāgas and from Kadrū, the Uragas (both are serpents) came into the world.

NĀGADATTĀ. One of the hundred sons of Dhrūtaraśtra.
This Nāgadatta was killed by Bhīmasena. (Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 157, Stanza 197).

NĀGADHANVATĪRTHA. An ancient holy place of bath, situated in the basin of the river Sarasvati. Vāsuki stays here. It was at this holy place that Vāsuki was anointed as the King of the Nāgas. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 37, Stanza 3).

NĀGADVJIPA. A region inside the island Sudarśana. This region has the shape of the ear of the hare in the Moon. (M.B. Bhīma Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 55).

NĀGALOKA. The world of the Nāgas or Pātāla. Vāsuki is its chief. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 127, Verse 60). There is a pond in Nāgaloka and a drink of its water bestows the strength of a thousand elephants. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 127, Verse 68). Pātāla is thousands of miles away from earth. Its area exceeds a thousand yoganas, and it is surrounded by magnificent forts studded with gems. The steps at the entrance of the fort are also decorated with gold and gems. There are beautiful gardens, fountains and singing birds in Pātāla. Its outer doors are hundred yoganas in length and five in width. (Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 58, Verse 37).

NĀGAPUKRA. A place situated on the basin of the river Gomati in Naimiṣāranya. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 355, Stanza 3, that in this place, a Nāga named Padmanābha lived.

NĀGARA. In ancient days there were rules and principles regulating the construction of a city. The name ‘city’ could be applied to them only if they conformed to the rules and principles in vogue. The principles and rules of the erection of a proper city are given below:—

One yogana or a half of land should be selected as site.1 The planning of the city should be commenced after worshipping the deity of Vāstu. There should be four main gates on the four sides, East, West, North and South. The South gate should be in the position of Gandharvapada, West gate in the place of Varuṇa, the North gate in the place of Soma (Moon) and the East fort gate in the place of Śūryapada (the position of the Sun). The hāttas (minor gates) should be wide enough for elephants etc. to pass through. The main gates should be six rods wide.

When the city is completed goldsmiths should be settled in the Agni corner2 (i.e. South East). The courtesans who live by dancing etc. should have their houses on the south side of the city. The houses of actors, those who extract oil, fishermen etc. should be in the corner of Nrītī (South West). Sheds for chariots, weapons, swords etc. should be on the western side. Dealers in liquor, carpenters, blacksmiths, masons etc. and servants should be given houses in the Vāyu corner i.e. North West. The houses of Brahmins, hermits, sages, saints, and such others should be on the north side. In the Iśāna corner (North East) merchants of vegetables and on the eastern side, the authorities of the army should have their houses.

The army (Infantry, cavalry, chariots and elephants) should be put up in the Agni corner. On the south the goddesses who are protectors of women-folk should be consecrated. Archers should live in the Nrītī corner. Most honourable people, Treasury officers, Leaders of the people, Brahmin groups and such others should have their abodes on the western side. So also Kṣatriyas should have their houses on the eastern side, Vaiśyas on the south and Śadras on the west of the city. Vaiśyas and horses should be placed on all four sides. The army also should be placed thus. The movable wealth should be placed on the east side and the funeral place on the south. The cattle etc. should be kept on the west, farmers on the north, and the outcasts on the corners. This should be the plan of a city as well as that of villages too.

On the east fort-gate of cities and villages Vaiśravaṇa and Śrī Bhagavatī should be consecrated. They will confer prosperity upon those who visit them. Temples dedicated to Gods should be erected on the western side facing the east. If temples are erected on the east they should face the west and those erected on the south should face the North. For the protection of the city, there should be temples dedicated to Indra, Viṣṇu and such other Gods. If there is no worshipping place in a city, a village, a fort, or a house, such places will be haunted by devils and troubled by diseases etc. If cities are built according to this plan they will afford both salvation and prosperity.

On the east there should be the house of Lakṣmi, in the Agni corner, the kitchen on the south, bedrooms in the Nrītī corner the weapon-house, on the west the dining hall, in the Vāyu corner, the granary, on the north, the treasury, and the place of worship in the Iśāna corner.

Houses could be erected with four blocks, three blocks or only one block. Houses with four blocks could be made in two hundred and fiftyfive ways by making changes in each block and the open verandas. Houses with three blocks are of four types; with two blocks are of five types; and houses of only one block are of four types. There are houses and cities with twenty-eight open verandas. There are fiftysix types of houses with four open verandas and seven open verandas. Houses with six open verandas and eight open verandas are of twenty types. In cities houses should have eight open verandas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 105).

NĀGARJUNA. Minister of King Cirāyus. (For details see under Cirāyus).

NĀGĀRI. One of the prominent children of Garuḍa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 9).

NĀGAŚĀTA. The mountain where Pāṇḍu did tapas along with Kunti, Madri and others. (Adi Parva, Chapter 118, Verse 47).

NAGASRI. Wife of King Dharmacatta of Kosala. Tarādattā was her daughter. (See under Dharmacatta).

NAGASTRA. A destructive weapon (arrow). The following story about the astra is told in the Yuddha Kaṇḍa of Kamba Ramayana.

In olden times there was a very powerful and mean asura called Nāga. Brahmi resorted to virulent black magic to kill Nāga, and from the fire-pit arose a terrible goblin called Nāgapāśa. It was deputed to kill Nāga and the Trimūrtis followed it. Nāgapāśa went to the city of Nāgāsura called Viramahendra, ascended its tower and made a terrible noise the echo of which caused abortion in all the pregnant nāga women. Many children fainted and many died. Nāgāsura deputed his army chieftain Virasena with an army to kill the nāga goblin. At the sight of the army the goblin raised another terrible cry which blew off Virasena and his army, reducing them to powder. Then Nāgāsura's minister with a big army attacked the goblin. But the minister was decoyed by him, and the army annihilated. Enraged at this defeat of his minister, Nāgāsura attacked the goblin with an army of crores of soldiers. But, within seconds the goblin devoured the mighty army.

At last Nāgapāśa and Nāgāsura engaged themselves in a duel which lasted for years. Ultimately the goblin swallowed up Nāgāsura also. Then he went to the Trimūrtis and saluted them. They granted him many boons, and Śiva, in excess of joy, wore it as one of the ornaments round his neck. Some time later Nāgapāśa set out on a tour to see the fourteen worlds, and Śiva specially instructed him not to visit the Śālmiša island. He visited the various worlds earning all knowledge and started for mount Kailāsa. On his way he saw Śālmiša island, the abode of nāgas, and in violation of Śiva's instructions, he entered the island. The nāgas there did not honour him and his false pride made him tremble with rage. Then the nāgas of the island told him thus: "We have a powerful enemy, who visits us every month, and unless we feed him sumptuously he will devour all of us for food. He is to come today, and if you are capable enough, you defeat and drive him off and save us. If you do so, we shall crown you as our King and honour you." The powerful enemy of the nāgas was Garuḍa and he came. All the nāgas ran off at his sight. Garuḍa then attacked the goblin Nāgapāśa, who was standing unperturbed before him. There being no chance of victory for the goblin he ran away and took refuge with Śiva. Garuḍa also followed him, and demanded of Śiva to return to him, his enemy, the goblin. Śiva told Garuḍa thus: "If, in future he (the goblin) interferes with anybody connected with you, you may either punish or eat him. Do not do anything with him now".

Garuḍa agreed to the above proposal of Śiva. From that day onwards Nāgapāśa lived in Vaikuṇṭha entwined with nooses. He became the arrow called nāgapāśa or nāgāstra.

NAGATIRTHA I. A holy place situated on the boundary of Kurukṣetra. Those who drink the water of this holy bath will obtain the fruit of performing an Agniṣṭoma sacrifice. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 14).

NAGATIRTHA II. A holy place which is situated near Gaṅgādvāra or Kanakhala and which keeps up the memory of Kapila, the King of the Nāgas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 66).

NAGAVITHI. Daughter born to Yāmī, the daughter of Dakṣaprajāpatī. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 15).

NAGAJITI I. A Kṣatriya King. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 37, Stanza 21 that this king was born from a portion of an asura called Iṣupāda. This Nagajit who was the King of Gaṇḍhāra was killed by Kartti and his sons were defeated by Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254 and Udyoga Parva, Chapter 43).

NAGAJITI II. An asura. This asura who had been the disciple of Prahlāda took rebirth as a King named Subala. (Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 11).

NAGODBHAEDA. A holy place near Vaiśānava tīrtha. Sarasvatī is supposed to dwell here in invisible form. He who bathes here will attain nāgaloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 112).

NAHUŚA I. A famous King of the Lunar dynasty.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu in the following order:—Brahmā-Atri - Candra - Budha-Purūravas-Ayus-Nahuśa.

2) Birth. Ayus, the son of Purūravas, married the princess named Indumati (Svarbhānukumāri). Nahuśa was the son born to the couple, thanks to the blessing of the great hermit Dattātreya. Nahuśa married Aśokasundari, the daughter of Śiva.

There is a story about the birth and marriage of Nahuśa and Aśokasundari in Padma Purāṇa as given below:

Once Śiva and Pārvatī were engaged in love-making in Kailāsa. Pārvatī requested Śiva to show her the best garden ever created by Brahmi. Śiva took her to Nandanavana, where she saw the Kalpa tree, which was beautiful all over, and she asked Śiva about its special features. Śiva replied that anything asked of it would be granted by the Kalpa tree. Pārvatī made a request to the Kalpa tree for a girl just for a test. Instantly a very beautiful girl was born from the tree. Pārvatī named her Aśokasundari and brought her up as her daughter. Once Pārvatī gave her a boon that she would become the wife of King Nahuśa of the Lunar family, who would be equal to Indra.

One day, when the beautiful Aśokasundari was walking with celestial maids in the Nandanavana as an asura named Huṇḍa the son of Vipracitti, came there. The moment his eyes fell on Aśokasundari he fell in love with her. The asura spoke to her of his love and requested her to be his wife. Not only did she refuse his request but also told him that according to the boon given by Pārvatī she would become the wife of Nahuśa, the King of the Lunar dynasty. Hearing this Huṇḍa smiled and said: "That righteous man named Nahuśa is yet to be born in the Lunar dynasty. You will be much older than he. He will not suit you as he will be too young. So don't waste your blooming youth. Come and enjoy life with me." But Aśokasundari did not concede. Huṇḍa was disappointed. So he began to think about ways to get her. He disappeared from there and reappeared in the guise of a beautiful woman. and told Aśokasundarī thus:—“Lady, I have taken a fast. Ḫunda has killed my husband. I am doing penance to curse him. You may come to my hermitage on the banks of the Ganga”.

Aśokasundarī believed these false words. She went with her. Both of them walked on and at last entered a palace. Then only did she understand that it was the palace of Ḫunda, who assumed his original form and tried to violate her chastity. Aśokasundarī became angry and cursed Ḫunda that he would die at the hands of Nahuṣa, and ran away to Kailāsa.

 очерк Ḫunda was sad for two reasons. On the one hand he did not get Aśokasundarī and on the other hand he had incurred the curse that Nahuṣa would be his slayer. Now what was the way to get out of the trouble? He asked his minister Kampana to take Indumati the wife of Ayus by stealth and bring her to his palace. They decided to destroy Nahuṣa in the womb of Indumati, in case it was not possible to carry her away. They waited for an opportunity.

Ayus was an emperor of righteousness. After the marriage, for a long time he was childless. Once he visited the hermit Dattātreya, in his hermitage. Dattātreya who was the son of Ātri and the most famous and the noblest of all the hermits, was quite senseless and red-eyed because of drinking, and without even the Brahmastūtra, was playing with a young woman, seating her in his lap. His body was besmeared with sandalwood and aloe and adorned with garlands and necklaces of pearl and he was surrounded by many women. The King seeing the divine hermit bowed him with reverence and fear. The moment the hermit saw the King, he sat in deep meditation. This continued for a hundred years, at the end of which period, seeing the devotion of the King, he said, “Oh King! why do you take this trouble. I have left off the customs and manners of Brahmins. I have no Brāhmīnya (Brahminism). I am immersed in liquor, meat and women. So you had better go and serve another Brahmin.”

Ayus refuted all that the hermit said and requested him to bless him that he might get a son. Finally the hermit ordered the King to bring meat and liquor in a skull. The King obeyed him. Dattātreya was pleased at the devotion and willingness to serve as a disciple and told the King that a son would be born to him; that the son would be a worshipper of Devarāthas (Holy baths), that he would not be defeated by devas, asuras, Kinnaras giants, and Kṣatriyas, that he would be the protector of his subjects and that he would be a great scholar in Vedas and Sūtras. Saying this he gave the King a fruit to be given to his wife. The King returned to his palace.

The King gave the fruit to his wife Indumati. She ate it and became pregnant. One night she gave birth to a son. When the servant-maid went out of the room of confinement Ḫunda entered into her body and went in. When all were asleep he took the child and ran to his palace at Kānčanapura. He gave the child to his wife Vipulā and asked her to make a sauce of the child for him. Vipulā gave the child to the servant woman to cook it. With the aid of the cook she hid the child and prepared a sauce with some other flesh. The cook took the child to the hermitage of Vasiṣṭha and placed it at the door of the hermitage, in the night. At dawn Vasiṣṭha came out of the hermitage and seeing the child took it, named it Nahuṣa and brought him up.

The King and his wife Indumati cried for a long time over the loss of the child. At that time Nārada came there and told them that their son would return soon.

Once Nahuṣa was bringing Samitis (butea-fuel) when he heard some devacārānas (heavenly singers) saying among themselves the history of Nahuṣa. Nahuṣa heard it. He told Vasiṣṭha all that he had heard. Vasiṣṭha told him all the stories from the beginning to his being kidnapped by Ḫunda. Nahuṣa was amazed at what he heard. He wanted to kill Ḫunda instantly. So he bowed before Vasiṣṭha and taking bow and arrow went away to kill Ḫunda.

Believing that he had eaten Nahuṣa, Ḫunda approached Aśokasundarī again and told her that he had actually eaten Nahuṣa. Aśokasundarī felt very sad when she heard this. At that time a Kinnara named Vidyyadha and his wife came there. They consoled Aśokasundarī and told her that Nahuṣa was alive. He continued.

“Oh beautiful lady, that great sage will kill Ḫundāsura and marry you, and live with you as an emperor in this world, as Śakra (Indra) in heaven. From Nahuṣa will be born to you a son named Yayāti, who will be righteous, kind and loving towards his subjects and equal to Indra, and a hundred daughters who would be exceedingly beautiful and of very fine character. Then Nahuṣa will go to heaven and become Devendra.

At that time your son Yayāti will be the emperor and will rule his subjects with kindness. Four sons, who would possess prowess and valour, who would be second to none in archery will be born to him. They will be known by the names Turvasu, Puru, Kuru and Yadu. Powerful and mighty sons called Bhoja, Bhima, Andhaka, Kukkura, Vṛṣṇi, Śrutasena, Śrutadhāra and Kāladdaṁśtra will be born to Yadu. They will become famous by the name Yādavas. Several sons will be born to them. Thus the family of Nahuṣa and yourself will increase.”

By this time Nahuṣa had arrived at the spot fully armed and ready to fight Ḫunda, who was killed in the terrible battle which ensued. Nahuṣa married Aśokasundarī in the midst of devas and after the marriage the couple reached the palace of Nahuṣa. (Padma Purāṇa, fifteen chapters from 102).

3) Nahuṣa became Indra.
Become a python by the curse of Agastya. To get remission from the sin of Brahmahatya, incurred by killing Vṛtrāsura, Indra hid himself in a cluster lotuses in the Mānas lake. The devas who were worried due to the absence of Indra, elected Nahuṣa as Indra temporarily. Nahuṣa wanted to get Indrāṇī. Agastya cursed Nahuṣa and changed him to a python. At the sight of the Pândavas he regained his original form and went back to the world of Indra. (For detailed story see under Agastya).

4) Other details.

(i) Nahuṣa had six sons Yati, Yayāti, Sarṇyāti, Ayati, Ayati and Dhrava. (M.B., Ādi Parva, Chapter 75, Stanza 30).

(ii) Nahuṣa was allowed to enter heaven because he made himself pure by performing the sacrifice Vaiṣṇava yajña. (M.B., Vana Parva, Chapter 257, Stanza 5).
Nahiṣṭhāna. A sacred place. River Sarasvatī which flowed westwards changed its course here towards the east so that it (river) might see the sages of Naimiṣārya. There is a story about it in Mahābhārata as follows:

The Yajña conducted by Śaunaka at Naimiṣārya ended in the twelfth year. The Rṣis who came from various parts of the country were put up in āśramas built on the banks of river Sarasvatī. But, many Rṣis did not get accommodation there and they moved eastwards. The River Sarasvatī which felt sorry that the Rṣis could not be accommodated also turned and moved eastwards, and thus afforded space for āśramas to be built on her banks. (Sālya Parva, Chapter 37).

NAIRRTA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 51).

NAIRRTI. A Rākṣasa. His name also occurs in the list of the ancient guards or protectors of the world. (Śaṭṭī Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 52).

NAKŚA. The son born to Pṛthaṇḍa by his wife Ākūṭi. Mention is made in Bhāgavata, Skandha 5, that he had a son named Gaya of his wife Drutī.

NAKŚATRAKALPA. A part of the Atharvaveda. The great hermit Muniṅkaśa had divided the Atharvaveda into five parts called Nakśatrakalpa, Vedakalpa, Samhitākalpa, Aṅgirasakalpa and Śānti Kalpa. Nakṣatra Kalpa deals with the order of worshipping the Nakṣatras (stars), Veda Kalpa deals with the activities of Brahma as a ṛtvik (family priest), the Samhitā Kalpa, the mantras (spells and incantations). In Aṅgiras Kalpa sorcery and enchantment and in Śāntikalpa, Śāntī (Alleviation or cure) of horse, elephant etc. are given. (Vṛṣṇi Purāṇa, Amśa 3, Chapter 6).

NAKŚATRAYOGA. It is ordained in the Purāṇas that alms-giving on each star or day will be rewarded by particular attainments. This is called Nakṣatrayoga. The Nakṣatrayoga of each star is given below:

1) Āśayuk: — Those who give horses and chariots as alms on this day, would be born again in a noble family.

2) Bhaṅga: — If lands and cows are given to Brahmins on this day, one would get a large number of cows and will become famous in heaven.

3) Kṛttikā: — If rice-pudding is given to Brahmins to their satisfaction on this day the giver will attain the prominent worlds after death.

4) Rohiṇī: — If milk-rice and venison mingled with ghee is given to Brahmins on this day, his indebtedness to the manes would end.

5) Mrgaśīras: — (Candra nakṣatra). If a milch-cow is given as alms on this day, one would attain heaven.

6) Ārdra: — If fast is taken and gingly oil is given as alms on this day, the giver will become capable of crossing mountains and trenches.

7) Puravānu: — He who gives bread on this day will be born again in a good family.

8) Puṣya: — He who gives gold as alms on this day will enter the world of bright planets.
9) Aślesha:— He who gives an ox made of silver as alms on this day, will become fearless.
10) Maughä:— He who gives gingerly as alms on this day will become prosperous with cows.
11) Pūrṇaphalagni:— If ghee-rice is given to Brahmans taking fast on this day, the giver would become happy and prosperous.
12) Uttaraphalagni:— He who gives rice of Nivara variety mixed with milk and ghee on this day will be honoured in heaven.
13) Hasta:— If one gives four horses and an elephant as alms on this day, one will attain the world of bliss.
14) Citrä:— He who gives oxen and perfumery as alms on this day, will enter the parks in which celestial maids play.
15) Svātī:— He who gives any sort of wealth as alms on this day will become renowned in the worlds.
16) Viśākha:— He who gives as alms on this day, oxen, milk-cow, grain-box, cart, paddy and diamond will attain heaven.
17) Anurādhā:— He who gives cloth, rice and blanket on this day will be honoured in heaven for a hundred yugas.
18) Jan'étä:— If Brahmans are given yams and greens on this day one could realize one’s wishes.
19) Mīśā:— The manes will be contented, if Brahmans are given roots and nuts on this day.
20) Pūrṇāsādhā:— If Brahmans who are expounders of Vedas are given as alms pots of curd, after observing fast, the givers will take birth again in families with many cows.
21) Uttarāsādhā:— He who gives milk and ghee to wise men will be honoured in heaven.
22) Srawaṇa:— Those who give cloth and rug on this day will enter a white conveyance and reach heaven.
23) Śrāvisthä:— Those who give cattle, cart and cloth on this day will enter heaven.
24) Satābhísak:— Those who give sandalwood and aloe wood on this day, will go to the world of devas (gods).
25) Pūraṇaprosṭhapada:— He who gives coins on this day will reach the world of bliss.
26) Uttaraprosṭhapada:— Those who give mutton on this day will be pleasing the manes.
27) Revati:— He who gives cows which could give potfuls of milk, could reach any world. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 64).

NAKULA

1) Birth. The fourth of the Pāṇḍavas, Mādri, the second of the two wives of Pāṇḍu meditated on the twin gods Asvinidevas, and recited one of the Mantras given to Kunti by the hermit Durvāsas and the two sons Nakula and Sahadeva were born to her from those gods. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 111 that Nakula and Sahadeva were immensely handsome.
2) Story of Nakula till the Bhārata battle. Naming and such other rituals after birth were performed for Nakula also as in the case of the other Pāṇḍava children, by the hermits who lived in Śatārīgī. The ceremony of investiture with the Brahmas string was conducted by Kāśyapa the priest of Vasudeva. The royal hermit Śuka taught Nakula archery and swordplay, in his boyhood. When Pāṇḍu died, Mādri jumped into the funeral pyre and died leaving her two sons with Kunti. After this the hermits of Śatārīgī took Kunti and her five sons to Bhīma at Hastināpura.

At Hastināpura, Nakula learned archery under the great teacher Droṇa. According to the instruction of the teacher, Arjuna had to fight with him (teacher) on the completion of the teaching and during that fight Nakula and Sahadeva were the guards of Arjuna’s chariot-wheels. As Nakula was such an expert in wielding the weapons, he got the name ‘Aṭirathī’. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 138, Stanza 30). When the lac-panelace was completed at Vāraṇavātī, the Pāṇḍavas swiftly to that mansion by the instruction of Dhyārāstra. When the lac-panelace was set fire to, the Pāṇḍavas escaped by way of an underground passage and reached the banks of the Gaṅgā. There Nakula and Sahadeva fell down weary and exhausted. Bhīma carried them on his shoulders. After Baka had been killed, they proceeded to Pāncīlapura, where at the Svayamvara (marriage) Pāṇḍālī became the wife of the Pāṇḍavas. They returned to Hastināpura. A son named Śatānika was born to Nakula by Pāṇḍālī. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 75).

After that Nakula married Kṛṣṇumati, the daughter of the King of Cedi. A son named Niramitra was born to the couple. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 70).

Nakula was then sent to the kingdoms of the west for regional conquest, by Dharmaputra. The wealth of the kingdoms he had conquered, was carried on ten thousand camels to the capital Hastināpura. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 32). After the Rājasīya (imperial consecration) of Yudhiṣṭhira, Nakula went to Gāndhārā to escort Subala and his sons. After the defeat of Yudhiṣṭhira in the game of dice, the Pāṇḍavas went to live in the forest. At that time Nakula put soil all over his body and sat on the ground because of his profound grief. In the forest, once Jāṭāsura carried away Nakula. (See under Jāṭāsura). Nakula killed Kṣemaṅkara, Mahāmaha and Suratha in the forest. At Dvaitavana (a forest) Nakula went to a lake to fetch water and was killed by Dharmadeva who appeared in the form of a crane. At the request of Dharmaputra, who came afterwards, all the Pāṇḍavas including Nakula were brought to life again, by Dharma.

During the pseudonymity of the Pāṇḍavas at the city of Virāta, Nakula assumed the name Granthika. When the period of pseudonymity expired, Nakula fought with the Trigartas on behalf of the King Virāta. On the return of the Pāṇḍavas after the expiry of their forest-life and pseudonymity, when Dur-yodhāna announced that he would give not even a single dot of land to them, Nakula was very eager to decide the matter by a battle. He proposed that the King Druṣada should be made the chief captain of the army.

3) Nakula in the Bhārata battle. The following is the part played by Nakula in the battle of Kurukṣetra.

(i) There was a combat between Nakula and Duśāsana on the first day of the battle. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 15, Stanza 23).
(ii) Nakula fought with Śālva and was wounded. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 83).
(iii) He fought with Śakuni. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 105, Stanza 11).
(iv) He engaged Vikarna in a combat. (M.B. Bhishma Parva, Chapter 110, Stanza 11).
(v) Nakula defeated Vikarna. (M.B. Drota Parva, Chapter 106, Stanza 12).
(vi) Nakula defeated Sakuni. (M.B. Drota Parva, Chapter 169, Stanza 16).
(vii) He defeated Duryodhana in a fight. (M.B. Drota Parva, Chapter 187, Stanza 50).
(viii) Nakula killed the King of Apta. (M.B. Kartha Parva, Chapter 22, Stanza 13).
(ix) He retreated on being defeated by Kartha. (M.B. Kartha Parva, Chapter 24, Stanza 45).
(x) He fought with Drota. (M.B. Kartha Parva, Chapter 48, Stanza 34).
(xi) Nakula fought with Duryodhana again and was wounded. (M.B. Kartha Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 7).
(xii) Nakula fought with Vrishasena. (M.B. Kartha Parva, Chapter 61, Stanza 36).
(xiii) Nakula killed Caturasena, Satyasena and Sušena the sons of Kartha. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 10).

4) After the Bhārata-battle, (i) After the battle, Nakula explained to Yudhisthira, the duties of a householder. (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 12).
(ii) On the instruction of Yudhisthira, Nakula became the chief captain of the army. (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 41, Stanza 12).
(iii) After the battle, the palace of Durmañaga the son of Dhrátarāstra was given to Nakula by Dharma-putra. (M.B. Santi Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 10).
(iv) After the battle when Yudhisthira performed the horse sacrifice, Nakula and Bhimasena stood as protectors of the city. (M.B. Asvamedha Parva, Chapter 72, Stanza 19).
(v) Nakula went to the forest to see Kunti, who was engaged in penance during her latter days. (M.B. Āśramavāsi a Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 8).

5) The end. At the ‘great departure’ (Mahāprasthaṇa) of the Pāṇḍavas, Nakula died in the forest. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Svaragāroha Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 9, that after death Nakula and Sahadeva attained the position of the Āsvinīdevas.
6) The name Nakula. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vīraṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 25 that the name ‘Nakula’ was given to him because there were none more handsome than he in the family (Kula) of the Pāṇḍavas.

NĀKULA. An ancient country in India. (M.B. Bhishma Parva, Chapter 50, Stanza 53).

NALĀ. Nala the King of Nīsadha. (As the history of Nala is included under the word Damayanti, some points which are not given there, are mentioned here).
(i) Nala was the son of Vīrasena, the King of Nīsadha. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 52, Stanza 56).
(ii) Once the hermit Bhadaśa came to the Palace of Vīrasena and praised Nala a good deal and spoke highly of his good qualities to his father. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 2).
(iii) When Nala was playing in the garden some swans with golden wings flew to the lake in the garden. Nala caught hold of one of them just for fun. The swan said to Nala, “If you will let me off, I will tell Damayanti about you.” So it was released. As a reward it flew to the country of Vidarba and persuaded Damayanti to love Nala. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 53).
(iv) After death Nala sat in the aerial chariot of Indra and witnessed the battle fought by Arjuna with the Kauravas at the end of the forest life of the Pāṇḍavas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 10).
(v) Previous birth. Two different stories are narrated about the previous birth of Nala.
1) In the previous birth Nala was a Vaiśya of the city of Pippala in the Gauḍa country. This Vaiśya became abstinent and after leaving off everything he had, he went to the forest. There, according to the advice of a hermit he undertook the fast of Gaṇeśa. As a result he was born as Nala in the next birth. (Gaṇeśa Purana).
2) Nala and Damayanti were foresters named Ahuka and Ahukā. Siva was pleased with the couple. So they were born in royal families in the next birth, and Siva in the form of a swan, helped them. (Siva Purana, Satarudra Sambhāti).

NALA II. An ancient hermit. In Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 17, it is mentioned that this hermit lives in the palace of Indra.

NALA III. A monkey. This monkey was the son of Viśvakarmā. Śrī Rāma and the monkey-army went to redeem Sitā from Lanka and reached the sea-shore. A bridge had to be made to cross the sea and reach Lanka. Immediately Varuṇa the King of the seas appeared there and said, “Nala who is in the monkey-army, is the son of Viśvakarmā. His father had given him a blessing that he would become as expert an architect as his father. So let the construction of the bridge be commenced under his supervision.” Accordingly under the supervision of Nala, Rāma’s bridge of rock was completed and Śrī Rāma and the army of monkeys reached Lanka by walking over this bridge (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Sarga 22).
In the battle between Rāma and Rāvana, Nala fought with the giant Tūṇḍaka. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 9).

NALAKŪBARA. A son of Vaśravāna. He had a brother called Manigriva.
1) Cursing Rāvana. It was the time when Rāvana was ruling over Lanka and terrorising the fourteen worlds. As he was carrying on his conquests, once he came to a round rock near Kailāsa. It was night. Rambha had fixed a rendezvous near the rock that night with Nalakūbara. The full moon shone bright. The radiance of the moon rendered Kailāsa and its vicinity most beautiful. Filled with passion Rāvana could not sleep at all. In the silence of that calm night he heard the tinkling of bangles. Rāvana opened his twenty eyes and looked in that direction. He saw an extremely beautiful woman clad in splendid garments and ornaments going along the way. He ran to her and caught hold of her hand. She was flurried and confused at his sudden appearance. So she said, “Oh Lord ! I am the wife of Nalakūbara who is the son of your brother Kubera. My name is Rambha. Your brother’s son is your son too. So don’t do any harm to your son’s wife.” But Rāvana did not pay any heed to her words. He lifted her up and placed her on the round rock and raped her. Before dawn Rambha, who had become like the lake of lotus trodden by a mad elephant, went to Nalakūbara and told him everything. Nalakūbara became very angry and cursed Rāvana. “You, who have become blind with lust, shall not touch a woman who does not reciprocate your love. If you do so your head will be split into seven pieces.” It was because of this curse that Rāvana did not touch Sītā though she was kept in his harem. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa; Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 28).

2) Another wife of Nalakūṭā. It is mentioned in Kāthāsūriśāgara, Madanamaicukālambaka, Taranāga 3, that of the two daughters, Svyamprabha and Somaprabhā of Maya, Somaprabhā was the wife of Nalakūṭā.

3) The curse of Nārada. Nalakūṭā and Maṅigrīvā, the sons of Kubera were playing with celestial maidsens in the Ganges in nudity, when Nārada came by that way. The hermit was returning after visiting Viṣṇu. The moment the celestial maidsens saw Nārada they put on their clothes and stood aside bowing before Nārada. Nalakūṭā and Maṅigrīvā did not see Nārada. They ran here and there, playing with no clothes on. At this, Nārada got angry and cursed them that they would become two “Marutu” trees (Terminalia alata) on the earth. They became very sad and requested for liberation from the curse. Nārada told them they would get liberation from the curse when they saw Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the incarnation of Viṣṇu. Accordingly Nalakūṭā and his brother took birth near the house of Nandagopa in Ambāḍi, as double “Marutu” trees. It was the period of the childhood of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa swallowed mud, and Yaśodā tied him to a mortar. The child dropped the mortar to the Marutu tree and got himself between the double trees. Immediately the trees regained the original forms of Nalakūṭā and Maṅigrīvā. They paid homage to Śrī Kṛṣṇa, who blessed them, and both of them returned to Vaiśravaṇapuri. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

NALASETU. The rock bridge built by the monkey named Nala. The bridge over which Śrī Rāma and the monkey-army crossed the sea to Lāṅkā was built under the supervision of Nala and so the bridge came to be called Nalasetu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 283, Stanza 45).

NALATANTU. One of Viśvāmitra’s sons who were expounders of Brahmaṇ. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 58).

NALAYANI. See under Pāṇcālī.

NĀLAYIRAPRABANDHAM. See under Nammālvār.

NALINI. A branch of the Ganges. When the heavenly Gaṅgā came down to the earth as a result of the penance of Bhagirathā, Śiva received it on his head. It is seen in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Sarga 43, that when the Gaṅgā fell dragged from the head of Śiva it split into seven river-arms called Hīḍāṇi, Pāvani, Nalini, Sucaṇās, Sītā, Sindu and Gaṅgā. The Ganges which flows through North India is one of these seven river-arms.

NALOPĀKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub Parva (section) of Mahābhārata. This sub section consists of Vana Parva, Chapters 52 to 79.

NĀLU (FOUR). Various things mentioned in the Purāṇas having some association with four (Nālu) are given below:—

1) Four distances. In the case of an elephant one must keep a distance of 1000 kols, a horse 100 kols, horned animals 10 kols, evil people, unli mited number of kols. (1 kol is equal to a metre).

2) Four Addhikārīs. Manda (the very ordinary), Madhyama (medium standard), Utparna (best) and Uttarottama (the very best).

3) Four Anuvandhas. (Factors). In philosophy they are four factors called Viṣaya (subject matter), Prayojana (purpose), Sambandha (relationship between factors) and Adhikārī (the deserving or eligible person).

4) Four Antahkāranaś (Internal organs). Manas (mind), Buddhi (intellect), Cittam (heart) and Ahaṅkāra (ego). Imagination is the function of the mind; the decision of that of Buddhi; to retain knowledge gained in orderly form is the function of Cittam and self-respect of that of Ahaṅkāra.

5) Four Anuvāyas. Satya (truthfulness), Dama (Self control), Ārjavam (straightforwardness) and Anṛṣāmyam (not to be cruel).

6) Anuvadat Parva. Yajña (sacrificial offerings), Īśā (alms-giving, gifts), Adhyāyana (learning) and Tapas (penance).

7) Four Āpātriκāranaś. (Not suited to the particular station of place in life). Brahmins are forbidden from receiving bribes, engaging in trades, service of Śūdras and uttering lies.

8) Adbhīnas Parva. (Acting). Āṅgīkām (where gestures and bodily actions are used to convey ideas). Sātvika Subjective feelings expressed by periphrasis etc. Āhāryām (excessive), Vācikām (by words of mouth).

9) Adbhīnasvīyasya Parva. (Subjects for practice and training). Vināya (humility), Damana (control of mind), Indriyanirgraha (controlling the sense-organs) and Bāhūtadāyā (kindness).

10) Ampat Parva. (Nectar). Good wife, talk of children, present from King and honourable food.

11) Alaṅkāras Parva. (Ornaments). For the stars, Moon; for women, husband; for earth, King and for all, education (learning).

12) Alaṅkārasadāhanas Parva. According to rhetorics, Aṭāsaya (excellence), Sāmaya (similar), Vāstavam (matter of fact, as it is) and Śēga (one word with two meanings) are the Alaṅkārasadāhanas.

13) Avasatās Parva. (States, conditions).

A. Śaivaṃ (childhood), Kaumāram (boyhood), Yauvanam (youth) and Vārdhakām (old age).

B. Jāgrat (wakefulness), Svapnam (dream), Suṣupti (sleep) and Tūrīyam (being one with the supreme soul).

14) Astraprāyogikalas Parva. (Objects of shooting arrows). Siṁham, Calam, Calaṃla, Dvaya-calam. When the archer and the object of his shooting remain motionless the object is called Siṁham. When the object is moving but the archer is not, the object is called Calam. When the case is just the opposite of the above it is Calaṃla. When both are moving it is called Dvaya-calam.

15) Ākhyātākhyānas Parva. (Factors of the novel). Kathābandha (plot or theme), Prāparakātanam (exposition of characters), Rasapuṣṭi (sentiment) and Gadāyaritī (prose style).

16) Ākhyānams Parva. (Ornaments). For man, shape or form; for form, quality or merit; for quality, knowledge or wisdom and for wisdom, patience or forbearance.

18) Āvaraṇas Four. (Covering, Protection). For earth the sea, for house the compound wall, for country the King, for women chastity.
19) Āhrādaśīs Four. (Food etc.). Āhāra (food), Nīhāra (Evacuation), Maithuna (sexual act), Nīdrā (sleep).
20) Āhāramastus Four. (Edibles). Khādyam (eaten by munching with teeth and chewing), Peyam (that which is drunk), Lehyam (licked with the tongue) and Bhōyam (that which is not included in the above three).
21) R̄ṣas Four. (Obligations, debts). Debts due to Devas, R̄ṣis, Pīrs and Men. One pays back one’s debts to Devas by performing yajñās. By Svādhīyāya (self-study) and tapas one pays the debt due to R̄ṣis; by procreation of children and libation offerings that due to Pīrs and by truthfulness, hospitality etc. that due to people are repaid.
22) R̄tuks Four. Adhavaryu, Udātā, Hotā and Brahmade. The first of the four should be an erudite scholar in Yajurveda, the second in Sāmaveda, the third in Atharvaveda and the fourth in all the four Vedas.
23) Kavīs Four. (Poets). He who boasts about himself in secret is called Udātta; he who cries down others and indulges in self-praise is known as Uddhata; he who proclaims others’ merits is called Prandha and he who shows humility is called Vinītā.
24) Kukktuṣṭagunas Four. (Traits of the Cock). To rise early in the morning, to struggle for existence, to share whatever is got with relations and to work and earn one’s own food—these are the qualities of the Cock.
A. Nectar even from poison, good advice even from boys, good action even from enemies and noble and chaste brides even from low families are to be welcomed.
B. Literacy (learning of alphabets) should be accepted from brahmins, food from mother, pan from wife and bangles from King.
26) Caturāṇgas Four. Elephant, Horse, Chariot and Infantry.
27) Āsramas Four. Brahmacarya (student life), Gārhaveśa (married life), Vānaprastha (anchorite, forest-life) and Sannyāsa (Renunciation).
29) Vargas Four. Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa.
30) Uḍāyas Four. (Expedients). Sāma, Dāna, Bheda, Daṇḍa.
31) Cikitsāpādas Four. (Four elements in the treatment of patients). Vaidya (doctor), Rōgini (patient), Aṣṭādhdna (medicine) and Paričārika (attendant).
32) Jātis Four. (Castes). Pārvatikas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiṣya and Śūdra.
33) Tyājas Four. (Things to be shunned).
A. Horse returning after bath, elephant in its rut, love-lorn bull and wicked scholar.
B. Evil action, unhealthy region, evil wife and bad foods.
34) Dānas Four. (Gifts). Gifts daily given without expecting return or result is Niyadāna. Gifts given to scholars (pundits) for the sake of alleviation of or reduction from sin is Naimittikādāna. Gifts given for welfare and prosperity is Kāmyakadāna. Offering made to propitiate God is Vimala.
35) Nāyakas Four. (Heroes) Dhīrodāta, Dhīroddhata, Dhīralalita, Dhīrasánta.
36) Nāris Four. (Women). Padmini, Śākhini, Cirtini, and Hastini.
37) Pramāṇas Four. (Means of valid knowledge), Pratyaksa, Anumāna, Upamāna, and Šābda.
38) Mokṣas Four. (Salvation). Śālokya, Śāmipyā, Śārūpya and Śāuyuja.
39) Four Tūgas. Jñānayoga, Bhaktiyoga, Karmayoga and Dhyānayoga.
40) Four Satrūs (Enemies). Mother leading an immortal life; father who incurs debt; foolish son and beautiful wife.
41) Four Śāstras. Nitiśastra, Tarkaśastra, Manusmṛti and Kāmaśastra.
NAMASYU. A King of Yayāti’s family. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 9).
NAMBUTIRIS. (Malayāla Brahmins). Logan says that the Nambūtiris were the batch of Aryans that settled down in Kerala after the Nairs. The historians like Śaṅkunįi Menon and others have stated that the Nambūtiris had come to Kerala from the banks of the rivers Godāvari, Narmadā and Kāveri. Famous historians have inferred that the progress of the Aryans to the south took place between 1000 and 325 B.C. But Thomas Fawkes thinks that there were Nambūtiri priests and hermits in South India, during the time of Buddha.
N.K. Datta, the author of the book “Aryanisation of India”, is of opinion that during the time of the invasion of Alexander, the Aryans had spread all over India and Ceylon. Thus historians have not yet come to an agreement as to the correct period of the exodus of the Aryans to the south. Anyhow in the Geography of Ptolemy mention is made that half a degree east to Taibis there was a place called Brahmagāra. It may be assumed that Brahmagāra may be Brahmagāra (settlement of Brahmins). It has been decided definitely that the period of Ptolemy was A.D. 2nd century, and in that case the Brahmins must have settled in the south before that period.
Though the period of the ‘Saṅgha poets and their works’ has been assessed differently by different scholars, the majority have fixed it as the first few centuries of A.D.
In these Saṅgha poems the gods of the Aryans are praised. The gods Sūrya (the Sun), Candra (the Moon), Varuṇa (god of water), Baladeva (Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s elder brother) and Viṣṇu (Supreme God) are specially mentioned in ‘Cīlapadikārā’. The Saṅgha work ‘Purānanūra’ is an encomium to the purity of the Vedas and Agnihotra Brahmins (Brahmins who maintain the holy fire by burnt offering). In those days the King carried on the administration of the country with the advice of Brahmins. Economics, Grammar and law were taught in royal palaces. Paričākṣara and such other spells, reading of the scriptures, Aryan ways of marriage, Recitations of Purānic stories etc. were prevalent in those days.
Manimekhalā is stated to have reached the capital of the Cera King and learned Vedas and Sāṁkhya doctrines (one of the six systems of Indian Philosophy dealing with evolution) from the prominent teachers here. The dictation of both the works ‘Cīlapadikāra’ and ‘Manimekhalā’ is, to a certain extent, indebted to Sanskrit. Many of the Sanskrit poetic traditions are used in these poems. When these proofs are taken into account, it is not wrong to presume that in the period from 1st century to 5th century A.D. Aryan civilization prevailed in south India. If, during this period, Aryan civilization had taken root to such an extent in south India, the advent of the Aryans to south India must have taken place at least two or three centuries prior to this period. The Nambūtiris of Kerala are called Malayāla Brahmins. Between them and the Brahmins of other countries there are differences in manners and customs. They are given below:—

NĀLU (FOUR)

1) The Brahmins of other parts of India do not perform agnihoτa rites (maintaining the holy fire by burnt offering) so elaborately as the Malayāla Brahmins.

2) Among the sixteen purificatory rites, Agnisvikāra (or taking up of sacrificial fire) is an important item in Malabar. From Vedic period Agni (Fire) had become a prominent God. Most of the verses in Rigveda are concerned with fire. The attachment of the Brahmins of Kerala to fire shows their antiquity.

3) Much importance is attached to the learning of scriptures and priest-hood in Kerala. There were 18 Mathas and residential institutions in Kerala for giving religious education.

4) The peculiar type of recitation of the Vedas by the Malayāla Brahmins and the accompanying gestures of their hands and the movements of the head at the time of recitation are considered by them to be ancient. Even today certain sounds are produced by them in the Vedic way. (For instance Samrāl—Samrāṭ; Vāsār—Vasat; Īḍe—Ile etc.)

5) In Malabar there is a customary atonement or expiation called Vṛṭayastoma for those Brahmin boys who had not undergone investiture with the sacred thread within the stipulated time. This shows the stress laid on the need of religious education.

6) The custom that all the male members of the family except the family chief should be engaged in ‘Snātakavṛti’ (should remain celibates even after education) is prevalent only in Malabar.

7) Much importance is attached to evening worship in Kerala. At that time the Vedic gods are not hailed. But Brahmins of other places do not seem to attach so much importance to this practice.

8) The Brahmins outside Kerala repeat the mantras uttered by the priest and perform the functions, at the time of meditation and worship. But in Kerala for meditation and worship with or without incantations a priest is not necessary. This indicates the practice in vogue during Vedic period before the priestly class became predominant.

9) The Nambūtiris have recognized only three Vedas.

10) The Kerala Brahmins wear only one sacred thread. The Nambūtiris became predominant in Kerala and began to have a hand in the various spheres of activities. Thus the Aryan civilization shook the customary faith and religion of Kerala from top to bottom and the Aryan religion hoisted its flag of victory here. Aryan literature also found its way into Kerala. The authors and scholars in Kerala began to imitate it. The Nambūtiris erected temples in Kerala with the help of local chieftains. The sounds of alphabets, sentence pattern, grammar, poetic tradition etc. of Malayālam language underwent a thorough change. Sanskrit education spread far and wide. They spread Aryan civilization through ‘Kūṭtu and Kūṭiyāṭham (Narration of mythological stories with gestures etc. and collective dance) Pāṭhaka and Saṅghakkali (Musical lectures and dramatic performances), in connection with festivals in the temples. They absorbed many of the customs and manners of Kerala. The Nambūtiris who had adopted priest-hood as their career had amassed wealth and landed property in the capacities of priests and authorities of the temples. Some of them became Kings (e.g. King of Iḍappally, King of Campakaśeri etc.). They kept up the contact with the people of the locality by means of morganatic marriages and made their positions secure. Thus these people, though a small minority, were able to hold sway over the people of Kerala for a long time.

NAMMĀLVĀR. The first of the twelve great Ālvārs. The Saivite devotees of South India are called Nāyānārs and the Vaiṣṇavite devotees, Ālvārs. The word Ālvār means, a devotee of God. The Vaiṣṇava religion says that the twelve Ālvārs are the incarnations of Ādiśeṣa and Garuḍa the followers and the emblazoned deities of the Conch and the discus the weapons of Viṣṇu. It is mentioned in Śrīmad Bhāgavata that divine persons who are followers of Viṣṇu will incarnate on the earth in Kaliyuga and that their native places will be the banks of the holy rivers in Drāvīḍa such as Tāmrarpāṇi, Kṛṭmāḷā (Vaigai), Payasvinī (Pāpanāśini) and Kāvery. It is stated about these divine persons in Viṣṇumāhātya that they would take birth in any caste and compose Drāvīḍa songs and thereby propagate lofty truths. The collection of Drāvīḍa songs thus composed by the Ālvārs is called ‘Dīvya Prabandha’ (Divine Composition).

There are four thousand songs in four parts in the Divine composition and hence it has the name Nālāyira Prabandham ‘Four thousand composition’. The theme of the 1st and 2nd thousands is a secret known as ‘Tirumantra’ (the divine spell). The third thousand is concerned with the “Caramašloka” (the verse of death) and in the fourth “Dvayamanastra” is dealt with. The Tirumantra (the divine spell) is the collection of of three words Om, nāmaḥ and Nārāyaṇa. ‘Om’ and nāmaḥ are explained in the first thousand and the word Nārāyaṇa in the second thousand of the composition. The Caramašloka (the verse of death) is the last utterance of the songster-priest. It is a propagation of the theme of seeking refuge. The individual soul has to seek refuge under the universal soul, unconditionally. This is what is called ‘Prapatti’. Dvaya-mantra (the two fold mantra) deals with the aim and the ways for the realisation of that aim. It would be possible only by the help of Lakṣmi Bhagavati (the goddess Lakṣmi). It is a verse of only two lines. The first and foremost among the Ālvārs is Nammālvār. ’Tiruvāyvomoli’ is his work. It had been predicted in Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa that at the beginning of Kaliyuga. Viṣṇu Senāni named Viśvakṣa would incarnate as Nammālvār and that he would reinstate the Vaiṣṇavite religion. It is hinted in Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa that Nammālvār would incarnate in Śrīnagar (Tirunagari) on the banks of river Tāmrarpāṇi in the Kingdom of Pāṇḍya. As was fore-told Nammālvār was born in Tirunagari. The present name of this place is ‘Ālvār tirunagari’.

There is a traditional lore about the birth of Nammālvār. There was a ruling chief named Kārīyār in Tirunagari. Udayamaṉkāyār was his wife. The couple once went to the Vaiṣṇavite temple near Mahendra mountain known as Tirukkurukkutchi temple and prayed to the god consecrated there called Nambi, for a son. Reply was given through the priests that the god himself would take birth as their son. Accordingly Udayamān-kayār gave birth to Nammālvar. Scholars say that the birth of Nammālvar was on the 43rd day of Kāliyuga that is in B.C.3102.

Nammālvar had another name Parāṅkuṣa. Some believe that he was the incarnation of portions of Seneśa and the jewel Kaustubha. Some say that there are portions of Mahāviṣṇu, Paņcayudha, Ādiseśa and Seneśa in Nammālvar. The Vaśiṇavites have given Nammālvar a lofty place. The infant born to Kāriyār and Udayamān-kayār was not an ordinary one. Generally infants at birth are covered with a case of air called ‘Saṭha’. Because of this they lose the memory of previous birth. But Nammālvar had no Saṭha. So he got the name ‘Saṭhakopa’. The parents were amazed at the infant which lay still without beating its legs, and crying or sucking its mother’s breasts. The bright infant was taken to the Vaśiṇavite temple on the twelfth day. Because of his difference from ordinary infants he was named Māra. A golden cradle studded with jewels was hung on the branch of a tamarind tree and laying the child in it, the parents went home. That tamarind tree still stands there. The devotees believe that that tree also is a portion of Ādiseśa.

Nammālvar spent sixteen years under the tamarind tree without opening the eyes or uttering a single word. In the sixteenth year a wise man who could understand the dignity of Nammālvar came there. The person was the Madhura Kavi Ālvār. After this Nammālvar sat under the tamarind tree and sang songs of praise of Nārāyaṇa. Madhura Kavi set tunes for them and sang them. Everybody who heard them was struck with wonder and stood still. Nammālvar spent his days under the tamarind tree in meditation and contemplation. At the age of 35 he entered heaven.

NAMUCI I. A fierce Rākṣasa (giant). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 22, that this giant was the son of Prajapati Kaśyapa by his wife Danu. This fierce giant was killed by Indra. There is a story in the Purāṇas describing how Namuci was killed.

Under the leadership of Namuci a great army of the giants invaded the realm of the gods. Indra came with an army of devas. Though the giants were defeated in the battle Indra was not able to kill Namuci. To save himself from the attack of Indra, Namuci got into the radiance of the Sun and hid himself there. Indra found him out and made a treaty with him, the conditions of which were as said by Indra:

“Oh, noble giant, I will not kill you by wet thing or dry thing, in the night or in the day. What I say is true.”

According to this treaty it became impossible for Indra to kill Namuci either with wet things or with dry things and either in the day time or in the night. Only when Indra had agreed to these conditions did Namuci come out.

The battle continued and Indra drove away Śumbha and Niṅumba the elder brothers of Namuci, who went to Pātaľa. Indra ran after Namuci and in the evening Indra found him hiding on the sea shore and killed him with the foam of the sea. As Indra had violated the condition of the treaty the severed head of Namuci followed Indra. With this Indra incurred the sin of Brahma-hatyā (killing a Brahmin). To get remission from this sin Indra approached Brahma. He was advised to bathe in Aruṇāśanga and doing so Indra got remission of his sin. From that day onwards Aruṇāśanga became a holy bath (tīrtha). (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40).

NAMUCI II. An army-captain of Hiraṇyākṣa. In the battle with Indra, Namuci made him unconscious and the elephant Airāvata thrust its tusks on the ground. After that by his magic and sorcery he created many creatures. But Viṣṇu destroyed all those creatures with his discus Sudarṣana. At last Indra killed Namuci. (Padma Purāṇa, Śṛṇtikhandha).

NAMUCI III. Another valiant captain of Hiraṇyākṣa. He sent five arrows against Indra in a fierce battle. But Indra cut all the five arrows in the mid-way. Then by his magic and sorcery Namuci spread darkness everywhere. Indra defeated that strategy also. Then Namuci dashed forward and taking hold of the tusks of Airāvata shook Indra down. Indra stood up and cut off the head of Namuci with his sword. (Padma Purāṇa, Śṛṇtikhandha).

NANAGĀBHU. A King of the family of Yaśā. (Bhāgavata Skandha 9).

NANDA I. (NANDAKA). See under Nandagopa.

NANDA II. (See under Vararuci).

NANDA III. A son of Dhiṛarāṣṭra. In the battle of Kurukṣetra, Bhīmasena killed him. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 19).

NANDA IV. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa (Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 12).

NANDA V. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 64).

NANDA VI. A synonym of Bhagavān Viṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 69).

NANDA I. Wife of Harṣa the third son of Dharmadeva. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Stanza 33).

NANDA II. A river. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 214, Stanza 6, that while Arjuna had been engaged in a pilgrimage visiting the holy places in the east, he reached the banks of the rivers Nandā and Aparanandā. Many of the scholars are of opinion that this river flowed through the eastern side of the forest Naimiṣaranya. When the hermit Dhaumya talks about the holy places of the east to Yudhīṣṭhira, he says as follows about the river Nandā. “The beautiful mountain ‘Kundoda’ is in place which abounds in roots, fruits and water. Nala the King of Nisadha, who was weary of thirst rested here. There is a holy temple here called Devavana which is thronged by hermits. Near this temple there is a mountain through the top of which, two rivers Bāhūdā and Nandā flow.” (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 87).

During the time of the forest life of the Pāṇḍavas, Yudhīṣṭhira travelled with the hermit Lomaśa, through the basin of the rivers Nandā, and Aparanandā. During the Paurāṇic times some deities had lived in the basin of the river Nandā, and men began to come there to visit the deities. The devas (gods) did not like this and so they rendered the place inaccessible to men. From that time onwards the river basin of Nandā and the mount Hanumān have become prohibited area for human beings. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 110).

NANDABHAĐRA. A righteous Vaśya. Having been childless for a long time this Vaśya, who was an ardent devotee of God Kapileśvara, got a son in his old age. But he died after his marriage. With this calamity NANDABHADRA became a man of abstinence and began to try to acquire spiritual knowledge. After a while a seven-year-old boy appeared before the Vaśya and quenched his thirst for spiritual knowledge. Later with meditation on Śiva and the Sun, NANDABHADRA attained heaven. (Skanda Purāṇa, Chapters 1, 2 and 46).

NANDAGOPA. Foster-father of Śri Kṛṣṇa.

1) Previous birth. There are two stories about the previous birth of NANDAGOPA.

(i) Drona, one of the eight Vasus and his wife DHārā once committed a mistake, not becoming the gods. BRAHMĀ who found it out, cursed the couple to take birth in the family of cowherds. Drona and DHārā prayed for remission. BRAHMĀ told them that MAHĀVĪṢṆU would incarnate as their son as ŚRI Kṛṣṇa and that after that birth they would be liberated from the curse. Accordingly Drona took birth as NANDAGOPA and DHārā as Yaśodā. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

(ii) Once a King named Candrasena sat in the Mahākāla temple in Ujjayini to perform penance. Śiva was pleased at his penance and gave him a jewel. That brilliant precious stone fulfilled all his desires. Other kings heard about this jewel and came to war to take possession of the jewel. The King came and took refuge in the temple.

At this time a son named ŚRI KRŚNA was born to a cowherdess in Ujjayini. He was god-fearing since childhood. ŚRI KRŚNA came to Mahākāla temple and sat in worship and meditation and attained the goodwill of Śiva. The Kings who came in chase of Candrasena could not approach the temple because of the unearthly brilliance that radiated from ŚRI KRŚNA. Not knowing the reason the kings stood staring and HDDūnān instantly appeared before them and said: "Hear this, oh Kings! ŚRĪ KRŚNA is not a mere cowherd boy. The God is pleased with him. In his eighth birth from today he will be born in Ambādī under the name NANDAGOPA. Then MAHĀVĪṢṆU will incarnate as the son of NANDAGOPA under the name: ŚRI KRŚNA." NANDAGOPA was the eighth birth of this ŚRIKRŚNA. (Śiva Purāṇa, Saniprasamāthāmya).

2) VARUNA Carried Away NANDAGOPA. While ŚRI KRŚNA was living in Ambādī as the foster-son of NANDAGOPA, NANDAGOPA went to bathe in the river Yamunā. While he was taking a dip under the water a servant of VARUNA carried him away to the realm of VARUNA. As NANDAGOPA disappeared the people of Ambādī ran here and there in grief. At last ŚRI KRŚNA jumped into the water and reached the city of VARUNA, who praised ŚRI KRŚNA and said that it was to see ŚRI KRŚNA that he had carried NANDAGOPA away and requested for pardon. ŚRI KRŚNA pardoned VARUNA and brought NANDAGOPA to Ambādī. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

3) NANDAGOPA Swallowed by a Great Mountain-Snake. (See under KRŚNA, Para 21).

NANDAKA I. A tabor. Whenever the flag of Yudhisthira was hoisted, two NANDAKA and two NANDANA used to be beaten. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 27, Stanza 7).

NANDAKA II. A sword of MAHĀVĪṢṆU. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 147, Stanza 15).

There is a story explaining how MAHĀVĪṢṆU came by this sword NANDAKA. In days of old BRAHMĀ performed a sacrifice on the banks of the heavenly Gāṅgā on a peak of mount Mahāmeru. While BRAHMĀ was sitting in deep meditation in the sacrifice LOHĀSURA was seen coming to cause disturbance to the sacrifice. Immediately a male being came into existence from the meditation of BRAHMĀ. The male being paid homage to BRAHMĀ and the devas (gods) became glad and they encouraged the male being. Because the gods greeted the male one, he was changed to a sword called NANDAKA (that which is greeted or thanked for). That sword was received by MAHĀVĪṢṆU at the request of the gods. When MAHĀVĪṢṆU slowly took it LOHĀSURA came near. He was an asura of blue complexion, with thousand hands of adamantine fists. By wielding his club he drove away the gods. MAHĀVĪṢṆU cut down his limbs one by one and those organs became metals by the touch of the sword. Then MAHĀVĪṢṆU killed the asura. Then MAHĀVĪṢṆU granted NANDAKA a pure body and various boons. Afterwards NANDAKA became the deity of weapons on the earth. Thus BRAHMĀ, who got rid of the disturbance by the aid of VIŚṆU, completed the sacrifice. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 245).

NANDANA I. Son of Hiranyakāśipu. NANDANA had been ruling over the Śveta island had obtained boons from Śiva and had become invincible. He ruled over the kingdom for ten thousand years and then attained KAILĀSA and became a gaṇa of ŚIVA. (Śiva Purāṇa, Uttara Khanda, Chapter 2).

NANDANA II. One of the two attendants given to SKANDADEVA by AŚVĪṆIKUMĀRAS. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 44).

NANDANA III. A divine park in the world of devas (gods). Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 45, that those who had brought the organs of senses under control and who had not killed any living being, would be permitted to enter this park.

NANDĀŚRĀMA. A holy place. AMBA, the daughter of the King of Kāśī once performed penance in this holy place. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 186, Stanza 26).

NANDI I. A Deva Gandharva. He was present at the birth celebration of ARJUNA. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 56).

NANDI II. One of the divine attendants of ŚIVA. (See under NANDIKEŚA).

NANDIGRĀMA. It is stated in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Ayodhyākanda that when ŚRI RĀMA had been leading forest life, BHARATA lived in NANDIGRĀMA for twelve years worshipping the sandals of ŚRI RĀMA. This NANDIGRĀMA is situated nearly fourteen miles away from Ayodhyā. (Faizabad).

NANDIKEŚA. The chief of the Bhūta Gaṇas (the attendants of Śiva). For the story of how NANDIKEŚA once took the form of a monkey and cursed RĀVANĀ, see under RĀVANĀ.

NANDIKUNDA. A holy place. In Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 60, it is mentioned that the sin incurred by causing abortion, will be washed away by taking a bath in this holy place.

NANDINĪ I. A cow of the world of the gods (Devas). (See under Kāmadhēnu).
NANDINI II. A holy place. In this place there is a well esteemed by the gods. It is mentioned in Mahabharata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 15, that those who bathe in this holy well will obtain the fruits of Naramedhayāja (human sacrifice).

NANDISENA. One of the four attendants given to Subrahmanya by Brahmadev. Lohitākṣa, Ghantākarna and Kumudamāli were the other three attendants. (M.B. Sālya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 24).

NANDĪSVARA. See under Nandikesa.

NANDIVARDHANA I. The name of the conch of Sātyaki. (M.B. Sālya Parva, Chapter 61, Daśānātayāpaṭha).

NANDIVARDHANA II. A King of the solar dynasty. He was the son of Virada and the father of Suketu. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

NANDIVEGA. A Kṣatriya family of ancient India. A famous King named Sāma was born in this family. (M.B. Udyogya Parva, Chapter 74, Stanza 17).

NAPTA. An eternal god concerned with offerings to the Manes. (M.B. Anuvāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Stanza 37).

NAPUMSAKA. (EUNUCH). Mention is made in Brāhmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 48, that the semen introduced into the womb of the woman by the man at the time of coition, will get mixed with the blood in the womb, and that the issue will be male, female or eunuch according to the proportion of the mixture. In the mixture of semen and blood, if blood exceeds semen the issue will be female and if semen exceeds, it will be male child and if both are equal the child will be a eunuch.

NARA I. A hermit of divine power.

1) Birth. Brāhmaṇ created Dharma-deva from his breast. Truthful and righteous Dharma married ten daughters of Daśa. Several sons were born to Dharma of his ten wives. But foremost among them were Hāri, Kṛṣṇa, Nara and Nārāyaṇa. Hāri and Kṛṣṇa became great yogins and Nara and Nārāyaṇa became great hermits of penance. The Nara-Nārāyaṇas lived in the holy Ashram of Badarikāśrama in the vicinity of the Himālayas for a thousand years performing penance to Brāhmaṇa. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 4).

2) Giving birth to Uraśi. See under Urvā i, Para 1.

3) Keeper of Amṛta (Ambrosia). The Devas (gods) and the asuras (demons) together churned the sea of milk and obtained Ambrosia (the celestial nectar of immortality). Mahāviṣṇu took the guise of a fascinating woman and obtained the Amṛta by stealth from the asuras and gave it to the devas. The asuras waged a terrible war with the devas. At that time, at the request of the devas, Nara and Nārāyaṇa took sides with the devas, and fought against the asuras as a consequence of which the asuras were defeated. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 31, it is stated that from that day onwards Indra entrusted the keeping of the celestial Nectar with the hermit named Nara. (Dambhadāsaka brought under control. See under Dambhadāsaka).

4) Dambhadāsaka brought under control. See under Dambhadāsaka).

5) Conflict with Sīva. Because he was not invited to the sacrifice by Daśa, Sīva got angry and sent his trident against Daśa's sacrifice. The trident completely destroyed the sacrifice and flew through the air here and there. Then it reached Badarikāśrama and hit the breast of Nārāyaṇa who was sitting engaged in penance. By the force of the utterance of the sound 'Hum', made by Nārāyaṇa, the trident was ejected from his breast. Finding no accommodation there it flew back to Sīva, who getting angry at this rebut approached Nara-Nārāyaṇas with the intention of exterminating them. Nara took a grass from the ground and discharged it at Sīva. Instantly the grass became an axe. It flew round Sīva to attack him. Sīva broke the axe. From that day onwards Sīva got the name 'Khaṇḍaparasu' (one who broke the axe). In this story it is said that the trident which had returned from the breast of Nārāyaṇa heated the hair of Sīva to such an extent that they were dried as dry grass. So Sīva came to be called 'Munjākeśa' (with hair having the colour of dry grass). (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 343).

6) Fight with Prahlāda. Once Cyavana the son of Bhrigu went to Nākuleśvara tīrtha (Bath) to take his bath in the river Namādā. As soon as he got into the water the serpent called Kekaralahita caught hold of him. Cyavana meditated on Viṣṇu. So the poison of the serpent did not affect him. The huge serpent dragged Cyavana to Pātāla (the Nether world). But as his poison did not affect the hermit the serpent left the prey and went away. The Nāga damsels welcomed him and showed hospitality. Being greeted by the Nāga damsels he travelled through Pātāla and reached the great city of Dānavas. The asura chiefs greeted him with respect. Prahlāda met Cyavana, and received him with pleasure. The hermit said to Prahlāda: "I came to bathe in the Mahātīrtha and worship Nākuleśvara. When I got into the river a serpent caught hold of me and brought me to Pātāla, and made it possible for me to meet you." Hearing these words of Cyavana the King of the asuras said: "Oh good Lord! which are the holy baths in the earth, the sky and the Pātāla? Would you be pleased to tell us?" Cyavana replied: "Oh! powerful and mighty King! The holy baths are Naimiṣa on the earth, Puṣkara on the sky and Cakra tīrtha in Pātāla; these are the most important ones."

The King of the Daityas decided to go to Naimiṣa and said: "We must go and bathe in the Naimiṣa tīrtha. We could visit and worship Viṣṇu with eyes as beautiful as lotus." Obeying the words of the King, preparations were made instantly and the asuras started from Rasātala for Naimiṣa.

The mighty host of Daityas and Dānavas reached Naimiṣa and bathed in the tīrtha. After that Prahlāda went to the forest for hunting. As he was walking thus he saw the river Sarasvati. Near the river there was a Pine tree with very big branches, all of which were covered with arrows, the head of one at the tail of another. Prahlāda saw near the tree two hermits, with matted hair, clad in the hide of black antelope, performing penance. Near them were two perfectly made divine bows named Sārīgava and Ajagava and two quivers which would never become empty. Prahlāda questioned them without knowing that they were Nara and Nārāyaṇa. The questioning ended in a contest. The hermit Nara stood up and taking the bow Ajagava began sending showers of arrows at Prahlāda. Prahlāda checked every one of them. The hermit made his fight more severe. Prahlāda also withstood it. At last pushing Nara back Nārāyaṇa came to the front. The fight between Prahlāda and Nārāyaṇa was fierce. In the end Prahlāda fell down, his breast being pierced by the arrow of Nārāyaṇa.
Prahlāda realized that the hermit Nārāyaṇa was none but Viśnū. He praised Nārāyaṇa (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 8).

7) Other information.

(i) On the occasion of the stripping of Pāñcāli of her clothes at the palace of the Kauravas, Pāñcāli cried, calling Nara and Nārāyaṇa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 68, Stanza 46).
(ii) Arjuna and Śrī Kṛṣṇa were the rebirths of Nara and Nārāyaṇa. (See under Arjuna).
(iii) It is stated in Mahābhārata, Śautra Parva, Chapter 334, Stanza 9, that the hermit Nara was one of the four incarnations taken by Mahāviṣṇu in the Manusya yuga (age of man) of the Svāyambhuva Manvantara.
(iv) It is mentioned in Padma Purāṇa, Uttara Khaṇḍa, Chapter 2, that, of the two viṣṇus, Nara and Nārāyaṇa, Nara was of fair complexion and Nārāyaṇa of dark complexion.
(v) It was because of the curse of the hermit Bhṛgu that Nara-Nārāyaṇas took birth as Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa in the Dvāpara-yuga. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 4).
(vi) The meaning of the word 'Nara' is he who is not damaged. The universal soul named Nara has created water and so water got the name 'Nāram'. Because he lives in that water which has the name Nāram, the universal soul got the name Nārāyaṇa. (Manusmṛti, Chapter 1, Stanza 10).
(vii) For the other incarnations of Nara see under Raktaja.

NARA II. A Gandharva (semigod). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, stanza 14 that this Nara stays in the presence of Kubera.

NARA III. A King of Ancient India. He never tasted meat in his life. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Stanza 64).

NARĀ IV. One of the wives of Uśinara, a King of the family of the Aṅga Kings. Uśinara had several wives such as Nṛgā, Nāra, Kṛṣṇa, Daśā, Drśadvatī and so on. Nṛgā was born from Nṛgā, Nara from Nāra, Kṛṣṇa from Kṛṣṇa, Suvrata from Daśā and Sibi from Drśadvatī. All these sons became Kings. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

NARA V. An ancient place in South India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

NĀRĀCA. A particular type of arrow.

NĀRĀDA I. A very famous sage of the Purāṇas.

1) Birth. Nārāda was the son of Brahmā, born from his lap. Brahmā mentally created the famous saptarṣiṣ, Marici, Aŋgirās, Atri, Pulastya, Viṣṇu, Pulaha and Kratu. From Brahmā's anger was born Rudra, from his lap Nārada, from his right thumb Dakṣa, from his mind Sānaka and others and from his left thumb a daughter called Viraṇī. Dakṣa wedded Viraṇī. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

2) Various births of Nārāda. The Purāṇas refer to more than seven prominent births of Nārāda. He was first born as the son of Brahmā, and after that, on account of Brahmā's curse he was born as the Gandharva called Upabarhaṇa. Following that he was born as the son of emperor Drumila and was named Nārada. Again born as the son of Brahmā under the name Nārada, he married Mālāti and ended his life as a monkey. He was again born as the son of Dakṣa and was cursed by Dakṣa. Afterwards he was born as the son of Dakṣa and also as a worm. All these births did not occur in one and the same Manvantara. Nārada may be noticed doing something or other in connection with the various characters in the Purāṇas. There is no other character in the Purāṇas occupying so popular a place in them as Nārada. The important five births of Nārada are described below.

(i) The Gandharva called Upabarhaṇa. Nārada born from the lap of Brahmā desired to remain a celibate. But, Brahmā suggested that he should assume responsibility for procreation as his (Brahmā's) other sons like Marici and Sanaka had already become celibates. Nārada did not accept this suggestion of Brahmā at which the latter got angry and cursed Nārada to lose his knowledge and to marry fifty beautiful women. Brahmā continued—"You will be born as a Gandharva known as Upabarhaṇa and will become a great musician. You will be unrivalled in the handling of the Viṣṇu. After your death as the Gandharva you will be born as the son of a servant woman, and as such you will be a great devotee of Viṣṇu. Afterwards you will be born as my son when I will impart knowledge to you."

There was a Gandharva called Citraketu, who performed penance on the banks of the Puṣkara lake to propitiate Śiva for a child. Śiva appeared and blessed Citraketu to the effect that Nārada, the son of Brahmā, would be born as his son. Accordingly the wife of Citraketu delivered a son whom the family priest named Upabarhaṇa. The boy grew up as a devotee of Viṣṇu. Brhaspati taught him the worship of Hari (Viṣṇu). Upabarhaṇa lived on the slopes of the Himalayas performing penance. While Upabarhaṇa was one day engaged in Samādhi fifty daughters of the Gandharva called Citraraṇa passed that way, and they fell in love with Upabarhaṇa, who was in Samādhi. He awoke from Samādhi on hearing the melodious songs of the fifty damsels who stood there with palms joined in reverence. Upabarhaṇa too fell in love with them, and he married all the fifty girls. He returned with them to the palace and lived there for thousands of years. Once the Gandharvas and the Apsaras were invited to sing the story of Viṣṇu in Brahmaloka. Upabarhaṇa accompanied them. He became justly towards Rambha. The Prajapati, who noticed it got angry, and Upabarhaṇa well-nigh dead due to their curse returned home. He told his wives all that had happened to him. He spread a darbha grass on the ground and lay on it and died. Mālāti, the eldest of his wives, got ready to curse Brahmā, Yama and Mrtyu. In great consternation they sought refuge under Viṣṇu, who comforted and sent them back to Mālāti. They saluted her. Then a brahmin, who went there questioned Brahmā about the death of Upabarhaṇa. The brahmin told him that, according to previous decision, life for another thousand years remained for Upabarhaṇa, but he died in the meantime on account of the curse of Prajapati. Immediately the brahmin assumed the form of Viṣṇu. The brahmin blessed Upabarhaṇa who woke up from death rubbing his eyes. He lived happily at home with his wives. He was blessed with children and grandchildren. Knowing that his end was near Upabarhaṇa and Mālāti spent their time in austerities on the banks of the Ganga. At last Upabarhaṇa expired, and Mālāti ended her life in his funeral pyre. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).
(ii) Son of Kalavati. There lived in Kanyakubja the emperor called Drumila. He, along with his wife Kalavati, performed penance on the banks of the Ganges for an offspring. Kalavati pleased Kaśyapa, by her worship and with his blessing she became pregnant. Drumila, who in the meantime had renounced everything in life, decided to spend the rest of his life in the forest itself. He gifted away all his wealth to brahmins and died in the forest. Though Kalavati got ready to follow him in the funeral pyre, a celestial voice stopped her and she refrained from committing self-immolation. She returned to the village and lived as a slave in a brahmín’s house. In due course of time she delivered a son. On the birth of the child it rained in the land which was suffering from failure of rains, and because of that the brahmin master of Kalavati named the child Nārada, meaning he who gives water. When the child Nārada grew up he told his mother the story about his former birth. He turned out to be a great devotee of Viṣṇu. Meanwhile, Kalavati, who went to milk the cow one night, was bitten to death by a snake, and Nārada was orphaned. Śiva and three attendants of his who went there in disguise were pleased at Nārada's great devotion for Viṣṇu and his service-mentality. He lived on the left-overs given by them. He repeated songs sung by them about Viṣṇu. Gradually Nārada became perfect devotee of Viṣṇu and a unique master of music. Śiva and others imparted Bhāgavata to Nārada before they left him. Nārada who thus attained divine knowledge performed penance for many years on the banks of the Ganges and died there. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

(iii) Birth as Kapi (Monkey). Nārada, who expired on the banks of the Ganges was again born as the son of Brahmin. Though the father wanted the son to get married the latter preferred to spend his days in the meditation on God. Brahmin then told his son as follows:—

"Why are you so much afraid of the house-holder’s life? Many people have attained salvation by following the four āśramas (stages in life) like that of the celibate, the house-holder, the anchorite and the sannyāsin. In fact, only such people will be able to serve man and God. A girl named Mālati alias Damayanti is born to mārāṣī Saṅjaya, and Śiva has granted her the boon that in this birth you will become her husband. You, therefore, go to Naranāraṇyānas engaged in penance on the Himālayas. They will give Mālati in marriage to you."

Accordingly Nārada went to Badarikāsrama where in the presence of Naranāraṇyānas he married Mālati. During those days Nārada and sage Parvata started on a pilgrimage in the course of which they went to the palace of emperor Saṅjaya to observe Cāturmāsya. The emperor left a well-furnished house at the disposal of the pilgrims. He also deputed his daughter Damayanti to serve them. The humble service of Damayanti pleased them both. But, Damayanti’s devotion towards Nārada was more ardent and both of them noticed this fact. One day Parvata asked Nārada whether Damayanti did not take a special interest in him (Nārada) and to this Nārada answered ‘Yes, I too think so’. Parvata got angry at this answer of Nārada and told him thus:—

"We had agreed at the time when we started on this tour to divulge all secrets to each other. Now you have broken that contract. Why did you not tell me about Damayanti’s partiality for you? You become, therefore, a monkey”. Nārada, in turn, cursed Parvata as follows:—

“You will live in hell in Yamaloka for a hundred years.”

Accordingly Nārada became a monkey and Parvata lived in hell. At this juncture Saṅjaya’s ministers advised him to marry his daughter to a prince, and the news made her very sad. Saṅjaya understood the reason for his daughter’s sadness from her nurse. The father had ultimately to yield to her wishes and Damayanti married Nārada, who had been turned into a monkey. Hundred years rolled by, and Parvata, the period of his curse being over, returned to the palace of Saṅjaya. Nārada treated Parvata duly well, and pleased at the treatment, he gave redemption to Nārada from the curse. Nārada lived very happily with Damayanti for a long time at the palace, and after the demise of Damayanti he attained Brahmaloka. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

(iv) Born as Dakṣa’s son. After the creation of the Devas was over, Brahmā called Dakṣa to him and asked him to marry Viṣṇu and procreate, and Dakṣa accordingly begot five thousand sons of Viṣṇu. They were called Haryāśvas. Finding that the Haryāśvas also were interested in the procreation of children Nārada, the Devaṛṣi, approached and told them as follows:—

“Oh! Haryāśvas! You who are exceptionally vital people seem to be trying to procreate children. But, you have not enquired as to whether there is enough space on earth for such large numbers of people. You are just like children who know nothing about the world. How will you procreate people? Since you could live absolutely free in the sky, why do you not find out the limit of the earth?"

The Haryāśvas thereupon ran away in different places to find out the limit of the earth, and they have not, like the rivers which entered the ocean, returned yet. At the loss of the Haryāśvas in the above manner, Dakṣa created the Sabalāśvas, whom also Nārada sent away to various parts of the earth. Dakṣa again created five thousand people whom also Nārada drove away in the above manner. Angry and sad at this, Dakṣa cursed Nārada thus:—

“Well, Nārada! I my children roam about like this because of you. Therefore, you too in future will be roaming about without a permanent abode. Moreover, you will have rebirth as my son.” Nārada became a world-trotter on account of the above curse of Dakṣa. He was also rborn as the son of Dakṣa. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha and Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

(v) Born as a worm. There is a story about Nārada being born as a worm. On the approach of a chariot the worm moved quickly away from its route lest its wheel should crush it to death. The King seated in the chariot burst out into laughter at the above sight when the worm told him as follows:—

“There is nothing to be laughed at in my action. In every birth the body is much dear to the ātman (soul). Just as you love your body I also love and protect my body.” (Mahābhārata).

3) Viṣṇu showed Nārada the function of Māyā. See under Tāladhvaja I

4) Nārada became a woman. While staying once with Kṛṣṇa at Dwārakā, Nārada and the former went out on a tour in an aerial chariot. On the way they saw a stream and Kṛṣṇa stopped the chariot there as Nārada...
wanted to quench his thirst at the stream. Nārada drank water from the stream disobeying Kṛṣṇa's injunction that he should bathe before drinking water, and lo! the next moment Nārada was turned into a woman and when 'she' looked around neither Kṛṣṇa nor the chariot was to be seen. She wandered about in the forest and at last reached an āśrama. When the Rṣi of the āśrama awoke from his samādhi he saw standing before him a beautiful woman who requested him to accept her as his disciple. He readily granted her request. The preceptor married the disciple and in due course of time she became the mother of sixty children. One day all the sixty children and their father expired together. The grief-stricken widow felt too weak to perform the obsequies of the dead. An extraordinary hunger also held her in its grips. She raised her hand to pluck a fruit from the mango tree that stood nearby but could not reach the mango above. She placed together the corpses one on the other, mounted upon the heap of dead bodies and plucked the mango-fruit. Immediately a brahmin arrived on the spot and exhorted the widow on the impropriety of taking food without bathing after the death of husband and children. Then the widow entered the stream and dived in its waters holding above water the hand in which was held the mango, and lo! it was Nārada who came out from the water. Only the hand, which had been held above water and did not therefore get wet, remained like that of a woman with bangles thereon. The brahmin, who stood there on the banks of the stream transformed himself into Kṛṣṇa. As ordered by Kṛṣṇa Nārada again dived with the whole of his body in the water when the hand also turned into that of a man. The mango held in the hand turned into an excellent Vīnā. And Kṛṣṇa told Nārada: "The Rṣi who lived with you as your husband and who is no more is Kālāpuruṣa, and the sixty children are years Prabhava, Vībhava etc.

Kṛṣṇa and Nārada then returned to Dvārakā. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

5) Nārada met the woman called Bhakti. When Kalikāla held the earth in its grips Nārada, on a particular occasion, went round the world viewing the evils of Kali, and he saw a young woman immersed in grief sitting on the banks of the Yamunā, the sportsfield of Kṛṣṇa. On both sides of her two old men were breathing in an unconscious state, and the woman, weeping was trying to restore them to consciousness. Many other women were fanning the unconscious men and trying to comfort the woman. Nārada approached the young woman when she spoke to him as follows: 'Oh! great sage, please put an end to my grief, because your words will remove all grief. I am called Bhakti and these two old men are my sons, one of whom is known as Jñāna (knowledge) and the other Vairāgya (renunciation), and they have become old due to the impact of time. The others found here are sacred rivers, who have come to serve me. But, the service of nobody will do me good.

I was born in the Drāvīḍa region, grew up in Karnātakā, lived here and there in Mahrāṛṣṭra and became old at Gujarāt whereat, atheists due to the evil of Kali inflicted wounds on me for a long time so that I became very weak. I did then go with my sons to the worshipful Vṛndāvana where I regained my old form and became a young woman in the shape of a ghost. My children suffer here in an unconscious state and I have to leave this for another place. I am so very sad that my sons have become old. Why did I become a young woman when my sons were old people? We three were touring together, and how then did this difference arise with regard to us? Is it not the proper thing for the mother to be older, and her children younger? You will please explain the reason for all these.'

Nārada read out the Vedas and the Vedāṅgas to her, to no purpose. Then Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumāra, Sanatsujāta and others (all of them the mental off-springs of Brahmā and gifted with eternal youth) asked Nārada to read out Bhāgavata to the sons of Bhakti. Nārada did so, and they became immediately young. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttarākhaṇḍa).

6) Tested Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa was living in Dvārakā with his 16008 wives. Nārada once wanted to know how Kṛṣṇa managed to maintain so many wives without any difficulty or quarrels among them. To test it he first went to the palace of Rukminī where both Kṛṣṇa and herself welcomed and treated him duly. Nārada next visited Satyabhāmā's house where also Kṛṣṇa and herself welcomed and treated him well. In the houses of all the 16008 wives of Kṛṣṇa, Nārada had the same experience as above. He was wonder-struck at the divine powers of Kṛṣṇa and returned home praising Kṛṣṇa (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

7) Mahāvisṇu put down Nārada's haughtiness. Nārada had been very proud about his greatness as a musician. Viṣṇu decided to put an end to this conceit of Nārada for which purpose he took Nārada to a forest. There they saw many women, whose limbs had been cut, crying on account of insufferable pain. Mahāvisṇu asked the women who they were and why their limbs were cut. They answered Viṣṇu that they were Rāginīs, the presiding deities over the various tunes and that they were reduced to their present plight by the totally erroneous singing of the tunes by Nārada.

Nārada hung his head down in shame at the above answer of the women and he was cured of his conceit. (Adhūta Rāmāyaṇa).

8) Hanumān shamed Nārada. Nārada once met Hanumān, who sang a song for him. Enjoying the music Nārada placed his Vīnā on a rock which had been melted by the song of Hanumān, and Nārada's Vīnā sank into the melted rock. When the singing by Hanumān was over, the rock, as of old, became hard again and the Vīnā got stuck up with it. Hanumān asked Nārada to melt the rock again with a song of his and take away his Vīnā. Nārada sang and sang, all to no purpose. The rock did not melt again. Then Hanumān sang a song and the rock melted. After praising Hanumān Nārada left the place ashamed. (Adhūta Rāmāyaṇa).

9) Śrī Kṛṣṇa instructed Nārada about Māyā. Nārada once requested Kṛṣṇa to teach him about Māyā (illusion) and Kṛṣṇa told him that he would be taught sometime later. Afterwards, one day while Nārada was walking about, it began to rain and he took shelter from the rain in a hut near at hand. There was a beautiful young woman in the hut and Nārada fell in love with her. Nārada lived with her for many years and a number of children were born to them. But, a flood washed the mother and children off into the sea, and Nārada was grief-stricken. Then Kṛṣṇa appeared there and asked Nārada whether he loved Māyā. Nārada confessed that he understood Māyā very well and requested Kṛṣṇa to save him from attachments on account of Māyā.

10) Nārada and Sanaṭkumāra. Once Nārada went to Sanaṭkumāra and requested him to instruct him in spiritual wisdom telling the latter that he had already learnt the Vedas and all other scriptures and arts. Sanaṭkumāra accordingly taught him about the perfect nature, without either beginning or end, of supreme bliss. He taught Nārada thus: "Everything is God. God exists in all animate and inanimate objects and is superior to everything." (Chāndogypopaniśad).

11) Other information about Nārada.

(1) Once Brahmā advised him sixteen names which would wash off all the evils of Kali, i.e. Hare Rāma Hare Rāma Rāma Rāma Hare Hare, Hare Kṛṣṇa Hare Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa Hare Hare. (Kalisantarāṇopaniśad).

(2) It was Nārada who gave the impetus to Vālmikī for the composition of Rāmāyaṇa. Once Vālmikī asked Nārada, who had returned after a tour of the three worlds, who the greatest of men was. Nārada replied 'Śrī Rāma' and related to Vālmikī a brief history of Rāma. Nārada departed from there and Vālmikī went to the banks of the river Tamāsā. It was there that Vālmikī, at the sight of a hunter shooting down one of the Kraunča birds, sang the famous verse ‘Māṇiṣāda’ etc. (See under Vālmikī).

(3) Nārada once went to Veda Vyāsā, who was very unhappy because he had no children. Questioned by Vyāsā as to the means to have a son Nārada advised him to worship Parāśakti (the supreme power). Accordingly Vyāsā worshipped Parāśakti at Kālīśa and was gifted with the son Suka. (Devi Bhāgavata, 1st Skandha).

(4) When once Nārada came to Vaikuṇṭha playing on his Viṣṇu Lakṣmidēvi went bashfully into the inner apartment. In fact, she felt some love towards Nārada who asked Viṣṇu for the reason thereof. Viṣṇu replied that none existed who had absolutely conquered Māyā (illusion) and that Lakṣmidēvi felt love towards Nārada for a few moments because of the influence of Māyā. (Devi Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

(5) Once Agastya kicked down mount Vindhya and Nārada had also a small share in it. Vindhya had risen above the path of the sun as Nārada told him querulously that the Sun was circling Mahāmeru and was ignoring Vindhya. (Devi Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(6) Nārada once went to Pāṭālaloka and returned after having being duly treated as guest by Prahlāda. (Brahma Purāṇa, Chapter 23).

(7) Nārada once cursed Nalakūbara and Manigrīva (sons of Kubera) and turned them into two trees. They regained their former form on being touched by the mortar drawn by Kṛṣṇa as a boy. (See under Nalakūbara).

(8) It was Nārada who told Karisṇa that Śrī Kṛṣṇa was in Āmbāḍī. He also told Karisṇa about his previous history. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(9) Vṛkṣuṣura once asked Nārada who amongst the Triṃūrtis used to be pleased most easily and Nārada mentioned Śiva. It was therefore that the asura performed penance to Śiva and pleased him. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(10) The following story occurs in the Vāyu Purāṇa as to how Nārada's Viṣṇu became the musical instrument of the world. Once Nārada was in Indra's court when the latter asked Urvāśī to give a dance performance. She did so and in the course of the dance saw Jayanta, son of Indra seated before her. She was swept over by a passion towards Jayanta as a result of which some mistakes were made by her in dancing. Nārada, who was playing his Viṣṇu called Mahatī, also committed some mistakes. Nārada did so to attract the attention of the audience to Urvāśī's mistakes. Noticing the mistake Agastya, who too was present on the occasion, cursed Urvāśī to become a bamboo. He cursed that Nārada's Viṣṇu should become the Viṣṇu of the world (Vāyu Purāṇa).

(11) Nārada's curse was also one of the causes for Rāvana's death. Rāvana once requested Nārada to explain to him the meaning of 'Om', and when Nārada refused to oblige him he threatened to cut Nārada's tongue. Nārada in return cursed that the ten heads of Rāvana would be cut. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa).

(12) During one Kālpa, Nārada was born as a Devagandharva as the son of Kaśyapa by his wife Muni. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1 and Svargarāhoṇa Parva, Chapter 5).

(13) On one occasion Nārada recited Mahābhārata which included three lakhs of ślokas. (Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 1; Svargarāhoṇa Parva, Chapter 5).

(14) Since he imparted Śāntihya wisdom to the sons of Dakṣa they renounced the world and departed for different places. (Adi Parva, Chapter 75; Verse 7).

(15) He was present at the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 57).

(16) He also was present in the company of Devas and women, who attended Pāṇcālī's Svayamvara. (Adi Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 7).

(17) After Pāṇcālī's Svayamvara he once went to the Pāṇḍavas at Indraprastha and advised the five brothers not to quarrel over Pāṇcālī. It was he, who told them the story of the Sundopasundas. He also arranged that Pāṇcālī should live by turns of one year each with each of the five Pāṇḍava brothers. (Adi Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 9).

(18) It was he who consolated and sent the apsaras called Vargā, who was in the grip of a curse, to the south. (See under Vargā).

(19) In the form of a catechism he gave advice on various topics to Dharmaputra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 5).

(20) When proposals for building a palace at Indraprastha for the Pāṇḍavas were under discussion Nārada went there and gave descriptions of the courts of Indra, Yama, Varuṇa, Kubera and Brahmā. (Sabhā Parva, Chapters 5-11).

(21) He related the story of Hariścandra to Dharmaputra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 23).

(22) It was he who conveyed the information to Devārākā that Kṛṣṇa's grandson Aniruddha was imprisoned in the house of Bāṇa. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

(23) He bathed Yudhiṣṭhira's head with holy waters at the Rājaskṣīya Yajña. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 10).
(24) He prophesied that the Kauravas would get annihilated. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 80, Verse 33).
(25) When Pradyumna decided to kill Sālva it was Nārada who saved him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 22).
(26) Nārada too was in the company of the Gandharvas who had gone to receive Arjuna at Indraloka.) Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 14).
(27) It was Nārada who informed Indra about the Svyayānvara of Damayanti. (Vana Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 20).
(28) It was he who informed Sagara that his 60,000 children had been burnt to ashes in the fire of Kapilamuni’s anger. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 33).
(29) On another occasion he prevented Arjuna from using divine arrows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 18).
(30) While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Kāmyaka forest Nārada went there and enjoyed hearing stories related by Sage Mārkandeya. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 47).
(31) Once he went to the palace of Aśvapati the father of Sāvitri and described the good qualities and merits of Sātvān as a result of which Sāvitri was married to Sātvāna. (Vana Parva, Chapter 294, Verse 11).
(32) Once in the course of a search for a suitable husband for his daughter, Mātāli was taken by Nārada to Varunaloka and shown many wonderful sights. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 100).
(33) After that he took Mātāli to Garuda loka. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101).
(34) At last he got Mātāli’s daughter married by Aryaka. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 1).
(35) He related Gālava’s history to Dharmaputra. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 106).
(36) When fighting started between Bhīṣma and Paraśu-rāma Nārada tried to stop them. (See under Ambā).
(37) He consoled Akampana who was grieving over the death of his son. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 52).
(38) He demanded Sāįjaya’s daughter in marriage. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 12).
(39) Sage Parvata cursed Nārada and he, in turn, cursed Parvata. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 7).
(40) He blessed that a son would be born to King Saṅjaya. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 24).
(41) He consoled Saṅjaya who was sad over the absence of children by telling the story of Varunā. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 26).
(42) He spoke about the charitable nature of King Suhotra in the presence of Dharmaputra, who was feeling sad about the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 56).
(43) He extolled the charitable nature of King Paurava. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 57).
(44) He extolled the yajña conducted by emperor Śibi and also his generosity. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 58).
(45) He related the story of Sri Rāma to Yudhīṣṭhira. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 59).
(46) He related the story of Bhagiratha. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 60).
(47) He convinced Yudhīṣṭhira about the reasons for the prosperity of Dilipa. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 61).
(48) He told Yudhīṣṭhira the stories of Māndhātā, Yayātī, Anbarīṣa, Saśābindu, Saha, Rantideva, Bharata, Prthu, Parasurāma and Śrīṇava. (Droṇa Parva, Chapters 61-70).
(49) Nārada too was present to see the pond created with arrows by Arjuna during the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 61).
(50) He lighted the lamp for the Pāṇḍavas during the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 163, Verse 15).
(51) He prompted Vṛṛdhakanyā to get married. (See under Vṛṛdhakanyā).
(52) It was he who conveyed the news about the annihilation of the Kauravas to Balabhadradārāma. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 25).
(53) He prevented Arjuna and Aśvatthāmā from using Brahmacātra during the great war. (Śaṃptika Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 11).
(54) He informed Yudhīṣṭhira about the curse on Karna. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 2).
(55) On another occasion he related to Yudhīṣṭhira the story of Suvarṇaṣṭhili, son of Saṁjaya. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 31).
(56) He was also present in the company of the sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 8).
(57) It was he who prompted Dharmaputra to question Bhīṣma on topics of Īdhrma (righteousness) (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 9).
(58) Once Nārada told wind that the Śalmai tree claimed itself to be greater than wind. The next morning wind smashed the branches and leaves of the tree. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 155, Verse 9).
(59) Once he entered into a discussion about the creation of the world with Asitadevalamuni. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 3).
(60) He gave advice to sage Gālava about the means to achieve progress and prosperity. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 287, Verse 12).
(61) Once he advised sage Śuka on topics of renunciation. (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 329).
(62) He praised God once with two hundred names (Śaṃtī Parva, Chapter 338).
(63) He once explained to the Apsarā woman Pañca-cūḍā the aspects and characteristics of women. (Anuśaṇa Parva, Chapter 38, Verse 6).
(64) He related to Bhīṣma the greatness of feeding people with rice. (Anuśaṇa Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 5).
(65) He advised Marutta to appoint sage Saṅıvarta as his priest. (Āśvamedha Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 18).

(67) He was also present with the sages who cursed Sāṁba, son of Kṛṣṇa, to deliver an iron rod. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 1).
(68) Synonyms for Nārada : Devarśi, Parameśthī, Pārameśṭhiputra, Surārsi etc.
NĀRADA II. One of the Brahmacātra sons of Viśvāmitra (Anuśaṇa Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 53).
NĀRADĀGAMANAPARVA. A sub parva of Āśramavāśika Parva, Chapters 37-39.
NARADI

One of the Brahmavádi sons of Viśvámitra. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 59).

NARADIYAPURĀNA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. (See under Purāṇas).

1) Birth. Once the Asura Hiranyākṣa was amusing himself by wading through the ocean and beating at the waves with his club. Varuṇa, the god of water, was alarmed at this and ran to Mahāviṣṇu and told him every thing. Hearing this Mahāviṣṇu got up to kill Hiranyākṣa. Hiranyākṣa who had assumed the form of a Boar carried the earth on his tusks and ran to Pātāla. As the goddess earth had come into contact with the tusks of Hiranyākṣa she became pregnant and gave birth to an asura infant of immense might and power. That infant was Narākāśura.

Taking the infant born from impurity the sad goddess Earth went to Mahāviṣṇu and requested him to save the child somehow. Mahāviṣṇu pitied him and gave him Nārāyanastra (Nārāyaṇa's weapon) and said: "Naraka! So long as this weapon is with you, nobody but me could kill you." Saying this he disappeared. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

2) Administration. Narakāśura made Prāgjyotisha his capital and ruled over the asuras as their emperor for a long time, all the while terrifying the Devas. Once this asura raped Kašṭu the daughter of Tvaṣṭā. He brought sixteen thousand and one hundred maidens from the women of the earth and the world of gods. He made them captives at Audaka on the top of the mountain Maṇiparvata. He appointed four mighty and fearful asuras: Hayagrīva, Nisunda, Pañcananda and Mura as gate-keepers of Prāgjyotisha. As they stood blocking the way up to Devayāna, nobody dared to enter Prāgjyotisha. The ten sons of Narakāśura guarded the harem. At the boundary of the country Murāśura had tied six thousand ropes with a sword at the end of each. So enemies dared not come near the boundary. When Sugrīva gave instructions to the monkeys who were sent in search of Sītā, about the route they were to follow, he had mentioned about the city of Prāgjyotisha. Mention is made in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindha Kanda, Sarga 42 that Sugrīva had given them special instructions to search for Sītā in Prāgjyotisha. (M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 63).

3) Previous birth of Naraka. Long ago a king who was the father of Sixteen thousand daughters, ruled over a country. While the father and daughters were sitting in the palace Mahāviṣṇu came there as a hermit. The sixteen thousand damśes gathered round the hermit. Their father got angry and cursed them. The daughters shed tears and entertained their father for liberation from the curse. He gave them remission and said that in the next birth they would become wives of Mahāviṣṇu. Another version of this story says that the damśes had requested Brahmanā for liberation from the curse according to the advice of the hermit Nārada, and that Brahmanā had given them liberation from the curse. In some versions it is stated that Nārada himself gave them liberation from the curse.

It was this king, who was the father of the sixteen thousand damśes, who took birth again as Narakāśura. Those sixteen thousand damśes who had been born as princesses in different places were taken captives by Narakāśura and were kept in Audaka. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

4) Death. Narakāśura who had been causing devastation and terror in the three worlds entered the world of the gods once. The gods were not able to withstand the fury of Naraka, who carried away the ear-rings of Aditi, the mother of Indra, and the large white royal umbrella of Indra to Prāgjyotisha. Indra went to Devāraka and told Śri Kṛṣṇa of the molestations he had received at the hands of Narakāśura. Śri Kṛṣṇa rode on his Garuda with his wife Satyabhāmā to Prāgjyotisha. They flew over the city round and understood the lay-out of the city, and the precautions taken by Narakāśura. The battle began after this reconnaissance. Śri Kṛṣṇa, Satyabhāmā and Garuda fought with the asuras. The mighty asuras such as Mura, Tāmra, Antarīkṣa, Śravaṇa, Vasu, Viśvāvasu, Nabhavān, Aruṇa and others were killed. At last Narakāśura himself entered the battlefield. A fierce battle ensued in which Naraka was killed. The divine weapon Nārāyaṇāstra of Naraka was given to his son Bhagadatta. After the battle Śri Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhāmā went to the world of the gods and returned the ear-rings to Aditi and the umbrella to Indra. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

NARAKA II. Mention is made about another Narakāśura who was born to Prajāpati Kaśyapa by his wife Danu, in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 28. Once Indra defeated this Narakāśura. It is seen in Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 9 that this asura after his death, stayed in the palace of Varuṇa worshipping him.

NARAKA III. Bhagadatta the son of Narakāśura ruled over the part of Pātāla called Naraka, and being the ruler of Naraka, Bhagadatta seems to have been known by the name of Naraka also.

NARAKA. IV See under Kāla I.

NARANĀṆĀṆĀṆAS. Two hermits Nara and Nārāyaṇa. These two hermits had spent many thousands of years in Badaryāśrama doing penance. Arjuna was the rebirth of Nara and Śri Kṛṣṇa was the rebirth of Nārāyaṇa. (For detailed story see under Nara and Nārāyaṇa).

NARANTAKA I. A captain of the army of Rāvaṇa. It is stated in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 10, that the captains of Rāvaṇa, viz., Kumbha, Nikumbha, Makarajī, Mohodara, Mahāpārśva, Māttā, Unmattā, Praghaṣa, Bāsakarna, Virūpākṣa, Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Triśiras, Atikāya and other Rākṣasas fought on the side of Rāvaṇa against Śrī Rāma and that all of them were killed. Of these Devāntaka and Narāntaka were mighty and valiant warriors. Aigida killed Narāntaka after a fierce battle. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kanda, Chapter 69).

NARANTAKA II. Son of Rudraketu, an asura. This asura terrorized the three worlds by his wicked and cruel deeds. When the wickedness and cruelty of this asura became unbearable Gaṇapati incarnated in the house of Kaśyapa to protect the three worlds. Knowing this Narāntaka resorted to various means to kill Gaṇapati. But his attempts were futile. Finally he was killed by Gaṇapati. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa).

NARARĀṢTRA. A kingdom of ancient India. In Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 6, it is mentioned that Sahadeva one of the Pāṇḍavas, conquered this country.

NARASIMHA. See under Avatāra.
NARAVĀHANA. A Kṣatriya King who had obtained remission of the sin of Brahmahatyā (slaughter of Brahma) by taking the fast of Vaśikāhavrata. This man who was a Kṣatriya of Pañcāla, once happened to kill a Brahmīn with an arrow. To get remission of this sin, he discarded his Sacred thread, mark on the forehead and forelock and had been wandering here and there until he met a Brahmīn named Muniśārmā. Naravāhana told him his story. This Brahmaṇa who was a lover of God advised him regarding the importance of the Vaśikā fast. By taking this fast the King obtained remission of sin.

(Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 88).

NARAVĀHANADATTA. A famous Vidyādhara. Udayana the King of Vatśa had been spending his time in play and pleasure with his wives Padmāvatī and Vāsavadattā, when once Nārada appeared before them. The King greeted the hermit and showed hospitality. The King and the queens were childless. Nārada told them: “Hear, oh King. Your wife Vāsavadattā is the incarnation of Ratidevi blessed by Śiva. The son born to her would become the emperor of the Vidyādharas. Not long after this Vāsavadattā conceived and gave birth to a radiant son. He was named Naravāhana-datta. At this time Kaliṅgasena, who had been transformed into a woman by the curse of Indra, gave birth to an extra-ordinarily beautiful girl. (For detailed story see under Kaliṅgasena). That child was named Madana-māñcukā. Even in infancy she was surrounded by a halo of unearthly beauty. Hearing of this child, Vāsavadattā brought Kaliṅgasena and the infant to the palace. To the wonder of everybody, the infants looked at each other and they were not satisfied how sooner long they looked at each other. The king and his wives understood this perfectly well and at the proper time their marriage was conducted.

Naravāhanadatta was anointed as the Heir-apparent. Once he was playing in the garden in the spring season, with his ministers Gomukha and others, when the most beautiful Ratnaprabhā came there. (See under Ratnaprabhā). Once Naravāhanadatta went for hunting with his minister Gomukha and retinue. Somehow or other he was separated from Gomukha and army in the deep forest. Then he heard a divine song and sound of a heavenly lyre. He went in the direction from which the music came and reached a Śaivite temple. Getting in, he saw an exquisitely beautiful damsels standing in the midst of her attendants and companions singing and playing on a lute, in praise of Śiva. At this time a grown-up Vidyādhara woman came down from the sky and getting near the damsels, gave her to Naravāhanadatta. The name of the Vidyādhara damsels was Alakhāravatī. (For other details see under Alakhāravatī).

As Naravāhanadatta was spending his days, enjoying the pleasing company of his wife Alakhāravatī, once he went for hunting, with his army. Being very tired they went in search of water, and entered a thick forest. There they saw a lake full of golden lotus flowers and four men plucking flowers. Naravāhanadatta approached them. They said that they had been plucking flowers to worship Viśṇu. Naravāhana followed them to the presence of Viśṇu. Mahāviśṇu was greatly pleased at Naravāhanadatta who was standing with folded hands singing praises of Viśṇu in intense devotions and blessed him to become the emperor of the Vidyādharas. (Kathāsaritsāgara).

NĀRĀYANA. One of the two R̲ṣis famous as Naranārāyaṇas.

1) Birth. Dharma, son of Brahma was Nārāyaṇa’s father. Dharma married ten daughters of Dakṣa, and four sons, i.e. Hari, Kṛṣṇa, Nara and Nārāyaṇa were born to him of them. Of the four, Nara and Nārāyaṇa were inseparable sannyāsins. In the holy Badarikāśrama on the slopes of the Himalayas they did tapas to please Brahma for a thousand years.

2) Nārāyaṇa’s tapas. The whole world was, so to say, burnt by the intense tapas of Naranārāyaṇas. Indra was alarmed. Believing that their tapas was for the attainment of Indrahood and fearing his own displacement Indra went to Badarikāśrama mounted on Airāvata to break their tapas, and told them thus: “Oh ascetics, who shine like the rising sun, I am pleased with your tapas. You may choose any boon you like.” The Naranārāyaṇas did not even recognise the thunder-like voice of Indra; nor did they answer him. This increased Indra’s alarm, and he decided to disturb them with Māyā, productive of fear, desire etc. and thus break their tapas. Indra began threatening them with cruel animals created by him like wild cat, leopard tiger, lion, elephant etc. and also with aberrations created in nature like storm, rain, wild fire etc. But, none of the above affected or moved them in the least. After all, why should they be moved? You would threaten only those who are subject to desires, love of comfort, any particular object in life or likes and dislikes. Since Naranārāyaṇas had none of the above, Indra’s attempts to threaten them failed. Thus disappointed he returned to Svaragolaka and after thinking for a long time he called Kāmadeva to him and spoke as follows:—

“You should go, along with Rati and the spring, to Badarikāśrama. Also take with you any number of apsārā women you want. You will find Naranārāyaṇas at the āśrama performing tapas and will weaken them from their resolution by using your arrows (erotic shafts) and tempt them into erotic life. I am also deputing apsārā women like Rambhā to help you.”

Kāmadeva accordingly started for Badarikāśrama accompanied by all the apsārā women. When they reached the place spring season had set in there. Varieties of butterflies flew about from flower to flower humming. Trees like the mango and Paḷāśa were thick with flowers. Creepers (Comparable to young women) entwined and embraced trees (lovers), the former carrying puspas (flowers, in the case of young women, coming of age). A fragrant breeze swept the whole region. In this erotic background Kāma and Rati, with their five arrows and accompanied by celestial women came to the āśrama, and there they began singing and dancing. The erotic flow enchanted the soul of Naranārāyaṇas. Nārāyanarāṣṭi awoke from his tapas and whispered something in the ears of Nara. By now Kāmadeva had entered the presence of Naranārāyaṇas accompanied by the reputed beauties of Svaroloka like Menakā, Rambhā, Tilottamā, Suksequi, Manoramā, Mahēśvari, Puspagandhā, Pramadvarā, Ghṛtācī, Candraprabhā, Somaprabhā, Viṣṇumālā, Ambujākṣi and Kāñcanamālā. These beauties were accompanied by 10600 of their beautiful attendants. Naranārāyaṇas were wonder-struck to see this army of Kāma. All those great beauties stood before Nara-nārāyaṇas in salutation. Some of them began to sing, others to dance and yet others to take up the tunes. Nārāyaṇaṛṣi could easily divine the reason for the show. He thought to himself thus—

“None but Devendra could have sent all these people here, and his object must be to hinder our tapas. But I shall prove to Indra that all these mean nothing to me. Let Devendra understand that I can create more beautiful ladies than these women of his here and that I am not in the least attracted by any of them here.”

Thinking thus Nārāyaṇa beat gently on his thigh and immediately arose therefrom an exceptionally beautiful woman. Since that woman, the most beautiful in all the three worlds, was created from the Ūru (thigh) of Nārāyaṇa she came to be known as Urvasī. Others were wonder-struck by this new creation. He created some other beauties also, and an equal number of other women to serve them. All of them stood before him in humble salutation.

The celestial women almost fainted with fear. In repentance they begged the munis pardon for their mistake. The munis were kindly disposed towards them. They told them that they (munis) cherished no animosity towards them, but in fact were pleased with them, and they further asked them (celestial women) to choose their boons. The munis also asked them to take Urvasī to Devaloka as a present from them to Indra. Let the Devas prosper.

Having heard Nara speak like this the celestial women returned in great humility to Devaloka with Urvasī and the other women. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

3) Other information.

(i) Nara and Nārāyaṇa were two incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu. (Śaṁti Parva, Chapter 384)

(ii) A dark hair of Nārāyaṇaṛṣi was born as Kṛṣṇa and a white one as Balabhadrarama. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 32).

(iii) He was a star member in Brahmadeva’s assembly.

(Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 52)

(iv) Once he appeared before Māndhātā in the guise of Indra. (Śaṁti Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 14).

(v) He once fought with Śiva and won. (Śaṁti Parva, Chapter 382, Verse 110)

For complete details about Nārāyaṇaṛṣi see under Nara Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa.

NĀRĀYANAŚRAMA. A holy place. (Vana Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 6)

NĀRĀYANASTHĀNA. (SALAGRĀMATĪRTHA). A sacred place where Mahāviṣṇu is always present. Brahmadeva, Devas, Sannyāsins, Ādityas, Vasus, and Rudras are also ever present here in the service of Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu is called Salagrāma as he is being thus worshipped at Salagrāma. Those who visit the place will enjoy the fruits of Åśvamedha yajña and ascend to Vaikuñṭha. (Vana Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 115).

NĀRĀYANĀSTRAMOKSAŚAPARVA. A sub parva of Drona Parva comprising of Chapters 193-220.

NĀRĀYANAVARMAMANTRA. Imparted by Viśvaruṇa, son of Tvāṣṭa, to Indra, this mantra is competent to destroy enemies. He who dares to chant this mantra should do so silently after having first washed his hands and feet and holding Kuśa grass in his hands with face turned towards the north. The mantra is to be chanted when some danger is imminent.

NĀRĀYANAŚRAMA. A daughter of Meru. She and her sisters were married by the following sons of Agni: Nābhī, Kimpuruṇa, Hāri, Ilaṇvīta, Rāmayaka, Ḥiraṇmaya, Kuru, Bhradrāśva and Ketumāla. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

NARIŚYANTA I. Son of Vaivasvata Manu. He was a brother of Ikṣvāku. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 8).

NARIŚYANTA II. A King who was the son of Marutta. Indrasena was his wife; Dama was his son. While Nariśyanta was leading the life of a house-holder in the forest, Vapuṣmān killed him. Indrasena jumped into the funeral pyre of her husband and died. (Mārkandeyya Purāṇa).

NĀRĪTĪRTHA. Common name for the five tīrthas, i.e., Agastya tīrtha, Saubhadratīrtha, Paulomatīrtha, Kāraṇḍhamaatīrtha and Bharadvājatīrtha. Once Arjuna bathed in Bharadvājatīrtha. The Apsārā women called Vargā were living in the five tīrthas in the form of crocodiles as the result of a curse. With the arrival of Arjuna there, the crocodiles resumed their previous forms as Apsārā women and returned to Devaloka. (For the curse etc. see under Vargā).

NARMADĀ I. A famous holy river of South India. This river which springs from Amara-kāntaka flows through the valley called Khambhāta and falls into the ocean.

1) Birth. This river which is considered to be a holy river was the rebirth of Tapati the daughter of the Sun. (To know how Tapati was reborn as Narmadā see under Tapati).

2) The divine nature of the river Narmadā. Mention is made in most of the Purāṇas about the river Narmadā which is one of the holy rivers of Bhrārata. Once Nārada said to Yudhiṣṭhira about the river Narmadā as follows: “Gaṅgā has more divinity in Kanakhalā and Sarasvatī has more divinity in Kurukṣetra. But Narmadā is a holy river everywhere, whether in the villages or in the forests. Sarasvatī purifies us in three days and Gaṅgā in one day. But the moment we see Narmadā we are purified.”

The river Narmadā, the former half of which embraces the mountain Amara-kāntaka in the country of Kalṅga, is the purest of rivers in the three worlds. The devas, asuras, Gandharvas and hermits bathe in the river and attain eternal bliss. He who controls his organs of sense and takes fast for one night and bathes in this river would be prosperous for hundred generations.

This great river is hundred yojanas long and two yojanas wide. There are sixty crores and sixty thousand holy ghats in this river around the mountain Amara-kāntaka. Anybody who dies by fire, by drowning or by fast on this mountain Amara-kāntaka, will never have rebirth. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 13).

3) Mahābhārata and Narmadā. Throughout Mahābhārata mention is made about Narmadā. Important of them are given below:

(i) Goddess Narmadā stays in the palace of Varūṇa worshipping him. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 18).

(ii) While leading forest life Dharmaputra with his brothers visited Narmadādevi. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 121, Stanza 16).

(iii) Indra and the Aśvinīdevas once drank Soma sitting on the mountain Vaidūrya on the banks of the Narmadā. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 121, Stanza 19).
(iv) Narmadā is the origin of Agni (fire). (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 222, Stanza 21).
(v) A king named Duruyodhana, who ruled over the city called Māhiṣmatī on the banks of the Narmadā once married Devi Narmadā. A daughter named Sudarśanā was born to them. She was extremely beautiful. (M.B. Anūśasana Parva, Chapter 2, Stanza 18).
(vi) He who observes fast for two weeks bathing in the waters of Narmadā will be born as a prince in the next birth. (M.B. Anūśasana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 50).
(vii) Once Narmadā took Purukutsa, the son of Māndhātā, as her husband. (M.B. Āśrama-vāsika Parva, Chapter 20, Stanza 12). For the importance of Narmadā, see under Pramohinī).

NARMADĀ II. See under Puspotakā.

NARMADĀ III. Wife of Purukutsa, the son of Māndhātā. (Viśū Purāṇa).

NARYA. A King of the age of Rgveda. It is mentioned in Rgveda, Mandala I, Anuvāka 10, Sükta 54, that Devendra had rescued the Kings Narya, Turvasu and Yadu.

NĀSATYA. One of the Asvinikūrās. (Mahābhārata, Santi Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 17).

NĀSIKA. The grandson of Lomapāda. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

NĀṬAKEYĀ. A particular region in ancient India. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 36).

NĀṬOtINĀTAKA. A kind of dramatic performance in ancient Kerala. (See Tirayātām).

NĀṬOtIPPĀTU. (FOLK-SONGS). Every literature has a section known as nāṭottippātus (folk songs). In Kerala (Malayālam) literature the period of folk songs was a golden era. Worship of devatas, honouring heroes, entertainments, philosophy, science, caste-professions, morals, ethics etc., generally formed the themes for folk songs. There are a number of folk-songs in Malayālam called Sānghakkali, Tiyaṭū, Olappāvakkūtu, Ezhāmatu Kali, Kāppippātu, Nāṭuppātī, Vaṭippātī, Pārakkalippātī, Aṭaccuturippātī, (Pulluvarpātī, Nizhalkutippātī, Bhadralippātī, Tirayātī, etc. All these songs are reflective of the spiritual thoughts and ideas of the masses. Also, there is a special series of folk-songs called Vaṭakkānippātūs (songs of the north). All the Vaṭakkānippātūs are heroic songs. They are folk-songs eulogising the heroic deeds and achievements of certain heroes and heroines of exceptional courage and prowess who flourished in olden days in north Malabar. Though there are more than four hundred such songs, only thirty-five of them have been printed and published yet. These songs, which call for no special training or gifts for their singing or require any special knowledge in music for their appreciation, take their roots in the hearts of the common people. Almost all these songs are connected with Kalaris (schools where gymnastics are taught), Aṭavu (strategic feats of the duel fight), Payattu (physical training) and Āṭukam (fight). Descriptions of the challenges by heroes, clashing of arms and the way how youngsters get out of danger by their intelligence and prowess are really exciting and exhilarating to read.

Most of the heroes in the Vatakkānippātus lived either in Kaṭattanādu or its suburbs. A good majority of the songs sings the praises of two powerful families Puttūram house and Taccolinānikkattu, the former a Tiya and the latter a Nāyar family. Taccolinānikkattu house was at Meppa in Puttūpanam village near Vatākara in Kaṭattanādu, and most of the songs relate to the great hero Otenakkuruppu of this house. Otenakkuruppu was born in 1584 A.D. and lived for thirty-two years. Therefore, the Vatakkānippātus may generally be placed in the 16th and 17th centuries A.D. Āromalcevarvar, Ārōmalunī, Āṭummaṇamēl Uṇgiyārēcē, Taccoli Otenan, Taccoli Candu, Pālāṭu Komappan, Bambay Alikutty, Putunāṭu Kēlu and Kalpparampil Kaṇṇan are the chief characters in the pāṭus. Especially the song about Uṇgiyārēcē is thrilling. Brief notes about the heroes and their families in the pāṭus are given below.

1) Puttāṇam Vīṭu. (Puttāran House). Āromal Ārōmalunī, Āṭummaṇamēl Uṇgiyārēcē and Ārōmalunī were the star heroes of the house. Uṇgiyārēcē was the sister of Āromalcevarvar and mother of Ārōmalunī whose father was Kaṇṇapppan. It may be understood from the song puttīriyāṇakam’ that Āromalcevarvar was born to Kaṇṇapppan when he was forty-two years old. One or two songs about Āromalcevarvar are extant, one about his playing a game of dice and the other about his fighting the ‘puttīriyāṇakam’.

As for the game of dice, Āromalcevarvar went to his uncle at Mikavikativittīl—an expert in the game of dice—to study the art. There he spent a night with his uncle’s daughter Tumpingārēcē, who became pregnant by him. Though people ridiculed her at this development Āromal Ārōmalunī took her as his wife when she had delivered his child. Āromal Ārōmalunī had also another wife called Kuṭṭēmēl of Alattūr house. With regard to the puttīriyāṇakam, Āromar as the Ākakar (Sevakan, one who served) of Uṇgiyikanā, once went to fight with Ariṇṇōtār. Candu, his father’s nephew, accompanied him as his assistant. Candu hated Āromar from the day the latter stood in his way of marrying Uṇgiyārēcē.

Ariṇṇōtār brought over to his side Candu, assistant of Āromar. Āromar killed Ariṇṇōtār in combat and on his way home he slept lying on the lap of Candu weary after the combat when the treacherous Candu thrust heated handle of the lamp into a wound in the stomach of Āromar, who managed to reach home only to die there.

2) Āṭummaṇamēl Uṇgiyārēcē. Uṇgiyārēcē, overruled the opposition of her father-in-law and mother-in-law, one day went with her husband Kuṭṭēmēl to witness Kētu in the Allimalar temple. When they came to Etavaṭām market after passing Tānūr market certain ruffians confronted them. The coward that he was, Kuṭṭēmēl trembled before the ruffians, but Uṇgiyārēcē routed them with her skill in combat.

3) Āromalunī. Ārōmalunī, who as a youth heard from his mother Uṇgiyārēcē the story about the treacherous killing of his uncle, Āromal Ārōmalunī, by Candu rushed to Kolattunādu and killed the latter in combat.

4) Taccoli Otenan. Otenan was a powerful Nāyar (Kuruppu) born in Taccoli māṇikkattu house. His father was a nāyar chief well-known both as Puttūpanattuvāne and Cināmmittīl Taṇṇal. His mother was Uppāṭi, daughter of a woman called Teyī. He had an elder brother called Komappan and a younger sister called Unicirūta (Uṇcieṛa). Otenan’s father begot a son (Kaṭṭēcēri Čāppan) of Mākkam, the maid-servant of Uppāṭi. Čāppan grew up to be a constant companion of Otenan. Komappan (Komakkuruppu) brother of Otenan was a peace-loving, sedate person. Otenan mastered all the tricks of Kalariyappayattu at the gymnasium of Matloor Gurukkal. Otenan had also mastered the use of the Urumi (a thin sword). He was such a master in the use of the Urumi that he could, by one sweep of it, graze the throat of a man without cutting and shedding a drop of blood. He was an expert in necromancy also. What could not be managed by the physical strength of Otenan, Cappan used to manage with his intellectual powers.

Otenan was born on the slope of a hill at Meppa one mile east of the present Vatakara railway station. Relics and remnants of Mânjikkattu family are there yet to be seen. Many songs have been composed about Otenan. One of them is his going to receive presents of cloth on Onam day from a stingy chief who, after the death of Otenan's father, had become 'Putuppánattu Vázhunnavar'. Another song relates to his collecting taxes from Kotumala Kunnilkanan on behalf of Rajâ of Koṭayam. Yet another song is about his putting down the conceit and pride of Kunikkam of Keppikko. And another song is about his killing Kâteki Otenan Nambiyâr. His fight with the mappilas on behalf of the Rajâ of Cirakkal forms the theme of yet another song. Another interesting song is about his making Kotakakkâr Kunnilâi Marakkâr, who was a bosom friend of his, though a philanderer put on the attires of a female and thus teaching him a good lesson in life. Another song describes the escape of Otenan, who went to see the construction of the Karimala fort, with the help of Câppan. There are also many other songs about Otenan.

The very marriage of Otenan is an interesting story. Mâteviâmma of Kâvilum câttottu had a daughter named Cîru. Mâteviâmma went to Mânjikkattu house and requested Otenan to marry her daughter Ciru. Otenan refused to oblige her. But, Ciru grew up to be very beautiful girl, and Otenan, who saw her in that state felt a great passion for her. He sent Câppan to her for a pan (betel leaves for chewing) which she also refused. At last Câppan took Otenan disguised as a blind person to Ciru’s house. Ciru and Otenan got married without the knowledge of Ciru’s mother, who cursed them when she knew about the marriage.

There is another story about Otenan and Karuttanâtun (Kâttattanâtu) Kunilikkanâ, the only daughter of the Rajâ of Kattanâtu. A rowdy called Kelappan of Ponnâpuram fort forcibly carried her off. The Rajâ, who tried to bring back his daughter had to return wounded. Otenan came to know that Ponnâpuram fort had once been given as dowry to his family and Kelappan was in illegal and forcible occupation of it. Otenan along with Câppan went and captured the fort. He released Kunilikkan from captivity and took Kelappan captive. The Rajâ of Kattanâtu was very much pleased with this exploit of Otenan and married Kunilikkannî to him.

There is also a story about Otenan fighting with the mappilas of Cirakkal. The mappilas did not honour the Rajâ of Cirakkal during one of his tours, and the Rajâ asked Otenan to put down the haughtiness of the mappilas, and he did so. Kotamalla Kunilikka, the Rajâ Pulînâdu, Matîlur Gurukkal and others are referred to in this story.

Katirur Gurukkal was a very powerful enemy of Otenan. The Gurukkal one day kept his new gun leaning against a jack fruit tree, and Otenan, in derision, commented about it thus: “Who is it that has kept the spear made of earth leaning against the tree on which usually spear made of gold is kept so?” The Gurukkal, angry at the insult challenged Otenan for a combat within three months from Wednesday, the ninth of Kumbham. On the appointed day Otenan went to Gurukkal’s combat field and killed him, Parintukîl Emmenpaniyikar and others. On his way home after the victory, Otenan remembered that he had forgotten his dagger on the platform of the peepal tree, and paying no heed to the advice of his friends lie returned to the combat field and got killed there.

5) Tacoli Candu. Candu was Otenan’s nephew and was reputed for his great prowess. Mălu of Tâzhattumatham was his wife. One day she went for worship in the Omalur temple where Kandar Menon of Tuluñatîn fort abducted her into his court. Candu was at the time, twenty-two years old. On hearing about his wife’s mishap Candu, disguised as a Sannyâsin, entered the fort and fought singlehanded against Menon and his army of 400 soldiers.

6) Pâlattu Komân. Komân Nâyar, another nephew of Otenan, the son of Kunikkam of Koppullipalâtu, became famous under the name Komappan. The family feud between the Kuruppu of Tônûrûmûtu and the Nâyars of Pâlattu was a long-standing affair. There were seven Kuruppu during the days of Komân, and they had two sisters named Unnîciçiruta and Unnîqiamna. Komân felt a great passion towards Unnîqiamna, who was bathing in the tank, and her brothers rushed to kill Komân. But Komân outlawed all obstacles created by the seven brothers of Unnîqiamna and the tale-bearing Unnîciçiruta because of the cleverness of the very intelligent Unnîqiamna. Komân also got settled by Otenan the fortytwo items of family quarrels and married Unnîqiamna.

7) Bambîyi Alikkûtî. In the song about Ađirâja it is said Alikkutti, an expert in the science relating to elephants, was invited for help when the seventh elephant of the Rajâ escaped back into the forest. Alikkutti hailed from Bombay. According to the song under reference Alikkutti brought back the elephant from the forest to the Rajâ, who, greatly pleased with him, gave his daughter, Kunilikkanî, in marriage to him.

8) Putunâtan kelu. Putunâtan Candu and Kelu were brothers. Candu married a woman named Mātu. One Vaṭoli Menon became Mātu’s paramour by bribing her with a golden chain worth three thousand pâramus, and she got her husband killed by this paramour. Candu had two dogs called Malî and Cakkun, and one of them kept guard over Candu’s dead body while the other went and informed Kelu about Candu’s death. Kelu, in great rage, rushed to the place, saw the golden chain presented to Mâtu by Menon and blinded one of her eyes.

9) Kurumparampîl Komân. This tiya youth had a very chaste wife called Āryâ. One day when Kanûnan was away from home for tapping coconut palms for toddy Putukolottu râjâ saw Āryâ, and having felt a great passion for her he presented her one night four pieces of silk and a gold ring. The next day Āryâ dressed her husband as a brahmin with the sacred thread on, and deputed him to return to the Rājā’s wife the presents made by her husband to her (Āryā). Kaṇṇan succeeded in his mission, but the revengeful Rājā ordered him to be executed. Āryā went to the Rājā and after various discussions with him returned home.

NAUBANDHANA. A peak of the Himalayas. The peak came to be known by this name on account of the following cause. Once upon a time Hiranyakāśipu stole the Vedas and with them hid in the bottom of the ocean. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated himself as fish to restore the Vedas. The world then was submerged in water and the mahārṣi escaped in a boat attached to the horns of the Makara fish. On earth flood rose up to the peaks of the Himalayas. The Saptarṣis attached their boat to a peak of the mountain and that came to be known as Naubandhana. (nau = boat; bandha = tie). (Vana Parva, Chapter 187, Verse 50).

NAUKARANYI. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 29).

NAVAGVA. The Navagvas are a group of the Aṅgirases. In Ṛgveda, mention is made about them in several places.

NAVAKANYAKĀ(S). An important item of Navarātri-pūjā (A festival of 9 days, as observed by Śakti worshippers) is the worship of virgins. The nine kinds of virgins (from two to ten years in age) thus worshipped are called Navakanyakās (nine virgins). (See under Kumāripūjā).

NAVAMĪVRATA. (Fast on the ninth lunar day). This is a special fast taken in the month of Tulām (October-November) with a view to obtain ‘Bhukti’ (enjoyment or possession) and ‘Muktī’ (Pleasement). The important rite of this worship is to take fast on the ninth night of the bright lunar fortnight in the month of Tulām and worship goddess Gaurī. This navami is also called Gaurīnavami. Another name of this navami is Piśākā navami. This name is given because on that day Piśām (ground rice) is eaten and the goddess is worshipped. In the bright lunar fortnight of the month of Tulām (Āśvina), on the eighth night when the star is Mūlam and the Sun is in the zodiac of Kanyā if there is the touch of Navamī, it is called Aghārdānanavamī or Mahānāvamī.

Worship could be conducted on the days mentioned, by consecrating the goddess Durgā in nine temples or in one temple only. When the goddess is consecrated in nine temples they are meditated upon as nine separate beings. In such cases Goddess Durgā should be consecrated with eighteen hands and the rest of the goddesses with sixteen hands. Of the eighteen two should be holding Antimony and ādamaru (a small drum shaped like an hourglass), and the remaining sixteen hands should hold weapons that the other goddesses hold. The nine goddesses to be worshipped are Rudrā, Candā, Pracāndā, Candogrā, Candānāyikā, Candāvatī and Candārūpā and in the middle of these eight beings the great goddess Durgā who is Ugracandā and the slayer of Mahiśāsura. Durgā is addressed with the spell of ten letters “Oṃ, Durgā Durgēksini Svāhā.” Adoration, offering to ancestors and exclamation in sacrifice (Namaskāra, Svadhākāra and Vaṣaiṣṭakāra) should be denoted by six words and the Aṅgas (organs) beginning with heart also should be imagined. This root-spell should be repeated resting the organs such as heart etc. on the fingers. He who repeats this secret spell of goddess, will never be troubled by enemies.

The goddess should be worshipped by meditating upon her as carrying the weapons such as Kāpāla (skull), Khetaka (shield) Ghatā (bell), Mirror, Štarjāni, bow, dhvaja (flag), ādamaru (drum) and pāśa (rope) in the left hands and Śakti (dart) Mudgara, trident, vajra, sword, spear, conch, wheel and Śalāka (antimony) in the right hands. These weapons also should specially be worshipped.

In the worship of the goddess, a cow (sacrificial animal) should be beheaded with a sword repeating the spell Kālī Kālī and the blood and flesh of that cow should be offered as oblation to the goddess Pūtāna uttering the spell, Kālī Kālī Vajreśvarī, lauhadāndāyai namah.’ Offering to Pūtānā should be made in the south west corner of the shrine of the Devī. In the same way offerings of blood and flesh should be made to the goddesses Pāparākṣasī in the North West corner, Caraki in the North East corner and Vīdarīkā in the South East corner. The same form of offerings should be made to the god Mahākauśika in the south east corner. The King should bathe in front of this god Mahākauśika and making an image of his enemy with rice flour, should break it. Then give that rice flour as oblation to the gods Skanda and Viśākha and worship the female ancestors such as Śrīmān and such others in the night. As ordained in the Vedas, the Devī should be bathed in Pañcāmṛta (milch, curds, butter, honey and water) and then worship before her, uttering the spell “Jayantimāgala Kālī, Bhadrakālī Kapālī, Durgā Sivā Kāmā Dīatrī Svāhā Svāhā Namostu te.” (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 183).

NAVARATNĀS I. (The nine precious Jewels). The nine precious stones are pearl, ruby, Chrysoprasus, beryl, diamond, coral, jacinth, emerald and sapphire.

Mukti - māṇikya - vaikuty - gomeda vajra - vidruma/ Padmarāgo marataram niśceci yathākramam/

NAVARATNĀS II. Legend says that there were nine scholars who handled philosophy and arts, in the palace of the emperor Vikramaditya. These nine scholars were known by the name Navaratnas (the nine jewels). They were Dhanvantari, Kṣapanaka, Aamarasinh, Śaṅku, Veṭālalbhāṣṭa, Ghaṭākarpai, Kālīḍāsa, Varāhamihira and Vararuci.

NAVARĀTRI. Navarātripūjā (nine nights’ worship) is done to goddess Durgā. Though this is observed throughout the whole of India, it is more prominent in North India than anywhere else. (To know the details regarding the origin of this worship, see under Sudarśa, Saśikālā and Viṣayyadāśamī).

As ordained in the Vedas, the Nine nights’ worship is to be made in the seasons of spring and autumn. These two seasons are called Kāladaṃśtras (the tasks of seasons). Diseases and deaths occur in these seasons in excess, and so it is ordained that this fast and worship should be conducted in the months of Meḍam (Meṣa) and Tulām.

Vyāsa has ordered that navarātri worship should be conducted as follows. The things necessary for the worship and oblations should be collected on the new moon day. Only clarified butter could be eaten on that day. An open temple should be erected with pillars and flag-posts in an open flat place which is pure. It will be good if the shed has a circumference of sixteen cubits. There should be sixteen pillars. The shed should be floored with the mixture of cow dung and white clay. In the middle of the shed there must be a 'dais' having a height of one cubit and a circumference of four cubits. This is the place for the seat. The shed and the dais should be decorated.

The throne placed on the dais must be covered with a white silk and Devi (goddess) should be consecrated on it. A calm Brahmin should read the Vedas and at that time the worship of the goddess should begin. This worship will continue for nine days. Another ritual of this 'navaratripūja' is the worship of virgins. (See under Kumāripūja)

NAVAVYŪHĀRCAṈA. This is a worship conducted to prevent epidemics. In olden days Mahāviṣṇu advised Nārada on the form of this worship. The form of this worship is given below:

In the centre of the circular lotus, consecrate Vāśudeva with the first syllable of mantra (spell) 'A'. To the south of him consecrate and worship Saṅkarṣana and Pradyumna with the syllable 'Ā'; in the S.E. corner, Aniruddha with the syllable 'Ab'; in the west, Nārāyaṇa with the syllable 'Om'; Brahmā in the N.W. corner with the syllables 'Tatsat'; Viṣṇu in the North with the syllable 'Hum'; Nṛṣimeha with the syllable 'Kaśu' and Varāha in the N.E. corner with the syllable 'bhūm'.

Consecrate Garuda with spells having as first syllables 'Kam', 'tam', 'sam' and 'sam' at the western entrance of the lotus figure; Pārvavakra, with syllables 'Kham', 'cham', 'Vam' and 'hum' at the southern entrance of the lotus figure; Gadjā (club), with the syllables 'Kham', 'θam' and 'Sam' at the Northern entrance; consecrate Iśa with the syllables 'bam', 'nam', 'mar' and 'Kam, in the North East corner. Then consecrate Śri with the syllables 'Dham', 'Dām', 'Bham' and 'Ham' on the southern side; Vanamāli with the syllables 'Gām', 'Dām', 'Vam' and 'Sam' on the northern side; Śrīvatsa with the syllables 'sam, 'ham' and 'lam', to the west of Vanamāli; and Kaustubha, with the syllables, 'cham', 'Tām' and 'yam', to the west of Śrīvatsa.

After having consecrated and worshipped persons as mentioned above, in the order of the ten member-parts of Mahāviṣṇu, Ananta should be consecrated below the seat of the deity and in the order of the ten member-parts of Ananta, the four component parts called Maheśtra and so on should be consecrated on the four directions such as east and so on, and consecrate in the same way all the decorations, flags, canopy etc. Then the three spheres of Vāyu (Air), Agni (fire) and Indu (moon) should be consecrated with the first syllables of the spells suited to each and meditating on them and worshipping them, dip in the body in the meditation. Then imagine that the subtle form of the individual soul is staying in the sky. Then meditate that the individual soul is reborn by harmony with the universal soul after having been dipped and washed in the snow-white ambrosia emanating from the moon. After that saying to yourself 'I am Viṣṇu himself reborn', utter the twelve-syllabled mantra or spell. Place heart, head, turban and weapon respectively on chest, head, hind part of the lock of hair and Netra (eye) Place weapons in both hands. After this your body will become divine. This placing of the individual soul should be repeated in the same way with Deva (god) and Siva. When this worship of Viṣṇu is conducted in heart in imagination (without the aid of materials) it is called ‘Anirmaṇyapūja, and when it is done with the aid of lotus figure etc., it is called Sanirmaṇyapūja.

At this pūja (worship) the disciple should stand with eyes tied. Then on whichever deity he places flower it should be given that name. Place it on the left side and burn gingelly, paddy and glue in the sacrificial fire. After performing hundred and eight burnings perform another burning for the purification of the body. To each of the member-parts of the Navavyūha deities also burnt offering should be made, no less than hundred times to each. Then put the entire thing in fire as burnt offer ng. Then the disciples should take fast, and the disciples should offer wealth etc. to the teacher. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 201).

NAVYĀŚRAMA. An āśrama built by Lomāpāda Mahārāṣṭra. Śrīvārāga came to Lomāpāda's country in a boat. Hence the name Nāvyāśrama. (See under Śrīvārāga).

NĀYANĀR. The protagonists of Southern Śaivism are known as Nāyanārs while those of Vaiṣṇavism are called Āvārs.

NEMI. The real name of Daśaratha. (See under Daśaratha).

NEMICAKRA. A king, who once ruled Hastaṇāpura. Once, when Hastināpura was washed away by floods of Yamuna Nemicakra built a new city in Kauśāmbi. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NEMIHAMSAPADA. An important place in ancient India. The place is near Aksaprapatanam in the Anarta region. It was here that Kṛṣṇa killed Gopati and Tālāketu.

NĒPĀL. The kingdom of Nepal on the boundaries of the Himālayas has been famous from Purāṇic times. It is the only 'Hindu' state in the world. Karna, during his triumphal tour, had conquered Nepal also. (Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Verse 7).

NĪBĪDĀ. A mountain in the Kraunca island. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 19).

NICANDRA. A Rākṣasa referred to in verse 26, Chapter 65 of Aḍī Parva.

NICĪTĀ. A holy river of ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 18).

NĪDAGHĀ. A maharāṣṭra. (For details see under Rūḥu)

NIHDRUVA. One who actually saw the Sāktas. He was the son of Vatsāra Śi born in Kaśyapa dynasty. He married Sumea has the daughter born to Cyavana and Sukanyā; and Kuṇḍapāyins were their sons. (Vāyu Purāṇa).

NIHGNA. A King of Ayodhyā and son of Anaranya. He had two sons called Anāmitra and Raghūttama. (Padma Purāṇa, Śrīstī Khaṇḍa).

NIKHARVAṬĀ. A Rākṣasa in Rāvanā's camp. He fought with the monkey called Tārā in the Rāma-Rāvana war. (Vana Parva, Chapter 235, Verse 80).

NIKŚUBHĀ. An Aspara woman about whom the following story occurs in the Brahmaparva of the Bhavīsya Purāṇa. On account of the curse of Śūrya, Nikṣubhā, the great beauty in Svarloka, was born on earth as daughter of Sūjīva a brahmin of Mihāra Gotra. At the instance of her father, she used to keep the yajña fire ever burning. One day the fire held in her hands abruptly burst into flames, and her unique beauty revealed in the light kindled the passion of Śūrya.

Next day Śūrya went to Sūjīva and told him that his NICUMBHA I. A very mighty Rākṣasa. Son of Kum-bhakarna (Rāvana's brother) by his wife Vajramālā. He had an elder brother called Kummbha.

When Kumbha was killed in the Rāma-Rāvana war Nikumbha rushed to the front line and fought fiercely, and he was killed by Hanūmān. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kānda, Canto 77).

NICUMBHA II. Third son of Prahlāda. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 19).

NICUMBHA III. An asura born in the dynasty of Hiraṇyakaśipu. Sunda and Upasunda were his sons. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 2).

NICUMBHA IV. A warrior of Subrahmaṇya (Śalva Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 58).

NICUMBHA V. A king born in the Ikṣvaku dynasty. He was the son of Haryāśva and the father of Saṁhitāśva (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 1).

NICUMBHA VI. Another form of Gaṇapati. The following story about him in the Nikumbha state is told in Vāyu Purāṇa.

Suvaśa, wife of Dīvordāsa used to worship in the Nikumbha temple of Vārāṇasi for the sake of a child. As the worship did not yield the desired effect, Dīvordāsa smashed the idol in the temple into pieces. Then Nikumbha cursed that Vārāṇasi should decline. As a result of the curse the Hehayas like Tālajaṅgha and others destroyed Vārāṇasi and drove Divordāsa away from there. At last the Nikumbha temple was rebuilt and Vārāṇasi became prosperous again.

NICKUMHILÂ. A particular spot in the forest outside Lāṅkāpuri. (Uttāra Rāmāyaṇa).

NILA. I. A prominent nāga born to Kaśyapa Prajā-pati of Kadrū. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 7).

NILA II.

1) General. A King born in the Hehaya dynasty. His was a rebirth of the asura called Krodhaśava. Nīla was called Duryodhana also. Māhīśmati was the capital of his kingdom. He attended the Śvayāmvara of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 61).

2) Other Information

(i) Once he fought a fierce battle with Sahadeva, but ultimately yielded to the latter at the instance of Agnideva. (See under Agni, Para 8).

(ii) He gave his daughter Sudarṣanā in marriage to Agnideva. (See under Agni, Para 8).

(iii) During his triumphal tour, Karna defeated Nīla. (Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Verse 15).

(iv) In the battle of Kurukṣetra he fought on the side of the Kauravas. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 23).

(v) He was reckoned as one of the mahārathis on the side of Duryodhana. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 164, Verse 4).

(vi) Sudarṣanā was a daughter born to him of his wife Narmadā. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2).

NILA III. A monkey-chief, who was a dependant of Śrī Rāma. He was Agni's son. 'Nila, son of Pāvaka (fire) shone forth like agni (fire). He stood foremost among the monkeys in the matter of effulgence, reputation and prowess'. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakānda, Canto 17).

This monkey-chief was also included in the set of monkeys deputed by Śrī Rāma to search for Sītā. In the Rāma-Rāvana war Nīla killed Prahmati, the younger brother of the Rākṣasa called Dūṣaṇa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 287, Verse 27).

NILA IV. A warrior who fought on the Pāṇḍava side. He was king of Anūpadeśa. He fought against Durjaya and Aśvatthāma and was killed by Aśvatthāma. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 25).

NILA V. A famous king in northern Pāṇcāla. The Purāṇas refer to sixteen famous kings of this royal dynasty from Nīla to Pṛṣṇa.

NILA II. A daughter born to Kapiśa of Keśinī. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 3).

NILA III. A Gopīkā. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was one day picnicking in Vṛndāvana with the Gopi women, and they were proud that he was mad after them. To dispel their pride Kṛṣṇa disappeared abruptly from their midst and sported with the woman called Nīla. Then she also became proud that Kṛṣṇa loved her more than the others, and she asked him to carry her on his shoulders. He stood there ready stretching his neck to carry her. But, when she stood with her legs parted to mount on Kṛṣṇa's neck and looked for him he was missing; he had already disappeared. The Gopikās ultimately shed their pride and then Kṛṣṇa appeared before them. (Ceruṣṣeri's Malayālam Epic Kṛṣṇa Gāthā).

NīLAGIRI. Name of a mountain in the region called Lāṅkārta of Jambū island. In Lāṅkārta there are three chief mountains called Nīlagiri, Śvetagiri and Śṛṇgavān, and in their middle three Varṣas (regions) called Ramyaka, Hiraṇmaya and Kuru. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

NīLAKANṬHA DĪKṢITAR. A Sanskrit poet who flourished in the 17th century A.D. He was the court poet of King Tirumala-Nāyaka. He has written works in all the branches of literature. His more important works are Śīvalilānava, Gaṅgāvataraṇa, Nīlakāntahvījaya Cāmpū, and Kalividambana. Śīvalilānava contains twentytwo cantos. Its theme is the sixtyfour lilās (Divine sports) of Śiva installed at Madura. (South India) Gaṅgāvataraṇa is a poem in eight cantos which describes the story of Bhaṭṛathra bringing Gaṅgā down to the earth. In the first canto of Nīlakanṭahvījaya, A.D. 1638-39 is referred to as the period of its composition, and this reference helps us to determine the date of the poet.

NĪL. Second wife of King Ajamiṭha. Two sons called Dūṣyanta and Paramēṣṭhī were born to the king of Nīlī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 32).

NīLINĪ. A wife of Sunaśṭepha. A daughter called Sāntī was born to him of Nīlinī. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

NIMĒSA I. A son of Garuda. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 10).

NIMĒSA II. See under Kālāmāṇa.

NIMI I. A famous emperor who was the son of Ikṣvāku,

2) Vasiṣṭha's curse. Emperor Nimi was very generous with his gifts. He was interested in performing yajñas. The feeding hall that can be seen even today near the āśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi was built by emperor Nimi. The emperor, a person of rājasic nature, decided to conduct a yajña which would take a long time to perform and which required much money for gifts; and he got his father Iksvaku's permission for it. Arrangements were made for the yajña, and Rṣis like Bhṛgu, Aṅgiras Vāṃdeva, Pulasta, Pulaha and Ruci who were competent to perform yajña and great scholars in the Vedas were invited for the yajña. Lastly he met his family preceptor Vasiṣṭha and told him thus: "Oh preceptor! I have made all arrangements for a yajña, which it is my desire should last for five hundred years. You would also come with me and see that the yajña is duly performed."

Vasiṣṭha listened to Nimi's request with great attention. But, he had already been invited by Indra to conduct a yajña which would last for five hundred years, and he would be able to oblige Nimi only after that period of time. So Vasiṣṭha asked the emperor to postpone his proposed yajña by five hundred years. Nimi returned disappointed.

Nimi had no patience to wait for five hundred years. So he started the yajña with Vasiṣṭha as his preceptor. After Indra's yajña for 500 years was over, Vasiṣṭha came to Nimi's yajña hall. Nimi, at the time, was in the inner apartment of his palace. Though his servants went to him to tell him that his preceptor Vasiṣṭha had come, they waited outside his chamber as he was sleeping then. Within a few moments Vasiṣṭha was ablaze with anger. He raised his hands and cursed Nimi thus: "Oh! Nimi, you have insulted me, your preceptor. You disobeyed my injunction and began the yajña. Therefore, let your body be parted from the soul and fall on the ground."

This curse of Vasiṣṭha alarmed the servants of Nimi so much that they roused him from sleep and told him all about the affair. Nimi hurried to Vasiṣṭha and prostrated at his feet. But, he did not shed his anger. This made Nimi also angry. He also raised up his hands and cursed Vasiṣṭha thus: "Oh muni! you who got angry without reason are worse than a Candra. Therefore let your body also be parted from the soul and fall to the ground."

Vasiṣṭha got alarmed at the above curse. He ran up to and submitted his grievance to Brahma, who told him thus: "My son, your action was really fool-hardy. Yet, I shall advise you a way out of your troubles. You dissolve your-self in the effulgence of Mitra and Varuna and remain there permanently. After sometime you will be able to be born without being present in the womb of a woman, Then you will remember everything about your previous birth will acquire sense of righteousness and knowledge of the Vedas will become respected by all and will be omniscient.

The soul of Vasiṣṭha parted from his body on account of the curse of Nimi, saluted Brahma, went to the āśrama of Mitrāvaruṇa and got mixed with their effulgence. Meanwhile Urvaśī one day came to the āśrama of Mitrāvaruṇa, who had seminal emission at her sight. The semen fell into a pot. The pot duly burst open and there emerged from it Agaṣṭya and Vasiṣṭha.

Nimi returned to the Yajña hall and told the munis about the curse on him of Vasiṣṭha. While the munis were helplessly looking on, Nimi's body got separated from the soul and fell down. The munis placed the dead body in an uncovered coffin, kept it free from putrefaction with the help of medicines and manstras and continued with the Yajña. At the close of the Yajña the Devas appeared and asked Nimi which did he prefer to have, a human body or body of a Deva. He preferred to have a Deva body, and accordingly ascended to Svarga along with the Devas.

As Nimi had no sons to perform his obsequies the munis began churning the corpse repeating manstras and there arose from it an ideal person as glowing as Nimi. As he was created by 'māthana' (churning) the munis named him Mithī. Again, as he was created from a dead body he came to be known as Janaka also. Further, as he was born from the body from which the soul had departed he was called Videha also. The famous kingdom of Mithīla on the banks of the Gaṅga was founded by this Janaka.

Janaka, the father of Sītā, was a King born in this dynasty. To all the Kings born in this dynasty the surname 'Janaka' came to be applied. This dynasty is known as Janakavamśa and Videhavamśa after emperor Mithī. (Devī Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

3) Other information.

(i) He worships Sūrya's son Yama in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 9).

NIRMOCANA. The Palace of Murāṣura. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 48, Verse 83).

NIRMOCANA. The Palace of Murāṣura. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 48, Verse 83).

NISADHA I. A Deva. The Purāṇas contain the following information about him.
(i) He is one of the Aśādikpālas (guards of the eight quarters). He is in charge of the south-western corner. (See under Aśādikpālas).
(ii) He is one of the Ekādaśarudras. (Adi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 2).
(iii) Brahmā was his grandfather and Sthānū his father. (Adi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 2).
(iv) He attended the birth-day celebrations of Arjuna. (Adi Parva, Chapter 129, Verse 63).
(v) In temples his idols are installed with sword in hand and seated on an ass. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

NISADHA II. Wife of the Deva called Adharma. She had three sons called Bhyā, Mahābhaya and Antaka. These Rākṣasas are known as Nairṛtas. (Adi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 54).

NISĀ. The third wife of the Agni called Bhānu. To the couple were born seven sons called Agni, Soma, Vaiśānara, Viśvapati, Sannihita, Kapila and Agraṇī, and a daughter called Rohiṇi. (Vana Parva, Chapter 211).

NISĀDA I. A forest dweller. The grand sire of the nisād tribe living in forests was one Nisāda. Those forest-dwellers came to be known as nisādās as they were the descendants of this Nisāda. The Purānic story about the origin of Nisāda is as follows:

Once upon a time there lived a king called Vena. A very immoral ruler, he was hated by the people. As dharma declined in the country due to the misrule of Vena the mahārṣis killed him with darbha grass sanctified by mantras. Then the mahārṣis saw dust rising up everywhere and people told them that the poor people, in the absence of king, had turned into thieves and the dust was formed by the onrush of the thieves. To remedy the problem thus created the mahārṣis churned the thigh of Vena, who had died childless, for a son, and from the thigh was born a male child, dark in colour, dwarfish and with a compressed face. Sadly he asked the brahmans (mahārṣis) what he should do. They asked him to sit (niśāda) and hence he became Nisāda (forest-dweller). His descendants settled down on mount Vindhya and they by their sinful lives divested Vena of his sins. Vena was absolved of his sins through the Nisādas, and thus the Nisādas became responsible for the ending of Vena’s sins. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 13).

NISĀDA II. A particular region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 51).

NISĀDANAREŚA. A King well known in Bhārata. He was born from aspects of the dayitas, Kālakeya and Krodhahanūti. (Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 50).

NISADHĀ I. A King born in Śri Rāma’s dynasty. Kuśa was born as the son of Śri Rāma, Aditi as Kuśa’s son and Nisadha as Aditi’s son. His Nisadha was the father of King Nabhas. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skanda).

NISADHĀ II. A King of Bharata’s dynasty. Nisadha was the grandson of King Puru and the fourth son of Janamejaya. A great humanitarian, Nisadha ruled the country to the satisfaction of everybody. (Adi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 56).

NISADHĀ III. A mountain near mount Meru. During his triumphal tour, Arjuna defeated the people of this region.

NISĀKARA I. A mahārṣi. Honoured even by the Devas he lived in his āśrama on the heights of Mount Vindhya. One of those days Jāṭāyu and his elder brother Sampāti, under a bet, flew up to the Sun’s sphere. In his attempt to shield Jāṭāyu, who flew with great speed and neared the Sun’s sphere, from the scorching heat of the Sun, Sampāti’s wings got burned and he fell down on the heights of Vindhya where he lay unconscious for six days.

Nisākara mahārṣi heard Sampāti crying and he saved the bird, which lived there for many years as the mahārṣi’s slave. The mahārṣi, who could foresee things told Sampāti about Śri Rāma’s incarnation which was to happen in the future. He entered Samādhi after finally telling Sampāti that monkeys would go there then in search of Sītā, that Sampāti would point out to them where Sītā was and that on that day his wings would automatically reappear and his legs would become strong. Afterwards for eight thousand years Sampāti led a solitary life in the āśrama. It was during this period that monkeys, in the course of their search for Sītā got information about her from Sampāti. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa; Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṣkindhā Kāṇḍa, Canto 60).

NISĀKARA II. A great muni, who attained Svarga after passing through many lives. His story is given below:

There was a great ascetic and erudite scholar in all branches of knowledge called Kośākāra, son of muni Mudgala. Kośākāra’s wife was Dharmiṣṭhā, daughter of Vatsyāyana. To them was born a son, an idiot and a deaf and dumb child, whom they forsook at the gates of the mother’s house. At the same time an evil-minded Rākṣasa woman called Sūrpākṣi, who was in the habit of lifting children came there with a lean child. She replaced Dharmiṣṭhā’s child with the lean one and returned with it to the abode of dhahārapanta where her blind husband asked her what she had brought for him. She told him about the changeling child with her when he said as follows “Return the child at once to where it was found. The child’s father is a great man of knowledge and wisdom and when he hears about your action, he will curse us. So, return the child and bring the child of some one else.” As soon as she heard these words of her husband she rose up in the sky in great alarm. Hearing the cries of the Rākṣasa child left at their gates Dharmiṣṭhā and her husband came out, and the child which, in its colour and shape resembled their child exactly, Kośākāra said thus: “Oh! Dharmiṣṭhā! this must be some ghost. Some one is lying here in the same form as our child to hoodwink and cheat us.”
Saying so he tied the child to the ground by chanting mantras with darbha grass in his hands. At the same time Śūrpaṅkṣi came there in invisible form. She threw Dhārmiṣṭhā's child from a distance into the courtyard. Kośakāra took his child. But all the attempts of the Rākṣās to lift her child from the ground failed. The grief-stricken Rākṣās reported the matter to her husband.

As soon as Śūrpaṅkṣi left the place the magnanimous Kośakāra handed over the Rākṣasa child to his wife. He brought up his own child by feeding it on cow's milk, curd, juice of sugar-cane etc. Both the children grew up to seven years of age. The Rākṣasa boy was named Divākara and the other child Niśākara. Both the children were invested with the sacred thread in due course of time. Divākara learned the Vedas, but Niśākara did not, and he was despaired by all. His father pushed him into a neglected well and covered its mouth with stone.

Niśākara lived in the well for many years. The fruits of a cluster of plants in the well served as his food. Some ten years afterwards when Niśākara’s mother found the mouth of the well closed with a big stone she asked as to who did so, and from the well came the answer, “Mother, it was father who covered this well with that stone.” Alarmed at this the mother asked who was within the well, and she was answered, “Your son, Niśākara.” Then she argued that her son was named Divākara and that she had no son called Niśākara. But, Niśākara told her about his past life and what had happened to him during the present life, upon which the mother rolled away the stone and Niśākara came out of the well and prostrated before his mother. He then went home with his mother. Questioned as to how and why these things happened by Kośakāra his son Niśākara described his previous life as follows:

Father, you would please hear about the reason why I became dumb and idiotic. In my previous life I was born in a noble family, my father being called Vṛṣpaka and mother Mālā. My father taught me all the Sāstras and the Vedas. I became conceited over my unique learning and erudition and began doing evil acts. Conceit led to avarice, and I lost all my scholarship. I became indiscrète. Having thus become a fool, I began committing sins. I had to hang myself to death on account of my association with others’ women and stealing others’ money. I, therefore, fell into the Raurava hell.

After a thousand years some sin remained attached to me as a result of which I was born as a tiger, and a King trapped and took me to his city. When I was caged Sāstras about Dharma, Artha and Kāma came up in my mind.

One day the King went out wearing only one piece of cloth and with a club in his hands. Then his wife Ajitā, a unique beauty came to me, and because of my taste in my previous life sexual desire arose in my heart. I told her about my feelings. She also felt like me. So, she unmanned me and I approached her in great passion and seeing me thus the King’s servants tied me to a peepal tree and thrashed me to death.

My soul again returned to hell. After a thousand years I was born as a white ass in the house of a brahmin named Agnivesya, who had many wives. Then all knowledge and wisdom were reflected in my mind. My duty was to carry the brahmin women on my back. One day the brahmin’s wife Vimati of Navarāṣṭra started for her father’s home mounted on my back. Half-way home she dismounted and went to a stream to bathe. The exquisite beauty of that lady with wet clothes upset me, and I ran up to her on the stream, pushed her into the water and myself fell upon her. Then a person came and tried to tie me down. I escaped from his grips and ran southwards. While thus running the saddle slipped into my mouth and I fell down. And, within six days I died thinking about her. Thus I fell again into hell. My next birth was as a parrot. A hunter caged me in the forest and he sold me to a Vaiśya merchant, who put me up in the women’s quarters. The young women fed me on rice and fruits. One day the wife of the Vaiśya merchant hugged me to her breast and petted me. Her touch kindled in me sexual feelings and I embraced her with my wings. In my hurry about the affair I slipped down and got crushed between the doors. Thus I fell again into hell.

Afterwards I was born as an ox in a camp of a Gaṇḍāla. One day he yoked me to his cart and started for the forest in it with his wife. On the way she sang a song, and mentally excited by it I looked back. At once I slipped my feet, fell down and died. Again I returned to hell.

After another one hundred years I was born as your (Kośakārad) son in this house. All facts about my previous lives linger in my memory and now I am free from evils and am a virtuous person. I am going to the forest for tapas. Let the good boy, Divākara live here as house-holder. Niśākara thus did tapas for many years and attained Vaiśvadeva (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 91).

There is no definite evidence in the Purāṇas to establish that the Niśākara, the protector of Sāmpati and the Niśākara mentioned above were the same person.

NiśānGī. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhīmasena. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 4).

NiśAtha I. A prince of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty; son of Balabhadra born of Revati. (Harivarṣa). Niśātha also had participated in the utsava celebrations held at Raivata mountain by the Yādavas. It was Niśātha who went to Kṛṣṇa-bārapraṣṭha with the dowry of Subhadrā. He was present at the Aṁv水肿 and Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. After death he was absorbed into the Viśvaveas. (Aḍi Parva, Chapter 328, Verse 20; Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34; Aṁv水肿 Parva, Chapter 66; Svargaṁhita Parva, Chapter 5).

Niśāṣṭha II. A King of ancient India. After death he lived in the court of Yama worshipping him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

NiśCira. A river glorified in the Purāṇas. It is well known in all the three worlds. A bath in the river is as good as performing an aṁv水肿ya yajña. Those who bathe in the confluence of Niśīcira will attain Indraloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 138).

NiśCayavanā. Second son of Bhaspati. He was sinless, pure and holy. (Vana Parva, Chapter 209).

Niśitha. A King of Dhruva’s dynasty. Puspāṇa was the son of Utkāla, the son of Dhruva, and Niśitha was Puspāṇa’s son by his wife Prabhā. Niśitha had two brothers, Pradoṣa and Vyāṣa. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

Niśka. One palam (about one-sixth of a pound) of gold. (Manusmrti, Chapter 8).

NISKRITI. An agni (fire). A son of Bṛhaspati, he came to be known as Niskriti as he redeemed (Niskrāma) people from unhappiness. (Vana Parva, Chapter 229, Verse 14).

NIŚKUMBHA. A great asura. A dependant of the asura called Vṛṣaparvan, Niśkumbha, took part in many Devāsura wars. (Bhaviṣya Parva, Chapter 59).

NIŚKUTA. An ancient region in India. The people of the region were defeated once by Arjuna. (Śabhā Parva Chapter 27, Verse 29).

NIŚKUTIKĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanyā. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 12).

NIŚTANAKA. A prominent nāga (serpent) begot by Kaśyapaprājapati of his wife Kadrū. (Ādi Parwa, Chapter 35, Verse 9).

NIŚTHERUKA. A very prominent King, who lived in ancient times in South India. Once he had to depend on Śrīdatta, a King of North India. (See under Śrīdatta).

NIŚTHERUKA. A nāga born in the Kaśyapa dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 12).

NIŚUMBHA. An asura. Two of the sons of Kaśyapa Prājapati by his wife Diti became notorious fellows called Sumbha and Niśumbha. They were born and brought up in Pātāla. But as young men they came to the earth and began rigorous tapas taking neither food nor drink. After ten thousand years Brahmā appeared and asked them to choose their boons. They requested for eternity, deathlessness. But, Brahmā refused to grant that boon. Then they thought of another boon, which would in effect be as goodas the first one; they wanted death to come, but to come in a manner impossible to happen. So, they requested Brahmā as follows: “We shall not meet with death at the hands of males among Devas, human beings as also by birds, animals etc. In short we should be killed only by women; we fear them not.”

Brahmā granted them such a boon and they returned to Pātāla. They lost their head over the boon and appointed Sukra as their preceptor. Sukra was so pleased at this that he made Sumbha sit on a golden throne and crowned him King of Dāiyas. Following this, lesser Kings began coming to salute the great King and pay tributes. Great dāiyas like the Candra-muṇḍas, Dhūmralocana, Raktabīja etc., became attendants of Sumbha and Niśumbha.

After having established the power of the dāiyas thus Sumbha-Niśūṃba gradually turned their attention towards extending the boundaries of their kingdom. The whole earth they subjugated. Then Niśumbha with a large army marched to Devaloka to conquer Indra. A Devāsura war started. In the fight all the Dikpālakas were on one side and Niśumbha alone on the other side; the latter side was slightly defeated. Smitten by Indra’s Vajrāyudha Niśumbha fainted; his army also was broken.

As soon as news about the defeat of his brother was reported to him, Sumbha, with the remaining Dānavas hurried to Devaloka. In the battle that ensued the Devas were routed. Sumbha assumed Indra’s Divayūhā by force and the standard (flag) of the dāiyas was hoisted on the flag-staff of Sudharmā, the palace of Indra. Sumbha captured Kamadhenu, Aṅgāvata, Uccaiśrāvas etc. The Nandana garden and the shades of the Kalpaka tree were turned into resting places of the dāiyas. Fragrant flowers of the Kalp tree adorned the hairs of dāiyā women. Sumbha drove away Kubera and took over Alakāpuri also from him. As Yama ran away from the kingdom, Kālāpūri also came under Sumbha. All the Dikpālakas took refuge in forests and caves. Thousand years rolled by thus. By then the Devas worshipped Mahādevi, who appeared before them. Kauśikī devī, born from the body of Mahādevi stood before the Devas. As Kauśikī was dark in colour she came to be known as Kālikā also, Mahādevi, along with Kālikā started for the capital of Sumbha-Niśumbhas. At the capital they ascended a mountain and sat on two rocks. Mahādevi sang such a melodious song that birds and animals lost themselves in its sweetness and stood motionless.

The Candra-muṇḍas, who were at the time passing that way were also attracted by the music. Having understood what it all meant they hurried up to Sumbhāsura and gave him a description of the supreme beauty of Mahādevi and Kālikā. The description kindled great interest in Sumbha and Niśumbha about the devis and they deputed their minister Sūgriva to bring the devis over to them. Having heard Sūgriva’s mission Mahādevi told him as follows: “We do not have any objection to becoming the wives of your masters. But, in the matter of my marriage there is a special problem. While playing with my friends as a child I had accidentally taken a vow. I was at that age a bit proud about my capabilities and strength, and the vow I took was that I would marry only someone who was stronger than I am. My friends called me a ‘fool’ and ridiculed me about the vow. That only hardened my stubbornness and I stand by my vow even now. Therefore, please tell Sumbha first to defeat me in fighting.”

When Sūgriva carried this information to Sumbha, and Niśumbha, they felt amused that a woman challenged them to fight. But, they had no alternative but to fight. So they deputed the mighty dāiyā Dhūmārākṣa with an army to fight Devi, and there ensued a fierce fighting between Devi and Kālikā on one side and the big dāiyā army on the other side. The whole army and finally Dhūmārākṣa too was killed.

Devi then retired from the battlefield to a place nearby and blew the conch. Sumbha-Niśumbhas heard the sound from it, and the next moment a messenger came and told them about the fate of the army and of Dhūmārākṣa. They then sent a much greater army under Candra-muṇḍas against Devi. But Kālikā defeated them all. Raktabīja, who next encountered Devi with a great force, also became food for Kālikā. Then Sumbha-Niśumbhas entered the battlefield and they too were killed. Devas thus victorious regained Svarga. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

NIŚUMBHA II. The Mahābhārata mentions another Niśumbha, a dependant of Narakāsura. Śrī Krṣṇa killed this asura who towered up the path of the devas (devayāna) from the earth. (Śabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

NISUNDA. An asura killed by Śrī Krṣṇa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 12).

NITAMBHU. A great mahārṣi. He too was present in the company of the munis, who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 26,Verse 8).
NITHA. A king born in the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. (Vana Parva, Chapter 120, Verse 9).

NITIGOTRA. A king born in the Bhrigu dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIVĀTAKAVACA(S). A sect of Daityas.

1) Birth. Daityas were the off-springs of Kaśyapaprapājapati by Diti. Two sons called Hiranyakṣa and Hiranyakṣipu and a daughter called Sātinḥikā were born to the Prājāpati of Diti. Sātinḥikā was married by Viprāciti and to them were born Rāhu and others who became famous as the Sātinḥikyas. Hiranyakṣipu had four famous sons called Anūhāla, Hṛdā, Prahūśa (the great devotee of Viṣṇu) and Sāthāla. (Some texts refer to them as Anūrādha, Hṛdā, Prahūśa and Sāthāla). Hṛdā’s son was called Hṛdā, Sāthāla’s sons were called Ayūṃmā, Śibi and Bāṣkala, and Prahūśa’s son was called Virocanas. Mahābali was Virocanas’s son and Bāṇa was the eldest of the hundred sons of Mahābali.

Four crores of asuras called Nīvātakavacas were born in the family of Prahūśa. The army of the Asuras, which routed the Devas many a time, was formed by the Nīvātakavacas and Kālakeyas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

2) Fight against Rāvaṇa. After securing boons from Brahman Nīvātakavacas lived in the city of Manimati and they were a terror to the world. Rāvaṇa longed once to defeat them and so besieged their city with his army. The two sides fought fiercely for hundreds of years. At last Brahman intervened and conciliated them. From that day onwards the Nīvātakavacas became friends of Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

3) Annihilation. The Nīvātakavacas in company with the Kālakeyas attacked Devaloka. Indra, who could not withstand the attack, sent his charioteer Mātali to Arjuna and brought him down. Most of the Nīvātakavacas and Kālakeyas were killed in the fight by Arjuna. (See under Kālakeya).

NIVĀTAKAVACA/YUDDHAPARVA. A sub Parva in Vana Parva of Mahābhārata comprising of chapters 165 to 175.

NIVIT. A mantra or hymn. ‘Uktha and Nivit are recited after the offerings in a yāga. (Rgveda, Manndala 1, Anuvāka 14, Śūkta 86).

NIVITA. Brahman’s wearing upper cloth or the sacred thread on the left shoulder and under the right hand is called Upavita; the same on the right shoulder and under the left hand is called prācīnāvīta and the same worn as a garland around the neck is called Nivita.

NVRṬI. A king of the Yayāti dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIYATĀYU. Son of Śrutāyu. He was killed by Arjuna in the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 29).

NIYATI. A daughter called Laksṇi and two sons called Dīhatā and Vidhītā were born to mahrshi Bhrigu of his wife Khyāti. Dīhatā and Vidhītā married Ayati and Niyati, daughters of Meru. A son named Prāṇa was born to Vidhītā, and this Prāṇa became father of Mṛkanḍu and grandfather of Mārkanḍeya. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

Niyati after her death became a Devi, and she continues to worship Brahman in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 43).

NIYOGA. During the Vedic period there prevailed a system or custom which permitted either the husband or the wife who had no child by his wife or her husband to procreate a child in another woman or beget children by another man. That custom, called Niyoga fell into disuse after the Vedic period. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 256).

NODHAS. A muni who lived in the Rgvedic period. He achieved all his desires by praising the Devas. (Rgveda) NṛCĀKUSU. A king of the Yayāti dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NṛGA. A king born in the dynasty of Vaivasvata Manu. 1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahmā—Marici—Kaśyapa—Vivāsvāna—Vaivasvata Manu—Mahābāhu—Prasandhi—Kṣuṇa—Nṛga. Nṛga was the younger brother of Ikṣvāku. From Nṛga was born Sumati, from him the king called Jyotis, from Jyotis Vasu and from Vasu Pratikā.

2) Nṛga became chameleon. Nṛga was an extremely righteous and generous King. Once, at Puskara he gifted away thousands of cows to brahmins. There was a brahmin called Parvata living near Puskara. He too was given a cow and it was after that the brahmin named Anārata came. By then there remained no cow to be gifted. Anārata came after Parvata had gone into the forest after leaving the cow at the pond (Puskara). Nṛga had forgotten the fact that the cow had already been gifted away to Parvata and finding it there owner-less he gave it to Anārata, who went away with the cow very much pleased. The King and his ministers also returned to the palace.

A very short time afterwards Parvata returned to the pond and felt very sorry to miss his cow. He searched for it here and there and at last found it at Anārata’s house. Quarrl ensued between the two, Parvata alleging that Anārata had stolen his cow while the latter contended that it had been given to him by the King. Now, it was decided that the question should be submitted for arbitration to the King, and the contending parties went to the capital to see the King. At the palace they asked the gate-keepers to tell the King about their arrival. But, they did not tell the King, nor did he come.

Angered at this the brahmins cursed that Nṛga be converted into a chameleon and live as such for a thousand years. The King heard about the curse and ran up to the brahmins and requested for absolution from it. The brahmins then said that after one thousand years Mahāvīśu would incarnate as Śrī Kṛṣṇa and that at his touch Nṛga, the chameleon would resume his former form as King. According to this curse Nṛga was born as a chameleon in a neglected well at Dvārakā. One day Śamba and others who happened to go near the well tried their best to take the chameleon out of it, to no purpose. At last Kṛṣṇa with his attendants came and took it out of the well. At Kṛṣṇa’s touch it resumed its form as King Nṛga, and related the story of his curse to the onlookers, who stood there wondering

3) Other information.

(i) After his death Nṛga lived in Yama’s court worshipping him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 8).

(ii) Nṛga once conducted a yajña on the banks of the river Payosṇi in Varāhāthīrtha at which Indra drank soma so much as to get intoxicated, and the brahmins danced with pleasure at the very liberal gifts made to them. (Vana Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 5).
(iii) Nrga was a King very dear to Indians. (Bhishma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 7).
(iv) Krṣṇa granted salvation to Nrga who changed, at his touch, from chameleon to his former form as King Nrga. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 29).
(v) He did not eat flesh. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 29).

NRŚAD. A mahārṣi, who was the father of sage Kaṇva. (Ṛgveda, Mandala 10).

NRŚART. A Rṣi, who lived in the Ṛgvedic period. His son was deaf. (Ṛgveda, Mandala 1, Anuvāka 17).

NYAGRODHĀ. A son of Ugrasena. When Krṣṇa killed Kaṇḍa, Nyagrodha fought with Krṣṇa and others and was killed by the Balabhadrā’s shield. (Bhāgavata).

NYAGRODHATĪRTHA. A holy place on the banks of the ancient river Drṣadvatī in North India. (Vana Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 11).

O

O. This sound signifies Bhrāhma. (Agni Purāṇa; Chapter 348).

ODRA (M). An ancient province of India, Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 23 says that the King of this province had come to Dharmaputra with presents.

OGHARATHA. Son of the King named Oghavān. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 38).

OGHAVĀN I. Grandson of King Nrga. He had a son named Ogharatha and a daughter named Oghavati. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2).

OGHAVĀN II. A warrior on the side of the Kauravas. (M.B. Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 42).

OGHAVATI I. There are seven Sarasvatī rivers in the world. These are Suprabhā, Kancanākṣi, Viśālā, Manorāma, Sarasvatī, Oghavatī and Surenā. In the Mahābhārata, Salya Parva, Chapter 38 we find that Oghavatī was invoked and brought to Kurukṣetra. It was on the bank of this Oghavatī that Bhīma fell and lay on the Sarasaṇyā. (Bed of arrows). (M.B. Śaṅti. Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 5).

OGHAVATI II. Daughter of the King named Oghavān. Sudarṣāna, the son of Agni married her. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2).

OM. This sound is a combination of the three letters — A, U and M. The A—sound signifies Viṣṇu, the U—sound signifies Śiva and the M—sound signifies Bhrāhma.

Aṅkārī Viṣnu-ruddiṣṭa
Ukārastu Maheṣ-varaḥ/
Maṅkarastu śrītō Bhrāhma
Pranavastu trayāśīmekah/[ (Vāyu Purāṇa).

The sound “Om” is called “Pranava” or “Brahman.” All mantras begin with the sound ‘Om’. Because of its sacredness, Śūdras and other low-caste people are not allowed to utter it or to hear it. They may pronounce it only as “Aum.” This sound includes all that has happened and all that is to happen. (Māṇḍūkyopaniṣad).

OMPATU. (Malayālām word for nine).
Nine grahas (nine planets). Sun, Moon, Mars, Budha (Mercury), Guru (Jupiter), Sukra (Venus), Śani (Saturn), Rāhu and Ketu.

Nine Doṣa. Gulika, Viṣṭi, Gandāntam, Viṣa, Uṣṇa, ekārgalam, Sarpaśīrās, lāṭam and Vaidhiṃtam.
Nine Karmaśādhiśi. Śūrya, Candra, Yama, Kāla, Ākāśa, Vāyu, Agni, Jala and Bhūmi.
Nine Rivers. Sarasvatī, Vaiśārṇa, Āpaga, Manḍākini, Madhuvrāvā, Aṃlū, Kauśikī, Drṣadvatī and Hiraṇvatī.
Nine Dūti (s). Dāti, Dāsi, Śakhi, Ĉeṭi, Dhāreyi, Prātiveśini, Liṅgini, Sīlpinī and Svasati.

P

PA. A garden. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

PADAPĀTHA. An ancient system of studying the Vedas. (See under Ghanapātha).

PADĀRTHA. See under Pañcabhūta.

PADATTI. One of the eight sons of Janamejaya, a King of Kuruvarṣa. The others are Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu, Bālīhika, Niṣadha, Jambunāda, Kuṇḍodara and Vasāti. (The Pāṇḍu and Dhṛtarāṣṭra mentioned here are not the fathers of Kuruvarpaṇḍavas.).

PADMA I. A serpent born to sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kadru. (Śloka 10, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

PADMA II. A King. This King shines in the court of Yama. (Śloka 39, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PADMA III. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PADMA IV. A nidhi (treasure). This nidhi belongs to Kubera. (Śloka 39, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva). Saṅkhānīdhī, Padmanīdhī and a Puspakāmiṇā were presented to Kubera by Bhrāhma. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

PADMĀKARA. A Character in the story in Śiva Purāṇa describing the greatness of a Śivayogin. (See Rasbha).

PADMĀKETANA. One of the children of Garuḍa. (Chapter 101, Udhyoga Parva).

PADMĀKŪTA. The palace where Suprabhā wife of Śri Krṣṇa used to reside. (Dākṣiṇāyā Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

PADMANĀBHA I. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (See under Kauravas).

PADMANĀBHA II. A serpent. This serpent resides on the shores of the river Gomati which flows through Nāmisāranya. This serpent once went to Bhrīma and talked to him about Dharmā. (Chapter 355, Sānti Parva).

PADMAPURĀṇA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. (See under Purāṇas).

PADMARĀGA. See under Navaratna,
PADMASARAS. A lotus pond of Utara Bhārata. The Paṇḍavas on their way from Khāṇḍavaprastha to Girivṛaja met Śri Kṛṣṇa at this place and talked with him for a long time. (Chapter 20, Sabhā Parva).

PADMAŚAGANVHIKA. A lotus pond situated near Cedeśa. During the period of the Mahābhārata a company of merchants were attacked by wild elephants at this place. This is very nicely described in Chapter 66 of Vana Parva of Mahābhārata.

PADMAŚEKHARA. A Gandharva King. Padmāvatī of whom many stories are told in Kathāsārītāgama was the daughter of Padmaśekhara. Padmāvatīlamba of the said book is entirely devoted to stories about Padmāvatī.

PADMAVATI I. A river which is the incarnation of Mahālakṣmi. (See under Gaṅgā).

PADMAVATI II. Wife of Emperor Udayana. (See under Udayana).

PADMAVATI III. Wife of Candragupta son of Sahasramukharaṇa. (See under Sahasramukharāṅa).

PADMAVATI IV. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PADMAVATI V. Daughter of Satyaketu, King of Vidarbha. Ugrasena married her. After marriage she went and stayed once in her father's house for a short period. During that time through illegal intimacy with a messenger from Kubera named Gobhiṭa she became pregnant. She started to destroy the foetus when from inside a voice said "I am being born to wreak vengeance on Mahāviṣṇu for killing Kālanemi." The son born thus was Kātiṣṭa. (Srṣṭikāṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PADMAVATI VI. Wife of a Vaiśya named Pranidhi. Once Pranidhi went to a neighbouring village for trade. Padmāvatī and her companions were one day bathing in a river nearby when a Śūdra passed that way. Attracted by her dazzling beauty he remained there talking to her. The Śūdra named Dharmaśivajja was greatly enamoured of her and the companions of Padmāvatī, noticing that, just to make fun of him said "If you abandon your life at the point where the rivers Gaṅgā and Yaṃnā meet you can attain Padmāvatī." Without any hesitation, thinking that what they said was true, he went and ended his life at the place suggested. Immediately he became a replica of Pranidhi and stood before Padmāvatī. The real Pranidhi also came there then. Padmāvatī was in a fix to choose the real husband. Mahāviṣṇu appeared before them then and asked Padmāvatī to accept both of them as her husbands. Padmāvatī pleaded it was forbidden for women of her community to accept more than one husband and then Mahāviṣṇu took all the three along with him to Vaikuṇṭha. (Kriyā Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 4).

PAHLAVA. A place of human habitation of ancient India. This is situated in the western zone. (Śloka 68, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PAIJAVA. A Śūdra. This Śūdra conducted a grand Yajña similar to Aindrāngayajña and gave as fees to priests a lakkh of gold vessels. (Chapter 6, Śānti Parva).

PAILA. A disciple of Vyāsa. It was the five disciples of Vyāsa named Sumanu, Jaimini, Paila, Šuka and Vaiśampāyana who gave publicity to the original Mahābhārata. (See under Guruparamparā).

He was the son of a person named Vasu and attended the Rājasūya of Yudhisṭhira. (Śloka 33, Chapter 33, Sabhā Parva). Paila was also one among those who visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 6, Chapter 17, Śānti Parva).

PAILAGARGA. An ancient sage. Ambā, daughter of the King of Kaśi, once practised austerity in the āśrama of this sage. (See under Ambā).

PAIṢĀCA. A kind of marriage. (See under Vivāhā).

PAITĀHAKA. An asura. This asura was killed by Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

PĀKA. A mighty asura. Once this asura gathered a big army and went to fight against Indra. A grim battle which lasted for several days took place in which the asura army was destroyed and Pāka killed. Indra got thenceforth the name Pākaśāśana. (Chapter 70, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PAKAL. Malayālam word meaning Day. A story about the origin of day, night, dawn and dusk is contained in Viṣṇu Purāṇa. At the time of the great Deluge everything from gods down to the rocks lay submerged in Parabrahman (Supreme Being). Brahmā sat in meditation to initiate what he termed as Jagatṣṛti, the four species of living beings like the devas, asuras, piṭṛs and men. When the meditation proceeded, the Tamogūṇa in Brahmā became prominent and so first and foremost of all, the asuras were born from his waist. Then Brahmā discarded his Tamogūṇa and the manifestation of the discarded Tamogūṇa became Night. Brahmā sat again in meditation and from his face sprang out the devas, who were embodiments of sattvagūṇa. Brahmā discarded the sattvagūṇa and it then became Day. That is why asuras are powerful at night and devas by day. Then another manifestation with sattvagūṇa predominating sprang out from Brahmā and it was called Piṭr. Brahmā discarded that also and it became Dusk. Brahmā sat again in meditation and then were born men who were a manifestation of Rajogūṇa. Brahmā discarded that also and it then became Dawn. That is why men are strong at dawn and the piṭṛs strong at dusk. It is because of these that it is said that day, night, dawn and dusk are bodies of Brahmā. All the above four are an asylum of the three gunas.

Night is called Uṣā and day, Vyuṣṭi. Sandhyā (dusk) is the time between Uṣā and Vyuoṣṭi. When the fierce and terrible Sandhyā commences, a set of ferocious demons called Mandeśas desire to eat the Sun. A fight ensues then between the Sun and the demons and by a curse of Pajāpati the demons die daily though their bodies never perish. At that time the best of Brahmims with the sound of ‘OM’ vibrating recite the gāyatrī and throw water upwards. That water transforms itself into Vajrāṇudha and burns to death the wicked demons. The first oblation to the sacrificial fire is performed reciting the mantra which begins with “Sūryojyothi ‘OM’ is but Bhagavān Viṣṇu, lord of the Vedas with the lustre of Rk, Yajus and Sāma. The very utterance of the word ‘OM’ therefore, destroys the demons Mandeśas. (Chapter 8, Arūṣa 2, Chapter 5, Arūṣa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PĀKHAṆDA. An ancient place of habitation in Daśkaṇa Bhārata. Sabadeva one of the Paṇḍavas sent his messengers and subdued the country. (Śloka 70, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
PÄKKANÄR. Vararuci, the celebrated astronomer, got of a Caṇḍāli wife twelve sons. They were called “Paracci peṭṭa pāntulkalam (The twelve sons born of a Caṇḍāli).”

They were:
1. Agnihotri.
2. Rajakan.
3. Ulayanur Taacan.
4. Vallen.
5. Vayyillākkunnilappan.
7. Vaṭutala Nāyar.
8. Uppukutṭan.
11. Akavūr Cattan.

Pākkānar’s wife was a very chaste woman devoted to her husband. There are two stories demonstrating the devotion she showed to her husband.

(i) It was usual for all the sons of Vararuci excepting Vayyillākkunnilappan to assemble at the house of Agnihotri for the Śrāddha of their father annually once. Once after the Śrāddha, all of them sat together for their meals and the antarjanam (wife) of Agnihotri refused to serve an assembly consisting of Pākkānar, a Caṇḍāla. When Agnihotri compelled her to do it she came to the place hiding her face with an umbrella. Pākkānar enquired about the purpose of the umbrella and Agnihotri replied that it was the duty of chaste and devoted wives to hide their faces from other men. Then Pākkānar argued that still the brahmin wives who hid their faces were lacking in devotion and chastity and the Caṇḍāla women were the only class of women who were chaste and devoted to their husbands. Everybody present there joined sides with Agnihotri and opposed the argument of Pākkānar. To demonstrate the devotion of Caṇḍāla wives Pākkānar took Agnihotri to his house. On reaching there Pākkānar called his wife and asked “How much paddy do you have here?” “Five measures”, she replied. “Pour half of it and bring it to me”, Pākkānar instructed. The dufiful wife pounded the paddy, cooked the rice and brought it to Pākkānar. Pākkānar asked her to throw the rice into the drain. She did it without the least hesitation. Pākkānar then asked his wife to pound the remaining paddy and bring the rice cooked as before. She did so and when she brought it before Pākkānar he asked her to throw that also away into the drain. She instantly obeyed. That day both of them went without meals. They were so poor.

The next day Pākkānar along with Agnihotri went to the illam (house) of Agnihotri. Pākkānar then asked Agnihotri to make his wife do exactly like what Pākkānar’s wife was made to do. Agnihotri immediately called his wife and asked her to take two and a half measures of paddy, pound it, cook it and bring it to him. “There is rice here ready in stock and so why should we pound paddy now?” Agnihotri’s wife questioned. But Agnihotri insisted and so surrendering to the compulsion she did as she was instructed. When she brought the rice before him cooked, Agnihotri asked her to throw it away into the drain. She hesitated first but when Agnihotri insisted she did so very reluctantly. Then Agnihotri asked her to take another two and a half measures of paddy, pound it and bring the cooked rice once again. The antarjanam (wife) flew into fury and showered on her husband a heap of abuses. She went and hid inside and despite repeated requests from Agnihotri she never showed her face out again. Agnihotri admitted defeat and accepted Pākkānar’s view that a Caṇḍāli woman was more chaste than a brahmin woman.

(2) Once Agnihotri came to the hut of Pākkānar. Pākkānar called his wife to bring a ‘palaka’ (a wooden plank used for sitting) for Agnihotri to sit on. She was at that time drawing water from a well and the bucket was midway in the well with water. The instant she heard her husband call her she left the grip on the rope and rushed to the side of her husband. She did what was asked of her to do and then returned to the well. Pākkānar followed her taking Agnihotri along with him. When they reached the well Agnihotri was dumb-founded. The bucket with water was staying in mid-air in the well exactly at the position at which Pākkānar’s wife had left it. The power of the chastity of the woman. (See under Vararuci.)

PAKSA. See under Kālamāṇa.

PAKSĀLIKA. A female follower of Subrahmanyā.

PAKSIVAMŚA. The Purāṇic version of the origin of birds is given below:

Descending in order from Viṣṇu came Brahmā—Marici—Kasyapaprājapati. The latter got of his wife Tamrā (daughter of Dakṣa) five daughters named Kruñci, Bhāṣi, Śyenī, Dhrṭarāṣṭri and Śukī. From Krucicī were born the Ulūkka, Bhāṣī gave birth to Bhāṣas, Śyenī to vultures and Dhrṭarāṣṭri to swans and geese. From these originated the entire bird family of the world.

(Paṭh 4, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana.)

PAKTHĀ. A King of Vedic times who was a protege of the Āsins. Indra was king to this King. In the Dāsarājīna battle Paktha fought against Sudās on the side of Trasadasu. (Maṇḍala 7, Ṛgveda.)

PĀLA. A measure of ancient times. (See under Trasa-renu.)

PĀLA. A serpent born of the race of Vāsuki. This serpent committed suicide at the Sarvasatarā of Jana-mejaya. (Sok 51, Chapter 57, Ādi Paṛva.)

PAŁAKA. A son born to the King Caṇḍaṃahāsena of his wife Angāravaṭī. Angāravaṭī got two sons. The other son was named Gopālaka. (Kathāmukhalambaka, Kathāsaritsagāra.)

PAŁAKĀVYA. The author of one of the famous book ‘Hastā-yuvremaathītā’. This book contains 160 chapters dealing with Mahārasthānā (great diseases), Kṣudra-rasthānā (minor diseases), Saḷyasthānā (extraction of extraneous matter from the body) and Uttarasthānā (diseases of the head). Pālakāvyā taught this Āyurveda-mathītā to Rāmapāḍa, King of Aṅgadeśa. (Agni Purāṇa.)

PALALĀ. One of the seven mothers of Subrahmanyā. The other six are: Kāki, Halimā, Brahmikā, Mālīni, Aryā and Mitrā. (Sok 10, Chapter 228, Vana Paṛva.)

PAŁŚAVANA. A sacred forest. Once the sage Jama-dagni performed a sacrifice in this forest. On that occasion all the rivers in the world were present there carrying their water. The sage at this Yāga gave wine to all the other sages to their heart's content. (Sok 16, Chapter 94, Vana Paṛva.)

PĀLĪ. A corrupt form of Sanskrit.

PĀLITA. A rat, a character in ‘Bidālo pākhyānā’. This rat held a conversation with Lomaśa, a cat. (See under Bidālo pākhyānā.)

PĀLITA. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sok 3, Chapter 46, Sālya Paṛva.)

PALLANTU. The name of the devotional songs sung by the Tamil devotional poet, Viśṇucittā.
PAŃCAKUḌĀ

8. Padārthas. Anything which can be named; a category.
9. Dravyas. An elementary substance, the substratum of properties.
10. Guna—a characteristic or property of all substances.
13. Vīṣa. A peculiar attribute, the eternal distinguishing factor of each of the nine drayyas.
14. Samaṇḍāya. Intimate union, inseparable inherence or existence of one thing in another.
15. Abhāva. Nullity or negation.
16. Śāṅkhya. Followers of the Śāṅkhya philosophy.
17. Advaitins. Followers of the Advaita philosophy.
18. Mimāṁsakas. Followers of the Mimāṁsā system of philosophy.
19. Paramātmā. The supreme being.
20. Atmā. The individual soul enshrined in the body.

According to Nyāya Vaiśeṣikasūtras there are seven Padārthas and they comprise nine kinds of Dravyas which are the Pañcabhūtas (five elements), Kāla (time), Dik (space), Atmā (soul), and Manas (mind). They are described below:

1) Pṛthvi (earth). The characteristic of this padārtha is smell. Pṛthvi is of two kinds, Nitya (eternal) and Anitya (perishable). Nitya is in the form of atom (paramāṇu) and anitya in the form of Kārya. They are classified into body, sense organs and objects.

2) Jala (water). Jala has a cold touch. It is of two kinds Nitya and Anitya. Nitya is in the form of paramāṇu (atom); Anitya in the form of Kārya.

3) Agni (fire). It generates heat. It is of two kinds, Nitya and Anitya. Nitya is in the form of paramāṇu and Anitya, in the form of Kārya. There are four kinds of Agnis: Fire of the earth, fire of the sky, fire of the stomach (digestive power) and the fire commonly used.

4) Vāyu (air). It is without form but with the sense of touch. It is also of two kinds, Nitya in the form of paramāṇu and Anitya in the form of Kārya.

5) Akāla (eternity). This is the carrier of sound. It is single and eternal.

6) Kāla (time). It is general cause for all actions embracing the elements. It is also single and eternal.

7) Dik. Places like north, south, east and west which are eternal.

8) Atmā (soul). It is related to knowledge and is of two kinds, Jīvātmā and Paramātmā.

9) Manas (mind). It is the sense-organ to enjoy pleasures. It is in the form of paramāṇu and eternal.

To know the views of Manu on the origin of the Pañcabhūtas see under Srṣṭi.

PAŃCAKUḌĀ. A nymph. Once Śuka, son of Vyāsa by his yogic powers entered the Ākāśa. Then a host of celestial maidens led by Pañcacakūḍā stood watching him in admiration. (See under Śuka)

Bhīṣma once told Dharmaputra that women were fickled minded and the cause of evils. To explain his statement he pointed out to the conversation between Nārada and Pañcacakūḍā. Nārada once conducted a world tour during the course of which he met Pañcacakūḍā and asked her the characteristics of women. She replied thus:

“Even beautiful, venerable and noble ladies would stoop to folly. It is not the habit of women to leave away charming men of wealth if they get them conveniently. Any woman can be tamed if you please her in the proper way. If women remain faithful to their husbands it is because they are afraid of scandal. They will enjoy men without looking into their age or figure. The desire for men in women can be compared to that of Antaka (god of Death) for the lives of men. This is the secret of womanhood." (Chapter 38, Anuśasana Parva).

PAṆCADEVĪS. Durgā, Rādhā, Lakṣmī, Sarasvatī and Śāvitrī are the Paṅcadevis. They are different forms of nature. (See under Devī and Prakṛti).

PAṆCAHANUS. A King of the race of Puru. He was the son of Śrījaya and the father of Somadatta. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

PAṆCAGAṆA. An ancient kingdom of Uttar Bhārata. During the time of the Paṅḍavas this country was prospering and Arjuna once conquered the ruler of this country. (Śloka 12, Chapter 27, Sahā Parva).

PAṆCAGAṆGĀ. A sacred place of Uttar Bhārata. The god of Death once sat at this place and practised penance. From then onwards the place was considered holy. (Śloka 23, Chapter 54, Droṇa Parva).

PAṆCAGNI. Rohini, a daughter and Soma, a son, were born to Niśā the third wife of Manu, an Agni. Besides there they got five sons in the form of Agni (fire) and these five are called Paṅcagnis. They are Vaśivānara, Viśvapati, Sannihita, Kapila and Agraṇī.

PAṆCAJA I. (PAṆCAJANA). A mighty asura. This asura lived inside a conch. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed this asura. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārāma were having their education in the āśrama of the sage Sāndipanī. On the eve of their completing their education an asura named Paṅcaja carried away the son of the sage while the child was bathing in the Prabhāsārththa and kept him inside a conch where the asura lived. The sage, greatly grieved asked his disciples to get him back his son as his Gurudakṣiṇā (fees for the preceptor). Accordingly Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma went to the banks of the river and prayed to Varuṇa. Varuṇa appeared before them and then told him about the mishap. With the help of Varuṇa they killed the asura Paṅcaja and got back the son of their guru. The conch in which the asura lived was taken by Kṛṣṇa. Because the conch belonged to Paṅcaja the conch got the name Paṅcajanyā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCAJA II. Sagara of the solar race got a son named Asamaṇijasa of his wife Keśī. He became famous as Paṅcaja. He was the father of Amśumān and grandfather of Dilipa. (Chapter 15, Harivāmśa).

PAṆCAJANA. A Prajāpati. He gave his daughter Paṅcajanī (Aśikīnī) in marriage to the great sage and law-giver Daśa. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCAJANAS. Brahminas, Kṣatriyas, Vaśiyas and Śūdras are the four castes. Niṣādas form the fifth caste. All these five are collectively called Paṅcajanas. (Śūkta 89, Anuvāka 14, Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

PAṆCAJANI. A beautiful daughter of Viśvarūpa. King Rṣabha of the lunar race married this girl and they got five sons named Sumati, Rāṣṭrabhrīt, Sudarśana, Āvaraṇa and Dhūmamuktė. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCAJANYA I. The conch of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (See under Paṅcaja).

PAṆCAJANYA II. A forest near the mountain of Raivataka. (Dākṣiṇātya Pātha; Chapter 38, Sahā Parva).

PAṆCAJANYA III. An agni (fire). It was so called because it was born of the parts of five sages. It was called Tapa also. (Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

PAṆCAKA. One of the two soldiers presented to Subrahmanya by Indra for the battle between the devas and asuras. The other was named Utkroṣa. (Śloka 33, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PAṆCAKARṢAVĀṬŚAYANA. A Vedic preceptor. Because Paṅcakarna was born in the family of Vatsya he got the name Vatsyayana. In the language of Yogic treatises the seven life-winds in the human head are called the 'Saptasūryas' (seven suns). Paṅcakarnavāṭśayana had a clear knowledge of these Saptasūryas and has given a vivid description of them. (Taittiriya Aranyaka).

PAṆCAKARAṬA. An ancient country of western Bhārata. Nakula, one of the Paṅḍavas, conquered this country. (Chapter 32, Sahā Parva).

PAṆCAKŚARAMĀṆḌAYMA. Namaśivāya composed of five letters (Na—māḥ—śī—vā—ya) is called the mantra of Paṅcakaraṇa. There is a story in Śiva Purāṇa about the powers one can acquire by uttering this mantra. (See under Kalāvai).}

PAṆCAŁA I. An ancient village of Bhārata. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PAṆCAŁA II. A sage. He worshipped God according to the doctrines laid down by Vāmadeva and by the blessing of God attained the Kramavībhāga in the Vedas. (Śloka 102, Chapter 342, Śaṅti Parva).

PAṆCAŁA III. An ancient country of Bhārata. Draupadi, wife of the Paṅḍavas, was the daughter of Drupada, King of Paṅcāla. (See under Drupada).

PAṆCAŁI. Draupadi, wife of the Paṅḍavas.

i. Previous births. Paṅcāli had many previous births. During all these births many gods blessed her saying that she would have five husbands when she was born as the daughter of Drupada. Stories about her previous births lying scattered in the Purāṇas are given below:

1) Māyāśīta. When Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were in exile in the forest with Śītā, Agni came to Rāma once and told him in private thus: "Oh Rāma, you have incarnated on earth to kill Rāvaṇa. The time for that is drawing nigh and ere long Rāvaṇa would carry away Śītā. It is not proper that Śītā, the incarnation of Lakṣmaṇī, should be touched by Rāvaṇa. Therefore I shall keep Śītā safe with me and I am giving you a phantom Śītā to be with you in her stead." Śrī Rāma took the Māyāśīta from Agni without even Lakṣmaṇa knowing it and handed over the original Śītā to the custody of Agni.

While thus Śrī Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Māyāśīta were living together in their hermitage a golden deer was seen one day in the precincts of their āśrama. Śītā was enamoured of the beautiful deer and wanted it. So Rāma keeping Lakṣmaṇa to watch over Śītā went in search of the deer. Śrī Rāma tried his best to capture the deer alive. But all his efforts failed and by that time he had come far from the āśrama following the deer. So he discharged an arrow and killed it. While falling dead the deer raised a cry imitating that of Rāma's and called Lakṣmaṇa for help. The deer was none other than Mārīca, the uncle of Rāvaṇa. On hearing the call for help Lakṣmaṇa rushed to the spot from where the sound came and Śītā was left alone.
for some time. Rāvana came to the ārāma at that time and took the Māyasītā away to Lāṅkā.

Rāma and Lāṅkāma went to Lāṅkā with an army of monkeys and after killing Rāvana took back Sitā to Ayodhya. Then Rāma in deference to public opinion put Sitā into the fire to test her purity. At that time god Agni taking back Māyasītā gave the real Sitā to Rāma, unscathed by the fire. Then, when Māyasītā was thus abandoned by Rāma she bowed down before Sri Rāma and Agni and asked them thus "What am I to do now? Where should I go?" They advised her to go to Puskara and do penance there and blessed her saying that at the successful end of her penance she would become Svārgalakṣmī. Paramaśīva was pleased by her penance and appearing before her asked her what boon she wanted. Māyasītā who had become Svārgalakṣmī by then requested Śiva to give her a husband. She repeated the request 'Patiṁ dehi' (Give me a husband) five times and Śiva said that she would have five husbands in her next life as the daughter of the King of Pāncāla with the name Kṛṣṇa.
(9th Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

ii) Nālāyani (Indrāṇa). Once there was an aged sage named Maudgalya. Nālāyani alias Indrāṇa was the wife of Maudgalya. Even though the wife was young and the husband old, Nālāyani was very chaste. The sage became very old, grey-haired and rugous, skeleton-like with a foul smell emanating from his body. He was always in an angry mood. Still Nālāyani stuck to him as a chaste, loving and dutiful wife. As time passed on Maudgalya became a leper. One day while the sage was eating, a finger of his broke and fell into the rice. With great calmness and devotion Nālāyani removed the finger from the rice and ate the rice.
Greatly pleased at this act of hers the sage asked her what boon she wanted and she replied she desired to have an amorous life with him as Pañcaśāārīra. Mau-dgalya granted her the boon and they both travelled the whole world enjoying an amorous life. When the sage took the form of a mountain Nālāyani became a river and when the sage took the shape of a flowering tree she became a creeper on it. They spent thousands of years like that and then Maudgalya became tired of a sexual life and returned to the ascetic life. Even after such a long period of erotic life Nālāyani was still lustful and she resented the decision of her husband to go back to the life of a hermit. She begged her husband to continue the same life for some more time. Maudgalya got cross when she thus caused hindrance to his penance and cursed her saying that she would in her next life be born as the daughter of the King of Pāncāla when she would have five husbands to satisfy her lust. Greatly grieved at this curse she practised severe austerities standing in the midst of Pañcaśāārī. Pleased with her penance Śiva appeared before her and blessed her saying that she would be born in her next birth in a very noble family and she would then have five husbands, good-natured, doing godly work and equal in valour to Indra. She then pleaded that she should be granted the boon to remain a virgin during the coitus with each of her husbands. Śiva granted that wish.
Then Śiva sent her to the river Gāṅgā, and asked her to fetch a beautiful young man whom she would be seeing there. Accordingly she went to the river to do as she was directed.

At that time all the devas joined together and performed a Yāga at Naimiśāranya. Kāla, the god of Death, was one of the chief priests for the function.
The Yāga lasted for a long time and since Kāla was consecrated for the Yāga he did not attend to his duties as the god of Death. Death came to a dead stop and men increased in alarming numbers and the devas were perplexed. They went to Brahmā and acquainted him with the frightening situation. Brahmā sent them to Naimiśāranya. They went there and were talking to Kāla when they saw a few golden flowers coming down the river. Getting curious Indra walked up the river to locate the origin of these flowers. When he reached the place of origin of Gāṅgā he saw Nālāyani there. Nālāyani took the beautiful young man to Śiva. Śiva was at that time engaged in a game of dice with Pārvatī and Indra did not then recognise Śiva. Indra in his arrogance argued that the whole universe belonged to him. Śiva jumped up enraged and ran after Indra who ran to the mouth of a cave. Śiva caught him and said that he would show him four Indras inside that cave. Both of them entered the cave and to the amazement of Indra he saw four other Indras sitting inside the cave. They were all the creation of Śiva and with the original Indra the number of Indras came to five. Then addressing Nālāyani who had followed them Śiva said, “Oh beautiful girl, do not be worried. All these five are your husbands. You will be born as the daughter of the King of Pāncāla. Then all these five will be born in the lunar race and will marry you.”
The Indras agreed to be born on earth and do the work of God. After that they all went to Mahāviśuṣa and requested him to give them mighty accomplices to fulfil their mission. Then Mahāviśuṣa plucked two hais from his body, one white and the other black, and dropped them on the ground. The black hair was born as Śri Kṛṣṇa and the white hair was born as Balarāma, to help the Pāṇḍavas later.

Pāncāli's two previous births can be explained thus:
Agni deva created Māyasītā who in turn became Svarga-lakṣmī to be born as Pāncāli. Māyasītā was a part of Mahālakṣmī and so also Nālāyani who became Pāncāli was a part of Lakṣmī. Pāṇḍavas are known to be the sons of five gods and they used for the procreation of the Pāṇḍavas Indrāṇīśā (part of Indra) thus making them all Indras. (Chapters 197 and 198, Adi Parva).

2) Birth of Pāncāli. Pāncāli was born in the palace of Drupada, King of Pāncāla. She had a brother named Dṛśṭadyumna. There is a story about their birth in the Purāṇas:
Drupada insulted Droṇa his classmate in the Gurukula and Droṇa kept in mind the insult to wreak vengeance on Drupada. Drupada, therefore, wanted a son to be born who would defeat Droṇa in a battle. Brahmā advised him to conduct a Yāga for that purpose. He decided to conduct one on a large scale and went about in search of a Yajñā (one who performs sacrifices according to Vedic rites) and reached Kalmāsapurī on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. There he saw a brahmin's house where lived two sages named Vajā and Upayāja.
They were in figure and nature alike. At first Drupada went to the younger of the two, Upayāja. He went near him and after massaging his feet and legs requested him to officiate in a Yāga aimed at getting for him a son to conquer Drauṇa in a battle. He promised to give him ten crores of cattle for that and also anything else the sage wanted. These promises did not make the sage consent to conduct the Yāga and so the King stayed at the āśrama serving the sage. A year went by and one day the sage appeared cheerful and told Drupada thus: "Oh King, my brother who was walking one day in a storm saw a fruit lying on his way and ate it without first ascertaining whether the fruit was pure or not. Again, I have seen him taking food from others freely and eating it. I think he is wishful about wealth and, perhaps, if you approach him he may help you."

Drupada went to Yāja and after serving him to please him made his request promising him much wealth. Yāja was ready to perform the Yajña. Upayāja came to them at that time and Yāja consulted his brother before going to perform the Yajña. The Yāga was successfully conducted and at the end the priest Yāja called the wife of Drupada and gave her hāvya (clarified butter). Because the hāvya was prepared by Yāja and was offered by Upayāja the sages said that the queen would get two children. While Yāja was offering oblations to the sacrificial fire a boy with a crown on his head and bearing a sword and a bow in his hands rose from the fire. The Āśvins present there then said that, that boy would kill Droṇa. He was named Dhṛṣṭadyumna. Then from the dais of the Yāga-fire emerged a beautiful lady of dazzling brilliance. Immediately a voice from heaven was heard to say thus: "This Sumadhyanā (a girl in her blossoming youth) would work on the side of God and will cause terror to the Kauravas."

Yāja blessed the wife of Drupada saying that the two children would thereforth call her mother. Yāja himself named the boy Dhṛṣṭadyumna and the girl according to the ethereal voice, Kṛṣṇā. Kṛṣṇā was dark in complexion. Kṛṣṇā was called Pārṣaṭi because she was the grand-daughter of Prṣaṭa and Draupadi because she was the daughter of Draupada and Pāṇcāli because she was the daughter of the King of Pāṇcāla. Pāṇcāli grew up in the palace of Drupada. (Chapter 167, Adi Parva).

3) Marriage. After escaping from the lac palace the Pāṇḍavas reached a village named Ekacakra after walking a long time through the forests. There they stayed in a brahmin's house. Every morning they would go in disguise for begging and return with the alms in the evening. This was their daily routine and one day while they were in their daily round they saw a group of brahmans and they said they were going to the Svayanīvara of the daughter of the King of Pāṇcāla. The brahmans invited them also to come along with them describing in detail the beauty of the girl and the elaborate and festive arrangements made for the marriage. The Pāṇḍavas went to Pāṇcāla along with the brahmans. On the way they met Vedavyāsa and receiving blessings from him they went to the capital city of Pāṇcāla and took their abode in the house of a potter. Nobody knew who they were.

Drupada had placed a mighty steel bow in the marriage hall. When all the distinguished guests were seated in the marriage hall, the King announced that his daughter would be given in marriage to him who bent the steel bow and with it shot a steel arrow, through the central aperture of a revolving disc, at a target placed above. Many valiant princes from all parts of Bhoṛata including the Kauravas had gathered there. When it was time for the ceremonies to begin Pāṇcāli clad in beautiful robes with a bewitching charm which excited the royal assemblage entered the hall with a garland in her hands. Then Dhṛṣṭadyumna brother of Pāṇcāli said "Hear ye, oh princes, seated in state in this assembly, here is the bow and arrow. He who sends five arrows in succession through the hole in the wheel and unerringly hits the target shall win my sister."

Many noted princes rose one after another and tried in vain to string the bow. It was too heavy and stiff for them. Then Arjuna rose and meditating on Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme God, strung the bow with ease and hit at the target. Pāṇcāli then put the garland on Arjuna's neck and accepting him as her husband went with him and stayed that night at the house of the potter. Drupada that night went to the house of the potter to make enquiries about his daughter and son-in-law. His joy knew no bounds when he knew that his son-in-law was none other than the celebrated Arjuna. The Pāṇḍavas then took Pāṇcāli to their home in Ekacakra and as soon as Kuntidevi heard the footsteps of her sons outside she said from inside asking them to share that day's alms among themselves little knowing that it was a bride that had been brought by them. Thus Pāṇcāli became the common consort of the five Pāṇḍavas. Then the marriage of Pāṇcāli was ceremoniously conducted after inviting friends and relatives. The Pāṇḍavas then built a new palace at Indraprastha and lived there. (Chapters 190 to 220, Adi Parva).

Śrī Kṛṣṇa was present there along with the leading members of the clan of Vṛṣṇi. He could recognise the Pāṇḍavas in spite of their disguise. Śrī Kṛṣṇa went to the potter's house and visited them. He gave them valuable presents on the occasion of their marriage.

4) Making Draupadi naked. Once Duryodhana challenged Dharmaputra to a game of dice. Dharmaputra lost all and in the end in despair pledged Draupadi and lost her. Immediately Duryodhana asked Vidura to bring Draupadi to his palace and make her serve as a servant-maid. Vidura did not consent to that. Then Duryodhana asked Prātikāmi to bring her. While entering the palace of Draupadi, Prātikāmi was as timid as a dog about to enter the cage of a lion. He informed Draupadi of his mission. Draupadi sent him back and then Duryodhana sent another messenger. Draupadi went with him to the court of the Kauravas. As soon as Duṣṭāsana saw Draupadi he jumped at her and caught hold of her hair and dragged her to the centre of the assembly. When Duṣṭāsana dragged her thus she said in piteous tones "I am in my monthly period and I have only the upper garment on me. Please do not take me to the assembly." Duṣṭāsana was not moved by these pleadings and he dragged her still.

Bhima could not hold himself calm against this atrocity any longer and in a roar of wrath he abused Dharmaputra for pledging Pāṇcāli thus and losing her. Arjuna however remonstrated gently with Bhima. Then to the consternation of all, Duṣṭāsana started his shameful work of pulling at Pāncāli’s robes to strip her of all the clothes. All earthly aid having failed Draupadī in utter helplessness implored divine mercy and succour. Then a miracle occurred. In vain did Duśśāsana toil to pull the garments completely and make her naked. As he pulled off each, fresh garments were seen to come from somewhere and cover her nudity. Duśśāsana retired from his work exhausted and disappointed. Then Karṣa ordered that Draupadī should be sent to the palace of Duryodhana as a servant-maid. Hearing this Duśśāsana once again started dragging her. Draupadī wept. Bhīma roared in fury and said that if his brother, Dharma-puṛa, gave him permission he would at that instant smash to death the Kauravas just like a lion killing the animals. Bhīṣma and Droṇa interfered and pacified him. Duryodhana stood up and striking his right thigh with his right hand challenged Bhīma to a fight. Bhāma-sena did not like Duryodhana exhibiting his naked thigh in front of Draupadī and an angered Bhīma declared that he would in a battle break Duryodhana’s thigh with his mace. Dhrṭarāṣṭra came to the scene and pacified both of them and turning to Pāncāli asked her to name any boon she wanted from him. Pāncāli said: “In order that my son, Pratīvindhīya, should not be called a ‘dāsapatra’ (son of a servant) his father Dharmapuṛa should be released from his servitude.” The boon was granted. Then she requested that all the other Pāndavas should be set free. That was also allowed. Dhrṭarāṣṭra then asked her to name a third boon. Pāncāli then said that all Kṣatriya women were entitled only to two boons and so there was no need for a third one. Then Draupadī took a vow that her hair which was let lose by the wicked Duśśāsana would be tied properly only by a hand tainted by the blood of Duśśāsana. After that in strict obedience to the conditions of the wager the Pāndavas started for the forests with Draupadī to spend twelve years in the forests and one year incognito. (Ten Chapters from Chapter 68, Sākāṭa Parva).

5) Vana-aśva of Pāncāli. (Life in the forests). During the exile of the Pāndavas in the forests Pāncāli was involved in many events of which a few important ones are given below:

(i) Kirmirā’s attack. When the Pāndavas were in the Kāmyakavana, Kirmirā, the brother of Baka, came to the aśrama where Pāncāli was taking rest. The demon was such a fierce-looking giant that Pāncāli was forced to shut her eyes by fright and she became weared like a river in the midst of five hillocks. Bhīmasena immediately ran to her rescue and killed Kirmirā. (Chapter 11, Vana Parva).

(ii) Pāncāli consoled Dharmaputra by her soothing words. (Chapter 27, Vana Parva).

(iii) Once when her woes became unbearable she condemned the devas. (Chapter 53, Vana Parva).

(iv) While the Pāndavas were on the mountain Gandhamadāna, Pāncāli persuaded Bhīma to bring for her the Saugandhika flower. (See under Bhīma).

(v) While the Pāndavas were living in the Badarikāśrama waiting for the return of Arjuna who had gone on a year’s pilgrimage, Pāncāli was carried away by Jaṭāśura. (See under Jaṭāśura).

(vi) After she was rescued from Jaṭāśura, Pāncāli along with her husbands dwelt in the hermitage of Arśataḥsena. (See under Arśataḥsena).

(vii) Once Draupadī gave instructions on the duties of a wife to Saṭyabhāma who came to the forests along with Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Chapters 233 and 234, Vana Parva).

(viii) Once Durvāsas with his disciples came to the forest as the guests of the Pāṇḍavas. They came late and Pāncāli had taken her food already. The Aksyapātra (the never-empty pot) could not be invoked to produce anything that day and Pāncāli was greatly agitated and worried. She prayed to Śri Kṛṣṇa for succour and Śri Kṛṣṇa also coming hungry searched in the pot for something to eat and finding a bit of spinach sticking to the sides of the pot grabbed it with avidity and ate it. The guests felt as if they had enjoyed a sumptuous feast and left the place well pleased. (See para XII under Duryodhana).

(ix) Jayadratha carried away Pāncāli from the forests once. The Pāṇḍavas rescued her. (Para 4 under Jayadratha).

6) Life incognito. After their twelve years of exile in the forests the time for living in disguise for a year came and Dharmaputra and his brothers with Pāncāli spent that period in the palace of the King Virā. Each assumed a new name and accepted different types of service under the King. Pāncāli took the name of Sairandhri and served as a companion and attendant to the princess. One day Kica, the mighty brother-in-law of the King, tried to molest Pāncāli and Bhīmasena killed him. (See under Kica). It was at the time when the incognito life was coming to an end that the Kaurava army headed by Duryodhana carried away the cattle of the King Virā. The King was absent from the palace at that time and the prince, Uttara, had not the guts to go and attack the Kaurava army. It was Pāncāli who then suggested sending of Bhājanala of the palace (Arjuna) to serve as charioteer of Uttara. (See under Arjuna, Para 24).

7) Subsequent events. The thirteen years of life in exile and incognito came to an end. But the Kauravas were not prepared to give half of the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas. The differences between them increased and it led to a great war. Śri Kṛṣṇa agreed to go as a messenger to the court of Dhrṭarāṣṭra and ask for the share of the Pāṇḍavas. Before leaving he asked each of the Pāṇḍavas what he should say at the court of Dhrṭarāṣṭra. Pāncāli then approached Kṛṣṇa in private and said she desired for a war to defeat the Kauravas. She then reminded Kṛṣṇa of a vow taken by Bhīmasena that he would tie her hair with his hands smeared with the blood from the thigh of Duśśāsana.

The peace-mission of Kṛṣṇa failed and the famous Kurukṣetra battle started. Many valiant warriors on both the sides were killed. When Abhimanyu was killed Subhadra wept bitterly and Pāncāli who went to console her fainted. Śri Kṛṣṇa revived her. Pāncāli asked Bhīmasena to bring to her the inborn jewel on the head of Aśvatthāma, son of Droṇa. She wanted to take revenge on him for killing her brother Dhrṣṭa-dyumna.
After a fierce battle for eighteen days the Kauravas were defeated and their tribe annihilated. Pândavas took hold of Hastinápura and Pâncâli was one among those who persuaded Dharmaputra to take charge of the administration of the state as its ruler. Dharmaputra performed an Āsvamedha-yajña and Pâncâli gave presents to Citrāṅgadā and Ulāpi who were present for the function then. After the Āsvamedha Draupadi lived in Hastinápura serving Kunti and Gandhārī alike for a long time. It was at that time that Dhrtrāśtra, Gandhārī and Kunti went to the forests and Draupadi expressed her desire to go along with them to be of help to them. But they did not allow her to do so. While the Pândavas were living in Hastinápura as the rulers of the country eminent rśis from different parts of the country visited them and some of the Śiddhas (realised souls) among them saw Pâncâli as the goddess Mahālakṣmī herself. (Sloka 9, Chapter 25, Āśrama-vāśika Parva.)

8) Death of Pâncâli. At the end of their life the Pândavas crowned Parīkṣit as the King of Hastinápura and started on their Mahāprāštāna. They travelled for long through the Himalayas and reached Mahāmeru. At that time Pâncâli fell down dead. Then Bhīmasena asked Yudhiṣṭhira why without any particular ailment Pâncâli died. Yudhiṣṭhira replied that it was because she showed special interest in Arjuna. The Pândavas walked on and all of them excepting Dharmaputra died on the way one by one. Even before Dharmaputra entered svarga Pâncâli and the four brothers had reached there. (Chapters 1 to 4, Mahāprāštāna Parva.)

9) Sons of Pâncâli. Pâncâli had five sons one each from each of the five husbands. She got Prativindhyā of Yudhiṣṭhira, Śrutāsoma of Bhīmasena, Śrutakṛṣṇī of Arjuna, Śatānnika of Nakula and Śrutakarmā of Sahadeva. (Sloka 73, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva.)

PĀNCĀLIKA (PĀNCĀLIKESA). A Yakṣa who was a son of Kubera. In some parts of Bhārata this Yakṣa is worshipped as a deity. It is believed that Śiva had given Pāncālika a boon that he who worships him whether he be man or woman, young or old, would become intoxicated with vigour. There is a story behind Pāncālika obtaining this boon:—
When Satī who was insulted at the Dakṣayāna was consumed by fire a bereaved Śiva sat inactive and moody at a lonely place. When this continued for a long time Kāmadeva (god of love) at the request of the other devas sent arrows against him and made him lustful. Siva then started running passionately calling the name of his wife and finding her nowhere jumped into the river Kālindī to commit suicide. (The waters of Kālindī became black from that time onwards.) Kālindī was unable to bear the burden of the soul of Śiva and so he had to get out to the shore and run again. At this time Kāmadeva sent another arrow, unmādāstra (arrow of intoxication) also against Śiva. Śiva could not bear the impact of the two arrows together and he laboured under great strain. Just then he saw Pāncālika son of Kubera coming that way. Śiva then made him understand his difficulties and requested him to take charge of the force of the arrows from him. Pāncālika did so and saved Śiva from his toil. Pleased at this Śiva blessed him. He said that Pāncālika will be worshipped by people in the month of Caitra and all those who do so will be invigorated. He added that henceforth he would be known as Pāncālikeśa also.

PĀNCALYA. An āśrama of ancient Bhārata. This was the place where Nyagrodha, King of Pāncāla, performed penance for a long time. (Sloka 11, Chapter 90, Vana Parva.)

PĀNCAMAHĀYAJṆĀ. For a Gṛhasthā-āśrama (householder) the following five apparatuses are unavoidable: A sifter, a grinding stone, a broom, a wooden mortar and a water-pot. It is believed that a sin is committed when each of these is used and to remove the sins thus committed the ancient sages have prescribed five yajñas and these five yajñas are called the PaṇcamahāyajṆās. They are the BrahmayajṆā, PitrayajṆā, DevayajṆā, BhūtayajṆā and the MānuyajṆā. Reciting of Vedas is BrahmayajṆā. Pleased the manes by offering rice or libations of water is called PitrayajṆā. Giving offerings to the demi-gods in the sacrificial fire is called DevayajṆā and religious offerings of rice to the cows is called BhūtayajṆā. Giving food for the guests is called MānuyajṆā. One who does not do the PaṇcamahāyajṆās is no better than dead. Some scholars have classified the PaṇcamahāyajṆās as Huta, Prahuta, Brahmâyuta, Prāṣṭā and Ahuta.

Japō huto huto homah
Prahuto bhautiko balih //
Brahmyam hut纳税 dvijāngyarccā
Prā: itum pitira-pānam. //
Ahuta is BrahmayajṆā, huta is devayajṆā, prahuta is bhūtayajṆā, brahmâyuta is mānuyajṆā and prāṣṭā is pitrayajṆā. Even if at times one finds it not possible to do mānuyajṆā one must perform daily brahmayajṆā and dāivyajṆā. The offerings given to gods in the sacrificial fire go to the Sun. The Sun sends rains to the earth which in turn make the plants flourish. Vedas say that thus living beings increase. Just as all animals and objects depend on life-breath for living, a Brahmacārī, a Vānaprastha and a Sannyāsī depend upon a grhaṣṭha for sustenance. Therefore, the Gṛhasthā-āśrama is the best of all āśramas. (Chapter 3, Manusmṛti.)

PĀNCAMI. An ancient river of Uttra Bhārata. People used to drink water from this river. Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva.)

PĀNCANĀDA I. A land of the north-western side of Bhārata. This is at present called the Punjab. When Nakula conquered the western states he conquered Paścanāda also. (Sloka 11, Chapter 32, Mahābhārata.) Five rivers of names Vipāśa (Vyāsa), Śatrādu (Sutlej), Irāvati (Rāvi), Cndrabhāgā (Chenab) and Vitastā (Jhelum) run through this place and that is why the place is called Paścanāda.

PĀNCANĀDA II. A sacred place in Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in the holy pond of Kojitirtha there, one would get the benefit of performing an Aṣvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva.)

PĀNCAPRĀNAS. The five prānas (life breaths) of any living being are Prāṇa, Āpāṇa, Vyāna, Saṃāṇa and Udāna. There is a story in ‘Devi Bhāgavata’ regarding the origin of the Paṇcaprānas.
Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa met Rādhādevi at Rāsamandala and in seclusion they spent in sexual sport the period of one day of Brahма. Then Kṛṣṇa selecting an auspicious time dropped his vital fluid into her womb at the end of the sexual sport. Tired by the prolonged carnal sport and shaken by the impact of the hot semen Rādhādevi perspired profusely and the exhaustion produced deep and long breaths. The whole universe was covered with her sweat and her sighs became the goddess of the life-giving breaths of all created animals. From the left side of goddess was born Vāyupatni and to her were born the Pañcaprāṇas. Besides these, another five younger prāṇas were also born. From the sweat of the Devi was born Varuṇa and from the left side of Varuṇa was born Varuṇāni. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Māndūkīyopanisad gives the following details regarding the working of the prāṇas in the body:—Prāṇa was first used in the sense of breath. Later it got the meaning of life. Life is in fact breath to all living beings. Only when a man is awake, his mind and sense organs are active. But Prāṇa is active always both in the state of wakefulness and sleep. Therefore Prāṇa is the vigour of life. It may be said that when a man is asleep his senses merge with his mind and his mind with the prāṇa. The five factors of Prāṇa are the Pañcaprāṇas. The first of the five is called Prāṇa itself. It is called Mūkhyaprāṇa or chief Prāṇa. Just as a king appoints his ministers at different places to do specified jobs the chief Prāṇa posts the other prāṇas at different parts in the body with specific purposes of their own. Prāṇa is seated in the heart and does the work of breathing. Apāṇa is seated in anus and directs the organs of excretion of the body. Vyāna is spread throughout the body and it is this life-wind which keeps one alive even when breathing is stopped for some time. When an archer stands in deep concentration with his bent bow without breathing he lives with the help of Vyāna. Samāna controls the breathing-in and breathing-out to a specified rhythm. Samāna (equaliser) is so called because it balances the force of the in-coming and outgoing breaths. There is a school of thought that Prāṇa is not seated in the heart but spread over the ears, eyes nose and face. Samāna is seated at the navel midway between the seats of Prāṇa and Apāṇa. This is also a reason why life-wind got that name. This breath does the work of prompting digestion. The four prāṇas, Prāṇa, Apāṇa, Samāna and Vyāna sustain life. The fifth one, Udāna, takes the soul of the being out of the body when it dies.

PAñCĀPSARAS. A lake of distinction. During the exile of Śri Rāma in the forests, Agastyā showed Śri Rāma this lake and described its origin thus: "In times of old a sage named Māṇḍakāraṇī built this lake. This sage living on air alone stood in the waters of this lake and practised severe austerities for ten thousand years. Devas were frightened by the rigorous penance of Māṇḍakāraṇī and they sent five devakanyakās (celestial damsels) to the earth to entice the sage and stop his penance. This sage was attracted by the divine beauty of the girls and he lived with them in a grand building constructed within the lake itself. Even after the passing away of the sage and the damsels people used to hear dance and music from inside the lake. Because five apsaras lived in that lake it became known as Pañcāpsaras. (Apsaras = celestial damsels who are servants of Indra).

(Sarga 1, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

PAñCĀPSARAS. An āgama (a system of philosophy). (Chapter 218, Śānti Parva).

PAñCARĀTRA. A book of spiritual doctrines. Who learns this will attain the position of Uparicaravasu. (Śloka 23, Chapter 323, Śānti Parva).

PAñCASIKHA. A sage of ancient times. The Purāṇas give the following details about him. He was a disciple of Āsuri. He was brought up breast-fed by Kapīlā, wife of Āsuri and so he was known as Kapīla also. He dwelt in Pañcārosoratas and performed a Yāga for a thousand years and got his name Pañcāsikha. He went to the assembly of the learned king Janaka and entered into a polemic contest with him and defeated him. The defeated King gave Pañcāsikha great respect and he lived in the court of Janaka as his Guru for a number of years. (Chapter 218, Śānti Parva).

PAñCĀSVĀ. A King of the Puru race. (See under Puru-variṇa).

PAñCATANTRA.

A General Information. An ancient book of distinction written by the scholar Viṣṇuṛmāṇa in the form of stories for the use of children to give them an idea of the different aspects of life.

1) Origin. There is a statement in the Preface itself regarding the composition of this book: "Three sons were born to an emperor named Amarasakti. All the three were dull-witted. The emperor was very sorry for them but found no way to improve them. Greatly disappointed the King called the royal council and told them about his sons. Then one of the members of the council, a man named Sumati, stood up and said "Oh! best of Kings, let us not try to teach your children the Vāstras one by one. It will not only be unpleasant study but would also take a long time to complete. If we can mix all the Vāstras cleverly and make it palatable like sweetmeats the children would take it easily. There is a suitable man also for this work in our state. He is Viṣṇuṛmāṇa, a kind-hearted scholar who is not only well-versed in all the Vāstras but also an adept in the art of the up-bringing of children. I am sure he would make your children wise and learned." When the emperor heard this he sent for Viṣṇuṛmāṇa and told him everything. After understanding well the nature of his would-be disciples and the ambition of their father, Viṣṇuṛmāṇa took charge of his wards and within six months he taught the sons of the emperor the science of government. The stories which he used to teach them the science of administration were all compiled into a volume called Pañcatantra."
to this are a crow and an owl. The fourth tantra is called Labdhapranāśa. It describes how a man loses what has come into his possession by his foolishness. A monkey and a crocodile are the characters in this story. The fifth tantra is Aparikṣīkatāraka. It deals with the bad side of not looking into all the possible aspects of what you hear. Several stories are there to illustrate this point.

3) Popularity of the book. Though no correct records are there in history in support of the belief, it is believed that Ambarāśakti was the ruler of Mahālārāpya in Deccan and that Pāñcatantra must have originated from there. But Pāñcatantra received a global publicity and popularity and was translated from Sanskrit into many other languages. Directed by King Kosru Anurāśva, a Persian poet named Būryoe translated it into the Persian language during the period 531–575 A.D. That translation is not available at present. In the year 570 A.D. it was translated into the Syrian language by a poet named Bud. A scholar named Abdulla Ibaal Mogāfī in the year 750 A.D. translated it into the Arabic language. It was from this Arabic translation that it was translated into many European languages. The Greek translation appeared in the year 1000 A.D., Hebrew in 1100 A.D., Latin in 1270 A.D., German in 1480 A.D., Italian in 1582 A.D. and French in 1678 A.D. Next to the Bible this is the book which has received the greatest publicity and popularity. The great linguist Hertel says that Pāñcatantra has appeared in about 200 translations in fifty different languages.

4) Period of composition. Because the translation into the Syrian language appeared in the year 570 A.D. it must have been composed earlier than that date. Again, since it takes at least two centuries for a work to get popular enough to be translated into a foreign language, the composition must have been done early in the fourth century A.D. Some believe that the work was done in Kashmir. While others assert that it was written in Magadha. The original title of the book is believed to be 'Karataka and Damanaka' by a few.

5) Two editions. Two different editions of the book are now found. One edition popular in Kashmir is known as Tāntākāhyāyīkā. The other is in the form found in Kathāsārītāgāra and Bhātakaṭhāmāṇjāri. The original Sanskrit work is very rarely found. There are several editions of this in Dakhṣiṇa Bhārata. Changes in the stories according to the change of times are also noted. (History of Classical Sanskrit Literature).

B. Contents (Stories).

1) Mitraabheja. There was once a very good merchant in the land of Mahālārāpya called Vardhamāna. He was once travelling in a bullock-cart. One of the bullocks drawing the cart was named Sānjivaka. The leg of Sānjivaka broke on the way striking against a stone. Leaving the bullock to the charge of four of his attendants Vardhamāna continued his journey. When night came the attendants were frightened by the surrounding forests and so, leaving the bullock to its fate the attendants left the place. The bullock got well and it roamed about in the forests bellowing loudly. The King of the forests, Pingalaka the lion, was frightened by the bellowing of the bullock.

The lion remained in the forest without stirring out from its cave. The minister of the lion was a fox. That fox had two sons named Karataka and Damanaka. Damanaka wanted to know what made the lion worried and told his brother about it. Karataka advised him not to interfere unnecessarily with the affairs of others and told his brother Damanaka a story to stress his point.

A group of sawers were sawing wood near a temple for its construction. At lunch time one of the sawers placed a wedge on a half-sawn timber and went for his midday meal. One of the monkeys sitting on the branch of a tree near the temple jumped on to the half-sawn timber and pulled out the wedge. His tail had fallen without his knowing into the space between the sawn planks and when the monkey later jumped out from the timber his tail was wedged between the planks and the tail got crushed. If you poke your nose into the affairs of others without any purpose such dangers are sure to happen.

Hearing that, Damanaka said, "Brother, are we serving the lion, our master, just for our food? If we want only our food what difference is there between ourselves and the dog? Have you not seen the uproar the dogs make when they see food. A dog has no modesty, humility or self-confidence. Some men are also like that. But some others are not like that. Look at the elephant. It never makes an exhibition of its happiness when it gets its food. Its majestic stand, look and gestures are worth noticing. The best of men are also like this. Everybody should keep this in mind. He who earns his livelihood without depending on others but does it by his own wits and efforts is the most revered of men. But food is not enough, we must earn fame also. So even though we are children we must try to remove the worry that hangs over our lord, the lion."

The brother was not moved by this philosophy of Damanaka and so he said again, "Anywhere and in any venture success is difficult to achieve and failure is very easy. It is difficult to rise up but it is easy to fall down. It is a very hard labour to roll a stone up a mountain but to push it down from the top is very easy. He is blessed who can read correctly the thoughts of other people. I have, looking at the face of our King, understood that something big is worrying him."

Karataka said, "Admitting what you say to be correct how are we to know the thing that worries, the King? It is a dangerous task." Damanaka said "Regarding the achievement of success, there are three kinds of people namely the Uttama (best), the madhyaama (mediocre) and the adhama (worst). The adhama type will never start a venture fearing failure. The madhyaama type would start his endeavour but would turn back at the sight of obstacles. But the Uttama type would never turn back without achieving success. They are the adorable type of men in this world. The Uttama would act according to the circumstances of the situation. If he wants to talk to another and obtain a favour from him he would not go to him at random without looking into the time, place and opportunity to do so. Even Bhraspati has his moods. In fact, there is nothing impossible in this world. Disappointment and failures are due to want of experience and lack of endeavour. The great ocean with its huge rolling waves gives one a fright at first sight. But if he starts bathing in it for a long time he finds it not so unapproachable or ghastly."

When Karataka heard these moral preachings of his brother he allowed him to do what he wanted to do. Damanaka went to the cave of the lion. Far from the cave itself Damanaka started walking humbly with his head bent down. The lion saw Damanaka walking thus to him and was immensely pleased. The King of the beasts asked him thus “Damanaka, it is a long time since I saw you and your brother. Why is it that you both, sons of my minister, do not come and see me as often as your father?”

Damanaka replied very humbly “Oh mighty King, of what use can we insignificant creatures be to you? Yet, if one thinks over it, even little things can also be of use at times to great people.” Damanaka then recited to the King a poem which in substance was thus: “Even grass over which we trample while walking, is of use as fodder to the cattle. Some are used for cleaning the teeth and still some, dry and brittle, to tickle the ear when it itches badly. Great men retain their greatness even when they fall. A burning torch would send its flame only upwards even when you keep it upside down. Similarly all things will shine only in their proper places. An ornamental waist belt would not shine round a neck nor would bangles shine on one’s ears. Anyhow let me ask your highness one question. Is it true that when your highness went to drink water something happened to make your highness worry?”

Piṅgalaka the lion said: “What you say is correct. When I went today to drink water in the river I heard the horrifying bellow of a fierce animal and was frightened. I am thinking of leaving this forest and going to some other one.”

Damanaka said “Oh Lord, be not frightened. Appearances are often deceptive and cannot be believed. I shall tell you the story of a fox who mistook an ordinary drum for an animal with good flesh. Once a fox saw a drum lying in a battlefield. It was making a sound when the wind blew over it. The fox mistook it for an animal with plenty of flesh and blood. Rejoicing at the prospect of having a hearty meal the fox mustered courage and went near it. It tore the leather open. Only then could it understand its blunder.”

The King liked the story very much. So he sent Damanaka to enquire where the bellow came from. Damanaka found out Saṅjīvaka, the ox and told him everything and added that he had been sent by the King to fetch him to his presence. Saṅjīvaka was at first afraid to go but the consoling words of Damanaka gave him courage and it went to the lion. The lion and the ox became great friends and gradually the intimacy developed to such an extent that the King of the beasts started becoming indifferent to the welfare of the other beasts in the forest. The subjects of the King Piṅgalaka were in trouble.

Feeling sorry for his own actions Damanaka went to his brother and said, “All this happened because of our own fault. I shall tell you a story about a self-made calamity. Once an ascetic named Devaśārmā was afraid of robbers. So he stitched into his robes all the money he possessed. Somehow a robber named Āśādhabhūti came to know of it and he made friends with the ascetic and acted as his servant pretending to be very faithful. Devaśārmā got confidence in him and one day he went to bathe handing over all his guarded wealth into the hands of Āśādhabhūti. On his way back from the river after his bath Devaśārmā saw two goats fighting against each other. Blood was flowing from the heads of both the goats and still the fight continued. A fox came there to drink the fresh blood flowing from their heads and he went and started licking the blood that had dropped between the two fighting goats. The goats came again and hit against each other with force and the fox that was standing between the two and licking the blood greedily was crushed to death. When he returned after witnessing the fight the ascetic found that his servant had gone away with his cash.”

Karaṭaka liked the story very much. They then discussed ways and means of getting out of this calamity. Damanaka said that any object can be achieved by cleverness and told his brother a story to illustrate his point. He said “Once a crow made his abode on a tree with his wife and children. After some time his wife began to lay eggs but all of them disappeared one by one. They made enquiries and found that the culprit was a big cobra living beneath the same tree. They were no match to the cobra and so they sought the advice of their friend, a fox.

The fox said, “I shall suggest a way to get out of the danger. Have you not heard the story of an old stork who got his food by his cleverness? The stork went to the banks of a pond feeling hungry. There were plenty of fishes in the pond. The stork stood still on the banks pretending to be sad. A crab seeing the sad-looking stork came and enquired the cause of his grief. The stork said ‘You well know that we storks live on flesh and fish. I now understand that a fisherman has planned to catch all the fish in this pond. This is the cause of my worry.’ The fishes who overheard this conversation between the crab and the stork came before the stork frightened and requested him to save them from the fisherman somehow. The stork said ‘I am not strong to fight the fisherman. But I can do what little help I can give you. I shall every day remove you one by one from this pond to another one without the knowledge of the fisherman.’

The poor fishes agreed to the proposal and the stork carried away one fish everyday from the pond and ate it at a place hidden from the view of the others. This went on for one or two months without break and somehow the crab got suspicious and he requested the stork to take him also to the other pond. The stork carrying the crab reached its usual place and the crab was horrified at the sight of the bones of the fishes eaten before by the stork. The crab knew its death was sure even if it did not fight with the stork and so started a fight and in the end killed the stork by crushing the neck of the stork.”

The crows crew hilariously when they heard the story of the fox. The fox then told them a plan. “When any of those who come to bathe in a pond nearby removes the necklace and places it on the shore you are to pick it up and hang it on a branch of the tree.” The crows did like that and pedestrians going that way saw the necklace hanging from the branch and took it after killing the cobra in the hole beneath the tree.”

On hearing the story told by Damanaka the idea of putting the lion against the ox gained strength in Karaṭaka’s mind. To confirm the idea in his brother’s mind Damanaka told another story. Damanaka said, “Once there was a lion named Madotkāṭa. He lived in a forest harassing all the beasts that lived there,
All the subjects of King Madotkaṭa joined together, went to him and represented to him that they would go to his cave one by one every day to be killed and eaten by him. The lion agreed to that and the beasts one by one went to his cave each day. One day it was the turn of a clever hare. The hare walked slowly and reached the lion's den late. The King was very cross at this and asked him to explain why he was late. The hare said "Oh lord, on my way another lion accosted me and I had to take a round-about route to get away from that lion." The lion got angry and asked the hare to take him to the other lion who dared to come to that forest and question his authority. The hare took the lion to a well and asked his lord to peep in. When Madotkaṭa did so he saw his own reflection in the still waters of the well and mistook it for another lion. It jumped into the well and was killed."

Karaṭaka had implicit confidence in Damanaka. After hearing all these stories and he sent his brother to the King to create a rupture between the lion and the ox. Damanaka went to the King Piṅgalaka and apologised for the mistake he had committed. Then the King enquired what the mistake was. Damanaka said that the ox Saṅjivaka was not such a simpleton as he took him to be. He was ambitious and wanted to snatch away the kingdom from Piṅgalaka. It was unwise to keep one single minister always. "After all what can an ox do? He can plough the fields. I have come to inform you all these out of my regard for you." Damanaka said.

Even after hearing all these, Piṅgalaka did not have the heart to abandon the ox. Piṅgalaka asked what a poor bullock could do against a lion. Damanaka then said that one would come into grief if one believed too much in any body. "Have you not heard the story of the house which believed the bug?" Damanaka asked. Then he narrated a story. "Mandavaisarpīṇī was a house which was living happily on the silken bed of a King. A bug went there and made friends with the house. The poor house believed the bug to be harmless and allowed it to stay that night with him. The bug said that it was very greedy to suck the blood of the King. At night the bug bit the King. The King woke up and ordered his servants to search for the thing that bit him. When lights were brought the clever bug slipped away. The royal servants conducting the search found out the house and killed it."

The lion liked the tale very much and yet was reluctant to dismiss the ox. The lion wanted proof that the ox was at fault. So Damanaka went straight to the ox in his house and said "We are all small people. What does the master do for our welfare? If small people seek the friendship of big people the small ones will always suffer." The ox endorsed the view and told a story to illustrate the truth. "A lion named Madotkaṭa had a tiger, a fox and a crow as his ministers. When the ministers were once walking in the forest they saw a camel. They had never seen a camel before and so they were wonderstruck by the animal. They went and talked with it and gathered that the curious animal was a camel which had been carrying loads for a merchant. It had now escaped from the merchant because of the heavy work it had to do. The camel wanted to remain in hiding. The ministers took the new animal to the lion. The lion liked the camel very much and soon they became good and intimate friends. The intimacy increased and soon the King lost all interest in his other subjects. At this stage the ministers found out a plan. They advised the King to kill and eat the camel but the King refused to do so. Then the crown went before the King and requested the lion to kill and eat it. But the crow was so small a food for the lion and so it refused to kill the crow. Then the fox made a similar offer but the lion refused to kill the fox also. Then came the tiger with the offer and the lion refused to kill the tiger also. Seeing all this the camel also made a similar offer and the moment his consent was out from his mouth the fox and the tiger together killed the poor camel and ate it. So one should be careful in believing others. In my case I am sure some wicked persons must have advised him against me and that is the reason why the lion is angry with me. But I will always work true to my conscience. There is no harm in fighting either for self-protection or for destroying one's enemies. So if it is necessary I will fight the lion."

Hearing this Damanaka said "To go to war without knowing the strength of the enemy is wrong. Once upon a time a water-fowl quarrelled with the ocean. The water-fowl was living happily on the shores of an ocean with his mate. They ate the worms that lived on the shores. The she-fowl got pregnant and when it was time to lay her eggs she asked her mate to show her a safe place to lay the eggs. The male mate asked her to lay the eggs on the shore itself. But the she-fowl said that the waves would carry away the eggs and so it was not wise to do so. The male fowl assured her that the ocean was not bold enough to do anything against his interests. But the she-fowl still hesitated. Then the male fowl said "I am the nearest relative responsible for your protection and welfare. If one does not heed the words of a relative one will fall into danger. I shall tell you the story of a tortoise which came to grief by not obeying the instructions of its friends. In olden times there lived on the banks of a pond a tortoise who had two swan-friends in the lake named Saṅkṣaṭa and Vikaṭa. Once the lake became empty of water and the swans decided to go to another lake with water. They never wanted to part with their friend the tortoise and so decided to take the tortoise also along with them. But the tortoise could not fly and so they found a plan to carry the tortoise to the other lake. They brought a stick and the tortoise was asked to hang at the middle of the stick clutching the stick tightly with its teeth. The swans then took the stick by its two ends each holding one end in its beak. The swans gave strict instructions that the tortoise should not open its mouth and then rose up into the air and flew towards the other lake. On the way some children saw the funny sight in the air and so hooted and howled. The tortoise got angry and abused the children. The moment it opened its mouth it lost hold on the stick and fell down to the ground. This happened because the tortoise did not heed the words of its friends." The water fowl continued "It is cowardice and foolishness to remain sad expecting dangers in future. Just hear this story" he said "Once in a pond there were three fishes named Anāgata, Upānnamati and Yadbhavisha. Hearing that fishermen were coming to fish in that pond Anāgata warned them and suggested going to another pond to escape from the fishermen. But Upānnamati and Yadbhaviṣya did not care. They said that some plan could be found out when the danger came. But Anāgata felt diffident and so he went away to another pond. Soon the fishermen came and spread their nets. Upānnamati lay still pretending to be dead. The fishermen took it and deposited it on the shore and started to fish again. The moment the fishermen turned their heads Upānnamati slipped into a mud pit nearby and remained there till the departure of the fishermen. But poor Yadbhaviṣya could not think of any plan and so was caught and carried away by the fishermen. So just like Upānnamati I will also come across some plan when the danger comes and so you do lay your eggs on the shore of the ocean itself.

Hearing the assuring words of her husband the she-fowl laid her eggs on the shore. But very soon waves came and carried them away. She complained to her husband. The water fowl called a conference of all the birds living there and explained to them his mishap and all of them went on a deputation to Garuda, the best of the birds and requested him to find out a remedy. Garuda represented the matter to Mahāviṣṇu who in turn called Varuṇa to his side and ordered him to give back the eggs to the fowl.

After telling this story Damanaka went to the lion and told him many misleading lies about the ox. Gradually the lion and the ox became enemies. Damanaka then triumphantly went and informed his brother Karatāka of his achievement. But Karatāka said “Brother, you have done a very unjust thing. There are four methods to achieve your object namely, Sāma, Dāna, Bheda and Daṇḍa. Of these Bheda is to be used only last of all. I shall tell you a story:

Once a chetty (Merchant) had two sons named Dharmabuddhi and Duṣṭabuddhi. Once they were both travelling through a forest when Dharmabuddhi got a treasure from a hole at the base of a big tree. Duṣṭabuddhi advised his brother not to take the treasure to the city as it was dangerous to do so and made him bury it at a place beneath the same tree. That night itself Duṣṭabuddhi went and dug out the treasure and got it buried in his own room. After some days both of them went together to see the treasure and found the place empty of the treasure. They accused each other of stealing the treasure. Both of them complained to the King. The King asked them whether they had any witnesses and they replied that only the tree was there as a witness. The King decided that both of them should go beneath the same tree and dip their hands in burning oil to prove their innocence. Duṣṭabuddhi went to his father and requested him that he should hide in the hollow of that tree and say that it was Dharmabuddhi who had stolen the treasure. Hearing this the father said “Child, when you think of a trick you must also think of the danger involved in it. Once there lived a stork with his wife on a tree. A serpent living in the same tree began to eat the young ones of the stork and the stork complained to his friend fox about it. The clever fox suggested to him a plan. There was a mongoose living near the tree. The stork was to drop fishes in front of the hole of the mongoose and continue dropping fishes in a line leading to the abode of the serpent. The mongoose would thus be led to the hole of the serpent. The stork did so and when the mongoose reached the hole of the serpent it saw it and killed it. I cannot do such cruel things.” But when Duṣṭabuddhi insisted, the father half-heartedly agreed to it and went and sat in the hollow of the tree. Next day the servants of the King came to the foot of the tree with burning oil. They asked the tree to tell the truth regarding the theft. Then there came a voice from the tree denouncing Dharmabuddhi as the culprit. Dharmabuddhi then said there was no truth in the bodiless voice and requested them to fumigate the tree from beneath. The royal servants did so and then the father came out and confessed everything. The servants of the King nailed Duṣṭabuddhi on a spike and killed him.

After having told the story Karatāka tried to dissuade his brother from his deceitful intentions. Karatāka said:— “Pīṅgala and Saṁjñavaka are kind-hearted and simple people. There need be no treachery with them. Treachery is allowed against wicked people. I shall tell you the story of a merchant:

This merchant had as his entire wealth a thousand pounds of iron and one day he went on a pilgrimage after entrusting his entire wealth to a friend and neighbour of his on the understanding that the latter should return it on his return after the pilgrimage. After ten months the merchant returned but the friend did not give back the iron. He regretted that all the iron was eaten by rats in which his house abounded. The merchant knew that his neighbour was speaking falsehood but kept silent over the matter. After a few days the merchant somehow enticed the only son of his neighbour to his house and locked the young boy in a room. The friend went in search of his son to the merchant’s house and asked him whether he had seen his son anywhere. The merchant replied that he saw the boy being carried away by a kite. The friend could not believe the story and suspecting some foul play on the part of the merchant went to the king and reported the matter to him. The king sent for the merchant and asked him about the missing boy. The merchant gave the king the same reply he gave his friend. The king was surprised and asked the merchant whether it was believable that a boy aged eighteen would be carried away by a kite. The merchant very coolly replied that such things could happen in a country where rats could eat a thousand pounds of iron. The king asked the merchant to explain and he then told him everything that had happened. The king ordered the friend to return the iron and the merchant got back his wealth. Karatāka after telling this story added that deceit in return for deceit was no sin. Damanaka stuck on to his plan and made the lion and ox fight each other. The poor ox was killed and the lion became his old self again.

2) Suḥṭlābha. (Gaining friends). Once there lived on a tree a crow named Laghupatanaka. The crow saw a hunter coming and spreading a net beneath the tree. A flock of doves coming that way was caught in the net. But the doves flew up in a body and the net was carried from the ground freely of the pegs that held it. The crow followed them and when they were safely landed at another place Citragṛiva the leader of the doves, told the crow thus “I shall now show you the benefit of gaining friends.” Citragṛiva and his doves flew again with the net and landed before the hole of a rat named Hiraṇyaka. The rat was a friend of Citragṛiva.
On hearing the voice of Citragrīva outside, Hiranyaka came out and felt sorry for the plight of the doves. The rat pointed out that nobody could oppose fate and proved it with illustrations. He added:—"Though elephants and cobras are mightier and fiercer than men, it is because of fate that they are being controlled by smaller people than they themselves. Hiranyaka cut to pieces the threads of the net and set the doves free. Next day the doves flew away to their places. Seeing the generosity shown by the rat, the crow wanted to be friendly with the rat. The crow mentioned this to the rat. But the rat refused to be friendly thinking that it was a ruse to get him killed for his food. But the crow promised to be grateful for ever to the rat for saving the doves which belonged to the community of birds to which the crow also belonged. But the rat retorted that gratitude was a quality which was absent in any living being and generally harm was the reward for any favour done. The crow was greatly grieved to hear the words of Hiranyaka and told him that he (crow) would commit suicide if the rat did not take him as his friend. At last the rat took pity on the crow and they became friends. Time passed on and then there broke out a famine in the land. The crow decided to shift his abode and told the rat about it. He said he was going to a lake on the banks of which lived a friend of his, a tortoise. The tortoise, he added, would fetch for him from the lake plenty of fish to eat. The rat was also affected by the famine and so he also decided to accompany the crow. The crow took the rat in its beak and they both reached the lake where lived the tortoise named Manthara. The crow introduced Hiranyaka to the tortoise and the tortoise asked him the reason why he left his previous abode.

The rat said:—"There was a bhikṣu (one who lives on alms) named Cūḍākārṇa living in a house in my place. He used to eat only what was required to maintain life in him. He would cook his own food and keep the remains everyday in his kitchen. I used to eat that food and live. Then one day another Sannyāsin named Brhatṣphik (Viṇākara) came to this house. Every night Viṇākara used to read the Purāṇas to Cūḍākārṇa. Cūḍākārṇa would sit and make a sound on the bow kept nearby to drive me away. The first time he did so Viṇākara who was reading resented the interrupting sound and asked Cūḍākārṇa why he made it. He then explained that it was intended to drive away the rat coming to steal the food. I was forced to starve and I became lean and weak. Even rivers would go dry if there were no rains. Only those with wealth would have friends. Begging is a nuisance to others. Everywhere it is important to acquire good and faithful friends. When a good man is in danger only good men wish to help him. When an elephant falls into a pit it is always another elephant which comes to its rescue. Therefore I desire to make friends with you."

All the three, the crow, the rat and the tortoise lived together happily. Then one day a dear named Citraṅgada escaping from a hunter came frightened to their midst and started living with them. One day the deer which went in search of food did not return even after dusk and so the crow went in search of the deer and found it trapped in a hunter's net. The crow informed the rat about it and the rat immediately came and started gnawing at the strings of the net. In the mean-him with amorous movements of its body. The farmer knew from its voice that it was a donkey and so removed his disguise and stood before the donkey. The be-fooled donkey got angry and abused the farmer using very vulgar language. The farmer got angry and killed him with an arrow.

Ciranjīvi continued:—Once upon a time a few birds joined together and decided to elect their leader. The owl was the bird selected to lead them. An aged crow condemned it. The crow said: “Are you making this ugly bird which is blind all day your leader? If only you make a worthy creature your leader you will be respected. I shall tell you a story to illustrate my point.” He then narrated the following story:

Once upon a time there came a period of twelve continuous years without any rain at all on the earth. Wells, ponds, lakes and rivers were all empty. A huge herd of elephants walking in the forests represented to its leader the grave situation and the leader sent messengers to all sides to find out watering places with water. One of the messengers came back and reported that he had found out a beautiful lake full of water and that on its banks lived a number of hares. The elephants immediately went to that place and started enjoying swimming and bathing in the waters of the lake. Many rabbits on the bank of the lake died when trodden upon by the elephants. The aggrieved rabbits sat in a council to consider the steps to be taken to stop this deadly nuisance of the elephants. One of the hares, Vijaya by name, promised to handle the matter by himself. He knew it would be unwise to go anywhere near the elephants. So Vijaya climbed on to the top of a hill near the lake and when he saw the elephants coming to the lake as usual hailed them from the top of the hillock. When the elephants turned their heads to the place from where the sound came they saw a hare speaking to them. The hare bawled out thus: “We are all servants of Candra, the moon-god. This lake has been given to us by him. Candra Bhagavān has deputed me to verify a report which has reached him that some elephants are making the water of the lake muddy. He will surely be cross with you if you again enter the lake. So it is better for you to go away from this place.” The elephants were frightened and they all left the place. Ciranjīvi added that this happened to the elephants because of the lack of a wise and proper leader.

The aged Ciranjīvi continued: “It is unwise to place confidence in small people. I had an experience. Near my abode on a tree there lived a bird called Kapinjala. We became friends. One day Kapinjala did not come home as usual. Taking advantage of it a rabbit came to Kapinjala’s abode and started living there. I did not like it and I told the rabbit about it. But the rabbit did not mind it. After four or five days Kapinjala returned home and on finding a rabbit in his nest got angry and asked him to leave the place. The rabbit refused to go and an argument ensued. The rabbit said that lakes, rivers and trees were for all and did not belong to any particular individual. “He who is in possession of it is its owner,” the rabbit argued. So they decided to take the case for arbitration and for that purpose approached a cat named Dadhikarna doing penance on the banks of the river Yamunā. I followed them curious to know the decision of the ascetic cat. They did not see me. Both of them on approaching him started presenting their case before the cat. The cat pretended to be deaf and asked both of them to come nearer and talk into his ears. They moved nearer and the cat caught hold of them both and ate them. Those poor beings lost their lives by placing too much confidence in the aged cat. That is why I say that we should not select a small being like an owl as our leader.

On hearing the story of the crow the birds withdrew from their first decision of selecting an owl as their leader. The owl was offended and felt insulted and roared that his community would one day wreak vengeance on the crows. A wound made by an arrow would heal in due course and a tree would grow even if its branches are cut but any wound on the pride of an individual is never healed.

Ciranjīvi continued:—“This is how the crows and owls became enemies. We have to fight the owls. It is impossible to serve mean people. I shall tell you a story of what would happen if one believes in mean people:—

Once a brahmin decided to perform a Yāga to increase the prosperity of the land. He wanted a goat for the same and some wicked young people knew that he was going to buy one. They worked out a plan to deceive the poor brahmin. They sat hiding at different places on the way the brahmin was returning with the goat. As he came near the first of the wicked young men accosted the brahmin and asked him where he was taking the dog. The brahmin was surprised that the young man mistook his goat for dog and went his way. When he walked some distance more the second of the group came to him and put the same question. This time the brahmin was a bit perplexed that two people should have put the same question which he thought was absurd. When a third man put this question again he became worried and when this same question was repeated two more times the brahmin got mad and left the goat on the road and went his way. The wicked youngsters took the goat cooked it and ate it.

After narrating several such stories and maxims Ciranjīvi said he would lead the owls into a trap and come back. Ciranjīvi then went to the owls and their friends on the top of Śrāṅgā. Ciranjīvi shaved his head and smearing the blood of the dead crows on his body went and sat alone on a branch of their former abode, the banyan tree. When night came the owls came and surrounded the tree. Ciranjīvi made some piteous groans and the owls took him before their king. The king questioned Ciranjīvi and he said thus:—

“I am Ciranjīvi the minister of Meghavarna. Once I praised your greatness before my king and he shaven my head and dismissed me from his service.” The king of the owls asked his ministers what should be done with Ciranjīvi. The minister of the king of owls, Baka, immediately jumped from his seat and said:

“Once a fox went to steal the cow of a brahmin. On his way he met a Brahmārakṣa and they became friends. The Brahmārakṣa was going to kill and eat the brahmin. Both exchanged their ideas and when they reached the gate of the house of the brahmin the fox said he would go first and eat the goat. But the Brahmarākṣasa, said he, would enter first and eat the brahmin. The quarrel developed into a noisy one and hearing the sound outside the brahmin came out. The fox accused the Brahmarākṣasa of having come to eat the brahmin while the Brahmarākṣasa accused the fox of having come to eat the goat. The brahmin was glad that he escaped from a danger and pardoning them sent them both with presents. This is the benefit of a split among the enemies.

The king of the owls gave refuge to Ciraṅjīvi and the latter expressing gratitude for the favour done took a vow that he would wreak vengeance on the crows after getting himself born as an owl in his next birth. At once the king said “Oh Ciraṅjīvi, it is not wise to change one’s clan. Once a kite picked up a girl rat and flew up. On the way the young rat slipped from the beak of the kite and fell down into the open palm of a sage doing his sandhyāvandana. The sage by his yogic powers made it into a beautiful girl and presented her to his wife. The girl attained womanhood and the sage was anxious to get her married to a suitable person. He first approached the Sun and the Sun replied “You are in search of a powerful husband. Megha (cloud) is more powerful than myself since at any time it can cast a shadow over my brilliance. So go and ask Megha about this.” The sage went to Megha and Megha said that wind which could carry him away at his will was more powerful than himself and so directed him to the wind. The sage approached the wind and it said that the mountain which could obstruct its path was more powerful and so the sage went to the mountain. The mountain said that the rat which could make holes in him was more powerful and so finally the sage went to the rat. The rat agreed to marry her but asked how it could keep her in the hole which was his abode. The sage said that it was easy and changed her into a rat. This is how a girl rat became a girl rat again. So do not change your clan, be a crow and live with me.”

Ciraṅjīvi from that day onwards started living with the owls. During day time when the owls slept, the old crow would fly hither and thither and collect such easily combustible materials as hay, dry grass and cotton and stock them beneath the tree covered with dry leaves. Two months went by like this and one day when the owls were sleeping Ciraṅjīvi set fire to the stock of dry materials beneath the tree. The owls were all burnt to death. Meghavarna and his friends congratulated Ciraṅjīvi on his success. Ciraṅjīvi said: To obtain difficult positions great men pass through difficult situations. If one is prepared to suffer hardships any object can be achieved. Once a cobra began to starve for want of food. It went to the land of frogs and told the king of frogs thus: “Friend, I am in difficulties. I happened to bite a brahmin boy and that boy died. The boy’s father cursed me. I asked for forgiveness and then he said:—“You must carry your enemies, the frogs, on your back from one pond to another pond and live on the food they give you.” The king of the frogs believed him and allowed his subjects to be carried away to another pond from the one in which they were then staying. The cobra ate all the frogs on the way and at last the king also was eaten. Thus to destroy the enemies one will have to carry them on one’s back sometimes. The crows were happy their enemies the owls were destroyed and they lived more happily and peacefully than before.

4) Labdhanāsā. (Losing what you got) Once a monkey named Baliṅukṣha separated himself from his group and came to a fig tree on the banks of a river. When he jumped from branch to branch on the tree a great many ripe figs fell into the river. Seeing this a crocodile named Śimśumāra came to the foot of the tree and started eating the fruits. This went on for a few days and then the crocodile and the monkey became good friends. One day the crocodile sat chatting with the monkey and eating fruits and did not go home. The wife of the crocodile got worried on not seeing her husband back at home and sent a maid of hers to go and enquire what happened to her husband. The maid came and reported that the crocodile was spending his time with a she-monkey. The wife of the crocodile was very sad and angry to hear this and she sent word through her maid that she was seriously ill and if he wanted to see her alive he must return to her immediately. The crocodile returned home immediately and he called a doctor to examine her. The doctor who had been previously bribed by the crocodile’s wife said that she should be given the heart of a monkey if she were to be saved from her present ailment. The crocodile was in a fix. He weighed in his mind the lives of his wife and friend and then decided to take the life of his friend to save the life of his wife. The crocodile went to its place near the fig tree as usual and the monkey made enquiries about his family. Then Śimśumāra said that his wife wanted to see the monkey-friend and had asked him to take him home that day. The monkey believed the story and started for the house of Śimśumāra on its back. When they reached half way in the river Śimśumāra told Baliṅukṣha thus: “My wife is seriously ill. The doctor has prescribed the heart of a monkey as the only medicine for it.” The monkey went pale-white with fright but instantly he hit upon a plan. Baliṅukṣha said “Śimśumāra, what a fool you are. Why did you not tell me this at least at the time of our departure? I kept my heart on the tree before starting, for I never knew you were in need of it. Let us go back and take it.” The poor crocodile believed the story and went back with the monkey to the fig tree. As soon as they reached the shore the monkey jumped from the back of the crocodile and ran to the tree. The crocodile asked the monkey to bring his heart soon but the monkey laughed from the top of the fig tree and said thus:—“Dull-witted crocodile, I am not an ass like you. Have you not heard the story of the foolish ass?” The monkey then narrated the story of the ass thus:—“Once a lion calling his minister, the fox, to his side said that he wanted to eat the flesh of an ass as a remedy for the stomach trouble he was having by drinking too much of elephant’s blood. The minister started in search of an ass and found one in the house of a washerman. The fox said that he was surprised that the ass was doing such heavy work daily with a washerman when a happy life in the palace of the lion was easily available. The ass was tempted and it went to the den of the lion. When it reached there it got frightened and taking the opportunity of the absence of the lion for his evening worship left the place in a hurry. The lion sent the fox again to fetch the ass. The fox came and laughed at the timidity of the ass. He said that the lion was of a loving nature and last time when it approached the ass to embrace him out of affection he ran away like a fool. The lion knew that the asses were as a class good musicians and the lion himself a great lover of music was anxious to hear the ass sing. The poor ass believed the story and went to the lion along with the fox. When the ass reached the lion's den the lion was waiting for him and the ass in all simplicity bowed before the lion. The lion with one stroke killed the poor beast and leaving the carcass to the care of the fox went for his Sandhyavandana. When the lion returned the fox had already eaten the heart of the ass. The King of the beasts not finding the heart in its place questioned the fox and the fox replied that the asses do not possess either a heart or neck.

When the monkey concluded his story by adding that never again would he be trapped like this, Simśumāra, the crocodile, went its way. Labdhanaśa is the act of losing what came into your possession once.

5) Asamprekṣayakārita. This is a tale which explains the danger behind doing things adventurously without properly studying the pros and cons of an issue.

Once upon a time there lived in Gauḍadesa a brahmin named Devasārmā. His wife Yajñāsenā became pregnant. The father started saying that the son to be born would be a very fortunate boy. One day the wife of the brahmin told him thus:—"It is not good to build castles in the air. Once a brahmacāri walked home carrying the fried grain he got as his daksinā in a pot on his head. He started thinking thus—"I will sell this fried grain and with the money will buy a lamb. The lamb will grow and give birth to two kids. I will then sell the goat and the kids and buy a cow. The cow will give birth to calves in a short time. I will buy some land to raise paddy. After selling the paddy I will renovate my old house and then I will marry. She will deliver a beautiful son. I will name the child Somaśārmā. At times leaving the child alone my wife will go to milk the cow and then I will hit her like this." So saying the brahmacāri hit with his stick the mud pot on his head containing the fried grain. The pot broke and the whole thing inside fell on the road.

Devārmā on hearing the story of Yajñāsenā became pensive. After five or six days Yajñāsenā delivered a son. Days went by and one morning Yajñāsenā went for her bath in the river nearby entrusting the child to the care of her husband. Some moments later a messenger came from the palace asking him to go over there. The brahmin was in a fix. There was nobody around to whose care he could leave the child. He had a mongoose. The brahmin asked the mongoose to look after the child and went to the palace. Some time later a big cobra came creeping towards the child. The mongoose jumped at it and killed it. The mongoose was smeared with blood after that. The brahmin returned hurriedly from the palace only to see the blood-smeared mongoose waiting at the doorstep. Thinking that the mongoose must have killed his son the brahmin thrashed the poor mongoose to death. But on entering the room the brahmin found out his mistake, for there near the child was the dead body of a deadly cobra. The brahmin regretted his foolish act of doing a deed before knowing things well, when Yajñāsenā came back after her bath and was greatly disturbed by the foolish deed of her husband. She said:—"Once there was in a place a very poor brahmin boy. He was an orphan with nobody to help him and he suffered from hunger daily. One night the boy had a dream. He was told that at midnight next day three beggars would come to his place and if he slew them they would turn themselves into treasure jars and that the boy could become rich by using the wealth so received. Next day the brahmin boy was having his head shaved when as predicted in the dream three beggars entered his house. The brahmin boy ran away from the barber and taking a stick thrashed the three to death. All the three turned into treasure jars. The barber was astonished. The brahmin boy gave the barber a sovereign taken from the jar as his wages. The barber thought that beggars would turn themselves into treasure jars if they were thrashed to death. So he waited daily in his house for beggars to enter his house. One day after a long waiting three beggars entered his house and the barber with a hard stick which he had kept ready started thrashing the beggars. The beggars shrieked and shouted and ran away abusing the barber. Servants of the King came on hearing this and took the barber away and by the command of the King killed him nailing him on to a spike. Yajñāsenā concluded by saying that even death would be the result if one does anything without properly understanding things.

Pāncatīrtha. A holy place. There is a pond at this place. Once a nymph called Vargā with her four companions lived in this pond as crocodiles as a result of a curse. Arjuna came to that pond and rescued them from their curse. From that day onwards the pond came to be known as Pāncatīrtha or Saubhadra-kāṣṭhara (For details see under Vargā and Saubhardrakāṣṭhara).

Pāncavātī. A soldier who fought bravely against the asuras on the side of Subrahmanya.

Pāncavātī. The sacred place where Śrī Rāma built an āśrama and lived for some time with Siitā and Lakṣmana during their exile in the forests. There is a story about Pāncavatī in the Kambha Ramāyana. Pāncavatī is on the south side of the Godāvari. Five Vaiḍavyakṣas (banyan trees) stand here in a circle and therefore, the place got the name Pāncavatī. There is a legend about these banyan trees. Once five Gandharva youths encircled the sage Agastya in the forest as a sport and prevented him from moving towards any direction. The enraged sage cursed them to stand in the same position as banyan trees. Thus by obstructing the movements of a divine man they were forced to remain without movement as trees. Before they took the form of trees they begged the sage for deliverance from the curse. Agastya said, "One day Śrī Rāma with his wife and brother will come and stay in an āśrama built in your midst. Their holy presence will give you salvation from my curse." Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmana when they came to that forest decided to build an āśrama in the centre of the circle formed by the five banyan trees. Lakṣmana started to build the hermitage. At first he cut down one of the trees standing tall and straight and to the surprise and astonishment of all the fallen trunk of the tree disappeared and there in its place lay the dead body of a demon youth. It was the body of Śambhukumāra, son of Śūra-paṭakha. He was doing penance there when Śrī Rāma came there with Śītā and becoming lustful at the sight of Śītā he stood there as a tree. It was he who was cut down by Lakṣmaṇa. Śrī Rāma understood the thing that happened. He then explained to Śītā and Lakṣmaṇa many things about the frauds and deceits of the demons. After that they built their hermitage there and dwelt there for a long time. (Aranya Kānda, Kamba Rāmāyana).

PANCAYATANA. A Sanātana Viśvadeva (one of the ten deities supposed to be the sons of Viśvā). (Chapter 91, Anuśāstra Parva)

PANCAVIRA. A sacred place of Bhārata. He who visits this place will get mokṣa. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva)

PĀNCAYATANA. An idol of Śiva in Kaśi. This idol is called Oṣīkāra also. Bhaga-vān Parameśvara who gives mokṣa to men dwells in this idol in the form of Panca-vatana. The five souls of Śiva are the five āyatanas. They are Śānti (tranquillity), Ațitaśānti (passed beyond tranquillity), Pāparāvīdyā (Greater and smaller knowledge), Pratiśṭhā (celebrity) and Nivṛtti (Recession). Because these five āyatanaś dwell in the idol of Śiva at Kaśi it got the name Panca-vatana. (Chapter 34, Padma Purāṇa).

PĀNDA. One of the sons born to Kaṇya of his wife Āryavatī. He married Sarasvatiputri and begot seventeen sons. They all became in the future originators of races. (Pratisargasamhitā, Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

PĀNDARA. A serpent born of the race of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the sarpasatras of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PĀṆḌAVAS.

1) Origin. Śantanu, a celebrated King of Candravanśa (lunar dynasty) had two wives, Gaṅgā and Satyavatī. Bhīma was the son of Gaṅgā. After the birth of Bhīma Gaṅgā his mother went to heaven. After that Śantanu married Satyavatī, mother of Vyāsa. Satyavatī got two sons, Citrāṅgada and Vīcitrāṅga. Even while a bachelor, Citrāṅgada was killed by a Gandhāra of the same name. So Vīcitrāṅga became a King of Śantanu's earth. Bhīma forcibly brought the three daughters of the King of Kaśī named Ambā, Ambikā and Ambālīkā for Vīcitrāṅga to marry. But knowing that Ambā was in love with the King of Sālva, Bhīma let her off on the way. Ambikā and Ambālīkā became the wives of Vīcitrāṅga. But for a long time they had no sons.

At that time Satyavatī, mother of Vīcitrāṅga, sent for Vyāsa her eldest son and asked him to beget sons of Ambikā and Ambālīkā. Ambikā got Dhrta-rāṣṭra of Vyāsa and Ambālīkā, Pāṇḍu, father of the Pāṇḍavas. Dhrta-rāṣṭra was born blind and he married Gāndhārī. Pāṇḍu was born pale-white in colour and he married Kunti mother of the Pāṇḍavas.

Kunti was the sister of Vasudeva, father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The real name of Kunti was Pṛthā. Śūrasena, King of the Yādavas, was the father of Kunti and Vasudeva. Because Kuntibhoja son of Śūrasena's sister, had no issues Kunti was sent to the palace of Kuntibhoja and she grew up there. Pṛthā got the name of Kunti because of that. Besides Kunti, Pāṇḍu had another wife named Mādrī.

While she was living in the palace of Kuntibhoja the sage Durvāsa came and stayed in the palace as the king's guest. Kunti was a little girl then and yet she served the sage with such care, patience and devotion that the sage was greatly pleased with her and gave her a divine mantra. He said: "If you call upon any god repeating this mantra he will manifest himself to you and bless you with a son equal to him in glory and valour. You can use this mantra only five times." The impatience of youth made Kunti give a test to the power of the mantra and though unmarried she invoked the Sun. The Sun immediately presented himself before her and by his grace she conceived and got a son whom she secretly set afloat in a river. A childless charioteer named Adhiratha happened to see the child and he took it home and brought it up. When he grew up he was sent to Hastināpura and the sons of Dhrta-rāṣṭra took him in their service. He was Kaṇa, the celebrated warrior of the Kauravas. Kunti married Pāṇḍu after the birth of Kaṇa.

Dhrta-rāṣṭra got of Gāndhārī a hundred sons and a daughter named Duśālā. The children of Dhrta-rāṣṭra were known as Kauravas or Dhrta-rāṣṭras. Pāṇḍu had a curse that he would die the moment he entered into sexual sport with his wives. (See under Kīmāna). So under instructions from her husband Kunti invoked Dharma, Vāyu and Indra and got the sons Uddyōṣṭhītra, Bhīmasena and Aṭjuna. She gave the remaining one chance to Mādrī and Mādrī invoked the two Āśvinīdevas, Nāsatya and Daśra and got two sons named Nakula and Sahadeva. All these five were accepted as the sons of Pāṇḍu and so they got the name of Pāṇḍavas. (Upto Chapter 123, Ādi Parva).

2) Life in Hastināpura and the lac-palace incident. After the birth of the Pāṇḍavas, Pāṇḍu with his wife and children spent a very long time in the forest of Śataśīrga. Kaśyapa, the royal priest of Vasudeva, performed the Upanayana (investiture with the sacred thread) and such other religious ceremonies ordained for boyhood. They were educated under the sage Śuka. One day in the Spring season Pāṇḍu's resolution broke down under the exhilarating influence of the season and he caught hold of Mādrī and embraced her despite earnest and repeated protests from Mādrī. At once the curse of the sage took effect and Pāṇḍu fell dead. It was the custom then that the wife should end her life in the funeral pyre of her husband and so Kunti and Mādrī came forward to do so. But Mādrī said that one of them should live to take care of the children and so entrusting her children also to the care of Kunti, Mādrī jumped into the funeral pyre and ended her life. The sages of the Śataśīrga forest took the children and Kunti to Hastināpura and handing them over to the charge of Dhrta-rāṣṭra came back. The Pāṇḍavas grew up in Hastināpura along with the Kauravas. But there was no real affection or intimacy between them. The naturally strong Bhīma found it a sport to tease and torment the Kauravas whenever he got an opportunity. Gradually as the teasings of Bhīma became unbearable a wicked thought of somehow putting an end to Bhīma's life found place in the minds of the Kauravas. They once poisoned Bhīma and binding him tight with ropes threw him into the ocean. But Bhīma went to the world of the Nāgas and came back unscathed with added siddhis (acquired power). This annoyed the Kauravas.

It was at this time that Droṇa a renowned preceptor in archery, came to Hastināpura. Bhīṣma enrolled the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas as disciples of Droṇa. Arjuna became an extraordinarily brilliant bow-man. This came off as another reason for the Kauravas to drift away from the Pāṇḍavas. After the end of their course of education a contest was held in which Arjuna ranked first. The time came for Gurudakṣiṇa (fees paid in bulk at the end of the studies to a preceptor). Droṇa asked his disciples to bring King Drupāda bound hand and foot before him. The Kauravas failed in that mission and the Pāṇḍavas under the leadership of Arjuna fulfilled the demand of their Guru.

When the training and Gurudakṣiṇā were over, Dhṛtarāṣṭra crowned Yudhīṣṭhīra as the heir-apparent and this increased the power and status of the Pāṇḍavas in Hastināpura. The jealousy of Duryodhana knew no bounds when he found the Pāṇḍavas in the pinnacle of power and popularity. He decided to kill them. He therefore, built a new palace in a place called Vārāṇavata and with the permission of Dhṛtarāṣṭra made them change their residence to the new building. The new building was cunningly built of lac and other combustible material. The wise and intelligent Vidura knew this deceit beforehand and so he had warned the Pāṇḍavas of the danger through a messenger named Khanaka. The Pāṇḍavas had, therefore, made ready a secret passage by underground to escape from the building when an emergency arose. The passage was to lead them from the palace to the forest nearby. One night Purocana, a minister of Duryodhana, came stealthily and set fire to the palace. The Pāṇḍavas with their mother Kunti escaped from the palace to the forest nearby. That night a huntress and her five sons were sleeping in a part of the building and they were burnt to death. They were all sleeping fully drunk and so could not escape from the building. Purocana also was burnt to death. Thus the Pāṇḍavas had to go away from Hastināpura for a brief period.

3) The Exile and its end. The Kauravas thought that Pāṇḍavas died in the fire and in that belief conducted the funeral rites of their brothers. The Pāṇḍavas after their escape from the fire walked a long distance through the forests and came to the banks of the river Gaṅgā. On their way a demon named Ḥiḍimba attacked them and Bhīma killed him but at the request of Dharmaputra married his sister Ḥiḍimbī. After that while they were continuing their journey crossing the river a Gandharva of name Cītrarathas attacked them. Cītrarathas was defeated in a battle and he later became friendly with the Pāṇḍavas. He gave them many valuable presents and also narrated to them the story of Tapati-savrāvanā. Then they went and stayed in the house of a brahmin in the village of Ekacakra. It was at that time that the Svayānvāra of Pāṇcālī was held. The Pāṇḍavas went for the Svayānvāra and married Pāṇcālī. The news then spread that Pāṇḍavas were not dead but still alive. Dhṛtarāṣṭra then sent for them and the Pāṇḍavas returned to their palace in Hastināpura. Yudhīṣṭhīra was crowned as King of half of the country and he built his palace in a place known as Khāṇḍavapraṣṭha. The palace was designed and built by a demon named Maya with beautiful Crystals and costly diamonds.

When the Pāṇḍavas were living there Nārada went to them once. He suggested that Pāṇcālī should remain as wife to the Pāṇḍavas in turn, one year each to one of them. They accepted the suggestion and started living like that. Yudhīṣṭhīra married Devikā, daughter of King Śibi, also. (Sloka 70, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva). Bhīmasena and Arjuna with the help of Śrī Kṛṣṇa slew Jarāsandha. After that they conducted a victory march over the country and established their overlordship by conducting successfully a Rājasūya yajña. Duryodhana and his brothers once visited Indraprastha, the palace of the Pāṇḍavas. They were fooled at the palace and this enraged them. Duryodhana invited Dharmaputra for a game of dice and the latter lost everything. Yet Dhṛtarāṣṭra gave them back everything and sent them to Indraprastha again. Before Dharmaputra reached the palace Duryodhana once again challenged him for a game of dice. Despite protests from all sides Dharmaputra went and played and lost again everything. To fulfill the conditions of the game Yudhīṣṭhīra went to the forests with his brothers and wife to spend twelve years in exile and a year incognito. At that time Kunti lived with Vidura.

It was during this period of exile that the Pāṇḍavas got the Aṣayaprāta (never-empty pot) from the Sun. They dwelt first in Dvaitavana and then in Kāmyakavana. Then they went to the mountain of Gandhāmādana and from there to Badarikāsrama. From there they came back again to Kāmyakavana and while they were living there Duryodhana and his men went to that forest to see the sufferings of the Pāṇḍavas and gloat on their sad plight. But Citrasena, a Gandharva, captured Duryodhana and Arjuna got him released. Duryodhana sent Durvīśas to tease Dharmaputra but the sage was sent back after being received duly and well-attended to earn his blessings. During their stay in that forest Jayadratha kidnapped Pāṇcālī but the Pāṇḍavas rescued her immediately. They went from there again to Dvaitavana. Dharmadeva tested them once while they were there. The twelve years of exile came to an end and as per directions from Dharmadeva they spent their incognito period of one year in the court of the King of Vīraṭa. After the end of their incognito life the King of Vīraṭa gave in marriage his daughter Uṭtarā to Abhimanyu son of Arjuna.

Even after the return of the Pāṇḍavas from the forests after successfully fulfilling the conditions of the game, Duryodhana showed obstinate reluctance to part with even five pin-points of land in favour of the Pāṇḍavas. A peace mission of Śrī Kṛṣṇa from the Pāṇḍavas to avoid a war and settle matters amicably to Dhṛtarāṣṭra failed and the stage was set for a great battle between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas.

4) Ascension to Heaven. A great and grim battle was fought at Kurukṣetra between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas lasting for eighteen days. Śrī Kṛṣṇa neither fought nor took arms even once against the Kauravas but acted as the charioteer of Arjuna. When the war came to an end the Kauravas were completely annihilated. Yudhīṣṭhīra became King. He performed an Aṣvamedha Yāga. After a few years of reign the Pāṇḍavas crowned Parīkṣit, son of Abhimanyu, as the King and started for their Mahāprasthāna (departing this life). They walked in a line in the order of their age, Dharmaputra leading and Pāṇcālī following last. At first Pāṇcālī fell dead, but nobody turned back. Then Sahadeva fell and nobody hurried. This continued thus till Dharmaputra was left alone. A dog which followed them from their very start about remained alive with Dharmaputra. The dog was none other than Dharmadeva, father of Dharmaputra. When Dharmaputra reached the top of the Himalayas Indra was there ready with the divine car to take him to heaven. But Dharmaputra said that he would not come to heaven leaving his brothers and wife elsewhere. Then Indra informed him that they were already in heaven and so Dharmaputra went to heaven with Indra. (Only a general and succinct history of the Pāṇḍavas is given under this head. For details see under the heads of each of the Pāṇḍavas as well as Pāṇcālī, Kuntī, Bhīṣma and Vyāṣa).

PĀṆDAVAPRAVEŚAPARVA. A sub-divisional Parva of Viśā Parva. This includes chapters two to eighteen of Viśā Parva.

PĀṆḌITAKA. One of the hundred sons of Dhrtaṛṣṭra. He was killed in the great battle by Bhīmasena. (Chapter 88, Bhīṣma Parva).

PĀṆḌU I. Father of the Pāṇḍavas.

1) Genealogy. Refer to the genealogy of Arjuna.

2) Birth. Sanatanu, a King of Candravanīṣa, had two wives, Gāṅgā and Satyavatī. Even while Satyavatī was a maiden she got the sage Parīṣara a son named Vyāṣa. But because of the blessing of the sage Satyavatī did not lose her maidenhood. She got of Sanatanu two sons, Citrāṅgada and Vicitravīrya. Citrāṅgada died young. Vicitravīrya married the two daughters, Ambikā and Ambalīkā, of the King of Kāśi. Vicitravīrya died before any progeny was born to him. To save the dynasty from extinction Satyavatī asked her first son Vyāṣa to beget children of Ambikā and Ambalīkā. Accordingly Dhrtaṛṣṭra was born to Ambikā of Vyāṣa and Pāṇḍu to Ambalīkā. (Chapters 63 and 105, Ādi Parva).

3) How Pāṇḍu got his name. Vyāṣa came to Hastināpura by the command of his mother to beget sons of Ambikā and Ambalīkā. Vyāṣa was an ugly sage with matted hair and he was dressed in garments of deer skin. Satyavatī that night called Ambikā to her side and in secret commanded her to go and lie with Vyāṣa. She was reluctant to have a sexual union with that old and ugly sage. Yet obeying the orders of her mother-in-law she did so shutting her eyes during the whole period. The result was she got a child born blind who became known later as Dhrtaṛṣṭra. The next day Satyavatī ordered Ambalīkā to go to lie with Vyāṣa. Ambalīkā on entering the bed chamber went pale on seeing the ugly Vyāṣa and the result was she got a child that was pale white in colour. That child became known as Pāṇḍu. The third day Satyavatī asked her servant-maid to go and lie with Vyāṣa. She did it with pleasure and she remained happy and cheerful during the whole period. The result was she got a beautiful child who became an intelligent scholar of great wisdom. He was known later as Vidura. (Chapters 1, 63, and 105, Ādi Parva).

4) Boyhood and kingship. Bhīṣma took care of Dhrtaṛṣṭra, Pāṇḍu and Vidura as his own sons. Bhīṣma taught them all the Vedas including Dhanurveda, and all warfare like mace-fight. They were trained in the use of elephants also. Bhīṣma taught them law and acquainted them with all the Itihāsas and Purāṇas. Pāṇḍu became second to none in archery. The people were all happy. When the boyhood was over Pāṇḍu was crowned as Yuvarāja. Pāṇḍu was the most eligible of the three to become King, for Dhrtaṛṣṭra was a born blind man and Vidura was the son of a servant-maid. (Chapter 109, Ādi Parva).

5) Married life. Obeying the behest of Bhīṣma, Pāṇḍu married Prithā, daughter of the Yādava King Sārāsenā. She was the sister of Vasudeva, father of Kṛṣṇa. She got the name Kuntī because she grew up in the palace of King Kuntibhoja. While Kuntī was staying in the palace of Kuntibhoja Durvāsas came and stayed in the the palace as a guest of the King. Kuntī then served the sage with such devotion and patience that Durvāsas at the time of his departure gave Kuntī a divine mantra for begetting children. The mantra was to be used only five times. If she called upon any god repeating that mantra, that god would manifest himself before her and bless her with a son equal to him in glory. Out of impatient curiosity of youth Kuntī tried it before getting married. One morning, seeing the beautiful and brilliant sun in the sky she invoked him by the mantra and instantly the Sun stood in all bewitching brilliance before her and she got of him a son who was known as Karna later. Unmarried as she was, Kuntī sent the child afloat in the river nearby. Even after a child-birth Kuntī remained a virgin by the blessing of the Sun and so got married as a virgin. Many Kings were present for the Svayānvar of Kuntī and she put the wedding garland round the neck of Pāṇḍu.

Once Bhīṣma went to the country of Madra. The King of Madra received Bhīṣma with respect and Bhīṣma took Mādṛi daughter of Madra as a bride for Pāṇḍu. He brought her to Hastināpura and married her to Pāṇḍu. Pāṇḍu lived with his two wives happily and ruled the country well. Once Pāṇḍu attacked Daśārha with a huge army and defeated him. Later he defeated Dirgha, King of Magadha. Then he conducted a victory march capturing many kingdoms like Kāśi, Mithilā, Suhma and Pundra. Thus many of the Kings of Uttara Bhratā became feudatory princes of Pāṇḍu. In consultation with his brother Dhrtaṛṣṭra, Pāṇḍu gave all the wealth he got by his might to Satyavatī and Bhīṣma. He gave enough riches to Vidura also. Then Pāṇḍu went and stayed with his wives in a forest to the south of the Himalayas. (Chapters 110 to 114, Ādi Parva).

6) Curse of a sage. While Pāṇḍu was once walking with his wives in the forest he saw a couple of deer playfully running about and the hunting nature in him made him send an arrow against one of them. The deer was none other than the sage Kindama who in the guise of a deer was having sport with his mate. While cheering dead Kindama cursed Pāṇḍu thus: "Oh wicked King, you will fall dead the moment you touch your wife in amorous sport." From that day onwards Pāṇḍu could not touch his wives. (For details see under Kindama).

7) Sannyāsa and death. With the death of the innocent sage Kindama there occurred a great change in the life of Pāṇḍu. At first he thought of committing suicide.
BUT he changed that decision and started for the Himalayas to perform penance there. Kunti and Madri accompanied him. They gave away all their jewels and ornaments as gifts to brahmans. People followed them to the border of the forests and returned to the country weeping. Pandu and his wives visited such holy places as Nágasatândri, Gaitrarathâ, Kákalâjûta, Himalayas, Gandhamâdana and the lake Indradyumna. Then they went to Sataśrânga and started performing penance. Once Pandu and wives along with a few sages went to Brahmaloka to attend a Yâga there. The long travel tired them much and on the way Pandu wept thinking of his pitiable state of having no issue. Then Pandu told them of his helplessness in the matter because of the curse of the sage Kindama hanging over him. Then Kunti confided in him the secret of the divine mantras in her possession. Pandu was extremely pleased and with his permission Kunti got three sons, Yudhîshthira, Bîhmasena and Arjuna. She gave one chance to Madri and she got two sons out of it named Nakula and Sahadeva.

Pandu was living happily with his children in Sataśrânga when spring time arrived in the forest with all its blossoming brilliance and fragrance conducive to amorous thoughts in all living beings. Pandu one day walked alone with Madri enjoying the sight of the flowering plants and trees. Bees and Beetles hummed around the flowers and on the branches sat the Cuckoos singing. There was a seductive fragrance all around and Pandu was excited beyond controllable limits. Pandu's resolution broke down under the exhilarating influence of the season and despite repeated protests from Madri, Pandu caught hold of her and embraced her. The curse of the sage took effect instantaneously and Pandu fell down dead.

The inhabitants of Sataśrânga assembled there weeping. In the presence of a huge crowd including the relatives who had come down from Hâstinapura the dead body of Pandu was cremated according to religious rites. Both the wives came forward to end their lives in the funeral pyre of Pandu. But Kunti asked to remain to take care of the children and Madri leaving her children to the care of Kunti jumped into the funeral pyre and ended her life. It was the sage Kâtyâpa who performed the funeral rites of Pandu. (Chapters 115 to 126, Âdi Parva).

8) After the demise, Pandu's soul is shining in the court of Yama. (Śloka 25, Chapter 7, Sabha Parva). Pandu sent a message to Yudhîshthira from Devaloka that Yudhîshthira should conduct a Râjaśûya Yajña. The message was carried by Nárada. (Śloka 24, Chapter 12, Sabha Parva). He lives in Indraloka with Madri and Kunti. (Śloka 15, Chapter 5, Svargarâha Parva).

9) Synonyms of Pandu. Pandu is known under the following names. Bharata, Bharatârshâbha, Bharâtasatata, Kaurava, Kauravânapanda, Kauravarshâbha, Kauravya, Kauravyadâyâda, Kausalyânapandavardhana, Kuruvâha, Kurukulodvâha, Kurunanda, Kurupati, Kuruprâvira, Nâgarupâdhipi and Nâgarupasimha.

PÂNDU II. The second son of Janamejaya. (Śloka 94, Âdi Parva).

PÂNDURA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 73, Chapter 45, Sâlya Parva).

PÂNDURĀSTRA. A place of habitation in ancient Bharata. (Śloka 44, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

PÂNDYA. I. A King of Vidarbha who was a great devotee of Śiva. One day while he was performing Śivapûja at dusk he heard a loud noise outside the city and before completing the worship he went out and faced the enemies who were attempting to enter the city and killed its leader. He returned after the fight and without completing the worship took his meals. It was a sin to do so and the King was therefore born in his next birth as Satyaratâha, a King, and was killed by his enemies. (Śatarudrasahhitâ, Śiva Purâṇa).

PÂNDYA. II. (A Tamilian dynasty of Kings.) A place of Purânic fame in Dakṣâṇâ Bhârata. The three states Cera, Cola and Pandya were from early times renowned states of Dakṣâṇâ Bhârata. Historically and Purânic Pândya was a state of eminence.

(A) Historically. The Pândya dynasty of Kings is very ancient. The exact period of its beginning is still unknown. Megasthnes who lived in the fourth century B.C. has made mention of the Pândya dynasty in his diary. Julian, an emperor of Italy, who lived in 361 A.D. is stated to have received visitors from Pândyadesa. The Pândya dynasty was revived and elevated under the leadership of Katurika in the 7th century A.D. From that time till the 16th century Madura was the capital of Pândyadesa. The Uccângi dynasty which was ruling the places to the south of Tungabhadra during the period from 9th century to 13th century A.D. is believed to be a part of the Pândyavânsâ which had gone from Madura. A continuous history of the Pândya line of Kings is not available. Many Kings bear names like Jâtavarma or Máravarma. The Pândya Kings were devotees of Śiva even from the period of the Jainas. At times they have ruled over the combined kingdoms of Cera and Cola. During the period from the 12th to the 14th century A.D. Pândya was ruled by five of the most valiant rulers and at that time the Pândyadesa included all the places in south India up to Nellore. But the power of the Pândyas waned when the power of the Sultans who ruled Delhi spread to the south. After 1370 A.D only on rare occasions has the power of the Pândyas spread to the north of river Kaveri. In 1312 A.D. Kerala got herself free from the hold of the Tamilian Kings. (Pândyârajâya).

(B) Purânic fame. The statements found in Mahâbhârata about Pândyadesa are given below:—

(i) Śrî Kṛṣṇa once slew a Pândya King who was the father of Malayadhvaja. Malayadhvaja who was a very valiant archer started for Dvârakâ to kill Kṛṣṇa to avenge the death of his father. Friends dissuaded him from his attempt and so he dropped the idea. During the time of Mahâbhârata Malayadhvaja was the King of Pândya. (Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

(ii) Malayadhvaja, King o' Pândya, was a frequent visitor to the court of Yudhîshthira. (Śloka 24, Chapter 4, Sabha Parva).

(iii) The King of Pândya presented gifts at the Râjaśûya of Yudhîshthira. (Śloka 35, Chapter 52, Sabha Parva).

(iv) In the Kurukṣetra battle the Pândya King fought on the side of the Pâṇḍavas with a large army. (Śloka 9, Chapter 19, Udyoga Parva).

(v) On the chariot of the Pândya King flags bearing the insignia of ocean flew. The Pândya King wounded Droṇa. (Sloka 72, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).
(vi) The King of Pândya fought against Vṛṣasena and Āvattihā. (Sloka 46, Chapter 20, Karṇa Parva).
PAŚI (S). A tribe which opposed the Aryans during the time of Rgveda. Yāska's Nirukta states that their profession was trade and commerce.
PAŚIKHĀTA A holy place on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in the sacred pond there and performs worship of the Manes one will get the benefit of conducting the three yajñas, Agniṣṭoma, Atriśrā and Rājaśyā. (Sloka 89, Chapter 13, Vana Parva).
PAŚIKURAÇCA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 76, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).
PAŅIMĀN. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Sloka 10, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).
PAŅINI. The author of the Sanskrit Grammar, Pāṇiniya.
1) General information. There is nowhere else in this world a grammar so scientific and so complete as Pāṇiniya. The book contains about four thousand aphorisms. Pāṇini was an inspired sage and he got his knowledge from Śiva. It has not been possible to gather much information about the life of such a celebrated grammarian. Patañjali believes that he was the son of Dākṣi. He addresses Pāṇini as Acārya, Bhagavān and Maharsi. The Chinese traveller Huen Tsang says that the grammar of all the languages in this world has its origin from Pāṇiniya. Rūnabhadradikṣita says that Pāṇini was the son of the sage Pāṇi.
2) Life period. There is difference of opinion regarding the period during which Pāṇini lived. Dr. Goldstucker and Bhandarkar believe that Pāṇini lived before 500 B.C. while Vincent Smith and Belvelkar fix the period in 700 B.C. Patañjali, the author of the celebrated 'Mahabhāṣya' (commentary on Pāṇiniya) lived in 200 B.C. Patañjali has contradicted many of the unjust criticisms made by Kātyāyana about Pāṇiniya. So Pāṇini must have lived before Kātyāyana. Pāṇini has made no reference to Buddha and so he must have lived before Buddha. Pāṇini has shown great grasp over the laws of Sṛṃti and so he must have lived after Manu. Considering all these facts together it will be proper to fix the period of the end of the sixth century or the beginning of the seventh century B.C.
3) Place of birth. Evidences are lacking to correctly fix the birth-place of Pāṇini. Many pandits believe that Pāṇini was born in the village of Śālātura in the city of Attock in the state of Gāndhāra. But Pāṇini has spent the major portion of his life in Pāṭaliputra. So some pandits are of opinion that only the ancestors of Pāṇini belonged to the village of Śālātura and Pāṇini was born and brought up in Pāṭaliputra. Jamini and Bhartrhari have stated that Pāṇini was a Śiṣṭa. Śiṣṭas were brahmins well-versed in the Śāstras and devoid of earthly pleasures who inhabited the area surrounded by the Himmālayas in the north, Kālakavana (Bengal) in the east, Vindhya mountains in the south and the Ādārśa (Aravalli mountains) in the west.
4) A legend. There was a preceptor named Varsa in Pāṭaliputra and Pāṇini had his education under him. Varsa gradually acquired a large number of disciples and Pāṇini was the most dull-witted among them. But he was greatly devoted to his Guru and this pleased the wife of the Guru and she took great interest in Pāṇini. One day she called Pāṇini to her side and advised him to go to the Himalayas and do penance to propitiate Śiva to get knowledge from him. Pāṇini obeying instructions went and performed penance. Śiva was pleased and he granted him knowledge about a new grammar. By the time Pāṇini came back from the Himalayas with his grammar another disciple of Varaṇa, Vararuci by name, had come down with a grammar from Indra. Pāṇini challenged Vararuci for a polemical contest. It took eight days and on the eighth day Vararuci defeated Pāṇini. At once there was a great humming sound from the sky and the grammar book of Vararuci was destroyed. After that Pāṇini defeated all his co-disciples in polemics and emerged as the greatest grammarian of the world. (Kathāpithā-lambaka, Kathāsaritsāgara, Tārāṅga 4).
5) The birth of Pāṇiniya. When Pāṇini was doing penance to propitiate Śiva the latter appeared before him and started dancing. He sounded his musical instrument ḍhakṣa (a large double drum) fourteen times. Each of it produced a different sound as follows (1) Aiṃ (2) Trk (3) Eōi (4) Aiāuc (5) Hayavaraṭ (6) Iap (7) Ṛmanānaśāna (8) Jhabhaḥ (9) Ghadaḥ (10) Jagaśādaś (11) Khaphaḥaṭṭahacata (12) Kapay (13) Šaśāra (14) Hal. Pāṇini accepted these fourteen sounds as fourteen sūtras (aphorisms). They are called Pratyaḥśarasūtras. (The comprehension of several letters or affixes into one syllable effected by combining the first letter of a Sūtra with its final indicative letter.) These Sūtras are now known as Māheśvarasūtras. Pāṇini's grammar contains eight chapters and each chapter has got four pādas and each pāda contains many sūtras. He has taken examples from worldly and spiritual texts in literature. He has dealt with the origin of sounds, connection between two words and all such etymological details. Pāṇini's grammar is not a mere grammar book. It is a science of language in itself.
PAŅITAKA. One of the two pārśadas presented to Subrahmanya by a deva named Pūṣa. The name of the other pārśada was Kālika. (Sloka 43, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).
PAŅKADIGHANĀ. A deva who fought bravely against the asuras along with Subrahmanya. (Sloka 68, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).
PAŅKAJIT. Son of Garuda. (Sloka 10, Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).
PAŅASODHANA. A sacred place of Bhārata. Indradatta, King of Cedi, once constructed a temple near this place. (Tārāṅga 8, Kathāsaritsāgara).
PARAS. An ancient King of Bhārata. (Sloka 234, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).
PARA II. A Brahmanvādi son of Viśvāmitra. (Sloka 55, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).
PARĀ. Another name for Kauśiki river. (Sloka 32, Chapter 31, Ādi Parva).
PARABRAHMAN. The Supreme Spirit.
1) General information. Brahma is the root cause of this universe. From Brahma originated Akāśa (sky). From sky came air, from air came Agni and from Agni came water and from water was born this earth. (Chapter 377, Agni Purāṇa).
2) General characteristics. Brahman is such that he who says he knows it does not know it and he who says he does not know it, knows it. It is beyond the experiences of time and space. The chief attributes of Brahman are Sat, Cit and Ānanda. Sat means existence, the really existent truth. The one and undivided existence. There are pandits who say that it was undivided, Nāstītva (nonexistence) that was at the beginning of the Universe. Since nothing can be born from ‘nothing’ the world should have started from astītva (existence). There is a saying in Rigveda explaining the position thus:—“There was neither Astītva nor Nāstītva (existence or non-existence) at the beginning.” It is a matter to ponder how strongly conscious was the Rṣi who made the above statement about the Parabrahman’s Nirguṇa (devoid of attributes) and how clearly he tries to make it understandable to those who have not experienced the idea. Cit means knowledge, splendour, consciousness. Ānanda means bliss, Paul Deussen writes that the ancient Upaniṣads do not include in the definition of Brahman the term ‘ānanda’.

3) The two forms of Brahman. Brahman has two forms—Parabrahman and Aparabrahman. Parabrahman is Amūtra (formless, incorporeal) and Aparabrahman is Mūtra (embodied, corporeal). The Amūtra Brahman is known by such names as Parabrahman, Paramātmā and Nirguṇa. The corporeal or material Brahman is Aparabrahman and thus this whole world is Aparabrahman.

4) The Upaniṣads about Brahman.
Aśabdamapsarśamarpuṇamayayāṁ
Tathāgraṣaṁ nityamārangadvacca yat /
Anādyantaiti mahātaṁ paraṁ dhrīvaṁ
Vicārya tántriyumukhā pramucyate //

(With no sound, touch, form, taste or smell, with neither beginning nor end Brahman is imperishable).
Na tatra caksurṣagacchati na vāk gacchati na mano
Na vidmo na vijañjino yathaitantarudvayate /
Anyadeva tadviditadātho aviditätadāthi
Iī suśruma pūrveśaṁ ye nastadvayaccaśeṁ

(Nōgukāpanīṣad)

(No eye goes there, no word goes there, no mind, no intelligence—we do not see it, we cannot describe it—you cannot imagine it nor can you understand it. It is distinct from the known and above the unknown. We have heard it spoken thus).
Yasyāṁtaṁ taśya maṁtaṁ maṁtaṁ yasya na veda saḥ /
Avijñātaṁ vijñātaṁ vijñātaṁ avijñātaṁ //

(Deśapāpanīṣad)

(He understands It who comprehends It not; and he understands It not who feels he has understood. It is the unknown to those who have acquired real knowledge while it is the known to those who are ignorant of true knowledge).
Yat cakṣuṣaṁ na paśyati
Yena cakṣuṇiṁ paśyati /
Tadeva Brahme tvaṁ viddhī
Nedāṁ yaddidamupāsaṁ. //

(Deśapāpanīṣad)

(That which is not seen by the eye but that by which the eyes are able to see—that alone is Brahman and not that which people do worship here, do know that).

Yato vāco nivartante
Āprāpya manasaṁ saha. (Taittirīya Upaniṣad).
Avijñātaṁ Vijñātaṁ vijñātaṁ avijñātaṁ,

(Kenopāpanīṣad)

(It is unknown to people who think they know but known to those who did not profess to know it).
Naiva vācā na manasaṁ prāptuṁ śākya na cakṣuṣaṁ /
Āsūtī bruvaṁ yatra kathāṁ tadupalaksya-te. //

(Kathopāpanīṣad)

(It is not possible to reach it by speech, mind or the eyes. How is it to be identified; or described?—Digdēvagūṇadīpahaladhasunyāṁ hi paramārthā—Sat tad adavayāṁ Brahma mandabuddhināṁ asadivā praśibhāti. (Śaṅkarācārya).

The sublime Truth (Brahman) is beyond time, place and attributes. Brahman is one (not two) and it is Sat (existent) but for the dull-witted, ignorant people it is Asat (non-existent).
Satyamevopāsaṁ, tadat tat yaksaraṁ satyamiti;

(Chāndogya).

PĀRA. An ancient place of Bhārata. Those who resided there were called Pāradas. The descendants of these people live in north Baluchistan. Pāradas gave Dharmaputra many valuable presents. (Chapter 51, Sabhā Parva). They followed Bhismā. (Chapter 87, Bhishma Parva).

PARAHAN. A king of ancient Bhārata (Śloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva, Mahābhārata).

PARAMAKĀMBOJA A place of habitation situated on the northwestern side of Bhārata. Arjuna conquered this land. (Śloka 25, Chapter 27, Sabhā Parva).

PARAMAKĀMRODHĪ. One of the Viṣvadevas who are worthy of accepting a share of the obsequial oblations. The others are: Balandhṛi, Viśpāṁ, Puṣyakṛt, Pāvana, Pārṣnikṣeṇa, Samūhā, Divyāsāṇu, Vivasvān, Viśvāvān, Hṛmaṇ, Kuṭṭiṁ, Kṛta, Jitāṁ, Munivīrya, Dīptarāme, Anukarman, Pratīka, Pradātā, Aruṇāṁ, Śailābha, Dhīroṣi, Bhūpāti, Sraja, Vajrīvīra, Viṣvāyro, Somavārca, Śūryāro, Somāpā, Śūryāsaṁitā, Dattāṁ, Purandariya, Uṣṭiṁa, Nākoda, Viśvāyu, Dīpti, Camuḥara, Suresa, Vyomā, Śaṅkara, Bhava, Iṣa, Karṭa, Kṛti, Daṣa, Bhuvana, Divyakarmākṛt, Gaṇita, Paṇcavīrya, Āditya, Raśiṁ, Saptakṛt, Somavārca, Viśvākṛt, Kavi, Anugopta, Sugoṭa, Naptā and Iṣvara. (Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).

PARAMĀṆU. See under Trasareṇu.

PARAMĀṬMĀ. The Supreme Spirit. The vitality behind Jīvātmā (soul). (See under Jīvātmā and Brahman).
PARAMESHTHI I. A king of Chandravaniśa (Lunar race). He was the son of Indradhumana and the father of Praithâra. (Chapter 1, Aniśa I, Viśṇu Purâṇa).

PARAMESHTHI II. A Vaidikaśuktidraśā. He was a disciple of Brahmâ. (Bhadarânyaka Upanishad). According to Jaimini Brâhmaṇa Parameshti was the disciple of Prajapati.

PARAMESHTHI III. A king of Pâńcâladesa. He was born to Ajamîtha of Nîl. Parameshti and the sons of Dûṣyaṇâ, his brother, are known as Pâńcâlas. (Ādi Parva, Mahâbhârata).

PARÂNYA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhârata. (Sloka 47, Chapter 9, Bhûma Parva).

PARAPURANJAYA. A prince of the Hêhaya race. He once sent an arrow against a wild animal. (See under Ashîtanemi).

PARASARA I. 1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viśṇu—Brahmâ—Vâsiṣṭha—Sakti—Parâsâra. 2) Birth. Sakti, son of Vâsiṣṭha begot of his wife Adrâjânti the son named Parâsâra. Even at the time of his birth he was a scholar. (For details regarding birth see under Adrâjânti). 3) Râkṣasayâga. Even before the birth of Parâsâra, Kalmâsâpâda in his demoniacal form ate his father, Sakti. Therefore Parâsâra nurtured an obstinate hatred against the Râkṣasas. So he performed a Yâga to kill all the Râkṣasas. Thousands of Râkṣasas were burnt to death at this Yâga and Vâsiṣṭha, grandfather of Parâsâra felt sorry for the innocent Râkṣasas. He approached Parâsâra and said “Son, do not give way to such anger. Abandon this wrath. What harm have these poor Râkṣasas done? Death was in the destiny of your father. Every one has to suffer the result of his own deeds. Anger destroys the fame and austerity which one has attained by years of toil. Therefore abandon your anger and wind up your Yâga.” Parâsâra accepted the advice of his grandfather. Vâsiṣṭha was pleased with his grandson and at that time PulastyaMahâraśi son of Brahmâ also came there. Vâsiṣṭha gave arghya (water and flowers) and asked him. Then Vâsiṣṭha and Pulastya jointly blessed him and said he would be the author of Purâṇasiva-thitâ. Thus Parâsâra became the best of the Gûraparamârâ (traditional line of preceptors). (Chapter 1, Aniśa I, Viśṇu Purâṇa).

4) Birth of Vyâsa. Parâsâra begot a son of a fisherwoman named Satyavâ Henri and the boy became later the celebrated Vyâsa.

5) Other details. (i) He got the name Parâsâra because even from the womb of his mother he was a fisherboy. Vâsiṣṭha gave arghya (water and flowers) and called him. Then Vâsiṣṭha and Pulastya jointly blessed him and said he would be the author of Purâṇasiva-thitâ. Thus Parâsâra became the best of the Gûraparamârâ (traditional line of Gurus). (ii) See under Gûraparamârâ the status of Parâsâra in that traditional line of Gurus. (iii) Among the Sûkta-s, Sûkta 65, Anuvâka 12, Maṇḍala 1 of Rûgveda was sung by Parâsâra. (iv) Parâsâra was one among the several sages who visited Bûṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Chapter 47, Sânti Parva). (v) Once Parâsâra visited king Janaka and talked with him on Adhyâtma topics (spiritual matters). (Chapter 290, Sânti Parva).

(vi) Chapter 150 of Anuśasana Parva mentions Parâsâra as describing the power of Sûvitrimantra to an audience.

PARÂSAharma II. A serpent born of the family of Dûrâsātra. This was burnt to death at the sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 19, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PARÂSÂRA YI. Vyâsa, son of sage Parâsâra. (See under Vyâsa).

PARÂSÂRA YII. This sage is different from Vyâsa. This Parâsâra was a member of the court of Yudhishthira. (Sloka 13, Chapter 7, Sûbhâ Parva). He was a member of the court of Indra also. Sri Kûśa once met him while he was going to Hastinâpura from Dwârakâ. (Sloka 64, Chapter 83, Udyoga Parva).

PARÂSAvA. A child born to a brahmin of a sîdra woman. Vidura was a son born to Vyâsa of a sîdra woman and was therefore called Parâsâva. (Sloka 25, Chapter 101, Ādi Parva).

PARÂSIKA. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhârata. (Sloka 25, Chapter 9, Bhûma Parva).

PARÂSÂRaMA. An incarnation of Mahâviśnu, as man. 1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Mahâviśnu—Brahmâ—Bhûru-Cyavana—Urva—Rñcika—Jamadagni-Parâsâra. 2) Cause for incarnation. Once god Agni went to Kàrta-vîryârjuna and begged for food. The king allowed him to take from his vast territory as much food as he wanted from anywhere he liked. Agni started burning forests and mountains and consuming them. Deep inside any of the forests a sage named Ápava was performing penance and the fire burnt the ârâma of Ápava also. Enraged at this the sage cursed thus: “Kârtavîryârjuna is at the root of this havoc. The arrogance of Kâštriyas has increased beyond limits. Mahâviśnu would therefore be born on earth as Parâsârâma to destroy this arrogance of the Kâśtriyas.” Accordingly Mahâviśnu was born as Parâsârâma in the Bhârgava race. (Chapter 40, Harivarâśa).

Brahmânâdha Purâna gives another version: Viśṇu promised Bhûmidëvi (mother earth) that he would be born on earth as Parâsârâma when Bhûmidëvi went to him in the form of a cow and complained to him about the atrocities of the wicked Kâśtiyâ kings.

3) Birth. Parâsârâma was born as the son of sage Jamadagni of his wife Rñukâ. Their ârâma was on the shores of the Narmadâ river. Rñukâ, mother of Parâsârâma, was the daughter of King Prasenajit. She had four sons even before the birth of Parâsârâma (Chapter 58, Brahmanâdha Purâna).

4) Boyhood and education. Parâsârâma spent his boyhood with his parents in the ârâma. An important event in his life then was his slaying his mother at the behest of his father. (See under Jamadagni, Para 6). Though Parâsârâma was a brahmin there is nothing on record to show that he did study the Vedas. Perhaps he might have had the Vedic instructions from his father during his life with him. He had even from the beginning shown an interest in learning Dhanurvîdyâ (archery). For obtaining proficiency in archery he went to the Himâlayas and did penance to please Siva for many years. Pleased at his penance Siva on several occasions extolled the virtues of Parâsârâma. At that time the asuras (demons) acquired strength and attacked the devas. The devas complained to Siva. Siva called Parâsârâma and asked him to fight with ardë défât th smell, Parāśurāma was without weapons and he asked Śiva how he could go and fight the demons without weapons. Śiva said: “Go with my blessings and you will kill your foes.” Parāśurāma did not wait for a moment. When Śiva thus assured him of success, he went straight to fight with the demons. He defeated the asuras and came back to Śiva when the latter gave him many boons and divine weapons.

Till that time his name was only Narāyaṇa and he became Parāśurāma because among the weapons given to him by Śiva was a weapon named Para’u (axe). There is a story behind this weapon Paraśu. Once Śiva was not invited for a Yāga conducted by Dakṣa. An angered Śiva threw his spike into the Yāgaśāla (sacrificial hall). The spike spoiled the Yāga and smashed the hall and after that roamed about aimlessly for sometime and then turned towards Badarāśrama where at that time Naraśāyanaṇas were engaged in penance. The spike went straight to the heart of sage Narāyaṇa. Narāyaṇa made the defiant sound “hum” (hūṅkāra) and the spike turned away. Siva felt angry for thus showing disrespect to his spike and he attacked the sage. At once Narāṣi plucked a grass and reciting a mantra threw it at Śiva. The grass became a Paraśu (axe) and it attacked Śiva. Śiva broke it into two. Then Naraśāyanaṇas bowed before him and worshipped him. Thereafter the two pieces of the Paraśu remained with Śiva. It was one of these that Śiva gave to Parāśurāma. When Parāśurāma was returning happy and glorious with boons and weapons he got on his way a disciple named Akṛtvanāraṇa. (See under Akṛtvanāraṇa). Guru and disciple lived in an āśrama and Parāśurāma became a noted Guru in dhanurveda (archery). (Chapter 34, Karna Parva; Chapter 49, Śanti Parva and Chapter 18, Anuśāsana Parva).

5) Instruction in archery. According to Purāṇas Parāśurāma did not spend his life as an instructor in archery. There are statements, however, mentioning that Karna and Droṇa took instructions from him.

Pretending to be a brahmin Karna commenced taking instructions in archery from Parāśurāma. When his education was complete Parāśurāma taught him Brahmāstra. One day tired after a long walk in the forests Parāśurāma took rest placing his head on the lap of Karna and soon fell asleep. At that time a beetle came and started sucking blood from the thigh of Karna. Karna remained still, bearing the pain, lest any movement of his body should disturb the sleep of his Guru. Blood was oozing from his thighs and it slowly made the body of the Guru also wet. Parāśurāma woke up and the sight of the bleeding thigh and the calm demeanour of Karna raised doubts in him. He questioned Karna saying that no brahmin could ever bear such a pain with such calmness and Karna had to tell the truth. Then Parāśurāma cursed him for deceit against his Guru saying that he would never be able to remember the Brahmāstra when the time to use it came.

There is a story behind Alarka, the beetle that bit Karna. This beetle was in his previous birth a demon named Damśa. Damśa once tried to molest the wife of the sage Bhrigu. The Mahārāja cursed him and made him into a beetle. On his request for mercy he said he would get release from the curse by Parāśurāma. So the beetle became the Rākṣasa again and left the place. Karna took leave of Parāśurāma and went to Hastināpura. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 3).

Another famous disciple of Parāśurāma was Droṇa. There is a story behind Droṇa getting Dhanurveda from Parāśurāma. After travelling throughout the world exterminating the Kṣatriya race Parāśurāma gave all his wealth to Kaśyapa. On hearing that Parāśurāma was giving away all his riches as gifts to brahmmins Droṇa rushed to Mahendraparvata to see Parāśurāma. By then Parāśurāma had distributed all his wealth excepting Dhanurveda. Parāśurāma called Droṇa to his side and said that only two things remained with him, his body and Dhanurveda. Droṇa, he added, could take anyone of the two and then Droṇa took Dhanurveda from him. After that Parāśurāma went to Mahārāja for the sake of penance. (Chapter 130, Adi Parva).

There are some apparent inconsistencies in the above stories: It is said Droṇa taught Dhanurveda to Karna. Droṇa was the last person to receive Dhanurveda from Parāśurāma because the latter, surrendering his Dhanurveda in entire, left for the forests for doing penance. Then, when did Karna learn Dhanurveda from Parāśurāma? Could it be before Droṇa went to Parāśurāma? Then it must be accepted that Droṇa had not studied under Parāśurāma when he was teaching the the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas. He learnt it from somewhere before he became the preceptor of the Pāṇḍavas. Karna after studying under Droṇa for some time went to Parāśurāma for higher studies and Droṇa approached Parāśurāma after Karna had left him.

6) The destruction of the Kṣatriyas. The most important event of his life was the total extermination of the Kṣatriya race. The Purānic belief is that he went round the world eighteen times to massacre the Kṣatriyas.

In many places in the Purāṇas it is stated that Parāśurāma fought against the Kṣatriyas eighteen times. But in chapter 29 of Āsvamedha Parva it is stated that Parāśurāma fought against the Kṣatriyas twentyone times. So it is to be surmised that Parāśurāma fought eighteen big battles and three minor ones.

There are some old stories to explain this revengeful enmity of Parāśurāma towards the Kṣatriyas.

1) Family enmity. The Hehaya dynasty was the most powerful kingly race then. Parāśurāma was a descendant of Bhrigu, a brahmin sage. That is why he gets the name Bhārgava also. The Bhārgavas were for generations the family preceptors of the Hehaya kings. Taking advantage of their supreme position in the royal palace the Bhārgavas accumulated great wealth at the cost of the royal riches. Gradually the Bhārgavas rose in prosperity in inverse proportion to the decline of the Hehaya wealth. It was at the time of Reśka, grandfather of Parāśurāma that they touched the rock-bottom of their wealth and they found funds lacking even for the day to day administration of the state. In despair they went and requested the Reśkas to lend them some money. But they hid their money and refused to give them anything. The Kṣatriya kings got angry and killed the brahmmins. What stock was left of them went to the base of the Himālayas. The wife of Reśka who was pregnant then kept the child in her womb for twelve years afraid to bring forth the child. After that the child came out breaking open the thigh (ūru) and so the child was called Aurva. Even at the time of his birth Aurva shone like a brilliant torch and not only that; the child cried aloud “Oh, wicked Kṣatriyas, I will kill every one of you. I heard from my mother's womb the din of the swords you raised to kill my ancestors. I will never wait for another moment to wreak vengeance on you.”

The fire that emanated from the face of Aurva burnt even Devaloka. Kṣatriyas as a class came and prostrated before him. The devas came and requested him to abandon his anger and Aurva agreed. The devas picked up the fire sparks from Aurva's face and deposited them in the ocean. From those sparks put in the ocean was born Bādāvignī alias Aurva.

(ii) Curse of the sage. From Aurva was born Jamadagni and from Jamadagni was born Pārashurāma. In the race of the Hēhayas was born at that time a very valorous king named Kārtavyāryūjuna. Once Kārtavyāryūjuna gave a dinner to Aṅgībhagavān. Aṅgīni began to devour all the mountains and forests in the world. The burning was so indiscriminate that it burnt the āśrama of a sage named Āpava also. The sage cursed Kārtavyāryūjuna saying that the thousand hands of the latter would be cut off by Pāsāṣṭurāma born in the family of Bhārghavas. From that day onwards the feud between them lasted for many thousand years and only when Pārashurāma destroyed even the embryo in the wombs of Kṣatriyī women. Then the Bhārghava ancestors like Rčika and others came to the sky and requested Pārashurāma to stop this slaughter. They said: “Oh son, Rāma, stop this slaughter. What good do you get by killing innocent Kṣatriyas?” By that time Pārashurāma had made twentyone rounds around Bhārata killing the Kṣatriyas. (Chapter 64, Ādi Parva; Chapter 38, Sābha Parva; Chapter 116, Vana Parva; Chapter 49, Śānti Parva and 10 chapters from chapter 83 of Brahmanda Purāṇa).

7) Samantapancakonirmāṇa. Samantapañcaka is Kuru-ksetra itself where the great battle was conducted. This is a holy place and it was Pārashurāma who constructed it. He stored the blood of the Kṣatriyas he killed in the twentyone rounds of killing in five lakes in Samantapañcaka. He offered blood to the Manes in those lakes. The Manes led by Rčika appeared before him and asked him to name any boon he wanted. Then Pārashurāma said, “Revered Manes, if you are pleased with me you must absolve me from the sin of this mass massacre of the Kṣatriyas and declare the five lakes where I have stored their blood as holy.” The Manes declared, “Let it be so.” From then onwards the place became holy under the name Samantapañcaka.

At the end of the Dwāpara-yugya and the beginning of Kali-yugya a great battle lasting for eighteen days took place at this holy place between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas. (Chapter 2, Ādi Parva).

8) Alonement. To atone for the sin of slaughtering even innocent Kṣatriyas, Pārashurāma gave away all his riches as gifts to brahmans. He invited all the brahmans to Samantapañcaka and conducted a great Yāga there. The chief Rtvik (officiating priest) of the Yāga was the sage Kaśyapa and Pārashurāma gave all the lands he conquered till that time to Kaśyapa. Then a platform of gold ten yards long and nine yards wide was made and Kaśyapa was installed there and worshipped. After the worship was over according to the instructions from Kaśyapa the gold platform was cut into pieces and the gold pieces were offered to brahmans. When Kaśyapa got all the lands from Parasurāma he said thus:—“Oh Rāma, you have given me all your land and it is not now proper for you to live in my soil. You can go to the south and live somewhere on the shores of the ocean there.” Parasurāma walked south and requested the ocean to give him some land to live. Varuṇa then asked him to throw a winnow into the ocean. There is a legend saying that it was a Parāśu that Parasurāma threw. Parasurāma threw the sieve (śūrpa) and the ocean gave way to land for a distance where the winnow fell from where he stood. This is the place Sūrparaka now known as Kerala. (Śūrpa=Winnowing basket). After giving this land also to the brahmans, Parasurāma went and started doing penance at Mahendragiri. (Chapter 130, Ādi Parva; Chapter 117, Vana Parva and Chapter 49, Sānti Parva).

9) Other exploits of Parasurāma.

(i) Meets Śrī Rāma. Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were returning to Ayodhyā from Mithilāpurī after the marriage along with the sage Vasiṣṭha through a deep forest when Parasurāma blocked their way and addressing Śrī Rāma said thus, ‘Oh Rāma, son of Daśaratha, I heard that you broke during the marriage of Śītā the great Saiva bow of the palace of Janaka. It was a Śāiva bow and I have now come here to test your prowess. I am giving you a Vaisnavā bow now. Can you string this bow?’ Vasiṣṭha tried his best to pacify Parasurāma. But Parasurāma without heeding it started describing the story and greatness of the Śāiva bow and the Vaiṣṇava bow. (See under Vaiṣṇava bow). Then Śrī Rāma took the bow from Parasurāma and started to string it. The brilliance of Śrī Rāma dazzled him and he stood dumbfounded at his skill. Parasurāma was immensely pleased and he blessed Śrī Rāma. After that he went again to Mahendragiri to perform penance. This same story is told in Kamba Ramayana with some slight changes:—Parasurāma did not like Śrī Rāma breaking the bow of his Guru Śiva. So an angered Parasurāma blocked the way of Śrī Rāma and challenged him to string and take aim with the mighty Vaiṣṇava bow he (Parasurāma) was carrying with him then. Śrī Rāma with perfect ease took the bow, strung it, and taking the missile asked Parasurāma to show the target. Parasurāma was astonished and was in a fix. The missile could destroy even the entire Universe. So Parasurāma asked Rāma to aim at the accumulated tapobala (power accrued by penance) of his self and Rāma did so. Then Parasurāma surrendered to Śrī Rāma the Vaiṣṇava bow and arrow and the Vaiṣṇava tejās (divine brilliance) in him. Parasurāma having carried out the purpose of his incarnation gave instructions to Śrī Rāma to continue the purpose of his incarnation and then after blessing Śrī Rāma went again to do penance at his holy āśrama. This same story is told by the sage Lomaśa to the Pāṇḍavas during their exile in the forests. This story is much different from the previous ones: “When the fame that Śrī Rāma was the best of Kings spread far and wide Parasurāma once went to see Śrī Rāma. Giving him the bow and arrow with which he had done the mass massacre of the Kṣatriyas he challenged him to string it and take aim. With a smile Śrī Rāma did so and then Parasurāma said Rāma should draw the string up to his ears. Śrī Rāma got angry and then on the face, which became fierce, by his anger, Parasurāma saw besides himself, Ādiyā-Vaṣu-Rudras, Sādhyas, Bālakūlyas, Devarśis, oceans, mountains, the Vedas and all such things of this universe. Śrī Rāma sent out his missile from the bow. The whole universe was thrown into chaos. Thunder and lightning rocked the world. Heavy rains flooded the whole land space. Burning stars and meteors fell to the ground. Parasurāma then knew that Śrī Rāma was the incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu and he stood bowing before him. Ashamed of his defeat he took leave of Śrī Rāma and went to Mahendragiri. When he reached there he found he had lost all his brilliance. Then the sages appeared and advised him to go and bathe in the river Vadhūsarā. Accordingly Parasurāma went and bathed in the river and regained his lost brilliance. (Chapter 99, Vana Parva).

10) Other details.

(i) Parasurāma along with a few other sages was present at the Sabhāpravēśa of Dharmaputra. (Sloka 11, Chapter 53, Sabhā Parva).

(ii) Parasurāma was present at the court of the Kauravas when Śrī Kṛṣṇa was speaking to Dharitrāśa on behalf of the Pāṇḍavas. When the Kauravas did not reply the question put by Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Parasurāma rose up to tell a story to illustrate the evils resulting from the arrogance of man. There was once a King called Dambodbhava who was very arrogant because of his great strength. He wanted to diffuse his energy by fighting and laboured much to get good opponents and roamed about in search of fighters. One day the brahmans directed him to Naraṇāraṇyasas and accordingly Dambodbhava went to their āśrama at Bādarikā and challenged them for a fight. They refused to fight and yet the King showered arrows on them. Then the sages took a few blades of the iṣṭikā grass and threw them at him. They filled the sky as great missiles and the King begged to be pardoned and prostrated before the sages. They sent back the be-
PARASURAMAKUNDA 572

Parasurama. The Marriage.

Parasurama sits in the court of Yama. (Sloka 19, Chapter 8, Sabha Parva).

Parasuramakunda. Another name for Parasurama. Parasuramakunda comprises of five pools of blood called Samantapañcika constructed by Parasurama on the borders of Kuruksetra. (See under Parasurama)

Parasuvana. A forest in hell. The sinners after climbing out of Vaitarani, a river in hell in which hot blood flows, reach Asipatravana. There the bodies of the sinners are cut by the leaves of asipatra which are as sharp as a sword’s edge. Leaving that they reach Parasuvana. (Sloka 32, Chapter 322, Santi Parva).

Paratanga. A place of habitation of ancient Bhairata. (Sloka 64, Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

Paravaha. One of the seven forms of Vayu. Prana-vayu has got seven forms:—
1) Pravaha. This vayu makes lightning in the sky.
2) Ayaha. It is by this vayu that the stars shine and waters of the ocean go up as water-vapour and down as rains.
3) Udvaha. This vayu makes movements among the clouds and produces thunder.
4) Satvaha. This vayu beats the mountains. Sinvaha is also engaged in shaping the clouds and producing thunder.
5) Vyavaha. Preparing holy water in the sky and making Akasaganga stay there static is the work of this vayu.
6) Pariwaha. This vayu gives strength to one who sits in meditation.
7) Parivaha. It is this vayu that fans the devas to make them cool. (Chapter 329, Bhishma Parva).

Paravarthanaka. One of the twenty-eight hells. (See under Kala).

Paravasu. Son of a sage called Raibhya. He was the brother of Arvavasu. (See under Arvavasu).

Paravata. A serpent born in the family of Airavata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

Paravidya. See under Aparavidya.

Parabharha. One of the children of Garuda. (Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

Parihadrakas. The inhabitants of the place called Parihadraka. The soldiers from Parihadraka fought on the side of Duryodhana during the great battle. (Sloka 9, Chapter 51, Bhishma Parva).

Parigha I. One of the five pârśadas presented to Subrahmanya by the deva, Adiśa. The other four are:— Vaṭa, Bhima, Dhati and Dahana. (Chapter 138, Santi Parva).

Parigha II. A forester. (See under Bidalopakhyanas).

Parihara. A King of the country of Kâlanjara situated near Citrakûta. Parihara who was an Atharvaparâyaṇa (devoted to the Atharvaveda) ruled the country for twelve years and during his reign he gave a strong opposition to the spread of Buddhism. (Pratisarga Parva, Bhavishya Purâna).

Parihyanga. A mahrshi. One of the sons born to Rishi Marici of his wife Ûrjâ. There were six sons and the five others were:— Smara, Udgitha, Kṣudrabhṛt, Agnisvâta and Ghrit. In his next birth he was born as one of the relatives of Sri Kṛṣṇa and was killed by Kamsa. (10th Sandha, Bhâgavata).

Parâjata I. The sage who came to the court of Maya along with Nârada. (Chapter 5, Sabhâ Parva).

Parâjata II. See under Kalpavâsa.

Parâjata III. A serpent born in the family of Airavata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 51, Adi Parva).

Parâjatak. A sage who was a brilliant member of the court of Yudhishthira. (Sloka 14, Chapter 4, Sabha Parva).

Parikshit I. A brilliant King of Candravâna. He was the grandson of Arjuna and son of Abhimanyu. (For genealogy see under Abhimanyu).

1) Birth. Parikshit was the son born to Abhimanyu of Uttarā. This was a still-born child and it was Śrī Kṛṣṇa who gave it life. There is a story in Mahâbhârata about this:

Uttarā, wife of Abhimanyu, was pregnant when the war between the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas started at Kurukṣetra. Āsvatthāmā, son of Droṇa, entered the camp of the Pāṇḍavas at night and slew Dhṛṣṭadumna. He then sent the most fierce Brahmapârastra (missile of Brahmapîra) to exterminate the Pāṇḍavas. To face it and oppose it Arjuna also sent an equally fierce Brahmapārastra. The sight of two such powerful weapons opposing each other made all the sages anxious and they led by Vyāsa entered the field and requested them to withdraw their missiles. It was in vain. The missile of Āsvatthāmā went and struck the womb of Uttarā. Once when the Pāṇḍavas after their exile were staying in the village of Utpalavaya a brahmin had predicted to Uttarā that at the fag end of the life of the Pāṇḍavas Uttarā would bear a son who would be tested even while in her womb and that the child should be named Parikshit. (Parikṣīt—test).

The child in the womb died when the missile struck it. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was greatly agitated by this wicked act of Āsvatthāmā and he said thus: “Oh Āsvatthāmā, the child now dead in its womb would surely come to life again. You will be called a sinner because of this infanticide. Because of this you will roam about on earth for three thousand years and during that time nobody would mingle with you. You will not get a seat anywhere. All diseases will find an abode in your body. But this infant would grow up into a king and rule the country for sixty years. He would become celebrated as the next Kururāja.” (Saśākha Parva, Mahābhārata) When the Bhūratayuddha came to an end Dharmaputra performed an āśvamedhya. Many prominent personages including Śrī Kṛṣṇa was assembled at Hastinapura for this purpose. Vidura received them all. At that time they were informed that Uttarā had delivered a still-born child. Parikṣīt was born when the embryo was only six months old (Sloka 82, Chapter 83, Adi Parva). Everybody assembled there was sad and depressed when he heard this news. Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in and saw the dead infant. Uttarā wept bitterly and everybody asked Śrī Kṛṣṇa to give life to the infant somehow. Śrī Kṛṣṇa did so and the child was named Parikṣīt remembering the prophetic words of the brahmana.

2) Marriage. Parikṣīt married a princess named Madravatī and got of her four sons named Janamejaya, Śruta-sena, Ugrasena and Bhimasena. Chapters 3, 4, 5, Ādi Parva).

3) Curse of a sage. Parikṣit was greatly interested in hunting. Once he went to a big forest with his large retinue to hunt. While hunting he followed a deer which the king had shot with his arrow and he separated from the rest and went a long way deep into the forest. It was midday and the king was tired. Then he saw a sage sitting there and the king went in and asked him about the deer. The sage engrossed in his meditation did not hear that. The king mistook his silence to be arrogance and taking the dead body of a cobra lying nearby with the tip of his bow threw it round the neck of the sage and went his way. The sage did not know that. The king returned to the palace after the hunting.

The sage had a son named Gavijāta (In many places the name Śrūgi is used for Gavijāta). He was playing with the sons of other sages. One munikumāra (son of a sage) said, "Oh Gavijāta, your father is equal to Siva. Both have a serpent round their necks. But there is only one difference. The serpent round your father's neck is a dead one." Gavijāta was greatly disturbed by this jeer and he immediately went to the āśrama to make enquiries. When he knew that an unknown person had done that foul deed he took water in his hand and said "Whoever be the person who put this dead snake round the neck of my father will die being bitten by the fierce cobra Taksaka within seven days." Only after pronouncing this horrible curse did he find out that the perpetrator of that crime was none other than the most noble and charitable king, Parikṣit. Gavijāta repented greatly and immediately sent word to the king about his curse through Gauramukha, a munikumāra. The king was a bit frightened first but then he started thinking about the way to escape from the curse. (Chapter 40, Ādi Parva, and 2nd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) Taksaka gets ready. As soon as the messenger Gauramukha departed from the palace Parikṣit called the ministers to his side and conferred with them to find a way to escape from the cobra Taksaka. They built a building on a huge pillar and gave all protections to the building. Brahmins well-versed in all the mantras and Viṣṇāvaidyas (physicians in the treatment of snake-poisoning) of fame were asked to sit around the pillar and the place was well-guarded. The King sat in a room tightly closed. Six days went by. On the seventh day the celebrated Viṣṇāvaidya Kaśyapamahāraṇi was on his way to the palace at the summons of the king. Taksaka was also on his way to the palace in the guise of a brahmin. They met on the way and though Kaśyapa did not know him first Taksaka introduced himself when he knew that Kaśyapa was going to the palace to treat the king if anything happened. He said "Oh Kaśyapa, I am Taksaka and none of your wits would be able to fight against the effects of my poison. If you want to know it we shall make a trial." Saying so Taksaka went and bit a big banyan tree standing nearby, and lo! the whole tree was burnt to ashes by the strength of the poison. Kaśyapa smilingly recited the Viṣṇāhari mantra and sprinkled some water on the ashes and lo! the tree stood in its place again with not a single mutilation anywhere. Taksaka was astounded. He then bribed Kaśyapa. He said he would give him more than what could be expected of the king and requested him to return home. Kaśyapa returned and Taksaka went to the palace.

5) Death of Parikṣit. Taksaka went and inspected the palace of Parikṣit. There was no way to step in and Taksaka was astonished at the perfect protection given to the king. Taksaka called all his relatives to his side and asked them to go to the King in the guise of brahmins carrying several kinds of fruits as presents. Taksaka crept inside a beautiful fruit in the shape of a worm and was carried along with the fruits taken to the king. The servants of the king took the fruits brought by the brahmins to the king and the king struck by the size and beauty of a fruit among them took it and cut it open. He saw a worm inside red in colour with two black spots as eyes. The king took it in his hand and at that instant it changed into Taksaka and bit the king. After that it rose up into the air and disappeared. (Chapters 42 to 49, Ādi Parva and 2nd Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

6) Parikṣit as a king. Many researches have been made to fix the period of the reign of Parikṣit.

"Saptarṣaya maghāyuktāḥ
Kāle Pārīkṣite śāhavanī]
(Chapter 271, Matsya Purāṇa),
"Te tu Pārīkṣite kāle Maghāśvāna dvijottamāḥ"
(Chapter 24, Amāśā, Viṣṇu Purāṇa)

Following these statements in the Purāṇas, astronomers and astrologers searched for the year or years in which the Saptarṣi maṇḍala (the constellation of a group of seven stars) and the month of māṣgha came into the same zodiac. It came in B.C. 3077 and then in B.C. 477. This would again occur in 2223 A.D. Parikṣit, according to other facts, also must have lived in B.C. 3077.

Pāṇḍavas went for their mahāprasthāna after entrusting the administration to the care of Parikṣit. The Mahābhārata battle was fought in the year 3133 B.C. Dharmaputra ruled for 36 years and so Parikṣit must have taken charge of the administration in 3102 B.C. Parikṣit ruled for 60 years and his son Janamejaya became king in 3042 B.C. It was this Janamejaya who conducted the famous Sarpasatra.

7) Parikṣit attained Svarga. Parikṣit did not enter heaven as soon as he died. So Janamejaya at the advice of Nārada conducted a yāga called Ambāyāga for the salvation of the spirit of his father. It was during the navarātri period that this was done. Many eminent sages took part in the ceremony. All were received well and given gifts in plenty. He made pure brahmans read the Devībhāgavata with devotion in the presence of the deity to please Jagadambikā (mother goddess), queen of all queens (Rājarājīvarī). When it was over, a divine brilliance like burning fire was visible in the sky and Nārada appeared before Janamejaya and said "Oh Janamejaya, King of Kings, your father was lying bound by the shackles of his life on earth. But today he acquired a divine form and wearing divine apparels and ornaments went to the divine seat of Devī in a sacred Vīmāna from Indrapura while Indra, devas and the celestial maidens stood praising him (Skandha 12, Devī Bhāgavata).

8) Other details.

(i) Parikṣit ruled the country for sixty years, with all virtues and goodness. (Chapter 49, Ādi Parva).
(ii) After the great battle, one day at the request of a few, Vyäsä by his yogic powers arrayed all the dead great ones of the Pándava-Kaurava company. Paríksit was also called thereto the Gaṅgā where it was arranged and Janamejaya who was present to witness the show then gave an Avabhṛtanā (ablution after a sacrifice) to his father. Paríksit disappeared after that. (Chapter 35, Átvamāvāsika Parva).

(iii) The synonyms of Paríksit are (1) Abhimanyusūta (2) Bhārataśreṣṭha (3) Kiritītanāyātmajā (4) Kurusreṣṭha (5) Kurumandana (6) Kururāja (7) Kuruvardhana (8) Pāṇḍaveya.

PARÍKSIT II. There is a story about another Paríksit belonging to the Ikṣvāku dynasty of kings in chapter 192 of Vana Parva:

Once this Paríksit went after a deer while hunting in a forest and he traversed a long distance following it. On the way he felt tired by hunger and thirst. He saw a green grove and a river running still by its side, then. The king entered the waters of the river with his horse and after quenching the thirst of the horse and drinking some water to quench his own thirst, he bound the horse to a nearby tree and lay on the shores to take rest. Then he heard from somewhere a melodious song. The king raised his head and enjoying the music, waited to see the origin of it. Then a beautiful damsel appeared before him and the king talked with her and their conversation ended in the king requesting her to be his wife. The beautiful maiden consented on one condition that she should not be made to touch water. The king agreed and by that time the king's followers came and the king took her to his palace in a decorated palanquin followed by his retinue. The king took her to a secret chamber and stayed with her allowing nobody to enter the room. The chief minister came to the palace and enquired what was happening there and the maidens attending on the queen said that it was strange that no water was allowed inside the room. Then the minister arranged a garden with beautiful flowers and fruits with no water anywhere and a pond in the middle in which water was not visible from outside. He then went to the king and told him of his arrangement and the king took his wife into the garden and started having amorous sport with her there. After some time they reached the pond; water was not visible and so they entered the pond. The moment they entered the pond they touched water and the queen disappeared in the water. The King asked the water of the pond to be emptied and then he saw a frog sitting at the bottom. The king accused the frog of having eaten the maiden and he started killing all the frogs of his state. The frogs became frightened and they went to their king and complained. The frog-king in the garb of a maharṣi went and requested the king to stop this massacre of frogs but the king refused to yield saying that a frog had eaten his wife. Hearing that, the sage was shocked and revealing his identity said “Oh King, be pleased with me; I am Áyu, the king of the frogs. Your wife was my daughter. She is called Suśobhanā and she is an obstinate bad-natured girl. Even from times of old she has cheated many kings like this.”

Hearing this the king pleaded to the frog-king to give him back Suśobhanā. He gave Suśobhanā to Paríksit.

But he cursed his daughter that she would bear misbehaving children because of her cheating many kings before. Áyu disappeared then. Paríksit begot of Suśobhanā three princes named Sala, Bala and Dala. When Sala grew up Paríksit crowned him as king and left for the forests for doing penance. (Chapter 192, Vana-Parva).

PARÍKSIT III. He was the son of Avíksit, a king of the Kuru line of kings. Paríksit was the eldest son and he got six sons named Kaksiṣena, Ugrasena, Citrasena, Indrasena, Suśena and Bhimasena. They were all virtuous scholars and Jñānins. (Chapter 94, Ádi Parva).

PARÍKSIT IV. Son of Anaśvī, a king of the Kuru line of kings. His mother was Ámṛtā. This Paríksit begot of his wife Suyaśā a son named Bhimasena. (Sloka 41, Chapter 95, Ádi Parva).

PARÍKSIT V. A king of the Kuru line of kings. (Chapter 150, Sánti Parva).

PARIPLAVA I. A king of the race of Bhārata. He was the son of Nryaṅgav and the grandson of Nala. Pariplava got a son named Medhāvī. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PARIPLAVA II. A holy place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If anyone visits this holy place he would get the benefit of conducting an Agniṣṭoma Yajña and an Atriātra yajña. (Sloka 12, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PARÍKSUTA. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PARIVĀHA. A Vāyu (wind). (See under Parāvaha).

PARIYĀDHI. One of the nine sages who lived in the western regions of Bhārata. The others were: Uṣāṅga, Kuruṣa, Dharma, Suvirāyāṇ, Ekata, Dvīta, Trita and Sārasvata (Chapter 208, Sánti Parva).

PARIYĀTRA. A mountain of Purānic fame. The deity of this mountain Pariyātra was a member of the court of Kubera. The āśrama of the celebrated sage Gautama, was on this mountain. The sage Mārkaṇḍeya once saw this mountain in the belly of Bālamukunda. This mountain is situated on the western side of Mahāmeru. (Sloka 115, Chapter 188, Vana Parva).

PARJANYA. A deva. See under Devavatī III.

PARNĀDĀ. An ancient sage of Bhārata. He was a member of the court of Yudhīṣṭhira (Sloka 18, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

PARNĀDA II. A brahmin of the country of Vidarbha. It was Parnāda who was sent out to know whether Nala was alive and he found out Nala living in disguise under the name of Bāhuka and after collecting all information about him returned to Vidarbha. (See under Damayanti).

PARNĀDA III. A sage who acted as priest for a yāga conducted by a brahmin named Satya who lived in the country of Vidarbha. (Sloka 8, Chapter 273, Sánti Parva).

PARNĀSĀ. A river of western Bhārata. This river sits in the court of Varuṇa in the form of a nymph. (Sloka 9, Chapter 1, Sabhā Parva.). Srutāyudha, a valiant soldier who fought against Arjuna in the great Kurukṣetra battle was the son of Parnāsā. Varuṇa was the father of Srutāyudha and at the time of the birth of a son for her she requested Varuṇa to grant her a boon that her son would not be killed by anybody. Varuṇa while granting her the boon gave the son a mace. That mace had a peculiarity. If the mace was used against anybody who was not fighting, the mace would turn back and kill the user. With the help of that mace Šrutāyuddha gave Arjuna a fierce fight and in the midst of the heat he forgot the condition stipulated by Varuna and used it against Śrī Kṛṣṇa who was standing nearby watching their fight. The mace turned back and killed Šrutāyuddha. (Chapter 92, Droṇa Parva.)

ARṆĀṢĀLĀ. A Village situated in the valley of the mountain Yāmuna. This mountain stands between the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā. During the period of Mahābhārata this village was the abode of a great number of eminent scholars. Once there lived in that village a brahmin of Agastya-gotra, well-learned, named Sarmī. One day the messengers of Kāla (god of death) came to that village and by mistake took Sarmī to Yama-loka. It was only when they reached there that they understood their folly and Kāla then asked his men to carry him back to earth. Then Sarmī said he would spend the balance of life due to him in Yamaloka itself. But Yama did not allow that. Kāla then told Sarmī the greatness in giving as gifts Til and Vastra (Gingelly and clothes) and sent him back to earth. (Chapter 68, Anuśāsana Parva.)

PARNĀYA. A demon of Ṛgvedic times. He had two friends named Kāraṇjaya and Vaṅgṛda. They attacked the two Kings belonging to the group of Āryas named Atithiśvā and Rjīśvā. The asuras were defeated because of the help sent to the kings by Indra. (Sūktā 54, Anuvākā 10, Manḍalā 1, Rgyveda.)

PAROKṢA. A King of Candravāniśa. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

PAPĀKĀRĪ. See under Kanakarekha.

PĀRŚṆIKESEM. A Viśvadeva. (Sloka 30, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva.) (Viśvadevas are a particular group of deities, ten in number, supposed to be the sons of Viśvā.)

PĀRVAMAULUI. Another name for the demon named Maṇḍicara. There is a story behind this demon getting the name of Maṇḍicara. (See under Maṇḍicara.)

PĀRVASVAROMA. A place of human habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 56, Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva.)

PĀRTHA. Son of Pṛthā (Kuntī). (See under Kuntī.)

PARUCHEPHA. A sage of Vedīc times who was a Sūktadraṣṭā. He used some sounds too often in his talks.

Nṛmedhas and Parucchepa vied with each other in their māṇtric skill. One day Nṛmedhas in great pride produced smoke from wet firewood without igniting it and then Parucchepa produced fire without firewood. Nṛmedhas admitted defeat. (Taittirīya Saṁhitā.)

PARUNĪTHA (PURUNĪTHA). A King extolled in the Ṛgveda. (Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda.)

PARUSA. A Rākṣasa (demon). He was one among the twelve demons who supported Khara when the latter fought against Śrī Rāma. (Sarga 26, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana.)

PARVAṆA (S). A company of rākṣasas and devils. ParvaṆas, Patanas, Jambhas, Kharas, Krodhavāsas, Haris, Prarujas, Arujas and Praghāsas belonged to a group of invisible devités who fought against Śrī Rāma on the side of Rāvana. (Chapter 285, Vālmiki Rāmāyana.)

PARVASAṆGRAHAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Ādi Parva. Chapter twenty is included in this Parva.

PARVATA I. A sage who was the nephew of Nārada.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viśnu—Brahma—Marici—Paurnāmśa—Parvata. Prajāpati Marici got of his wife Sambhitā a son named Paurnāmasa. Paurnāmasa got two sons Virajas and Parvata. Parvata’s mother was the sister of Nārada. (Chapter 10, Anīśa 1, Viśnu Purāṇa.)

2) Nārada and Parvata. These two sages lived for a long time as inseparable friends. Once they travelled on earth in the form of human beings. They decided that each should speak out what he felt without reserve and if anybody broke the arrangement the other had the right to curse him.

During their travels they reached the palace of a King called Śrījaya (Śaṅjaya) and they stayed there as his guests for a long time. Damayantī (Madayanti) daughter of the King served them both and Nārada fell in love with her. Nārada hid this fact from Parvata and within a few days Parvata came to know it and he according to the agreement cursed Nārada to take the form of a monkey. Nārada gave a counter curse disabling Parvata from attaining Svarga. Both separated from there and after some time both lost their bitterness against each other. Parvata met Nārada in his monkey form in a forest. Both were sorry for their curses then and each withdrew his curse and Nārada got his original form. He married Damayantī and started living together and Parvata went to Svarga. (Chapter 30, Sānti Parva.)

3) Other details.

(i) Parvatamuni was a member of the assembly of sages at the Sarvasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 8, Chapter 53, Ādi Parva.)

(ii) Nārada and Parvata were present for the Draupadi-svayamāvara (marriage of Draupadi). (Sloka 7, Chapter 156, Ādi Parva.)

(iii) Parvata and Nārada were members of the court of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Sloka 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva.)

(iv) This uncle-nephew combination was present in Indrasabha also. (Sloka 10, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva.)

(v) They were members of Kuberasabha also. (Sloka 26, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva.)

(vi) When the Pāṇḍavas were living in Kāmyakavana, Parvata went there and advised them to conduct a pilgrimage. (Sloka 18, Chapter 93, Vana Parva.)

(vii) Parvata showed the Pāṇḍavas daylight at night one day when the great battle was going on. (Sloka 15, Chapter 163, Droṇa Parva.)

(viii) Parvata swore that he was not a party to the theft of the lotus of Agastya. (Sloka 34, Chapter 94 Anuśāsana Parva.)

PARVATA II. It is believed that in Kṛitayuga all mountains had wings. They flew all over the world with the swiftness of Garuḍa or Vāyu. All beings including rīṣis and devas lived in a state of suspense since at any moment any mountain might fly and land down on their heads. They complained to Indra and Indra asked the mountains to remain at one place which they flatly refused. Indra got angry and started cutting down the wings of the mountains with his Vajrāyudha. No mountain was able to escape from this punishment; but Vāyubhagavān carried away his bosom friend, the mountain Maināka, and put it in the ocean without anybody noticing it. So Maināka alone did not lose its wings. It was this Mainaka which rose from the ocean and gave a resting point to Hanumán, son of Váyu, when he took a leap from the shores of Bharata to Lankā. This was but an expression of gratitude to Váyu whose son Hanumán was, for the help he had given when Indra was cutting off the wings of all mountains. (Sarga I, Sundara Kanda, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

PARVATESVARA. A King of Videhyadeśa. He tortured his people because of his greed for money and Yama sent him to hell when he died. In his next birth he was born as a monkey. At that time a priest of the King had taken life as a Sārāsa bird. One day the monkey tried to catch the bird and then the bird (priest) reminded him of his previous birth and told him that in their next birth both of them would be swans and in the birth after that they would become men again. (Uttara Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PARVATESA. A rājāsī (A King who is also a rājāsi). He was born of the species of a demon named Kapaṭa. (Śloka 30, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PARVATI. Wife of Siva.

Pārvatī is known under different names and worshipped in different forms. Amarakośa (Sanskrit lexicon) gives the following synonyms for Pārvatī: Unā, Kātyāyaṇi, Gauri, Kāli, Haimavati, Īśvarī, Śiva, Bhavāni, Rudrāṇi, Sarvāṇi, Sarvāngalāṇi, Aparṇā, Durgā, Mrdāṇi, Cāṇḍikā, Ambikā, Āryā, Dākṣāyaṇi, Girijā, Menakātmajā, Cāṃudā, Karna-moṭi, Carcikā, Bhairavī.

Some of these names refer to the various dispositions of Pārvatī, while a few are the names in the various incarnations of Pārvatī. The origin of Pārvatī and her other prominent births are given below:

1) Incarnation of Sātī. Siva was born from Brahmā. To make Siva active, Sātī, an aspect of Mahāmāyā, was born as the daughter of Dakṣa, one of the Prājāpatis. The 9th Skandha of Devi Bhāgavata gives the following story about the incarnation of Sātī:

While Brahmā was engaged in creation a few daityas named Hālāhala were born. They were very valiant and ferocious and they did penance to propitiate Brahmā and after obtaining boons from him conquered the three worlds and asserted their supremacy in all the three worlds. They defied the Trimūrti (trio of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Siva). Siva and Viṣṇu in despair went to war against them. The war continued for sixty thousand years and both the daityas and Devas were exhausted. Viṣṇu and Siva refused to attend to their duties. Brahmā understood the situation and taking into his hands the work of Siva and Viṣṇu also and calling his sons, Sanaka and others to his side said “Oh sons, Siva and Viṣṇu are incapable of doing their work now. I have therefore, taken on myself the charge of their duties also and hence I do not find time to do penance. You must therefore, do penance to propitiate Mahāmāyā. Let her be pleased and when she incarnates in this universe the world will be happy.” As soon as they heard this the Prājāpatis headed by Dakṣa went to the forests on the side of the Himālayas. They started doing penance reciting the mantra of Māyābīja. The penance lasted for a hundred thousand years and then the goddess was pleased. She graciously appeared before them with three eyes and four hands bearing pāśa, aṅkuṣa, vara and abhīti. Dakṣa and others praised her and she granted them boons. She did also promise to be born as the daughter of Dakṣa. Dakṣa and others returned happy.

Mahāmāyā incarnated as Sātī in the house of Dakṣa. Sātī blossomed into a beautiful maiden and all the Prājāpatis joined together and made Siva marry her. The bride and bridgroom lived in the bride’s house. At that time the sage Durvāsas worshipped Jagadambikā seated at Jambūnāda meditating on her and reciting the māyābīja mantra. The devi was immensely pleased and appearing before him gave him the divine garland lying round her neck. The garland was highly perfumed. Honey flowed from it always. Wearing that garland the sage travelled through air and reached the palace of Dakṣa, father of Sātī, and gave that garland to him. Dakṣa received it with great delight and took it to his bed-room and placed it there. That night Dakṣa inhaled the perfume of the divine garland and enjoyed an amorous sport with his wife. This act made the garland impure and the latent curse in it made Dakṣa hate his daughter Sātī and her husband Siva. After that Dakṣa conducted a Yāga and insulted Siva by not inviting either him or his wife. Sātī, however, attended the Yāga uninvited and she was insulted. Unable to bear the insult Sātī leapt into the fire and committed suicide. From that day onwards Siva roamed about in the world crying “Sātī, Sātī.”

2) Sātī, Pārvatī (Kālī). During that time a son named Vajrāṅīga was born to Kaṭyāpa of his wife Diti. This virtuous asura practised austerities for a thousand years and when he opened his eyes after his long penance he did not see his wife. Vajrāṅīga started in search of her collecting fruits and roots for his food on the way. Then he came across her standing underneath a tree weeping and she said: “All the time you were doing penance, Indra was teasing me. I was living without food on the banks of the river keeping a vow of silence. Indra came there in the form of a monkey and threw away all my articles used for worship. Then he came in the form of a lion and frightened me. Then again he came in the form of a serpent and bit me. Oh lord, am I, your wife, an orphan?” Vajrāṅīga got angry and decided to do penance again to find a remedy for this unjust act of Indra. Then Brahmā coming to know of the fierce decision of Vajrāṅīga appeared before him and said “Why do you go in for a penance again? Ask me what you want and I shall grant you.” Vajrāṅīga said “Oh Lord, I did penance all these thousand years to get rid of the demoniac disposition of mine. But when I was engaged in meditation Indra tormented my virtuous wife very much without any reason. If you will bless me I must get a son named Tāraka to kill all the devas including Indra.” Brahmā granted the boon.

Varāngi became pregnant and after twelve months was born a son to her named Tārakāsura. Tāraka did severe penance sitting in the midst of Paṅcāgni (five fires) for a long time and Brahmā was pleased and appeared before him. Tāraka then said: “If I were to die I must die at the hands of a seven-day-old babe. You must grant me a boon like that.” Brahmā granted the boon. Tāraka became arrogant with that boon and joined hands with such fierce demons as Prasena, Jambla and Kālanemi to create havoc in the three worlds of Svarga, Bhûmi and Pâtâla. They blessed the wicked and killed the virtuous. It was the time when Siva was sadly roaming in search of his lost wife Satî.

All the devas headed by Indra went and complained to Brahmâ. Brahmâ said:—"After all, this calamity is not without remedy. There is an escape from the boon I have given him. Târakâsura himself has allowed him to be killed by a seven-day-old babe. If there should be such a babe it should be from the virility of Siva. Târakâsura thinks that since Siva is observing brahma-carya after the death of Satî there is no chance of a babe being born to him. That was why he was prepared to allow that clause in that boon. I shall therefore suggest a plan. Satî herself should be born as the daughter of Himavân and Menâ in the name of Kâlî. Kâlî should do great penance and break the vow of celibacy of Siva. If Siva accepts her as his wife and a child is born to them we are saved."

Siva was all this time spending his time thinking of Satî. Once during this time Siva bathed in the river Kâlindî and then the waters of the river Kâlindî became black and the waters remained black ever since that.

Indra and others on their return from Brahmâ went to Brhaspati to think about further procedure in the matter. Brhaspati said:—"No obstacle would ever come to any act of the devas. Himavân was doing penance for a long time to obtain a child and by the grace of Siva, Satî has already been born as the daughter of Himavân. (Skanda Purâna in its Sambhava-Kânda states thus about the birth of Satî as Pârvatî: "Satî before jumping into the fire meditated on Siva and prayed that she should be born in her next birth as his wife. Siva granted that request. It was at that time that Himavân along with his wife Menâ went to the vicinity of Amârta-saras and started doing penance to get a child. One day when Himavân and his wife were bathing in the saras they saw a gem of a girl in the waters and they took it. Then they found the child with four hands and all other emblems of goddess on her. They praised her with verses from Vedas and soon the divine emblems faded away and Himavân gave the child to his wife.") Brahmâ never wanted Târaka to know that the child was an incarnation of Devî and so he made the babe black by sending Niśâ to do so. Niśâ entered the womb of the pregnant Menâ while she was sleeping with her mouth open one day. The child was like a sapphire idol. Himavân was surprised to see the child. The child will do severe penance and obtain Siva as her husband. Siva and Satî will never be separated in any of their births. Oh Indra now go and try to get Siva interested in a married life."

Himavân and Menâ had three daughters and a son. The devas were watching who among the three—Râgini, Kuṭîlî and Kâlî—would become the consort of Siva. The three were interested in penance. The devas took Râgini to Brahmâloka and showed her to Brahmâ and the latter declared that Râgini was incapable of bearing the virility of Siva. Râgini got angry and Brahmâ cursed her and made her into Sandhyârâga and she took her place in the sky. Then the devas took Kuṭîlî to Brahmâ and the latter said that she was also incapable of being a mate of Siva. Kuṭîlî also got angry and Brahmâ made her into a river and kept her in Brahmâloka. Menâ was greatly distressed at the loss of her two daughters and so she advised Kâlî, her third daughter to go home, discontinuing the penance. She at first said Umâ (Mâ—do not) and so she got the name of Umâ She was the daughter of a Parvata (Himavân is a parvata (mountain) and so she got the name Pârvatî (mountain-girl) also. Kâlî later went home. But after some time the natural inclination in her led her to start a severe penance again.

The young Kâlî, who was only a small girl then, accompanied by two of her girl companions went to the shores of a river deep in the forests and started practising austerities. In summer she would sit in the midst of Pañcâgini (five fires) and in the rainy season she would sit in water and do penance. The penance lasted for a thousand years.

Siva who was roaming about in search of Satî went once to the palace of Himavân. Siva agreed to stay there for some time at the persistent request of Himavân. During his stay there Siva understood that one of the daughters of his host was doing penance meditating on Sañkarâ. Curious to know more about her, Siva one day went to the aśrama of Kâlî, Kâlî saw Siva and she stood up bowing before him. Siva was pleased with her. But before Kâlî could have another look at Siva, he vanished from there.

Kâlî was disappointed and continued her penance again. Years went by and one day there came to her a Vâtu (a brahmin brahmacarî). Kâlî and her companions stood up and worshipped the Vâtu who looked brilliant with ashes on his body and wearing rudrâksha and aksamâlî (berry of a tree and rosary made of it) and carrying in his hand a dânda (stick) and a Kamandalu (water pot). After formal introduction the Vâtu asked Kâlî the purpose of her penance and Kâlî told him all about it. Then the Vâtu asked her in tones of surprise why such a beautiful girl like herself born to be the wife of a king, should go after a crudely dressed aged man like Siva who goes on the back of a bullock always. Pârvatî resented the statement of the Vâtu and got angry with him. Then Siva appeared before her in her real form and married Pârvatî (Kâlî alias Umâ) in the presence of devas and maharâsîs.

3) Pârvatî changes into Gaurî. Siva and Pârvatî spent their honeymoon travelling throughout the world. Years went by like that. One day Siva in a spirit of sport called Pârvatî 'Kâlî, Kâlî'. Kâlî meant black one and Pârvatî was as black as sapphire. Pârvatî misunderstood Siva addressing her thus two times and thought, perhaps, Siva did not like her black body and trembling with grief said "If a wound is made by an arrow it will heal in due course; if the top of a tree is chopped off it will again blossom when the season comes; but the wound in the minds of others by harsh words is never healed. It was not my fault that I was born black and I would never again come near you with this black body. I am going."

Saying thus with a firm determination, she rose up into the air and travelling for some time reached a big forest. She created by her reciting the smarânamantra four attendants for her named Somaprabhâ, Jayâ, Vîjyâ and Jayanti and started doing penance there. She practised severe austerities standing on one foot for a hundred years and then Brahmâ appeared before her and sought the reason why Pârvatî, wife of Paramesvâra should do such severe penance and then she narrated to him all that had happened. Brahmâ after hearing her story told her thus:
“Virtuous woman, from today onwards, your black complexion would change into one of the hue of a lotus petal. Because of that ‘gaura’ hue you would be called ‘Gauri’.” By the time Brahma finished blessing her the colour changed into the one described by Brahma.

4) Gauri changes into Kātyāyāni, Vindhavāsīsinī, Candikā and Gaṇūḍikā. When Devi became Gauri her superficial skin peeled off and dropped down, it is said.

At that time there were two great demons called Rambha and Karambha. They had no sons and they started severe penance. Karambha was doing penance standing in deep waters and a crocodile swallowed him. The crocodile was none other than Indra. Rambha did penance standing in the midst of fire and finding no result even after a long time decided to sacrifice himself into the fire. Agnideva then appeared before him and blessed him thus: “Oh Rambha, you will get a mighty son of the woman you love.” Rambha stopped his penance and returned home with the boon. On the way he saw a beautiful she-buffalo and passion rose in him and he made contacts with the buffalo. The buffalo became pregnant and in due course delivered a child which later on became the notorious Mahiṣāsura. In the meantime a buffalo loved Mahiṣāsura’s mother and it attacked Rambha and gored him to death. The Yakṣas burnt his dead body in a funeral pyre and the she-buffalo jumped into the pyre and abandoned her life. From that pyre there arose then another demon and he was the notorious Raktabija. Mahiṣāsura became the king of demons and Raktabija, Candā and Muṇḍa became his ministers. They attacked the devas and drove them to exhaustion. The devas took refuge in Brahma to think of a plan to kill those asuras. Viṣṇu, and Śiva took part in the conference. Viṣṇu the eternal, got angry along with Śiva and became fierce like the fire of death. Brahma and the devas also became angry and from the face of everyone a brilliance emanated and all these brilliances joined together and reached the holy āśrama of Kātyāyana maharsi and that eminent sage also sent out a brilliance. The ascetic brilliance joined with the divine brilliance and the combined brilliance shone like a thousand suns. Then this superior brilliance entered the peeled-off skin of Kāli to produce the fierce and divine form of a goddess named Kātyāyāni.

Each limb of the new form was made up of the brilliance from a particular god as follows: From the brilliance of Mahendra was formed the face; from Agnī, the eyes; from Yama, the hair; from Viṣṇu, the eighteen hands; from Indra, the central parts; from Varuṇa, the hip and the thighs; from Brahmā, the feet; from Sūrya, the toes; from Prajāpāti, the teeth; from Vasu, the fingers of the hands; from Yaksā, the nose; from Vāyu the ears and from the ascetic brilliance, the erotic eyebrows. Thus Kātyāyāni shone in the world with a figure formed with distinctive perfection.

All the gods and devas presented Kātyāyāni with gifts—Śiva gave her a trident (triśūla); Viṣṇu a Discus; Varuṇa, a conch; Agnī, a javelin; Vāyu, a bow; Sūrya, a never-empty quiver; Indra, Vajraṅganta; Yama, a daṇḍa (stick); Vaiśravaṇa, a mace; Brahmā, a rosary garland; Kāla, a sword and shield; Candra, Cāmara (white brush-like fan) and a pearl necklace; Ocean a garland; Himavān, a lion; Viśvakārmā, a moon-disced Cāḍāmanī, earrings and a dagger; the King of Gandharvas, a silver-plated drinking cup; the King of nāgas, a nāgahāra; and the Rūṣ (seasons), never-fading flowers. The three-eyed Kātyāyāni on getting all these was highly pleased and made a roaring sound. Devi, thus worshipped and adored by all, mounted on the lion and went to the topmost peak of the Vindhyas. Indra and Agni went and served Kātyāyāni thus living there. Vindhya called Devi, Kauśikī and Agastya called her Durgā.

Mahiṣāsura once went to the Vindhyas after conquering all the three worlds. He was accompanied by his ministers, Raktabija, Candā, Muṇḍa, Gīksura and Naraka. They met there the goddess Kātyāyāni. Mahiṣāsura fell in love with the beautiful and well-figured Kātyāyāni and he sent Durbhú as messenger to the goddess to make her know his desire. Durbhú approached Kātyāyāni and told her to become the wife of Mahiṣa, the emperor of all the three worlds. Devi replied that she would accept as her husband one who defeated her and that was the custom also in her caste. Mahiṣāsura with a huge army and heavy equipments went to war with her. But Kātyāyāni entered the field alone mounted on her lion and the devas watching her enter the battlefield without wearing even an armour were shocked. Devi went forward reciting the mantra of Viṣṇupaṇiṁcakraṁ given to her by Śiva and lakhs and lakhs of demons were killed by the adroit sword-swinging and the dinning roar of Kātyāyāni. Mahiṣa and his ministers surrounded her and Devī stepping down from the lion started to dance wielding her sword. Swinging her sword to the rhythm of her dance-steps Devī picked up the leading demons one by one and killed them. Seeing that, Mahiṣāsura approached her, burning with rage like the pralayāgni. All the attendants of Devī fled. Those who remained were trampled to death by Mahiṣāsura. Devī at first killed the ministers and then faced Mahiṣāsura. Mahiṣa became an elephant and Devī cut off its trunk. The elephant became a buffalo then. Devī sent a spike and it broke. Even Devī’s Discus, granted to her by Viṣṇu was blunted when it hit the rock-like body of Mahiṣāsura. Varuṇapāśa, Yamadanda and Indravajra were all alike fruitless against the mighty Mahiṣāsura. Angered Devī jumped on the buffalo form of the demon and drove it to exhaustion and when at last its power of resistance had failed, Devī plunged her spear into the ears of the buffalo and the demon fell dead.

Many years went by. Kaśyapa begot of his wife Danu three great sons named Sumbha, Niśumbha and Namuci. All were fierce demons. Namuci attacked Indra but they soon came to a compromise. But Indra hid in the foam of the ocean which entered the ears, nose and mouth of Namuci while he was playing in the ocean. Indra used his Vajrayudha from inside and killed him. Sumbha and Niśumbha were angry and they entered svarga and defeating everyone there, carried all the riches from there to the earth. They met Raktabija and he said “Oh Lords, I am Raktabija, minister of Mahiṣāsura. Kātyāyāni Devī killed virtuous Mahiṣāsura. His two ministers Candā and Muṇḍa are hiding inside the ocean afraid of Kātyāyāni devī.” While he was speaking thus Candā and Muṇḍa also came there. When they all exchanged ideas Sumbha called one of his men and said “Bo: Sugrīvasa, go and tell Kātyāyāni to be my wife.” Sugrīva went to Kātyāyāni and returned disappointed and said “Lords Sumbha and Niśumbha,
I told Devī your message and she only laughed. She said that Sumbha and Niśumbha might be mighty lords but only those who defeated her could marry her."

Enraged at this arrogance of Kātyāyani, Sumbha sent Dhūmrākṣa to drag Kātyāyani down to him. Dhūmrākṣa with six Aksāunins of soldiers went to the seat of Kātyāyani and challenged her to a fight. Devī stepped down from her seat and stood before Dhūmrākṣa and the latter leaped forward to catch hold of her. But Dhūmrākṣa was burnt to death by the huṅkāra fire of the goddess. Not only that, the huṅkāra sound reached the ears of Sumbha. Sumbha felt small by this prowess of the Devi but his rage increased. Sumbha then sent Čaṇḍa, Munḍa and the great demon Ruru also with an army of a hundred crores of demons to face Devī Kauśikī. When the enemies reached Vindhyā the bhūtas of Devī made loud and shrill noises. The lion of Kātyāyani roared and she leaped into the midst of the army sword in hand. Lakṣus and lakṣus of asuras fell dead by the sword of the goddess. Devī once sped her mouth and lakṣus of asuras entered it and then she shut her mouth keeping in her stomach the asuras till they all died. Devī beat the demon Ruru to death. Devī plucked her matted hair and struck it on the ground and from there arose the fierce form of Cāmuniḍi. Čaṇḍa and Munḍa fled but Cāmuniḍi followed them to Pāṭāla and catching hold of them chopped off their heads and presented them to Kātyāyani. Then Devī, Cāmuniḍi and the bhūtas together tore to pieces all the remaining asuras and stored them all in their stomachs. Hearing this Sumbha's rage knew no bounds and he started with an army of thirty crores of men. The army swept on like an ocean and finding it moving forward Cāmuniḍi roared. Kātyāyani made a sound like a lion's roar. Brahmāṇi holding high the dagger jumped down to fight. Māheśvar with snakes and the spike, with the three eyes open got down in fits of anger. Kaumārī with the javelin hanging round her waist and bright eyes entered the field. Vaiṣṇavi swinging her sword and whirling the mace with many weapons rushed to the field. Vārāhī breaking open the earth with its tusk and bearing a large wooden pestle came to fight. Indraṇī with diamond on her sides came to fight. Nāraśimha brushing the manes on her breast, shaking the stars and whirling the planets and making a fierce appearance came to the field. (Cāmuniḍi, Brahmāṇi, Māheśvarī, Vaiṣṇavi, Vārāhī and Nāraśimha are the different forms of Kātyāyani. They are called Saptamātsī (seven mothers). These saptamātsī were born when Kātyāyani in her wrath beat the earth with her matted hair). Cāmuniḍi roared. The world became dark. Hearing the roar Śiva descended to the field. The Asuras surrounded the Devī again. But they all fell dead with blood flowing in a stream. The dead bodies of the asuras became heaped up and in despair Sumbha and Niśumbha wept. Seeing that, Raktabijā got angry and rushed at Devī. The Saptamātsī shouted and Cāmuniḍi opened her mouth. The lower jaw of Cāmuniḍi touched Pāṭāla when she opened her mouth from the sky. Raktabijā, wounded and bleeding by a dagger stroke of Cāmuniḍi, fell into the mouth of Cāmuniḍi and disappeared. Then Niśumbha interfered and the fight became one between Niśumbha and Devī. The fat and sturdy hands of Niśumbha and the mace he was carrying fell by an arrow sent by Devī. Then Devī struck him with her spike and Niśumbha was killed. Both Sumbha and Niśumbha who came to wreak vengeance on her were thus killed. (See under Lāṅkālakṣāmi to know how Pārvatī became Lāṅkālakṣāmi).

5) Pārvatī takes the forms of Elephant and monkey. Śiva and Pārvatī went about enjoying amorous sports in the forests. Śiva turned himself into a tusker and Pārvatī became a she-elephant then. Gaṅapati was born as a result of that sport. Śiva became a monkey and Pārvatī became his mate and Hanumān was born as a result of that sport. (See under Gaṅapati and Hanumān).

6) Pārvatī became Sītā. This happened when Rāma and Lāṅkāmāna along with Sītā were in the forests. One day Sītā went to the Godāvṛti river nearby to bring water to the aśrama and she stayed for some time watching two swans playing in the midst of lotuses in the lake there. Hearing a sound she looked into the river and saw Śri Rāma bathing there. She was surprised. When she left the aśrama Rāma was sitting there. At the same time another thing happened in the āśrama. Śri Rāma found Sītā coming to him and when he arose to receive her the figure disappeared. Then Śri Rāma found bathing by Sītādevī also disappeared. When an astonished Sītā reached the āśrama she found an equally astonished Śri Rāma sitting there. They then told each other their experiences and Śri Rāma on meditation understood that in the guise of Rāma and Sītā Śiva and Pārvatī had come from Kailāsa to know about the welfare of the princes in exile.

7) Pārvatī, Vaiṣṇava and Jalandhara. See under those names.

8) Other details.

(i) Pārvatī shines in the court of Brahmā. (Śloka-41, Chapter 11, Sambhā Parva).

(ii) When the Pāḍavas were in exile Pārvatī guarded Arjuna always. (Vana Parva, Chapter 37, Śloka 38).

(iii) Once Pārvatī appeared in person and blessed Dharmaputra. (Chapter 6, Virāṭa Parva).

(iv) Once Śri Kṛṣṇa pleased Pārvatī and she granted Kṛṣṇa boon. The first was that he would have sixteen thousand wives. The next was a beautiful form for Kṛṣṇa and the next was love of his relatives. Another boon was that Kṛṣṇa would have the prosperity to be able to give food for seven thousand travellers daily. (Śloka 7, Chapter 15, Anuśāsana Parva).

(v) It was because of a curse of Pārvatī that devas do not get sons by their own wives. There is the following story behind that.

Śiva and Pārvatī went to the Himalayas after their marriage and started living there. Śiva and Pārvatī were so much engrossed in their amorous sport that they were oblivious of the happenings outside. After a long time when their sport continued without a break the devas went in and informed Śiva that the whole universe was trembling by their sport and if Śiva produced a son the world would be incapable of bearing it and so he should withdraw from the act of producing a child. Śiva agreed and drew his virile strength upwards. Pārvatī did not like that and she cursed the devas that they would never have sons of their own wives. (Chapter 64, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vi) Pārvatī once taught Gaṅgādevi the duties of women. (Śloka 33, Chapter 146, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vii) Pārvatī resides in the mount of Mūṅjavān in Kailāsa with Paramāśiva. There is a mount called Virata ordained and the Sakuni peopled (1 recited (Sloka installed help. invoked AsVamedha seventy the Bala the PATALA Sloka propitiate nothing temples be ancient these Pandavas.

PASA1VATIRTHA. A king who lived during the period of Mahabharata. He was born of the species of the dana called Kuksi. (Sloka 56, Chapter 67, Adi Parva).

PARIYATIYA II (PARVATIYA). Those who resided in the country called Pariyatiya in ancient Bharata were called Pariyatiyas. Pariyatiyas were also present for the Rajasuya of Dharmaputra. When the Pandavas had to fight against Jayadratha during their exile in the forests these paryatiyas fought on the side of Jayadratha. Arjuna killed them all. In the Kuruksetra battle the Pariyatiyas fought on the side of the Kauravas. Pariyatiya was a very important country of ancient Bharata. Once the Pariyatiyas fought against Krisha and Krsna conquered them. In the great battle the paryatiyas fought against the Pandavas under the banners of Sakuni and Uluka. The Pandavas destroyed them all. (Chapter 52, Sabha parva; Chapter 241, Vama Parva; Chapter 30, Udyoga Parva; Chapter 9, Bhima Parva; Chapter 11, Droha Parva; Chapter 46, Karna Parva and Chapter 1, Salta Parva).

PAASA. A divine weapon of Varuṇa. There is nothing to excel this in swiftness. (Sloka 29, Chapter 41, Vama Parva).

PASAŅATIRTHA. A sacred place. This is located in the Jamadagni-vedi in the temple of Sūrpraka. (Sloka 12, Chapter 38, Vana Parva).

PAṢĀSINI. An ancient river of Bāhara. (Sloka 22, Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva).

PĀSI. One of the hundred sons of Dṛṅtrāṣṭra. Bhīma killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 5, Chapter 84, Karṇa Parva).

PAṢĪVATĀ. A place of habitation in ancient India. (M. B. Bhima Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 64).

PAṢUBHŪMI. The country of Nepal. The place got the name of Paṣubhūmi because it is located near the birth place of Paṣupati (Siva). (Chapter 30, Sloka 9, Sabhā Parva).

PAṢUDĀ. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 28, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

PAṢUPTA I. An aged brahmin. (See under Virūpākṣa).

PAṢUPTA II. The missile of Siva. Arjuna during his exile in the forests performed penance to propitiate Siva and got this missile from him.

Siva has a bow named Pināka. Paṣupata is the arrow that is used on that bow. Pināka is a serpent with the colours of a rainbow. It has seven heads and has fierce canine teeth. Poison flows from them always. The string of the bow is wound round the neck of Siva. The arrow, bright like the sun and equal to the fire of death, is the Paṣupata. It will burn all that it touches.

Neither Nāryaṇaṇāstra, Brahmagāstra, Agneyāstra nor Vāraṇāstra can stand against this. In times of old Siva burnt the Tripuras (three cities of the notorious three demons) by this arrow. Even Brahmā and Viṣṇu could be killed by Paṣupata. (Chapter 14, Anuṣāsana Parva). Devotees worship Paṣupata as a deity. If the Paṣupata mantra is recited once it will remove all obstacles from the way and if recited a hundred times it will end all your calamities and bring success in any war for you.

PAṢUPTA (S). The bhūtaganas (Spirits and devils attending on him) of Siva as a class are called Pāṣupatās. (Chapter 67, Vama Purāṇa).

PAṢUSAKHA. Husband of Gaṇḍa, servant-maid of the saptaris. (See under Saptarish).
regions is of different hue like white, black, red and yellow. It is filled with rubbles, black granite and gold. Once Nārada on his return to Svarga from Pāṭāla said that Pāṭāla was more beautiful than Svarga. The ornaments worn by nāgas are profusely studded with shining diamonds. Daytime is lighted by the Sun and the night by the Moon. There is neither heat nor cold there and the happy nāgas living contentedly do not feel the passage of time.

Under the Pāṭāla is Ādiśeṣa, a tāmasc form of Mahāviṣṇu, known to the Siddhas as Ananta. He has a thousand heads and Svastika as his badge. Holding in one hand a plough and in the other a wooden pestle he sits worshipped by Śrīdevi and Vāruṇidevi. At the time of the end of the world the Saṅkarṣaṇa-mūrti, Rudra, is born from the face of Ādiśeṣa shining brightly like poisonous fire and it consumes all the three worlds. Ādiśeṣa worshipped by all gods bears this earth on his head like a crown and sits in Pāṭāla. When Ananta yawns this world begins to quake along with its oceans, rivers and forests. Nobody has seen an end of his qualities and that is why he is known as Ananta (no end). It was by worshipping this Ananta that the ancient sage Garga learned the truth about the results of Nimittāstrā (predictions by omens) a division of Jyotiṣaśāstra.

The distinguishing characteristics of each of the seven divisions of Pāṭāla are given below:

1) Atala. The first region of Pāṭāla. Here lives Bala, the celebrated son of Maya. He has created ninety-six kinds of magical arts capable of giving everything one desires. Those interested in magic are even now using some of these. When Bala yawns three kinds of women will come out of his mouth. Puṁścalis (harlots), Svariniś (adultresses) and Kamalīs (lustful maidens). These women have a charm called Hāṭaka to tempt all who enter Atala. This Hāṭaka is a rāṣṭāna which will excite sexual passion in men so that the women can enjoy a sexual life with them for a prolonged period. These women after enticing the men would live with them enjoying a life of bliss produced by bewitching side glances, charming smiles, erotic embraces and exciting amorous talks. The men who live with them will be in such a state of bliss that they would say with pride “I am perfect, I am god. I am one with the might of ten thousand elephants.”

2) Viṭāla. This is the abode of Hāṭakeśvara who is none other than Paramāśiva. This god accompanied by Bhavānidevi and surrounded by pramathagaṇas (prominent demigods who attend on him) and worshipped by devas, presides over this place increasing the praajas created by Brahma. The semen virile of Pārvatī-Paramēśvaras flows there as the river Hāṭaki. The gold named Hāṭaka is what is vomited by the wind-blown Agni after drinking the rasa of that river. The wives of daityas wear ornaments made of this gold.

3) Sutala. This is the abode of Mahābali. Here lives Mahābali meditating on Mahāviṣṇu with more glory and grandeur than Indra. To please Indra, Mahāviṣṇu once went to Mahābali on earth and by deceit took all his possessions and binding him with Varuṇapāśa pushed him to Sutala through a hole made on earth. Later Mahāviṣṇu felt he did a wrong in thus sending away Mahābali from earth by deceit and to remedy the sin committed he even now acts as a gatekeeper to Mahābali in Sutala. Once Rāvaṇa went to Sutala to attack Mahābali and then Mahāviṣṇu keeping watch over the palace-gate in the form of Vāmanā gave Rāvaṇa a kick and sent him back.

4) Talāṭala. This is the place where Maya lives. This Maya is a mighty magician among demons. After the Tripuradāhana (burning the three demons to death) Sīva blessed Maya and the latter is living as Tripurādhīpati (chief of Tripura) in Talāṭala. Maya is the preceptor of all demon-magicians and many fierce-looking demons worship him always.

5) Mahāṭala. This is the abode of Kādraveyas. They got the name because they are all children of Kadrū, the cobra. All these cobras are fierce-looking multi-headed ill-tempered ones. The prominent ones among them are Kūhaka, Taṣaṇa, Śuṣena and Kāliya. All these are long lean serpents possessing big hoods and great strength. These bad-tempered cobras live with their family terribly afraid of Garuṭa.

6) Raśāṭala. This is the residence of the notorious Nīvāṭakavaca-Kālēkayas. They were enemies of the devas and they tormented them in many ways. The majestic authority of Mahāviṣṇu decreased their virility. They are now living in Raśāṭala frightened by the threats and beatings with a magic wand of Saramā, a mantraśāpiṇi (a sacred chant incantate) deputed by Indra.

7) Pāṭāla. This is the abode of serpents. The nāgalokādhīpatis (chiefs of the serpent world) like Vāṣuki, Saṅkha, Guilika, Śveta, Dhanañjaya Mahāśikha, Dhiṭarāṣṭra, Saṅkhacūḍa, Kāmbala, Aṣvadhara and Devadatta live here. These are all strong, long-bodied, greatly poisonous snakes with very bad tempers. They all possess hoods varying in numbers from five to hundred and the lustre of the diamonds on their hoods keeps the region of Pāṭāla always illuminated. At the base of this Pāṭāla-world is a place, separated from the rest, thirty thousand yojanas in area. It is here that the tāmasc Viṣṇuкалā resides under the name Ananta. Ādiśeṣa or Ananta is the manifestation of this Viṣṇuкалā. Śrī Ananta has got a name Saṅkarṣaṇa meaning one who proudly and arrogantly pulls at every thing that is seen and unseen.

It is well-known that all the worlds are being borne on his head by the thousand-hooded Ādiśeṣa. When, while bearing the worlds like this, he feels that he should destroy the animate and inanimate objects of the worlds, he brings forth from his forehead Rudra named Saṅkarṣaṇa with eleven demigods and weapons like triśīla (trident). Ananta is very beautiful with divine brilliance. Other serpent chiefs prostrate before him and at that time they see their reflection on the diamond-mirror-like nails on the toes of Ananta and for some time the serpent chiefs lie there pleasantly looking at the reflection of their own faces in the nails. The earrings of dazzling brilliance worn by these serpent chiefs reflect on their cheeks and the serpents feel extremely happy when they see the reflection of their faces on the nails.

The daughters of the serpent kings are all beautiful damsels with fair, spotless and lustrous bodies. They smear their bodies with fragrant pastes made from Aloe, Sandal and Saffron. They then stand around Ādiseṣa with their bewitching smiles and amorous movements of their bodies accompanied by erotic side glances expressing their carnal desires. The mighty, virtuous, celebrated Ādiseṣa sits there surrounded by serpents for the welfare of the world. He sits there worshipped by Devas, Siddhas, Gandharvas, Vidyādras and Mahāris, bearing the divine garland ‘Vaijayantī’, and wearing fragrant flower garlands, blue apparels and ornaments in cars and neck and holding in his hand the Halāyudha. Suppressing his anger and keeping calm and serene he pleases all around with his pathetic look.

(9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PĀTĀLAKETU. A demon. This demon once carried away Madālasā, daughter of Vīvāvasu to Pātāla. R̄ṣadhvajāraja defeated Pātalāketu and rescued Madālasā from Pātāla. (See under R̄ṣadhvaja).

PĀTALARĀVAN. A leader among the demons. Rāvana, the lord of Lāṅkā, and Pātalārāvana are different. Pātalarāvana was the son of the sister of Mālyavān. Heti, son of Brahmap, begot of his wife Bhāyā a son named Vidyuṭakṣa. Vidyuṭakṣa married Śālakāṭāṅkā and got of her Sukṣa. Sukṣa married Devavatī and got of her three sons, Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī. Of these Sumālī got Prahastra and others who were the ministers of Rāvana. Pātalā-Rāvana was the son of Mālyavān’s sister.

A set of demons afraid of Mahāvisṇu, the destroyer of demons, fled to Pātāla. Their leader was Pātalārāvana. On reaching Pātāla he became their leader and emperor and he got the name of Pātalārāvana from then onwards.

Pātalārāvana performed severe austerities to propitiate Brahmā and got from him three extraordinary boons:—
1. To travel freely in all the worlds without the use of any vehicle
2. To be well-versed in all magical arts
3. To be alive till the beetle-shaped blue diamond in his possession is broken into two.

Pātalārāvana used all these boons for the welfare and emancipation of his own people. He was interested in teasing his enemies by the power of his boons. Rāvana, king of Lāṅkā, had an alliance with Pātalārāvana. Pātalārāvana had a cruel and huge brother named Kumbhdhara who was an adept in magic. This brother always helped Pātalā-Rāvana in all his activities.

The Rāma-Rāvana Yuddha was going on and Rāvana began to suffer defeat after defeat in quick succession. Rāvana then sent for Pātalārāvana and his brother Kumbhdhara. Pātalārāvana felt sorry at the pitiable plight of Lāṅkā and both the Rāvana’s sat together to discuss future plans. Though they had lost a major portion of their army, Rāvana suggested they should fight with the rest of the army and kill Rāma. Pātalārāvana was to kill Rāma and Lāṅkā-Rāvana was to marry Sītā. Pātalārāvana said that it was unwise to continue the fight with a small army but promised he would make a trial by using his magic powers.

Pātalārāvana and Kumbhdhara on leaving Lāṅkā made themselves invisible and travelled above the camp of Śrī Rāma to investigate the strength and manoeuvres of the Rāma-army. It was night and the whole place was lit by moonlight. The monkey soldiers were taking rest in different places. Vibhiṣaṇa and Sugriva were talking in secret about grave matters. Śrī Rāma was lying resting his head on the lap of Laksmaṇa and Laksmaṇa was mildly massaging the divine body of his brother. Hanūmān was sitting on a big dais created by his tail and keeping watch over the whole camp.

Pātalārāvana knew from what he saw that any attempt to carry away Rāma from the surface of the ground was impossible and so he returned to Pātāla. From there they made a tunnel up to the base of the seat of Hanūmān and from there to where Rāma lay. Then they carried Rāma and Laksmaṇa to Pātāla before anybody could find it out by making them smell a sammohanadivyausaḍhā (divine medicine causing unconsciousness). They brought them to a temple of Mahākāli with the intention of offering them in a sacrifice to the deity the next day morning. They made all preparations for the same. Hanūmān used to inspect the camp often and yet when after midnight he looked at the place where Rāma and Laksmaṇa were sleeping he could not find them. He immediately woke up all and made a search and they then found the big hole of a tunnel near the place where Rāma and Laksmaṇa were sleeping. All the leaders including Sugriva and Vibhiṣaṇa assembled there and then Vibhiṣaṇa told them what had happened. He then took Sugriva, Hanūmān, Jambavān and Aṅgada and a big army to Pātāla and went straight to the Mahākāli temple. There Pātalārāvana had already started the ceremonies for the sacrifice.

Vibhiṣaṇa then asked Hanūmān to go and get the beetle-shaped diamond of Pātalārāvana from a secret place in his bed chamber. Hanūmān took it and kept it in his mouth and attacked Pātalārāvana who came running to slay him. Pātalā-Rāvana faced Hanūmān in a very indifferent manner and a fight ensued. After sometime Hanūmān lost patience and cracked the diamond within his mouth and the moment it cracked Pātalā-Rāvana fell down dead. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

PĀTALĀVATI. A holy river of Uttara Bhārata. (Śloka 11, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PĀTALIPUTE. An ancient city of Purānic fame in Uttara Bhārata. The former name of this city was Pātalipuraka. There is a story behind the city getting this name:—

There was once a sacred pond named Kanakhala on the banks of river Gaṅgā. A brahmin from Dakṣiṇārāhata along with his wife came to this pond and started practising severe austerities there. He got three sons while living there. After some time the parents died. The three sons went to a place named Rājagriha and studied there. The three were very poor and they went from there to perform penance to propitiate Subrahmanya (Kumārsuvāṃ). On their way they entered the house of a brahmin named Bhojika living on the sea-coast. Bhojika had three daughters and the brahmin after knowing all details about them gave his daughters in marriage to them along with all his wealth. The brahmin went to perform penance with the three brahmin boys with their wives lived in that house.

Once there occurred a famine and the three brahmans left their home leaving their wives alone. The second girl was pregnant at that time and she and her sisters went to the house of a friend of their father named Yajñādatta. In due course she delivered a son and all... the three women looked after the child as their common son.

Śiva and Pārvatī were travelling by air once and seeing this child Śiva said thus:—"I am blessing this boy. This boy in his previous birth jointly with his wife worshipped me with great devotion. They are now born again to enjoy life. His wife in his previous birth was born as the daughter of King Mahendra. Her name was Pāṭalī and she would again be the wife of this boy in this life."

That night Paramāśīva appeared before the mother of the boy in a dream and said "You must name this boy Putraka. Everyday morning when he rises up a lakh of small gold coins will fall to the ground from his head."

They therefore, named the boy Putraka and every morning they would collect and store the gold coins falling from his head. When Putraka grew up he was immensely rich and started giving away his riches to brahmins as gifts. The news of this spread far and wide and brahmins from all sides began to flock to his house.

One day among the brahmins who flocked to his house were his father and his two brothers. The fathers felt envious of the extraordinary progress in wealth and fame of their son and they cleverly took the son to a lonely place in a temple in the heart of the Vindhya mountains to kill him. After engaging some murderers to kill him they left the place. Putraka bribed the murderers with his costly dresses and ornaments and escaped from there. There was a great storm then and Putraka walked through it. On his way he met the two sons of Mayāsura quarrelling for the three things left over to them by their father. The paternal property consisted of a stick, a pair of sandals and a pot all of which had some strange powers. If you draw on the ground with the stick you will have at that spot anything you desire. If you wear the sandals you can travel in the air. If you dip your hands into the pot you will get plenty of food.

Putraka immediately hit upon a plan and addressed the quarrelling brothers thus:—"Why do you fight like this? It is better you decide it by a competitive race. He who wins the race should have the right to get the things." The two brothers agreed to it and leaving the things with Putraka started running. When they had gone a long distance away from the spot, Putraka put on the sandals and taking the stick and pot with him rose into the air. He landed at a city far away from the spot and started living at the house of an old woman. The king of that country had a daughter named Pāṭalī. When the old lady described to him the beauty and good qualities of Pāṭalī, Putraka wanted to marry her. So at night when everybody in the palace was asleep Putraka put on his sandals and entered the room of Pāṭalī through the windows. Pāṭalī woke up; she liked Putraka and they were married according to Gāndharvā rites. Then they both went out of the palace by air with the help of the sandals and landed at a place on the shores of the Gaṅgā. Then at the request of Pāṭalī Putraka made a city there with the help of the stick and they named it Pāṭaliputra. (Kathāpithalambaka, Kathāsaritsāgara).

PATANGA. A mountain. There are twenty small mountains around Mahāmeru and Pataṅga is one of them.

PATAṆJALI. A celebrated commentator in Sanskrit. Patañjali is one of the best commentators of Pāṇini's Vyākaraṇa. Pandits are of opinion that he got his name Patañjali to mean that people should worship (anjali) at his foot (pāda). He was such an adorable person. Pandits believe that Patañjali is the author of Yogasūtra and Carakasūnāti. A few believe that Patañjali was the incarnation of Adiśeṣa. But modern scholars are of opinion that Patañjali, the commentator and Patañjali the author of Yogasūtras are two different persons.

In his book on Patañjalicarita, Rāmabhadradiśīta writes about the birth of Patañjali:—"Once Gaukṣu, daughter of a sage, prayed to the Sun-god for a son. At once Ananta, King of the serpents, fell on her palm in the form of a sage. The ascetic girl brought up that sage as her son. After some years the sage went to Cidambara and prayed to Śiva to bless him with enough knowledge and wisdom to write a commentary on Kāṭyāyaṇa's Vyākaraṇavārttikā (explanatory rules on Pāṇini's sūtras). Śiva blessed him and the sage wrote the commentary. Many disciples went to him to learn the commentary and the sage accepted them all as disciples and promised to teach them provided they would abide by a condition, namely, that nobody should remove a curtain he would place between him and the disciples while teaching. The teaching went on for some time. He would reply to their doubts but the replies were peculiar and ambiguous and the disciples, getting disappointed, removed the curtain one day. The sage cursed them all. One of the disciples was away from the place then and the sage cursed him for leaving the place without permission during the course of study. He begged for relief and the sage was pleased. The Guru said if he could teach his commentary to one who would say logically that the Bhūtakarmavāyaśkranta (past participle of a verb) of the root Pac was Pakva he would be released from the curse. Candragupta who came from Ujjainī gave the correct answer and he was taught the Mahābhāṣya. Bhrātr hari was the son born to Candragupta of a Śūdra woman.

Patañjali, according to Professor Goldstucker, was a courtier of King Puṣyamitra and was alive when Menander attacked Sāketa. This would mean that Patañjali lived before B.C. 150.

PATANA (S). A company of devils. (Chapter 285, Vana Parva).

PATAṬRI. A valiant warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. He lost his chariot in a fight with Bhimasena. (Chapter 48, Karṇa Parva).

PATAJAVĀSAKA. A serpent belonging to the race of Dīrgharāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

PATHAṆVARAN. A rājārsi well-praised in Rgveda. (Sūkta 112, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

PATHYA. A great preceptor in the tradition of ancient Gurus. (See under Guruparāmparā).

PATHIKRTA. Anagni. If a Yāga comes to a stop during its course this Agni is to be worshipped. (Chapter 221, Vana Parva).
PATINEṬṬARAKKAVI(S). (Eighteen and a half wise men).
Mānavikrama, the zamorin who ruled the old state of Kozhikkoṭu in the beginning of the seventh century (Malayālam Era) was a talented man well-versed in all arts. He kept in his court a company of nineteen wise men whom he called by the well-known name Patineṭṭarakkavīs meaning eighteen and a half kavis. The kavis of the zamorin were the nine Paṭṭeris of Payyūr, the five Nambūtiris of Tiruvegappura, Mullappilly Nambūtiri, Uduṇḍaṇḍaśāstri, Ḍārakāśēri Ḍhāṭṭatirī, Cennās Nambūtirippādu and Punam Nambūtiri. Of these eighteen were scholars in Sanskrit and the nineteenth, Punam Nambūtiri was a vernacular poet and so the then zamorin gave only half a unit value to the vernacular member and thus named the assembly as a company of eighteen and a half members. There is another explanation given to the word 'ārakkavi'. 'Āra' means 'half'; but modern pandits say that 'āra' was a prefix to show a sign of royalty as is found in the words 'āramana' meaning royal mana or palace of the King. So 'ārakkavi' would mean a Kavi attached to a King. Then the question comes, which of the nineteen was not included in the original company to reduce the number to eighteen. We can leave the matter for further research.

Payyūr Aćcan Bhaṭṭatirippādu, the top-most of Kerala pandits, was the president of the council of Patineṭṭarakkavis. The illam (house) of this Bhaṭṭatirippādu belonged to the Kunnamkulam taluk near Guriyāvūr of Cochin state. He was known as Mahāṛsi also Uduṇḍaṇḍaśārikal in his Mallikāmārutta states that one of the Paṭṭeris was Payyūr Mahābhaṭṭatirippādu named Parameśvara. Uduṇḍaṇḍaśāstri belonged to Kāĉēpura. Kāḳkaśēri Ḍhāṭṭatirī was born to defeat the invincible Uduṇḍaṇḍaśāstri. Cennās Nambūtiri was the author of Tantrasamuccaya. Many poets and pandits were born in the family of these Kavis after their death.

PATIVRATĀMĀḤATMYAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Vana Parva of Mahābhārata. This comprises six chapters commencing from Chapter 293 of Vana Parva.

PATRESVARA. A sacred place. This is situated on the northern shore of river Narmadā. If one bathes in the tirtha (pond) there, one will be able to enjoy the company of celestial maidens for five thousand years. (Chapter 17, Padma Purāṇa)

PATṬATTĀNA. This was a custom which was in force in the ancient temples of Kerala from the 9th century A.D. Paṭṭa means a 'Sanskrit pandit' 'Paṭṭas' is used as its plural. To give instructions in śāstras and upaniṣads to the upper three classes and to read in public at fixed times the Purāṇas, to make people more and more religious minded, it was the custom to appoint Paṭṭas in temples in ancient Kerala. This position which was the loftiest that could be attained by a pandit of those times was called by the name Paṭṭattāna. From the 9th century A.D. references are found about Paṭṭattāna in official records. In all important temples a māvāratapaṭṭa used to be appointed. His duty was to read and explain Mahābhārata to people. Urāḷars who conducted the day to day administration of the temples and the Koiladikārī who represented the supreme authority, and the King, jointly granted the Paṭṭattāna to deserving people. Pandits used to come to temples and engage themselves in religions polemics to make themselves worthy of the grant of Paṭṭattāna. The Paṭṭas were entitled to some profits from the temples. Records of the 3rd century Malayālam Era regarding the routine expenditure in the Tiruvalla temple mention about 'five nāzhis of rice to be given to each of the Paṭṭas within the temple'. Paṭṭas also were given many lands free of tax as were given to Urāḷars. In the Manalikkara order of 1236 A.D. and the Padmanābhapura order of 1237 A.D. mention is made about these grants. Paṭṭattānā and Urāṃstānā became hereditary after some time and began to decline in importance.

Even the meaning of the word Paṭṭattāna underwent a change. In Cochin it meant the ceremony of giving feasts followed by money-bags to invited brahmins by the Kings to obtain puṇya for the dead members of the royal family. The zamorins of Calicut meant by Paṭṭattāna the act of giving fifty-one bags each containing fifty-one rupees to the successful candidates in šāstrārtha contests held at the Tali temple during the period between Revati and Tiruvātirā ( Ardā) in the month of Tulām. There is a difference of opinion regarding the number of money-bags and the amount in each. Ullūr S. Parameśvara Iyer in his Viṣṇuṇāḍipikā (page 148) states that the number of bags were 46 and the money in each was two hundred rupees. Of these, twelve bags each were sanctioned for Prabhākara Mīṃāṃṣa and Bhāṭṭamīṃāṃṣa, nine for Vēkaraṇa, and thirteen for Vedānta. According to certain records 48 bags were given in the year 1679 A.D. Contests in Prabhākara Mīṃāṃṣa were held on the southern temple-tower gate of the Tali temple and in Vēkaraṇa on the southern platform of the northern temple-tower gate of the same temple. The custom of giving hundred and one rupees each to one hundred and eight scholars in Śrī Padmanābhasvāmi temple of Trivandrum is also called Paṭṭattāna.

PATTI. A division of the army. (See under Akṣauḥini). PATTORṆA. A Kṣatriya King. He brought gifts for the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 18, Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva).

PATTU (TEN),

PAŪN德拉 I. One of the barbarous tribes of men who had originated from the tail of Nandini. (Sloka 37, Chapter 174, Ādi Parva).

PAŪN德拉 II. A resident of the state of Paundra. This state was in existence during the Mahābhārata period. The king of the state was also called Paundra. Paundra was present for the marriage of Pāṇcālī. (Chapter 186, Ādi Parva). Paundras were also present for the Rājasaṣṭāya conducted by Dharmaputra. During the big battle the Paundras fought against the Kauravas constructing a Krauñčavyāhu (a battle array in the shape of a stork). (Chapter 50, Bhiṣma Parva). Kṛṣṇa and Karna on two different occasions conquered this country. (Śantī Parva, M. B.) The Paundras were Keśatas once. But the brahmans cursed them and changed them into Śūdras. (Chapter 85, Anuśāsa Parva).

PAŪN德拉 III. The conch of Bhūmasesa. He blew his conch at the beginning of the Mahābhārata battle and also at the time when Duryodhana fell down dead. (Chapter 61, Śalya Parva).

PAŪN德拉K A I. A son of Nikumbha. When during the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Nikumbha died, his son Paundra took up the fight against Rāma and was killed. (Ananda Rāmāyana).

PAŪN德拉K A II. (PaundraKavāṣudeva). A king of ancient Kārūṇya. Once he sent a messenger to Dvārakā and told Kṛṣṇa thus: "Oh Kṛṣṇa, I am the real Vāsudeva. Therefore put down all your royal emblems and robes and come and worship at my feet." As soon as Kṛṣṇa heard it he got angry and moved to Kārūṇya with a large army and killed PaundraKavāṣudeva. 10th Skanda, Bhağavata).

PAŪN德拉K A III. The name of the buffalo which is the vehicle of Yama (Chapter 9, Vāmana Purāṇa).

PAŪN德拉MĀTSYA K A. A Keśatiya king. He was the son born to the demon Vira of a woman named Dānūyas. (Sloka 43, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PAURAVA I. An ancient Rājaṛṣi. He became Parvatarāja when he grew up after being born of the species of the dāitya, Śarabhā. Once Arjuna defeated this king. The Pāṇḍavas invited him for the Mahābhārata battle. But he did not accept it but joined sides with the Kauravas against the Pāṇḍavas. Paurava was considered an prominent commander in the Kaurava army. In the Kurukṣetra battle he at first fought against Dhrṣṭaketu and then was wounded when he fought against Abhimanyu. It was Arjuna who killed him in the end. (Chapter 67, Ādi Parva; Chapter 27, Bhīṣma Parva; Chapters 4, 128, Udyoga Parva; Chapter 116, Bhīṣma Parva; Chapter 14, Drona Parva; Chapter 5, Karna Parva).

PAURAVA II. Those born in the Purū line of kṣiras are as a class called Pauravas. Both Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas have been mentioned as Pauravas in the Purāṇas. (Chapter 172, Ādi Parva).

PAURAVA III. An ancient king of the kingdom of Aṅga. This Paurava was also one among the kings who gave money to king Śrījaya when he conducted an Áṣāmedha (Chapter 57, Drona Parva).

PAURAVA IV. One of the Brahmavādi sons of Viśāmitra. (Sloka 55, Chapter 4, Anuśāsa Parva).

PAURAṆA. A Keśatiya tribe. These people fought against the Kauravas joining the Krauñčavyāhu constructed by Dharmaputra in the great battle. (Chapter 50, Bhiṣma Parva).

PAŪRAVI I. Wife of Vasudeva, father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. He had many other wives. (9th Skanda, Bhağavata).

PAŪRAVI II. Wife of Yudhīṣṭhīra. Yudhīṣṭhīra begot a son named Devaka of Pauravi. (9th Skanda, Bhaţgavata).

PAURAŞeya. A demon who travels along with the sun in the month of Jyeṣṭha. (June). (11th Skanda, Bhaţgavata).
PAURIKA. A king of the ancient country Purikānagari. He was such a sinner that he was reborn as a jackal in his next birth. (Chapter 111, Sānti Parva).

PAURJAMĀSA. Son of Marici. His mother was called Sambhūti. Paurjanamāsa had two sons named Viśrajas and Parvata. (Chapter 10, Arīśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).

PAUṢAJIT. One of the sages belonging to the tradition of the disciples of Vyāsa. (See under Guruparamparā).

PAUSAMĀSA. The month of Puṣa (January). During this month, on the full moon day the constellation Puṣya and the moon join in a zodiac. He who takes food only once a day during this month will get beauty, fame and prosperity. (Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva).

PAUSPINI. A sage belonging to the tradition of disciples of Vyāsa. (See under Guruparamparā)

PAUSṬI. Wife of king Puru. Puru begot of Pausṭi three sons named Pravira, Iāvara, and Raudrāsa. Pausṭi is called Kausalyā also. (Śloka 11, Chapter 9, Ādi Parva).

PAUSYĀ I. A Kṣatriya king. The queen of this king gave her earrings as a gift to a sage called Uṭṭānaka. (See under Uṭṭānaka).

PAUSYĀ II. Son of Pūṣā, king of Karavira. Pausya had three wives and yet was not fortunate enough to get a son. At last by the grace of Siva, he got a son named Candrasekhara. The palace of Candrasekhara was in Karaviranagara situated near Brahmāvara on the banks of the river Drṣadavia. (Kālikā Purāṇa, Chapter 49).

PAUSYAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Ādi Parva. Chapter three is included in this.

PAUSYANJI. A preceptor of the tradition of disciples of Vyāsa. (See under Vyāsa).

PĀVAKA. A son of Agni. Agni got of his wife Śvāhā three sons, Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śucī. These three brilliant sons got together 45 sons and they were also called Agnis. Thus there were 49 Agnis made up of the father, his three sons and their 45 sons. Pāvaka had another name also—Mahān (Chapter 219, Vana Parva).

PĀVAMĀNA I. An Agni (fire). The eldest son of Brahmā, Agni, got of his wife Śvāhā three sons, Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śucī. These three got fortyfive children and they are called Agnis. Thus, father, three sons and their fortyfive sons constitute the 49 Agnis. (Chapter 10, Arīśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).

PĀVAMĀNA II. A mountain. This mountain is situated near Meru. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PĀVAMĀNA III. One of the three sons of Viśvās. He was in his previous birth an Agni but was cursed by Vasīṣṭha to be born on earth as a man. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PĀVANA I. A Viśvadeva (one of the ten sons of Viśvā). (Śloka 30, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀVANA II. A son born to Kṛṣṇa of Mitrāvindā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PĀVANA III. A sacred place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one worships the Devas and Manes at this place one would get the benefit of conducting an Aśvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PĀVANAHRADĀ. A marudgaṇa tirthā (a sacred pond) situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in this one would attain Viśnuloka.

PĀVITRĀROPĀṇA. A Pūjāvidhi (a mode of worship) you will get the benefit of worshipping Viṣṇu for a year. This worship is to be conducted in the months of Āśāda (July), Śrāvana (August) Prauṣṭhapada (September), Āśvina (October) and Kārttika (November). A sacred Pavitra (sacred thread or ring of Kusa grass) is to be prepared either in gold, silver, copper, cotton or silk. A specially purified cotton thread is also enough. The Pavitra is to be made of three threads woven together. The Pavitra is to be made holy by reciting 108 times the Gāvatri mantra or even half of that number is enough. Reciting 108 times or more is considered to be Uttama (best); half of it is considered Madhyama (tolerable) and less than it is consideredadhama (worst). The Pavitra should then be tied to manḍalas and the mantra to be recited at the time of tying it, is this:

Om Nārāyaṇāya vidmahe Vāsudevāya Dhīmahi tanno Viṣṇuṣuḥ praocādyat. (Chapter 34, Agni Purāṇa).

PĀVITRĀVĀΝI. A sage who shone in the courts of both Indra and Yudhiṣṭhirā. (Śloka 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

PĀVAYASA. Son of the sage Aṅgiras. He had eight sons named Varuṇas. They were—Bṛhaspati, Uṭṭānya, Payasya, Sānti, Ghora, Vīrūpa, Sarvāvarta and Sudhanvā. (Śloka 130, Chapter 85, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀVYODA. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 28, Chapter 46, Sālīya Parva).

PĀVYONI. A holy river. This river starts from the Vindhya mountains and flows to the west. Nala and Damayantī walked through the banks of this river. (Chapter 61, Vana Parva). Those who bathe in this river will get the benefit of doing a thousand godānas (gifts of cows). There is a sacred place on the shores of this river called Varāhātirtha. King Nṛga performed a Yāga at this place at which Indra came and had Somapāna and the brahmins received daksinā (fees) and got drunk. (Chapters 88 and 121, Vana Parva).

Even the mere contact of water-drops of Payoṇi river would absolve one of all sins. The musical instrument Śrīga of Śiva is in this river. Dharmaputra once came to this river and stayed there for some time drinking its water. (Chapter 120, Vana Parva).

On another occasion Gaya son of King Amūratarayas conducted seven aśvamedhas at this place and pleased Indra. (Chapter 21, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀVYANNŪR PĀṬTU. This is a work in Malayāḷam written during a very ancient period of Malayāḷam literature. A complete edition of the same has not yet been received. The plot as could be gathered from records available is the following: Nilake’i, a woman born in a very noble family in Trīśīvaverūr did not have any sons though she accepted many husbands for the sake of progeny. At last she decided to perform penance. She left her place alone on a pilgrimage and reached Kāccal, a famous trading centre near Ezhimala. There lived a merchant named Nambucetty alias Combucetty who was the chief man of the place. He talked with Nilakeśi and accepted her as his wife. She got a son of him named Nambu’ari. Pleased at the birth of a son the parents gave a grand feast at the big Payyanur plains. At that time the brothers of Nilakeśi reached the place in a ship. They climbed the fort-walls and tried to enter the grounds. Some people objected to it and at that time Nambucety came there and beat them to death. On hearing about this Nilakesi left everything behind including her son and went again on a pilgrimage. When the son grew up the father taught his son everything about trade and ships. The father gave him a new ship for trading and the son taking along with him Pándyas, Jonakas, Coliyas, Páppavas and a Yavana and a huge stock of goods put the ship into the sea and fearlessly went for trading. After passing through many ports and crossing another ocean he reached Ponnama (the mountain of gold) and bartered his goods for a heap of gold. He came back to his own land and was one day playing chess with his father when a Sannyásini (female ascetic) came there. When she was given alms she requested to be allowed to talk to the young merchant. The Sannyásini was none other than Nilakesi the mother of Nambuśāri Aran, the young merchant. She requested him to come to Payyannūr for a feast conducted by a woman there and he agreed to that. But the father objected to it. But when the son persisted in going, the father sent him with the sons of a cetty, a few people from Manjigrāma and a huge stock of goods for trade. The poem ends there thus with 104 verses.

There are different opinions about the story among literary critics and historians. Gundert writes about it thus—"This is a piece of Malayālam work most ancient of all that I have seen. This is a creation in Malayālam before that language became diluted with meaningless inedible Sanskrit words." According to Gundert this poem was written before the poem Rāmacarita was written and thus in the 3rd century M.E.

PEDU. A Rājarṣi otherwise named Aiṅkāśa. (Maṇḍala 1, Rgyveda).

PERĪYĀLVAR, Viṣṇucittar, father of Anḍāl. (See under Viṣṇucittar).

PERUKA. A King of Vedic times. He was the āṣraya-dātā (one who gives r uge) of Bharadvāja. (Anuvāka 63, Maṇḍala 6, Rgyveda).

PHA. This letter means Jhaūjhaūvāta. Phū is phūktāra, a sound resembling hissing and means 'useless' also. (Chapter 348, Agni Purāṇa).

PHALAKAŚA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa was a member of the court of Kubera. (Sloka 16, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PHALAKIVANA. A sacred place. Once the devās started practising severe austerities at this place and it lasted for a long time extending to thousands of years. From then onwards this became a holy place. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, Sloka 36).

PHALAUDAKA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa lives in the court of Kubera. (Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PHALGŪ. A holy river. If one visits this place one would get the benefit of doing an Āsvamedha. (Sloka 98, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

PHALGUNA. Another name of Arjuna. Arjuna was born in the Uttarāphalguni constellation in a mount of the Himālayas. So he was called Phalguna and also Phālguna. (Sloka 9, Chapter 44, Viṅgā Parva).

PHĀLGUNA. A month (March). It is so called because the phalguninākaṣṭra yoga occurs in that month. He who gives away as gift his meal for a time of the day will become more loved by his wife. Not only that, the Purāṇas declare that such a man would attain Candraloka. (Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

PHALGUTANTRA. The father of Sagarā. During the old age of Phalguṇatru the Hāṭhayas led by Tālajaṅgha attacked Ayodhya and drove out the royal family from the palace. Phalguṇatru fled from the palace with his wife and stayed in the āśrama of Auvra. The King died before long. The queen who was pregnant then delivered a son in due course and he became the celebrated Sagarā. (Chapter 3, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

PHALODAKA. A Yakṣa of the court of Kubera. (Sloka 16, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PHENA. A King of the race of Uṣṇara. His son was Sutapas and his grandson Anuśānara. (Harivam’a, 1, 31, 32).

PHENAPA. A gotra-maker of the Bhrigu family. Phenapa is mentioned in the context of describing to Yudhiṣṭhira the greatness of cows. Phenapa’s original name was Sumitra. He lived on the shores of the river Kulajā in the mountain of Trīśikhara drinking the foam of cow’s milk alone and thus getting for him the name Phenapa. (Pheua = foam; Pā = drink). (Anuśāsana Parva, M.B.).

PICChALa. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpaśatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 6, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PICChILĀ. A river of Purānic fame which runs through Uttarā Bhārata. (Sloka 29, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PINĀKA. The bow of Siva. Pināka was formerly the three-forked spike of Siva. Once it fell down from the hands of Siva and on falling down took the shape of a bow. From then onwards it was used as a bow. See under Pāśupata. (Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva: Chapter 141, Anuśāsana Parva; Chapter 289, Śaṅtī Parva).

PINĀKī I. One of the eleven Rudras. He was the grandson of Brahmā and the son of Sthānā. Pināki attended the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 66, Ādi Parva; Chapter 206, Śaṅtī Parva; Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PINĀKī II. Siva got this name because he wielded the bow named Pināka.

PINḌĀRAKA I. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpaśatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 17, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PINḌĀRAKA II. A sacred place situated near Dvārakā in Saurāṣṭra. He who bathes in a holy river there would get immense gold. The place is worshipped by the sages. He who stays there for one day bathing in that river would get the benefit of conducting an Agnistoma-jāja. (Chapter 82, Sloka 62, Vana Parva; Sloka 21, Chapter 88, Vana Parva; Sloka 57, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

PINḌASEKṬA. A serpent of the race of Takṣaka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpaśatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 8, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PINḌIKĀ. A stool to install idols. The length of this stool should be equal to that of the idol. The breadth should be its half and the thickness equal to that is the breadth. The exact place where the idol is fixed of called Mekhalā and the hole in the mekhalā should slightly slant towards the north. The pipe (exthole for the water to flow out) called Pranāla should be as wide as a fourth part of the area of the pītha. For a pranāla of a Śiva temple the length of the same should be half of that of the Pīndikā.

The sanctum sanctorum of the temple should be divided into seven divisions and the Pīndikā should be fixed by a learned priest in the Brahmabhāga of the garbhagṛha (sanctum sanctorum). (Chapters 50 and 60, Agni Purāṇa).

Pīṅgākṣa. See under Durmukha.

Pīṅgākti. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 18, Chapter 46, Sātya Parva).

Pīṅgāla I. A deva who is an attendant of the Sun-god. Sārya (Sun-god) rides in a one-wheeled chariot drawn by seven horses and he bears in his hands two lotuses. On his right side stands the attendant Dāndi with an ink-pot and a writing stick and on his left side stands the attendant Pīṅgala with a stick. Both these are demi-god attendants of Sārya. (Chapter 51, Agni Purāṇa).

Pīṅgāla II. A prominent serpent born to the sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kadrū. (Śloka 9, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

Pīṅgāla III. A sage. He was a Yajvā (priest) in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 6, Chapter 53, Ādi Parva).

Pīṅgāla IV. A King of the Yaksas. He is a friend of Śiva. He acts as body-guard to Śiva who spends his time in cremation grounds. This Yaksā gives happiness to all in the world. (Śloka 51, Chapter 23, Vana Parva).

Pīṅgāla V. A lion, who is a character in the book Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

Pīṅgāla VI. A brahmin of very bad manners. This brahmin was killed by his own wife who was a prostitute. In their next birth Pīṅgala became a vulture and the prostitute, a parrot. Both had memories of their previous birth and the vulture (Pīṅgala) with vengeance killed the parrot. After that Pīṅgala was eaten one day by a tiger. A brahmin residing on the shores of Gaṅgā read to their souls the fifth chapter of Gītā and they got salvation and entered Pitrālaka (world of the Manes). (Chapter 40, Sṛṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

Pīṅgāla VII. A rāksasa (demon). Once when this demon was going through a forest he met a forester. The latter got afraid and climbed up a Śami tree. Then a branch broke and it fell on the head of Gaṇeṣa sitting beneath that tree. It was an act of worship and because of that both the forester and the demon were elevated. (Gaṇeṣa Purāṇa).

Pīṅgāla I. A prostitute. (See under Rṣabha II).

Pīṅgāla II. A prostitute of the country of Avanti. Pīṅgala was born as the daughter of King Gandrāṅgada in her next birth because of the virtuous act she did in doing service to the sage Rṣabha. The King named the girl Kiritāmālinī and Bhadrāyū married her. (See under Bhadrāyū).

Pīṅgāla III. A woman of the city of Ayodhyā. Once this woman approached Śrī Rāma with amorous intentions and Śrī Rāma who was strictly observing a vow of one-wife refused to satisfy her desire and said—“During the incarnation of Kṛṣṇa you will be born as a servant maid of Kāṁsa and then I will in my form as Kṛṣṇa accept you.”

Sitā on hearing this cursed Pīṅgala. She said “Oh beautiful woman who has approached my husband with amorous intentions, you will have three bends in your body when you are born next as the servant maid of Kāṁsa.” Pīṅgala weeping bitterly craved for pardon and then Sitā said that Kṛṣṇa would make her perfect. (Vīśāla Khaṇḍa, Ananda Rāmāyaṇa).

Pīṅgalarāja. A Yaksā who lives in cremation grounds. He always acts as a pilot to Śiva in his travels. (Śloka 31, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

Pīṅgatīrtha. An ancient holy place. (Chapter 82, Vana Parva).

Pīṅjala. A river of Purāṇic fame. The greatness of this river is described in Śloka 27, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

Pīṅjaraka. A son born to the sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kadrū. (Śloka 6, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

Pippala I. The youngest of the three sons born to the dāitya named Mitra of his wife Revati. (Bhāvīṣya Purāṇa).

Pippala II. A brahmin born of the race of Kaśyapa. Pippala did severe penance and became arrogant of the power acquired by it. Once he happened to see the eminent sage Sukarmā serving with devotion his own mother and father and that made his arrogance fade a bit. (Bhūmi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 61).

Pippalāda. An ancient sage belonging to the tradition of preceptors. (See under Guruparamparā). It is said that this sage got that name because he was in the habit of eating Pippalī in large quantities daily. Praśnopanisad tells a story of how the sages Sukeśa, Saibya, Satyakāma (Kaśyapa), Kauśalya, Bhārgava and Kabbandhi went to Pippalāda seeking Atmājāna (spiritual knowledge) and how he gave them instructions on the same.

Padma Purāṇa gives the following information regarding Pippalāda:—“Once Kuṇḍala, a brahmin residing in Kurukṣetra, got a son named Sukarmā. Sukarmā’s parents were old and Sukarmā spent most of his time looking after his sickly aged parents. Kuṇḍala taught his son all the Vedas and Śāstras. At that time in the gotra of Kaśyapa was born a brahmin named Pippalāda. Controlling his senses and abandoning all passions he did severe penance in a forest called Daśāranya. The greatness of his penance made the animals of the forest leave their mutual enmity and live in perfect peace. Even the devas were astonished at the power of his penance.

Pippalāda did penance sitting as majestic and motionless as a mountain for a thousand years. Ants made a sand-heaps over him like a mole-hill. The sage sat inside without any motion; poisonous black cobras circled round him and yet the sage made no movement. Three thousand years went by like that and then the devas showered flowers on him. Brahma appeared and gave him the boon of Sarvakāmasiddhi (getting all that he desired) and by the blessing of Brahma he became a very learned person also.

Pippalāda became arrogant with the boon of Sarvakāmasiddhi in his possession. One day while he was sitting on a river-bank a swan appeared before him and in clear tones said:—“Pippalāda, why are you so proud of your greatness? I do not believe you have that power of universal attraction. This art is arvâcina (modern); you do not know Prâcina because you are illiterate. You take pride unnecessarily for having done penance for three thousand years. Do you know Sukârma, the wise son of Kûndala? He is the man who has acquired this power of attraction. There is no makhijâmi (one possessing spiritual knowledge) like him anywhere else in this world. Sukârma has given no gifts, he has not practised meditation, he has not performed yâgas or yajñas nor has he ever done a pilgrimage. He has not done any of these virtuous deeds and yet he is well-versed in all the sâstras and Vedas. Even though he is a child you do not possess enough knowledge to equal his. Why? Because he is always engaged in the care and welfare of his parents. You take pride in your achievements without reason."

Hearing that Pippalâda went and met Sukârma, Pippalâda knew that the bird was none other than Brahma himself. They talked to each other for a long time and then Pippalâda admitted that Sukârma was a greater man than himself. (Chapters 60-62, Padma Parâvana).

PIPPALASTHANA. A division of land included in the Jambûdvipa. (Sloka 37, Chapter 6, Bhîśma Parva.)

PIPPALÂYA. One of the nine sons born to Ṛṣabhadeva of his wife Jayanti. Pippalaya was a very pious king. (4th Skandha, Bhâgavata)

PIŚÃCA I. (Devil, Satan)

1) Origin. A malevolent being which is the very manifestation of evil. Everybody, everywhere in the world, from the very birth of this universe believed in the presence of such a wicked soul. According to Hindu Purânas, Pîśâca is a creation of Brahmâ. In the beginning Brahmâ created the eighteen prajâpatis headed by Dakṣa, the Yakṣas, the Gandharvas and the Pîśâcas. (Chapter 1, Âdi Parva.) This wicked being is called in English a 'Devil'. This word is derived from the Greek word 'diabolo'. People of the West and East equally believe that Pîśâca (Satan) is an enemy of men and gods alike.

2) Bible and the Pîśâca. It is not clearly stated in Bible how Satan was born but it is being referred to at several places as a wicked soul which leads men to evil.

3) The Bhâratya Saññâlha. Pîśâca, the creation of Brahmâ, has taken important roles in the Purânic stories. Though Pîśâca is the instigator of all evils its manifestation appears in many contexts in the Purânas:—

(i) Pîśâca lives in the court of Kubera and worships him. (Sloka 16, Chapter 10, Savitri Parva).

(ii) Pîśâca lives in the court of Brahmâ and worships him. (Sloka 49, Chapter 11, Savitri Parva).

(iii) Pîśâca lives in the Gokarnaîthra and worships Śiva. (Sloka 25, Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

(iv) Pîśâca is the head of all evil spirits. Marici and sages like him have created many evil spirits. (Sloka 46, Chapter 272, Vana Parva).

(v) The bhûtas (evil spirits) made Râvana their king. (Sloka 88, Chapter 275, Vana Parva).

(vi) The food of Pîśâca is flesh and its drink, blood. (Sloka 9, Chapter 50, drona Parva).

(vii) In the battle of Bhârata, the horses attached to the chariot of Alambusa were Pîśâcas. (Sloka 38, Chapter 167, drona Parva).

(viii) The Pîśâcas fought Karna acting as helpers to Ghaṭotkaca. (Sloka 109, Chapter 175, drona Parva).

(ix) Arjuna conquered the Pîśâcas at the time of Khândavâdâhâ. (Sloka 37, Chapter 37, Karṇa Parva).

(x) The Pîśâcas were present during the fight of Arjuna with Karṇa (Sloka 50, Chapter 87, Karṇa Parva).

(xi) The Pîśâcas worship Pîrvatî and Paramēṣvara doing penance on the top of the mountain Mûnîjâvân. (Sloka 5, Chapter 8, Âsamedhikâ Parva).

(xii) During the time of Mahâbhârata many Pîśâcas incarnated as kings. (Sloka 6, Chapter 31, Âśramvâsikâ Parva).

PIŚÂCA II. A Yakṣa. (Sloka 16, Chapter 10, Śânti Parva)

PIŚÂCA III. An inhabitant of the country of Pîśâca in ancient Bhârata. These Pîśâcas fought against the Kauravas on the side of the Pândavas during the great battle. It was these Pîśâcas that stood on the southern side of the Kauvatiyâhâ of Yudhiṣhṭhira in the great battle. (Sloka 50, Chapter 50, Bhîśma Parva.) A few of these Pîśâcas were with Bhagadatta in the army of Duryodhana. (Chapter 87, Bhîśma Parva.) Śri Kṛṣṇa cured the pîśâcas. (Chapter 11, Droṇa Parva).

PIŚÂNGA. A serpent born of the family of Dhitraśṛṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 17, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PIŚĪ AKANAVAMI. See under Navamivrata.

PIṬÂMAHAŚARAS. A sacred place in the base of the Himalayas. If one bather in the holy pond there one would get the benefit of doing an Agniṣṭoma. (Sloka 148, Chapter 94, Vana Parva.)

PIṬHA. A demon. He was killed by Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Sloka 5, Chapter 11, Droṇa Parva).

PIṬHARA. A daitya who was a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 9, Savitri Parva).

PIṬHARAKA (PIṬHARAKA). A prominent serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. This was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 15, Chapter 37, Ādi Parva).

PIṬR (S). Pitṛs are a set of demigods. From Manu-prajāpati, son of Brahmâ, were born the Saptarasîs like Marici and they in turn created the Pitṛs. Besides Marici and his set many others like Virāṭ Puruṣa and Brahmâ have created Pitṛs. Some Purânas state that Pitṛs are of daily creation. Brahmâ in the beginning created three sets of Pitṛs with form and four with brightness making thus seven sets. The three sets of bodied pitṛs are Agniśvâtas, Barhiṣadas and Somapās and the four bright ones are Yama, Anala, Soma and Aryan (10th Skandha, Devi Bhâgavata). "Manor hairanyagarbhasya ye maricyâdayaḥ sutâḥ/ Tesaṁśrînâm sarvesvam putrâḥ pitragnânāh smrâtāh" // (Sloka 194, Chapter 8, Manusmrti).

Pitṛs (manes) are classified into two types: The Agniśvātas and Barhiṣadas. Of these the Agniśvātas do not perform Yâgas and the Barhiṣadas are those who perform yâgas. Besides these two major divisions they are classified into many other groups as follows:

1. Somasadasya (s). Virāṭ Puruṣa is the creator of these Pitṛs. Somasadasyas are the Pitṛs of Sâdhyadevas.

2. Agniśvâta (s). They are the pitṛs of devas.

3. Barhiṣadas. These Pitṛs are the creation of the sage Atri. They are the manes of daityas, dânavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, uragas (serpents), râkṣasas (demons), suvarñas and kinnaras.
4. Somapā (s), They are the sons of the sage Bhṛgu and are the manes of brahmans.
5. Haivirbhuk (s). The sage Aṅgiras is the father of these Pitṛs who are the manes of Kṣatriyas.
6. Ājyapā (s). These are the sons of the sage Pulastya and are the manes of Vaiśyas.
7. Sukālika (s). Sons of the sage Vasiṣṭha, these Pitṛs are the manes of the Śūdras.

To the seven sages like Marici were born the pitṛs and to the pitṛs were born the devāsuras (devas and asuras) and to the devāsuras were born everything else in this universe, animate and inanimate. (Chapter 3, Manu-smṛti).

Performing a Śrāddha (offering obsequial oblations to the departed) is just like a yajña. The oblations should be offered in either silver or silver cum copper pots. Viśvadevas are the guardians of the pitṛs. Therefore the oblations should be offered after worshipping the Viśvadevas first and then the pitṛs and then Viśnu. (See under Śrāddha).

PITRTĪRTHA. The Kumbhīpākanaraaka (the hell of Kumbhīpāka) in the land of the manes is called Pitṛṭīrtha. There is a story about this in Devī Bhāgavata:

Once the sage Durvāsas with his body smeared with ashes and wearing sacred barks went to Pitṛloka muttering “Śivaśādikara sarvāman śrīmātār bhuvane vari!” The lord of the Pitṛloka received him with respect and worshipped him. While they were talking, Durvāsas heard cries of agony from somewhere and the sage then asked Pitṛnātha thus: “Oh lord of the Pitṛs, I have heard you described as a very virtuous man. How can then such painful cries of distress be heard from here? “Oh, I am dying beaten”, “Oh, I am being killed” “Oh, I am dying” and “Oh, I am being burnt” are some of the woeful shrieks I hear. What is the reason for this?”

Hearing this Dharmarāja said: “Great sage, this is in fact a land of virtue. Nothing but righteous things are done here. I can tell you from where you hear that wail. The Yamaṇūra named Sānyamāni is nearby. There Yama sits to punish the sinners. Yama is a dispenser of Justice and he has got several cruel and mighty servants to carry out his orders. There are eighty-six hells to punish the sinners and of these Kumbhīpāka is the most horrible. Great sinners like those who insult the gods, fornicators and those who insult their parents are put in this hell and punished. You are now hearing the cries of such sinners from that hell.”

Durvāsas was curious to see the hell and the lord of the Manes gave permission and asked his servants to show Durvāsas the Kumbhīpākanaraaka. The hell was found to change into a heaven. The residents were laughing, singing dancing and doing such acts of happiness.

The servants of Yama were astonished and they went and reported to Yamarāja this sudden change. Yamarāja was also amazed to hear the news. He immediately rode on his vehicle, the buffalo, to the hell to learn the details personally. He could not find out the cause for the change. The place looked like the Svargaloka of Indra. King Yama sent a messenger to Indra with the news and Indra at first thought that it must be due to some māyā and so came to the place swiftly on his Airāvata. The news spread and one by one Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Aṣṭadikpālakas (the eight guardians of the quarters) and all such people came to Kumbhīpākanaraaka. Nobody could find an explanation for this change and so Mahāviṣṇu accompanied by a few devas went to Kailāsa and reported the matter to Śiva and Śiva said smilingly “Oh Viṣṇu, all this happened because of the greatness of the holy ashes. When the sage Durvāsas bent down to have a good look at the hell, particles of ashes from his body fell into the hell. From that moment onwards Kumbhīpākanaraaka became a holy place for the Manes. This hell will henceforth be known as Pitṛṭīrtha and those pitṛs who bathe in the holy pond there will become virtuous people. Do install on the shore of this pond an idol of mine, a Śivalīṅga, and by my side the idol of Umā, which is my power in an embodied form.” The devas returned and did as they were directed.

PITRVAROTTI. See under Brahmādatta I.

PIVĀRĪ. Wife of Sukrabhmārsi, son of Vyāsa. Suka got of Pivārī four sons named Kṛṣṇa, Gauraprabha, Bhārī and Devaśruta and a daughter named Kīrtī. (See under Suka).

PLAKSADVĪPA. One of the seven dvīpas (islands). (See under Saptadvīpa.)

PLAKSAJĀTĀ. A tributary of river Gaṅgā. It is believed that this river is an incarnation of Sarasvatī and that the sins of those who drink the water of this river will vanish. (Chpter 169, Adi Parva).

PLAKSAPRAŚRAMANATĪRTHA. The place of origin of the river Sarasvatī. This is a very holy place. (Sloka 11, Chapter 54, Salya Parva).

PLAKSĀVATARAṆA. A sacred spot at the place of origin of Yamunā. The ancient people of Bhārata used to worship this place as a gate of Heaven. (Sloka 4, Chapter 90, Vana Parva).

PLAKSĀVATI. A river. This is referred to as a holy river in the Purāṇas. (Sloka 25, Chapter 165, Anuśāsana Parva).

PLAKSĀYANA. A Vaiyākaraṇa (grammarians). His opinion on Visarga sandhi (a point in grammar) is described in Taityīyaprāptiśākyā. POTAKA. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 103, Udhyoga Parva).

PRABĀHU. A brave soldier who fought against the Pāndavas on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle of Kurukṣetra. He showered arrows on Abhimanyu. (Chapter 37, Drona Parva).

PRABĀLAKA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa sat in the court of Kubera and worshipped him. (Sloka 17, Chapter 10, Śanti Parva).

PRABHĀ I. A devī. This devī sits in the court of Brahmā worshipping him. (Chapter 11, Śanti Parva).

PRABHĀ II. A celestial maiden of Alakāpurī. Once when the sage Aṣṭāvakra went to Alakāpurī this maiden gave a dance performance in his honour. (Sloka 45, Chapter 19, Anu śāsana Parva).

PRABHĀ III. Daughter of a dānava called Svarbhānu. She was married to king Ayus and Ayus begot of her sons like Nahuṣa and others (Brahmānda Purāṇa, 3—6—26).

PRABHĀ IV. One of the two wives of King Puspārṇa, (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).
PRABHADRĀ. Wife of the son of Karṇa, King of Aṅga. She is called Bhadrāvati also. (Jaimini Bhārata, Āvamedha Parva, Chapter 63.)

PRABHADRĀKA. A special division of the army of Pāṇḍālaṅkāra. This division comprises of Kṣatriyas and Sāhāṇḍu's were its leaders. During the Kurukṣetra battle Salya slew many of the Prabhadrakas. The rest of the Prabhadrakas were killed by Āśvatthāma while they were sleeping. (Chapter 8, Saúptika Parva; Chapter 57, Udyoga Parva; Chapter 19, Bihīma Parva, Chapter 11, Salya Parva.)

PRABHĀKARA I. A serpent born of the race of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 15, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva.)

PRABHĀKARA II. A great sage born of the race of Atri. This sage married the ten daughters of Gṛṣṭācī born of Raundrāva (Bhadrāśva) of the family of Pāru. The names of the daughters are Rudrā, Sūdrā, Malādā, Bhadrā, Malāhā, Khaladā, Naladā, Surasī, Gocapalā and Striratnakūṭā.

Once when the Sun was in distress while he was being devoured by Rāhu, Sage Prabhākara said 'Svasti' to give salvation for the Sun and instantly the Sun came out from Rāhu's hold and shone brightly as before. It was as a result of this virtuous deed that the sage got the name Prabhākara. By his great knowledge and eminence he kept glowing the fame of Atriureka earned by generations.

Sage Prabhākara conducted a Yāga and on the occasion the devas presented him with great wealth and ten sons (Harivanśa, 1. 81-8.17).

PRABHĀKARA III. The sixth division of the land of Kuśadvipa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 12, Bihīma Parva.)

PRABHĀNJANA I. The first son of Citravāhana, king of Manipura. Citravāhana who was without a son for a long time did penance for obtaining a son. Siva was pleased with his penance and he blessed him and assured him of a son soon. (Sloka 29, Chapter 214, Ādi Parva.)

PRABHĀNJANA II. A king. He performed Siva-worship for ten thousand years and attained Dīkṣālakatva. The name of his son was Pūtātāma. (Skanda Purāṇa, 41, 13.)

PRABHĀNJANA III. A Kṣatriya king. Once this king killed a deer while it was breast-feeding its child and by a curse of the mother-deer Prabhānjana had to live as a tiger for a hundred years. When the period of the curse was coming to an end, the tiger heard the advice of a cow called Nandā and got himself transformed into his original form of the king. (Chapter 18, Śrīṣṭī Khanaḍa, Padma Purāṇa.)

PRABHĀNU. A son born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa of his wife Satyabhāmā. (10th Sandhya, Bhāgavata.)

PRABHĀSA I. A son born to Dharmadeva of his wife Prabhātī. This Prabhāsa is considered to be one of the aṣṭavasus. Prabhāsa's wife was the sister of Bhṛpasi, a widely travelled virtuous woman of renowned chastity and great yogic attainments. (Sloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva; Chapter 15, Amā, 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa.)

PRABHĀSA II. The sacred place called Prabhāsatīra. This place of Purānic importance is situated in Saurāṣṭra on the west coast. This is called Somatīra also. Some facts about this tirtha from the Purāṇas are given below:

(i) During the pilgrimage of Arjuna he did penance for a thousand divine years standing on one foot at Prabhāsa. (Sloka 15, Chapter 12, Vana Parva).

(ii) Agnideva resides in this place. One who bathes in the holy pond there will get the benefit of doing Agniśāya in Vaṇa Parva. (Sloka 58, Chapter 82, Vana Parva).

(iii) Once Yudhisṭhira along with his brothers came and did penance here. (Sloka 13, Chapter 110, Vana Parva).

(iv) Prabhāsatīra is dear to Indra. (Sloka 7, Chapter 130, Vana Parva).

(v) Those who bathe in the holy pond in Prabhāsa are taken to heaven in Viṃāṇas and they then by songs of praise wake up the celestial maidens there. (Sloka 9, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vi) It was at this Prabhāsatīra that the Yādavas fought against one another and destroyed themselves. (Sloka 10, Chapter 3, Māusala Parva).

(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma merged with the Supreme spirit at this place. (Chapter 4, Māusala Parva).

(viii) The son of sage Śāndipani was kidnapped by Paṇcājana while the former was bathing at this tirtha. (10th Sandhya, Bhāgavata).

(ix) It was while standing on the shore of the Prabhāsa pond that Arjuna first heard about Subhādṛa, (10th Sandhya, Bhāgavata).

PRABHĀTA. See under Śṛṣṭi.

PRABHĀTĪ. Wife of Dharmadeva. Dharmadeva begot of her two sons named Pratyūṣa and Prabhāsa. Both were Vasis. (Sloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva.)

PRABHĀVATĪ. A woman who was engaged in penance at the abode of Maṇḍapura. One of the batches of monkeys that went to different places in search of Sītā met Prabhāvati. (Sloka 4, Chapter 282, Vana Parva.)

PRABHĀVATĪ II. The wife of Śrīyadeva. (Sloka 8, Chapter 117, Udyoga Parva.)

PRABHĀVATĪ III. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 3, Chapter 46, Sal a Parva.)

PRABHĀVATĪ IV. Wife of Citaratha, king of Aṅga. This Prabhāvatī was the eldest sister of Ruci, wife of Devārāma. (Sloka 8, Chapter 42, Anuśāsana Parva.)

PRABHĀVATĪ V. Daughter of the demon Vajranābha. She was married to Pradyumna, son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. There was once a very valiant demon called Vajranābha. He went into the valley of Meru and performed penance to propitiate Brahmā. Brahmā appeared before him and he got from him boons such as strength to conquer and subdue all kings, the secret of leaving the body and entering that of others etc. Empowered with these boons he made Vajranābhapura his capital. He got a daughter named Prabhāvati. His brother Sunābha had two daughters named Candramati and Gunavatī.

While he was thus living there, he set out on a campaign of victory. He conquered the whole world and then turned his eyes towards Svarga. Going to Indraloka he told his son: 'Hi, son of Kaśyapa, I am also born of Kaśyapa. Your mother Ādi and my mother Dīti are both wives of Kaśyapyaprajāpati. You ruled over Svarga till this time. Now, let me rule over it for some time.' Indra was embarrassed by this logical challenge and could not give any reply to him. Kaśyapaprajāpati was then performing a long Yāga and Indra replied he would find a solution to his demand when their father returned after the Yāga. From that moment onwards Indra started thinking of plans to destroy Vajranābha. He went and sought help from Śrī Kṛṣṇa residing in Dvārakā. Kṛṣṇa promised to help him when the time came.
After returning to Devaloka, Indra started planning to kill Vajranābha. Vajranābhapūrṇi was surrounded by sky-scraping fortresses and admission inside was restricted. He, therefore, called the gaily loitering swans of Devaloka to his side and told them thus: “Look here, swan—ladies. You should go to Vajranābhapūrṇi and see Prabhāvatī and then describe to her the beauty and goodness of Pradyumna. Your description should be such that Prabhāvatī should fall in love with Pradyumna. After that you should go to Pradyumna and tell him about Prabhāvatī in a similar way. On completing your mission you should come and report to me.”

Obeying the orders of Indra the swans flew to Vajranābhapūrṇi. They saw Prabhāvatī in a secluded spot and told her just what they were asked to tell them. Then they flew to the side of Pradyumna and told him about Prabhāvatī. After successfully completing their mission they flew to Devaloka. The marriage day of Prabhāvatī drew near. The swans went to Prabhāvatī again and made her request her father to include the performances of a dramatic troupe also in the programme of marriage festivities. Vajranābha agreed and a troupe was invited. The dramatic troupe comprised among others many Yādava soldiers, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Pradyumna and his brothers, all in disguise. Their drama was Rāma-yāyaṇa. The performance was superb and even Vajranābha stood amazed at their skill. The troupe was encamped in another palace and treated as royal guests. The companionship of Prabhāvatī, Śūcinukhī, united her with Pradyumna during the dark hours of the night and they spent the nights in amorous sports. The daughters of Vajranābha’s brother, Candravatī and Guṇavatī came to know of these secret meetings and they requested Prabhāvatī to find out suitable persons among the Yādavas for them also to enjoy with. Prabhāvatī introduced them to Gada and Sāmbara both sons of Kṛṣṇa. The amorous sports of all of them continued freely during the nights.

When things progressed so far, Indra and Kṛṣṇa persuaded Pradyumna to kill Vajranābha. Pradyumna started a war with Vajranābha and in the great battle that ensued Pradyumna killed Vajranābha. Prabyumna and his brothers then took the demon girls to Dwārakā. Pradyumna, Gada and Sāmbara married Prabhāvatī, Candravatī and Guṇavatī respectively. By this time Kaśyapaprajapāti returned to Devaloka after his long yāga. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Chapters 91 to 95).

PRABHU. A soldier of Subhrāmanya. (Śloka 69, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRABUDDHA. A king born of the line of Priyavrata, son of Manu. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRACANDA. A demon. Pracança fought against Kārttikeya in the fight between Pāramāśrīva and the Tripurās. (Chapter 1, Ganeśa Purāṇa).

PRACETAS. The emperor Prthu, had two virtuous sons named Antardhāna and Vādī. Antardhāna got a son named Harihārana of his wife Śikhandinī. Dhiśanā of the race of Agni became the wife of Harihārana. She got of Harihārana six sons named Pracinabharis, Sukra, Gaya, Kṛṣṇa, Vṛaja and Ajina. (Chapter 14, Aṇiśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa). Pracinabharis had ten sons named Pracetas. They were Prajāpatis. Dakaś was born of the ten Prajāpatis to Vārkiśa alias Māriśa. Therefore he got the name Pracetas. (Śloka 5, Chapter 75, Aṇiśa Parva).

PRACINĀVITA. Wearing of an upper apparel or sacred thread by brahmmins on the left shoulder and through the right arm-pit is called Upavita and vice versa is called Pracināvita. If it is worn as a necklace it is called Nivita. (Chapter 2, Śloka 63, Manusmṛti).

PRACINABARHIS. A prajāpati. (For genealogy see under Prthu).

Prthu got two sons named Antardhāna and Vādī who were very virtuous. A son named Havirdhāna was born to Antardhāna of his wife Śikhandinī. Dhiśanā born of the family of Agni became the wife of Havirdhāna and they got six sons named Pracinabharis, Sukra, Gaya, Kṛṣṇa, Vṛaja and Ajina. Of these Pracina- barhis became a great Prajāpati. He carpeted the world with darbha grass with its head turned towards the east and thus got the name (Pracī-east; barhis-bed of Kuśa grass) Pracinabharis. He performed great penance and married Savarṇa, daughter of the oceans. They got ten sons who were called Pracetas and who were all masters of dhanurveda (archery). They all performed penance for ten thousand years lying submerged in water. Brahma persuaded Pracinabharis to request his sons to refrain from remaining unmarried. Pracinabharis informed his sons about Brahma's wish. They sat in meditation in the ocean for ten thousand years as per directions from their father and sang songs in praise of Viṣṇu. Mahāvīṣṇu was pleased and he gave dārśana (vision of god) to them on the surface of the ocean itself with the brilliance of blue lotus. Pracetas went into ecstasy when they saw Bhagavān coming to them riding on the back of Garuḍa and they bowed down in great devotion before him. Mahāvīṣṇu asked them what they wanted and they reported they wanted a boon for the progress and prosperity of the prajās. Granting them the boon Mahāvīṣṇu disappeared and the Pracetas went back to their father. (Chapter 14, Aṇiśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRACINVAS. A king who was the son of Janamejaya and grandson of Pūrū. His mother's name was Anantā. This king conquered in one day all the countries in the east (pračī) and got his name Pracinvās. He got of his wife Āsmāki a son named Satyāyati. (Śloka 12, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva). Pracinvās got a son named Manasyu. (Chapter 278, Agni Purāṇa).

PRACYĀ. A place of habitation of Purānic fame. (Śloka 58, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRADATĀ. Viśvadeva. (Śloka 32, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRADIPA. A character in Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

PRADHANA. An ancient Rajarṣi. A learned woman named Sulabha was born in his family and king Janaka conducted scholarly discussions with her. (Śloka 184, Chapter 320, Śānti Parva).

PRADOṢA. The grandson of Dhrūva. Pūṣpārṇa, son of Dhrūva, begot of his wife Prabha three sons named Pradoṣa, Nīśthā and Vyūṣṭā. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

PRADVEŚ. Wife of Dirghatamas. (See under Dirgha- tamaš).

PRADYOTA I. A Yakṣa. He was a member of the court of Kubera. (Śloka 15, Chapter 10, Śānti Parva).

PRADYOTA II. The first king of the dynasty of Pradyota. He was the son of a king called Śunaka. Pradyota is referred to as Śunakaputra in Vāyu Purāṇa.
Kṣemaka alias Šamaka father of Pradyota was killed by Mlecchas (a barbarous tribe). To avenge the death of his father Pradyota under the advice of Nārada decided to conduct a Mleccha Yajña and for that purpose dug a Yajñāṅkuṇḍa seventeen miles long and seventeen miles wide. The Yajñāṅkuṇḍa started and in that Yajñāṅkuṇḍa different kinds of Mlecchas were burnt to death. From then onwards Pradyumna got the name ‘Mlecchahantā’ (killer of Mlecchas). (Bhāvīṣya Purāṇa).

PRADYUMNA

1) General information. A son born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa of his wife Rukminī, Pradyumna was the rebirth of Kāmadeva. (For genealogy see under Kṛṣṇa).

2) Birth. It was at the time when Kāmadeva and Ratidevi were living together that Pārvatī, daughter of Himavān, started her penance to get Śiva as her husband. It was a need of the devas to get a son of Śiva to kill the fierce demon Tārakāsura. The devas employed Kāmadeva to create feelings of love in the ascetic Śiva and make him marry Pārvatī. Taking instructions from Indra, Kāmadeva took aim at Śiva with his bow and arrow. Śiva was then in deep meditation and Kāmadeva broke his concentration and Śiva got angry. He opened his third eye and burnt Kāmadeva to death.

Griefstricken by the death of her husband Ratidevi performed penance near the Himālayas to propitiate Mahādevi. Mahādevi appeared before her and consoled her thus: “Little girl, Kāmadeva would be reborn as the son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa of Rukminī. He would then be named Pradyumna. The devas have cursed Śambara the leader of the asuras, during the battle between the demons and the demi-gods that he (Śambara) would be killed by Pradyumna. So Śambara is now searching for the infant which is a rebirth of Kāmadeva. So you abandon your present body and be born again as Māyāvati to be the wife of Śambara. Pradyumna, the reborn Kāmadeva, would kill Śambara and accept you as his wife.” Devī disappeared after saying this.

Obeying the instructions of Mahādevi, Rati abandoned her life and was born in the world of asuras. She grew up under the name Māyāvati and became the wife of Śambara.

While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was living as the chief of Dvārakā his first wife Rukminī was yearning for a child. Kṛṣṇa was deeply moved by the grief of Rukminī and he flew on the back of Garuḍa to Kailāsa to obtain a boon for the birth of a child for her. On the way he alighted in the āśrama of Naranārāyaṇas and after obtaining the blessings of the sages there, went to Kailāsa and bowed before Śiva and explained to him the purpose of his visit. Śiva blessed him and said that Kāmadeva who was burnt to death by the fire of his third eye would take birth again as the son of Rukminī. Kṛṣṇa returned to Dvārakā well-pleased, Rukminī became pregnant and gave birth to Pradyumna, a rebirth of Kāmadeva. The demon Śambara knew of this birth and coming to Dvārakā in an invisible form carried away the infant when it was seven days old.

The demon threw the child into the ocean and a great fish swallowed it. The fishermen of the country of Śambara caught this fish and following the custom prevalent there presented the king with the fish. Śambara called his wife Māyāvati and asked her to take the fish and get it cooked. When Māyāvati cut open the fish for cooking she found to her surprise a beautiful child inside it. Even from the first sight of the child Māyāvati had a great liking for it and so she took the child and brought it up as her own child.

When Pradyumna grew into a youth all the charm and beauty of Kāmadeva were found in him. Māyāvati was excited to find a resemblance in him of her lost husband Kāmadeva. One day the great sage Nārada came that way and calling Māyāvati to his side secretly revealed to her that Pradyumna was the incarnation of Kāmadeva and was thus her lost husband. From that day onwards Māyāvati's affection for him changed into one of love. She taught him all the magic and witchcraft of Śambara. When Pradyumna found that Māyāvati's affection for him was gradually changing into one of passionate love he questioned her about it. Māyāvati then told him everything that happened and Pradyumna decided to kill Śambara and take Māyāvati away.

3) War with Śambara. Pradyumna waited for an opportunity to kill Śambara. One day Pradyumna went under the flagstaff of Śambara which flew the royal flag of the king with an emblem of the figure of a lion embossed on it. He dropped it down by one stroke of his arrow. Hearing of this Śambara ordered his sons to kill Pradyumna. The eleven sons of Śambara, viz., Ātiśena, Ciśasena, Viśvakṣena, Śrutasena, Suśena, Somasena, Akkāla, Vikala, Kumbhaketa, Sudarśa and Kesī, attacked Pradyumna. The devas came in their vimānas and joined sides with Pradyumna. The army of the demons teased him with various kinds of weapons like javelins, arrows, spears and battle axes. But Pradyumna cut them all by his arrows and cut to pieces all the sons of Śambara. Then Śambara sent an army against him. They were also made to flee by the arrows of Pradyumna. Then Śambara himself came on the scene. The fight became horrible. The continuous flow of arrows made it impossible for even Sun's rays to reach the earth. Then Śambara started his magical war. But Pradyumna faced that also. Śambara sent phantom lions; but Pradyumna made them immobile. Śambara then in turn created storms, rains, wild animals, serpents and vultures. All of them were killed by Pradyumna. Then with a well-aimed arrow Pradyumna killed Śambara. Then he rushed to Dvārakā carrying Māyāvati with him. The people of Dvārakā were astounded to see them. Pradyumna went to Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Rukminī and told them the whole story. They were overjoyed to find them and blessed them.

Aniruddha who married Uṣā the daughter of Bāṇa was the son of Pradyumna. (Chapters 103 to 108, 10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) Prabhāvatīparinaya. Marriage with Prabhāvatī. (See under Prabhāvatī).

5) Other details.

(i) Pradyumna was born of a part of Sanatkumāra. (Sloka 152, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Pradyumna was one among those who came to Arjuna from Dvārakā with dowry for his marriage with Subhadra. (Sloka 31, Chapter 220, Ādi Parva).

(iii) Pradyumna was present for the Rājasūya Yajña of Yudhīśthira. (Sloka 16, Chapter 34, Sabhā Parva).

(iv) Pradyumna consoled and encouraged the Yādava army which stood dumb-founded before the valorous exploits of King Sālva. (Chapter 17, Vana Parva).

(v) Pradyumna fainted during a fierce fight between himself and King Sālva. (Chapter 17, Śloka 22, Vana Parva).

(vi) Pradyumna slew King Sālva in the end. (Chapter 19, Vana Parva).

(vii) Pradyumna means the merging of Bhūtajāla during Pralaya. (Śloka 37, Chapter 340, Śānti Parva).

(viii) Pradyumna fell dead by the beatings of the Bhojas during the Mausala fight. (Śloka 33, Chapter 3, Mausala Parva).

(ix) After his death Pradyumna took the form of Sanatkumāra. (Śloka 13, Chapter 3, Svargārohāṇa Parva).

PRĀGAHĪ. A preceptor. He has expressed his views on Yajñas in the book Sāṅkhya-yāna Brahmaṇa. Prāgaḥī describes what should be done in case any of the Karmans is left out by mistake during a Yajña. (Sāṅkhya-yāna Brahmaṇa).

PRAGHĀSĀ I. A rākṣaśī (demoness). She was one among the several leading demonesses who sat around Śītā in Lankā to coax her into accepting Rāvaṇa as her husband. An ill-tempered woman, this demoness tried several methods to win Śītā to the side of Rāvaṇa. (Sarga 23, Sundara Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRAGHĀSĀ II. A female follower of Subrahmāṇya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PRAGHOSA(S). A tribe of rākṣasas (demons). (Chapter 283, Vana Parva).

PRAGHOSA. A son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (10th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

PRĀGJYOTISA. The palace of Narakāsura, Narakāsura was known as Bhumāsura also. After the death of this asura Bhagadatta became king there. After Bhagadatta Vairadatta became ruler there. Prāgjyotīṣa was an invincible fortress of the asuras. (Chapter 23, Verse 28, Sañcā Parva; Chapter 48, Udyoga Parva and Chapter 75, Adbhutā Parvā).

PRAHĀSA I. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PRAHĀSA II. A soldier of Subrahmāṇya. (Śloka 68, Chapter 43, Śalya Parva).

PRAHASTA. A minister of Rāvaṇa.

The demon Śuceśa got of his wife Devavatī three sons named Māliyavan, Sumāli and Māli. Of these Sumāli got of his wife Ketaumati ten sons named Praḥasta, Akampana, Vīkata, Kalākāmukha, Dhumārakṣa, Dāṇḍa, Supārśva, Sanhrādha, Prakāvata and Bhāskakarpa and four daughters named Vekā, Puspotkaṭa, Kaikaśi and Kumbhīṇaśī. Most of the sons were the ministers of Rāvaṇa.

2) Other details.

(i) Praḥasta was the chief minister of Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

(ii) In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Praḥasta fought against Vibhīṣana and was killed by the latter. (Śloka 4, Chapter 286, Vana Parva).

PRAHETI I. A demon. Once Brahmā, the creator, became hungry and in his anger he produced some sounds which became Rākṣasas and Yakṣas. When one said “Rākṣaśeke” the rākṣasas (demons) came into being and when the other said ‘Yakṣaśeke’ the Yakṣas came into being. It was Praḥeti who became the father of the rākṣasas and Heti, the father of the Yakṣas. Both of them became mighty and powerful like Madhu and Kaitabha. Of these Praḥeti knew that only by virtuous life could one attain happiness in the next world and so remaining unmarried went to the valley of the Himalayas and doing penance there attained mokṣa. Heti when he came of age married Bhayā, sister of Kāla, and got a son named Viduyuteśa. Viduyuteśa married Sālakaṭāṅkā, daughter of Sāndhyā. The rākṣasa race born of them lived in Pātāla and Lankā. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle all were killed.

PRAHETI II. A demon. This demon travels along with a Sūrya named Aryaman during the month of Vaiśākha (May). (12th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

PRAHLĀDA I.

1) General information. Son of a rākṣas King who saw Mahāviṣṇu by means of his devotion in the form of Narāsins (man-lion). His father was Hiranyakaṣipu and mother Kayādhū.

2) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu—Brahmā—Marici—Kṣaṭyapa—Hiranyakaṣipu—Prahlāda.

3) Birth. Kaśyapaprajāpati got of his wife Diti two sons named Hiranyakaṣa and Hiranyakaṣipu and a daughter named Siṁhikā. Of these two, Hiranyakaṣa got boons from Brahmā and roamed about as a very valiant hero destroying everything on earth and finally pulling down the earth to the depths of the ocean. Mahāviṣṇu then incarnated as Varāha and after killing Hiranyakaṣa lifted the earth from the ocean and put it in its original position.

Hiranyakaṣipu became very angry at Mahāviṣṇu for killing his brother and with a view to wreaking vengeance on him performed penance to propitiate Brahmā. When the emperor of the demons, Hiranyakaṣipu, thus went to the forests for performing penance the Devas attacked the land of the demons. A great fight ensued in which the devas were defeated. While fleeing away thus Indra took away Kayādhū wife of Hiranyakaṣipu by force. Nārada who heard the moanings of the poor woman under the clutches of Indra got her released from Indra’s hold. For some time she stayed in the āśrama of Nārada worshipping him. Kayādhū was pregnant then. Nārada taught the child in Kayādhū’s womb lessons in Vedas, moral philosophy, duty and spiritual knowledge. When Hiranyakaṣipu returned after his penance Kayādhū joined him and very soon gave birth to a son. That boy was Prahlāda. Hiranyakaṣipu begot of Kayādhū five sons, Prahlāda, Satīlālā, Anuḥlādā, Śibi and Bāskala. Prahlāda got three sons named Virocana, Kumbha and Nikumbha. The celebrated emperor Mahābali was the son of Virocana. Bāṇa was the son of Mahābali. Uṣa, daughter of Bāṇa, was married to Aniruddha, son of Pradyumna and grandson of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 65, Adi Parva; Chapter 19, Agni Purāṇa; Chapter 13, Amśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa and 7th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

4) Boyhood and education. Hiranyakaṣipu decided to make Prahlāda an instrument to wreak vengeance on Mahāviṣṇu. Entrusting the education of his son to

When he taken from him before altogether. Prahlada stood visnu himself. A hot discussion then took place between Prahlada and his father and in the end Hiranyakasipu ordered the preceptor to take away Prahlada and make another earnest attempt to correct him and bring him round to the emperor's liking. Prahlada stayed for another period with the Guru serving him with devotion and studying well. After a long time Prahlada was again taken before his father and the latter as before asked him to repeat what he had studied so far. To the shocking disappointment of Hiranyakasipu Prahlada again repeated verses in praise of Mahāviṣṇu. The emperor's rage knew no bounds and he ordered his men to kill his son. (Chapter 17, Aṇīṣa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

5) Torturing Prahlāda. On hearing the order of Hiranyakasipu many armed soldiers surrounded Prahlāda. Prahlāda addressed them thus: "Oh dāityas, Mahāviṣṇu resides in your weapons, in you all and in me also. Since that is the real truth your weapons will not injure me." The dāityas struck him hard with their weapons but Prahlāda did not feel pain at all. Hiranyakasipu then sent thousands of poisonous serpents led by great ones like Taksaka. When they started thrusting their venomous fangs into his body, Prahlāda stood cheerfully meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and he did not even feel the bitings. On the other hand the fangs of the serpents dropped out from their mouths and the gems on the heads of the big ones burst out and all the snakes felt sorry for their action.

Hiranyakasipu then sent the aṣṭadīggajas (the eight elephants who bear the burden of this earth) to kill Prahlāda. The huge animals bigger than the biggest of mountains threw the boy to the ground and struck him with their long and pointed tusks. Prahlāda lay meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and the tusks that hit the body of Prahlāda were broken to bits. Prahlāda was then thrown into a pit of fire. But the wind-blown ferocious fire was not able to burn him and as he lay in the fire-pit meditating on Mahāviṣṇu he felt he was lying on a bed of lotuses.

When things progressed so far the astonished priests of the palace advised the emperor to put a stop to torturwhile Prahlāda was repeating his chantings of Viṣṇu's name Hiranyakaśipu jumped up from his seat with sword in his hand and asked Prahlāda where his Viṣṇu was. Prahlāda very calmly replied that Viṣṇu was present everywhere even in stones, trees or the pillars of the palace. Hiranyakaśipu in uncontrollable rage struck the nearest pillar with his sword. Then to the shocking surprise of Hiranyakaśipu Mahāviṣṇu in the form of a fierce man-lion (Narasiṁha) jumped out from the pillar. The figure was terrifying to look at. It had fiery eyes, a dagger-like tongue with blood oozing from it, shaggy neck with trembling eyebrows, two teeth one on each side curved like the crescent moon, a black face inside a cave-like heap of manes, hairs strong and point- ed like diamond needles, nails white and cup-like and a body as bright and brilliant as a thousand crores of suns. Only Prahlāda could stand before the figure and look at it.

The man-lion jumped on the body of Hiranyakaśipu and tearing open the belly of Hiranyakaśipu took the bloody intestines out and wearing it round its neck performed a naked dance. Everything happened in no time and the Narasiṁha changing into the form of Mahāviṣṇu blessed Prahlāda and then disappeared.

(7th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

7) Prahlāda and Naraṇārāyaṇas. When Hiranyakaśipu was killed Prahlāda was crowned as emperor of the demons in Pātāla. At that time, once Cyavana the best of the Bhrigu, went to Nāgarakule-varatirtha to bathe in the Narmadā. He saw Mahādeva there. When he entered the waters of the river a serpent Keekarolahita by name bit him and took him to Pātāla. Cyavana meditated on Viṣṇu when he was bitten by the serpent and so he was not affected by the poison of the serpent. He therefore, roamed about in Pātāla accepting the hospitality of the serpent maidens. Travelling thus he reached the land of the dānavas. He was worshipped by the dānavas there and Prahlāda finding an ascetic of great saintliness honoured and worshipped by his people received him with respect and worshipped him and Enquired about him. Cyavana said: "I came today to see Nāgarakuleśvara and bathe in the Narmadā river. But as soon as I entered the river I was caught by a serpent and was brought to Pātāla. I was thus able to see you." Hearing the words of Cyavana the lord of the dānavas said: "Oh, Bhagavan, which are all the sacred tirthas of the earth, which are in the heavens and which all in Pātāla? Please do enlighten us." Cyavana replied: "Mighty king, Naimiśa is the best of all tirthas on earth, Puṣkara in the heavens and Cakratirtha in Pātāla."

The dānaya emperor turned to the dānavas and said "Make all preparations immediately. We must go to earth to bathe in the holy tirtha, Naimiśa. We can then see Puṣadariṅkāśa (lotus-eyed) Viṣṇu sitting there as Pātāmbāra (robed in yellow)." Hearing this dānavas with heavy equipments started from Pātāla with their king to the earth.

All the mighty dānavas reached the forest of Naimiśa and after bathing in the holy pond there went for hunting. During their wanderings they found the river Saravati, flowing with crystal-like water. On the shore of the same they saw a pine tree covered with arrows. The arrows were sticking to it one above another. The arrows looked like serpents and the gruesomely sight roused Prahlāda's anger. Near that tree sat two ascetics wearing the hide of Kṛṣṇa deer and matted hair on their heads. By their side were two divine bows, Sārīga and Ajagava with two never-empty quivers. Prahlāda mistook them for two fake sannyāsins and therefore questioned them thus: "Why are you thus falsely trading on virtuousness? What connection is there between matted hair and penance and weapons of such supreme quality?" Then one of the rṣis, Naraṇa, said "King of dānavas, why do you think like that? If one is powerful whatever one does will be right." Prahlāda jeered and said "When I, who have fixed limits for virtue and righteousness, am here what power can you wield?" Naraṇa replied "Oh king, our ability is really supreme. There is nobody in the three worlds to conquer us in a fight." Prahlāda got furious on hearing the boasting of the rṣi and took a vow thereby: "I will fight and win against Naraṇārāyaṇas." Then the great Prahlāda keeping aside his army in the forest took his bow and made a thundering noise with it.

At once Nara took his Ajagava bow and showered arrows on Prahlāda with it. But Prahlāda broke them all with his gold-plated matchless arrows. Nara got angry when he found all his arrows broken to pieces so easily by Prahlāda and he sent different kinds of arrows in quick succession. But the dānaya king replied with astonishing rapidity, for one arrow of Nara the dānaya sent two and the fight became grim. Nara covered the whole world above with arrows and the dānaya emperor smashed them all to pieces by his gold-plated ones. The fight then turned to one with divine weapons. The asura chief took the divine Brahmāstra and then Nara took the fierce Nārāyaṇāstra. They met in the air and fell down powerless. When his Brahmāstra got fused Prahlāda got wild with anger and taking a mace jumped out of his chariot and rushed at Nara. When Nārāyaṇa saw the dānaya chief rushing towards Nara with his mace he asked Nara to step aside and faced the demon himself. Prahlāda then attacked Nārāyaṇa and hit him with the mace. But the mace broke into a hundred pieces and Prahlāda was forced to use other weapons. The fight became ghastly and even devas assembled above to witness the fight. When Prahlāda found it was getting more and more difficult for him to defeat the Naraṇārāyaṇas he prayed to Mahāviṣṇu for help. Viṣṇu appeared before him and when Prahlāda asked him the reason why he could not defeat Naraṇārāyaṇas, Viṣṇu replied that they were the sons of Dharmadeva who were invincible by weapons. They could be won over only by devotion.

Hearing that Prahlāda returned to Pātāla and entrusting the administration of his kingdom to his cousin Andhaka, son of Hiranyākṣa, Prahlāda returned to Badarkārāma and erecting an āśrama there started a penance to propitiate Naraṇārāyaṇas. When Naraṇārāyaṇas appeared before him Prahlāda requested to be pardoned for fighting against them. They pardoned him and blessed him and Prahlāda returned to Pātāla. Even after his return Prahlāda did not take back the administration from Andhaka. He constructed an āśrama away from the palace and lived there performing penance. He spent many years there as an advisor to the asura Kings. (Chapters 7 and 8, Vāmana Purāṇa).

8) Blessings of Śakra. Andhaka, son of Hiranyākṣa, ruled over the empire only for a short time. At that time there was a fight between the asuras and the devas in which the asuras were defeated. After a truce with the devas Bali, son of Virocana, and grandson of Prahlāda was crowned the emperor of the asuras. Prahlāda then went to the mountain Gandhamādana and started doing penance to increase his personal power. Bali ruled as an antagonist of the devas and so very soon a grizzly battle ensued between the devas and the asuras and Mahāvisūṇa defeated them. They fled from their land and took refuge under their preceptor Śuṅkra. Śuṅkra then told them thus: “You remain here without fear. I shall protect you by my power of mantra and medicines. I shall devote my cogent brilliance to your advantage. It is enough if you remain here with full confidence in me.” The devas understood all these plans of the dāityas through spies and they met in conference to consider their future plans. They knew that Śuṅkra was very powerful and if the dāityas attacked them with the help of Śuṅkra the defeat of the devas was sure. They feared that they might even be compelled to flee from Svargaloka. How could the dāityas under the shield of the mighty Śuṅkra be destroyed? That was the worrying thought of the devas. They were thus worrying about this when Śuṅkra appeared to propitiate Śiva and Śiva appeared before Śuṅkra and when he knew that the purpose of Śuṅkra was to defeat the devas he was a bit embarrassed. So he told him thus: “Oh sage Śuṅkra, you take a vow and do penance with your head downwards over smoky incense for a thousand years. You will then attain power and happiness as you desire.” In fact Śiva thought Śuṅkra might not be able to complete the penance and so not succeed in his plan of destroying the devas. But Śuṅkra started the penance in right earnest. The devas were frightened when they knew the deceit of the dāityas and the strategy of their preceptor. They decided to go to war with the dāityas immediately. The dāityas were in a fix. They knew that if they fought without the help of their guru defeat to them was sure. So they ran to the mother of Śuṅkra and sought her help. The devas rebelled against Śuṅkra's mother and she invoked the goddess of sleep and put all the devas into deep slumber. Mahāvisūṇa stealthily carried away Indra lying asleep. Indra persuaded Mahāvisūṇa to kill Śuṅkra's mother and he cut off the head of Śuṅkra's mother by the divine discus, Sudarśana.

Bṛghu-mahārsī, father of Śuṅkra, was angry at that arrogant and cruel deed of Mahāvisūṇa and cursed him saying that he would be born on earth several times as man. After that he brought to life by sprinkling water his wife lying dead with her head severed from her body. Knowing well the havoc that would be created when Śuṅkra came back after his penance Indra sent his daughter Jayantī to destroy the penance of Śuṅkra. She went in the guise of a demon girl to serve Śuṅkra. In the meantime at the request of Indra Bṛhspatī took the form of Śuṅkra and presented himself before the dāityas. The dāityas believed him to be their real guru Śuṅkra and were pleased.

Ten years went by and one day Śuṅkra remembered the old events left Jayantī and went to his court in the demon land. Bṛhspatī had by that time returned to devaloka fully satisfied with his mission. The devas not knowing that Śuṅkra had returned started for a war with the dāityas. Śuṅkra when he came back went wild when he knew that his people had been worshipping Bṛhspatī for ten years. The angered preceptor was not to be pacified by any amount of arguments and so they sent Prahlāda to Śuṅkra and Prahlāda pleaded for controlling his anger and Śuṅkra did so. Śuṅkra then saw with his divine vision the maneuverings in mind of the devas and was convinced that a war with the devas at that juncture would be an utter failure. So he advised the dāityas to desist from war and assured them that during the period of Sāvarṇī Manu to come, emperor Bali would become all-powerful and he would then fight and win the devas. Prahlāda returned and told the asuras the message of Śuṅkra. But the dāityas were not satisfied and compelled Prahlāda to go to war with the devas. At last Prahlāda was forced to agree and a fierce deva-asura battle ensued. Prahlāda met Indra in a single combat and it prolonged for a hundred years. In the end Prahlāda won. Indra prayed to the goddess and fearing that she might destroy the demon world, Prahlāda also prayed to her. The devi was pleased with both of them and she pacified them both and each went back to his own place. (4th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

9) Other details.
(i) Once there was a fight between Prahlāda and Kāla. (Bhavisya Parva, Chapter 59).
(ii) Bali who was trampled down to Pātāla built a Viṣṇu temple and worshipped Viṣṇu following the advice of Prahlāda. (See under Bali).
(iii) Once Prahlāda taught Indra the rules of good conduct. (Śloka 28, Chapter 124: Sāntī Parva).
(iv) Once UŚanas sang in honour of Prahlāda. (Śloka 50, Chapter 139, Sāntī Parva).
(v) Once Prahlāda learnt the importance of Ājagara-vṛtī from a sage. (Chapter 179, Sāntī Parva).
(vi) During the reign of emperor Prthu when the goddess of earth (Bhūmidevi) was milked, the asuras used Prahlāda as the calf to milk madya (wine) from her. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).
(vii) Prahlāda sits in the court of Varūṇa and worships him. (Śloka 12, Chapter 9, Sahā Parva).
(viii) Prahlāda once went to the court of Brahmā to worship him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 11, Sahā Parva).
(ix) Prahlāda acted as mediator in the controversy between Virocana and Sudhanvā. (See under Sudhanvā).
(For knowing more details about Prahlāda please see under Virocana and Bali.)
PRAHUTA. A great yajña.
Manusmṛti states that respecting each of the following five is considered as a yajña in itself:—A devātā, a guest, servants, parents and the self. Of these the first is called Ahuta, second, huta, third, prahuta, fourth brahmāhuta and fifth, prāśīta (Slokas 72, 73, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

PRAJĀGARĀ. A celestial lady. Once when Arjuna went to the court of Indra this celestial maiden gave performance in dance at the request of Indra. (Sloka 30, Chapter 45, Vana Parva).

PRAJĀGARAPARVA. A sub-division of Udyoga Parva of Mahābhārata. This comprises chapters 33 to 40 of Udyoga Parva.

PRAJĀNGHA. A rākṣasa (demon) of the party of Rāvana. This demon was killed by Āṅgada. (Sarga 76, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRAJĀPATI(S). Creators of the world. With a view to making creation easy Brahmā at first created twentyone Prajāpatis (creators). They are Brahmā, Rudra, Manu, Dakṣa, Bṛhari, Dharma, Tapā, Yama, Marici, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasishtha, Paraṁṛṣi, Sūrya, Candras, Kardama, Krodha and Viśkṛta. (Chapter 384, Śanti Parva).

PRAJĀPATIVEDĪ. This is a holy place situated in the middle of four sacred places in Kurukṣetra named Tarantuka, Arantuca, Parasurāmakūnda and Macakrūka. This place is called the Uṭtarā (north) vedī of Prajāpati also. Besides this, four other places, Pratishānāpurī (with Prayāga), Kambala, Aśvatara and Bhogavatī are called Prajāpativedīs. The aforesaid five sacred places are called Brahmavedīs also. (Chapter 53, Salya Parva; Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

PRAJĀPATYA. A kind of marriage.
Sahabhau caratāṁ dharmamiti vācāṁbhāṣya ca/ Kanyāparamānaṁbhāyarca/ Prajayatayo vidhiṁ śrītah / (Sloka 30, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

Giving in marriage to a brahmacāri one’s daughter after inviting him to his house and worshipping him is called Prajayatya.

PRAKĀLA. A serpent born of the family of Vāśuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpaśatra of Janamejaya. (Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PRAKĀSA. A brahmin born of the family of Bṛhari. He was the son of Tamas who belonged to the race of Grīṣamada. (Sloka 63, Chapter 30, Anuśasana Parva).

PRAKKOSALA. The place east of Kosala. Sahadeva conquered this place situated in Daśśīnabhārata (Sloka 13, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).

PRAKRĀTA. A Yāka. He became very rich within twelve days. (Sloka 19, Chapter 194, Vana Parva).

PRAKRITI; PURUŚA. Prakṛti (matter) and Puruṣa (spirit) are two basic factors essential for production of the Prapāṇa (the visible world which is the scene of manifold action) as man and woman are for the production of progeny. From Puruṣa (male) Prakṛti (female) originated and then they together created the Prapāṇa. The Vedas and Puruṇās make statements everywhere regarding Prakṛti and Puruṣa and three of the most important ones are given below:

1) 'Pra' means 'principal' and 'Kṛti' means 'creation'. Therefore the word is meant to convey the meaning 'one that is the principal factor for creation'. 'Pra' means 'sattvic', 'Kṛ' means 'rajasic' and 'ta' means 'tāmasic' and the word 'Prakṛti' thus conveys the power of the three guṇas. 'Pra' means 'before' and 'Kṛti' means creation and so Prakṛti means that which existed before creation.

Before creation Prakṛti lay merged with the Supreme Spirit without separate existence. But when the desire for creation was aroused, this Supreme Spirit divided itself into Prakṛti and Puruṣa. Then the right half becomes 'Puruṣa' and the left half 'Pra'. Even though they are thus two yogindras (kings among sages) they see them as one (Tathāgata) as merged with the eternal One like fire and heat and assert the truth Sarvāṃ brahma-mayaṁ (everything is Brahman, the Supreme Spirit).

It was this basic Prakṛti that took forms as the five goddesses, Durgā, Lakṣmī, Sarasvatī, Śīvītī and Rādhā. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

2) Puruṣa is the vital sentient Truth that sets in action the entire Prapaṇa. This Puruṣa is Supreme among the Supreme, beyond human comprehension. Without form, colour, name, without origin, growth, change or end, residing in himself and that which can only be imagined to exist. This Puruṣa has got two different forms, the visible and the invisible and also a third imaginary one, time. The sages call Puruṣa the Śūkṣmaprakṛti (The subtle all-pervading spirit, the supreme soul). This Śūkṣmaprakṛti which cannot be measured by any unit of measure, is not attached to anything, is imperishable, is without decrepitude, is immovable and is without the senses of sound, touch smell or form. This Prakṛti endowed with the three guṇas, without beginning or end is eternal, is the root cause of this Prapaṇa. This Prakṛti pervaded over Prapaṇca from the beginning of the great Deluge to the beginning of creation. Brahmājiṇī who were great seers and who knew the truth of the Vedas speak about Prakṛti thus: “There was no night or day then, neither the earth nor the sky, neither light nor darkness. There was nothing but this. There was only one Brahman merged in which were Prakṛti and Puruṣa, a brahman which could not be understood by any of the five senses nor by intelligence. It was from the supreme being of Viṣṇu that the two forms Prakṛti and Puruṣa originated. These two were separated from Viṣṇu at the time of the great deluge and again joined together at the time of creation. The form of Viṣṇu from which these occurred was termed Time. During the last great deluge this visible Prapaṇa merged with it and so, this deluge was called Praṇatarālaya. Time is eternal, having no end and so the process of Śṛṅgī, Śṛṅgī and Śanmāra (creation, existence and destruction) continued without any interruption.

After that, during Pralaya (deluge), Prakṛti and Puruṣa stand apart due to equality of the guṇas, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas in Prakṛti. Viṣṇu in the form of Time starts the work to join them both together. Then when the time of creation came Viṣṇu, the Supreme Being, the supernal soul, the god of all living beings, omnipresent and omnipotent by his will entered the emotionless Puruṣa and emotional Prakṛti and created sensations in them. Smell is the sense which creates sensation in one by its nearness to it. Just like that Viṣṇu by his very presence near them created disturbances in them. It is Viṣṇu, the best of Puruṣas, who acts as Prakṛti which can disturb and which can be disturbed, which exists in states of contraction and expansion. It is Viṣṇu, the god of the gods, who exists in forms of Śūkṣma and Śhūlā, and as the great tattva and as the devas like Brahmā.

The Mahattattva originated from Prakṛti, which was existing as emotionless due to the equalisation of the three guṇas, when at the time of creation Viṣṇu, Truth in the form of Kṣetrajña (knower), merged with Prakṛti.
The Mahattattva in its three forms, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas lay enveloped by Prakṛti just as a seed is covered by its husk. From this Mahattattva originated the three egos, Vaikārika, Taijāsa and Tāmasa, the cause of the Pāñcabhūtas. Because that ego contained the three guṇas it became the cause of the origin of the bhūtas (elements) and indriyas (senses). Ego pervaded the Mahattattva just as the Mahattattva pervaded (Āṁśa 1, Chapter 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇā).

3) In the beginning during the Deluge the world was all water. Then Śiva tore open his thigh and dropped a drop of blood in the waters. It became a huge egg. He broke it and from it came out Puruṣa and from Puruṣa he made Prakṛti for the creation of the Prapañca. These two, Prakṛti and Puruṣa, created the Prājāpati and they in turn created the prajās. Puruṣa seeing the vast creation going on due to him became arrogant and Śiva chopped off his head. Śiva became repellant of his hasty deed later. To atone for his sin he took the skull in his hand and vowed that he would ever carry a skull in his hand and that he would live in cremation grounds.
The two halves of the great egg became ākāśa and bhūmi (earth and sky). (Taratīga 2, Kathāpiṭhalambaka, Kathāsāritsīgarā).

PRAŁAMBA 1. A notorious dānava born born to Kaśyapa-prajāpāti of his wife Danu. (Śloka 29, Chapter 63, Ādi Purāṇa).

PRAŁAMBA 2. An asura (demon). He attacked Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma and was killed by Balarāma. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAŁAYA (Destruction). Pralaya is of four kinds.
The first is nityapralaya. This is the destruction going on daily for all animate and inanimate objects born on earth.
The second is Brāhmaṇapralaya or naimitikapralaya
The third is Prakṛtapralaya. This is the great deluge made by prakṛti (nature) at the end of a thousand Caturyugas (four yugas). The fourth is ātyantikapralaya. This is the union of the soul with the Supreme Being due to Jñāna.
Of the above the Brāhmaṇapralaya or naimitikapralaya happens at the end of a Kalpa or a day of Brahūma or a thousand yugas. The nature of this pralaya is as follows: At the end of a thousand yugas the world will look famished. Then there will be excessive drought for a hundred years together and everything in this world would be destroyed then. Then Mahāviṣṇu, lord of everything in this universe, would present himself in the seven big rays of the Sun and drink to emptiness all the waters of all the three worlds, earth, ocean and pātāla. Then by the diving power of Mahāviṣṇu the seven rays of the Sun which had grown fat by drinking this water would become seven separate Suns. These Suns would burn all the three worlds including Pātāla. Then the earth would look like the back of a tortoise (Kūrmapṛṣṭha). At that time Rudra, equal in brilliance to Kālāgni, would from beneath burn the pātāla sending breaths from Ādīśeṣa. After pātāla Kālāgnirudra would burn the earth and then the heavens. Because of this all the worlds would look like globes of fire. Then the inhabitants of these worlds would go to Mahāloka unable to bear the heat and from there to Janaloka. Thus Viṣṇu in the form of Rudra would destroy everything.

Then from the face of Viṣṇu would originate clouds and lightning in different forms. Those clouds would rain incessantly for a hundred years and destroy the fire prevailing everywhere. When the rains become unbearable Vāyu would encroach upon the seats of the Saptarṣis in the ocean and by the breath of Viṣṇu destroy all the clouds. At that time Viṣṇu, lord of all, would lie on the back of Ādīśeṣa in that one big ocean drinking vāyu (air). Viṣṇu would lie thus for a period of a Kalpa in yogic slumber meditating on Vāsudeva taking the name Madhūṣīdana and form of Brahmā praised by the siddhamunis inside the ocean. After that he would take the form of Brahmā and start creation.

In Prakṛtapralaya this whole universe would lie in extinction for a period of two parārdhas. One parārdha is 100000000000000000 years (one followed by seventeen zeroes) and so the period of a prakṛta-pralaya is double the above number of periods. The world would then come into the grip of a great drought; five would break out and burn away everything in this world from Mahattattva to Viṣesa. Then prompted by the desire of Viṣṇu, pratisañcāraṇa (back into nature) would occur. Then Jala (water) would absorb the guṇas of bhūmi like gandha (smell) and when the qualities of the earth are thus absorbed the earth would merge with pralaya. Jala is rasātmaka.
Agni will absorb the rasa of Jala and Jala would be kindled. The guṇa of Agni is form and is in the form of Sun. Vāyu would absorb it and Agni would be destroyed. Vāyu would then become powerful and shock the world. The quality of Vāyu is touch and the ether would absorb that guṇa of Vāyu and Vāyu would be destroyed. The quality of ether is sound and it would be absorbed by the elements. If the elements are absorbed one by one the earth would merge into water (Jala) and Jala in Agni, and Agni in Vāyu and Vāyu in ether and ether in Ahaṅkāra (ego). Ahaṅkāra would merge in Mahattattva. This Mahattattva would be absorbed by Prakṛti. Prakṛti has got two forms:
Vyakta and Avyakta (Manifest and Un-manifest).
The Vyakta would merge with Avyakta. Puruṣa is single, pure and without decay. But he is also part of Para-mātma (the Supreme Being). So Prakṛti and Puruṣa would both merge into the Supreme Being. There are no distinctions, fabrications in Paramātma, the lord of all. It is only an existence. It is such a Paramātma that should be known and which itself is knowledge.
The Paramātma is beyond the Ātmā (soul). It is in such an indescribable Paramātma that all are dissolved during a Prakṛtapralaya. (Chapter 368, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAṂĀDA. A son of Vasiṣṭha. He was one of the Saptarṣis of Uttama Manvantara. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAṂADVĀRA. Wife of Ruru.

1) Birth. Pramadvarā was the daughter of the nymph Menakā born of the Gandharva Viśvāvasu. As soon as the child was born, Menakā threw the child into the forest and left for Devaloka.
Sthūlakesa, a sage who was engaged in penance in that forest in a hermitage heard the cry of a child and came out of his āśrama. On seeing a new-born child lying unclaimed and uncared for, he took the child to his āśrama and named her Pramādhvarā and brought her up. She grew into a charming maiden and one day Prince Ruru coming that way while hunting saw her and fell in love with her. The sage was pleased to give her in marriage to the King and so fixed the date of marriage.

The day previous to her marriage she trampled over a poisonous snake while walking in the forest with her companions and immediately she fell dead by the bite of the serpent. Ruru's grief was uncontrollable. He wept bitterly crying aloud "If I have from my very birth with great devotion taken vows, let Pramādhvarā rise up alive." Then a devādūta (message from god) appeared before him and said that all his wails were of no avail since it was only in the order of things that one whose āyus (period of life on earth) was over should die. Ruru then enquired of him a way of escape from this inevitable calamity and then the devādūta said that if Ruru was prepared to surrender half of his āyus in favour of Pramādhvarā she would come back to life. Ruru agreed and they went to Dharmarāja (god of Death) and told him of his wish. Dharmarāja brought back Pramādhvarā to life and she stood before Ruru as if just woken up from sleep. Their marriage was duly conducted. (Chapters 8 and 9, Adi Parva).

PRAMAGANDA. The King of Kīkaṭas mentioned in Rgveda. (Sūkta 14, Anuvāka 53, Maṇḍala 3, Rgveda).

PRAMĀNAKOTI. A sacred place on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. There is a great banyan tree named Pramānakoti at this place. It was at this spot of the river that Duryodhana poisoned Bhīmasena and threw him into the river, bound hand and foot. The Pāṇḍava who went for their exile in the forests spent their first night at this spot. (Sloka 41, Chapter 1, Vana Parva).

PRAMANDHU. A Yakṣa who was the custodian of the wealth of Hariścandra. Viśvāmitra removed the bad smell of the body of this yakṣa by pouring holy water over his body. (Chapter 2, Skanda Purāṇa).

PRAMATĀKA. A sage. He was one of the members of the Sarpsatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 7, Chapter 53, Adi Parva).

PRAMĀTHA I. A son of Dīrtrāśtra. (Sloka 13, Chapter 116, Adi Parva).

PRAMĀTHA II. One of the two pārśadas given to Subrahmanyā by Yamarāja. The other one was named Unmātha. (Sloka 30, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PRAMĀTHA III. A rākṣasa (demon). This rākṣasa was a minister of demons Khara and Dūṣaṇa. (Sarga 23, Aṛṇayakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

PRAMATHAGANA. Śiva's attendants. They were well-veried in Dharmaśāstra (What is virtuous and what is not). (Chapter 131, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRAMŚTHI I. One of the hundred sons of Dīrtrāśtra. He was killed by Bhīmasena in the great battle. (Chapter 157, Drona Parva).

PRAMŚTHI II. Brother of Dūṣaṇa who was an associate of Rāvana. When Rāma and Lakṣmana were in exile in the forests they had to fight Khara-dūṣaṇaśrīṣiras. Then the captains of their army, Mahākāpāla, Sthūlakṣa and Pramāthi attacked Rāma-Lakṣmana. Pramāthi attacked Lakṣmana and then Nīla an army-chief of the monkeys killed Pramāthi. (Sarga 26, Vālmiki Rāmāyana and Sloka 22, Chapter 287, Vana Parva).

PRAMĀTHI III. A rākṣasa who was a friend of Ghatotkaca. In the Kuruksetra battle Duryodhana killed this Pramāthi. (Sloka 20, Chapter 91, Bāṣṇa Parva).

PRAMĀTHIH. A celestial woman. This woman gave a dance performance during the Jamotsava of Arjuna. (Sloka 21, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PRAMATI I. (PRAMITI).

1) General information. Great Sage Bhṛgu, got of his wife Pulomā Gṛvavāna and Gṛvavāna got of his wife Sukṣṇa, Pramāti. This sage Pramāti married the beautiful Pratāpī and their son was Ruru.

2) Other details.

(i) Pramāti visited Bhīma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 5, Chapter 26, Anuśāsana Parva).

(ii) Pramāti is described as the son of Vāgīndra born in the family of Gṛvamadā son of Vitāhayāvā. (Sloka 58, Chapter 30, Anuśāsana Parva). For details see under Ruru).

PRAMĀTHI II. Son of a brahmin named Sūra of Prayāga. During the fag end of Kṛta-yuga the brahmīns made Pramāti their army-chief and defeated the Kṣatriyas. (Vignūdhamottara Purāṇa).

PRAMĀTHI III. One of the four ministers of Vībhīṣana. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 97. Verse 7, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRAMĪLĀ. Chief of the Strīrājya (country of women) in the Himālayas. The Pāṇḍavas conducted an aśvame-dhāyaṇa after the great battle. It was Arjuna who followed the sacrificial horse. Roaming about without anybody daring to tie it the horse reached Strīrājya and Pramīlā tied the horse. Arjuna challenged her and in the fight that ensued Pramīlā defeated Arjuna. At that time there was a voice from heaven which said "Arjuna, you will never be able to take back the horse after defeating Pramīlā. So if you want to save the sacrificial horse, enter into a truce with her and make her your wife." Arjuna took the advice and saved the horse after marrying Pramīlā. (Jaimūkhyā, Aśvamedha Parva, 21—22).

PRAMLOCĀ. A nymph who enticed the sage Kaṇḍu. (See under Kaṇḍu).

PRAMODA I. A serpent born of the family of Aīrāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpsatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

PRAMODA II. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 65, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PRAMODA III. One of the Māṇasaputras (Spiritual sons) of Brahmā. Pramoda was born from the neck of Brahmā. (Matsya Purāṇa).

PRAMOHINI. A Gandharva maiden. Pramohini and four Gandharva maidens were absolved from their curses by a drop of water from the river Narmadā. The story recounted to Yudhimātā by Nārada is as follows: Five Gandharva maidens Pramohini, Suīlā, Susvarā, Candrikā and Sutārā were friends. Pramohini was the daughter of Sukasangiti, Suīlā that of Suīlā, Susvarā of Svarvedi, Candrikā that of Candrika and Sutārā of Suprabha. On a day in spring all the five went about collecting flowers in a forest. As they went on walking they reached the pond named Ačchoda. They bathed in that pond and after that made an idol of Ambikā with clay and adorned it with golden ornaments. Putting marks on it with Kumkum (Saffron) and Candana (Sandalwood-paste) they danced around the idol with devotional songs. As they were doing so, the eldest son of sage Vedanidhi came to bathe in the Acchoda pond. He was very charming to look at with eyes like lotus, broad chest and round and brawny hands. He looked like another Kāmadeva (Cupid). He was wearing a deer-hide and around his waist was a yellow waist-band of Muñja grass. The five girls were attracted by the ascetic youth and stopping their dancing they at first thought of making him their guest. The more the girls looked at him the more they saw a resemblance of Kāmadeva in him and they decided to make him their husband. The girls started to approach him with amorous looks and perplexed by this move, the ascetic youth fled away from the place. The girls searched for him everywhere and he was not to be found. They found an emptiness on all sides. They thought that perhaps he might be a magician. They felt themselves in the plight similar to that of the gopis who searched for the missing Kṛṣṇa. Somehow taking courage they reached their homes and fell down before their mothers. The mothers asked them why they were so late and they replied they knew not the passage of time speaking with the Kinnaris who arrived there. Their bodies were hot and the mothers thought that it might be due to their brisk walking for such a long distance.

Telling a lie like that to hide their secret, they lay on the ground thinking about him and him alone. They did not make the Kelimāyura (peacock kept for pleasure) dance, did not teach the parrot in the cage, did not pet the mongoose nor did they converse with their pet Śārikā. The night seemed to them like a yuga and as soon as it was morning they ran up to the Acchoda pond. The brahmin boy came there along morning also for bathing. The five girls encircled him and requested him to marry them. He made several excuses and tried to get away from them. Then Pramohini breaking the circle went and caught hold of him by his legs, Śuśilā and Susvarā caught hold of his hands, Sūturā embraced him and Candrikā kissed him on his cheeks. At last in despair the brahmin boy cursed them and turned them into devils. The girls were not to be subdued like that. They also cursed him in return and made him also a devil. All the devils formed like that by curses and counter-curses lived in the same place in the forest. After a long time one day the sage Lomaṣa came that way by chance and the burning effulgence of Lomaṣa due to his severe penance made him unapproachable to the devils and they stood at a great distance from him. But the brahmin devil by the strength of his penance in his previous life knew Lomaṣa and falling before him in prostration told him everything that had happened. Lomaṣa was greatly moved by his story and he took them to the banks of the river Narmadā. At that time a wind blew and drops of water from the river, changed them into their original forms and they stood praising Narmadā. Then following the advice of Lomaṣa the brahmin boy married the five girls and lived on the shores of Narmadā bathing in it, drinking its water and worshipping it. They lived there for long happily and then attained Viśnu-loka. (Chapter 22, Padma Purāṇa) PRAMṚṬA. One of the ways of earning wealth. There are five ways according to Manusmṛti.

Rṭāṃṛṭabhyām jivettu
Mrtena prāṃṭenā vā /
Satyāṃṛṭabhyāmaphi vā
Na śavvṛtyā kaḍacana.// (Sloka 4, Chapter 4, Manusmṛti).

Rṭam, Amṛṭam, Mṛtam, Prāṃṭam and Satyāṇṭam are the five ways.

Each has been described thus:

Rṭamunṛṣadīlāṃ jīreyām
Amṛṭam syādayācītām /
Mṛtantu yācītāṃ bhaikṣām
Prāṃṭam karaṇārī śṛṃṭam //
Satyāṇṭantu vāpiyām tenā caiva vījyāte / Sevā śavvṛtirākhyātā
tasmat tān parivarjjet //
(Slokas 5 and 6, Chapter 4, Manusmṛti)

(Rṭam is the collection of grains from paddy fields with two fingers. Amṛṭa is that which is obtained without begging and Mṛta is that which is obtained by begging. Wealth that is obtained by agriculture is Prāṃṭa and that which is obtained by trade is Satyāṇṭa. Wealth obtained by sevā (flattery and service) is to be avoided.)

PRĀMSUNRGA. A Manu. Ikṣvākū, Ṇabhāga. Dhṛṣṭa, Śaryāti, Narisyaṭa, Prāṃṣunṛga, Diṣṭa, Kārūga and Prāḍhara are all Manus. (7th Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata)

PRAMUCI (PRAMUCA). A sage who lived in Dakṣīṇabhārata. (Sloka 29, Chapter 208, Śānti Parva).

PRĀṆA I. Grandson of sage Bhṛgu. Bhṛgu got of his wife Khyāti a daughter named Lakṣmī and two sons named Dhātā and Vidhātā. They married Ayāti and Niṣyati respectively and they got two sons named Prāṇa and Mrkaṇḍu. Mārkandaṇya was the son of Mrkaṇḍu. (Chapter 10, Aṭh'a 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRĀṆA II. A son born to the Vasu named Soma of his wife Manoharā. This Prāṇa was the younger brother of Varccas. These brothers had two other brothers named Śīśira and Ramaṇa. (Sloka 26, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

PRĀṆA III. Prāṇavāyu. The wind of life. (See under Parāvaha).

PRĀṆADHARA. A carpenter of Purāṇic fame.

There were two celebrated carpenters in the country of Kāṇcī named Prāṇadhara and Rājyadhara when King Bāhubala was ruling that country. They learnt many mechanical arts in carpentry and architecture from the great architect, Mayāsura. Prāṇadhara, the elder brother, became an addict to wine and women and gambling and lost all his wealth. Rājyadhara gave a portion of his wealth to his brother and before long both became poor. Then Prāṇadhara found out a plan and they both together made a mechanical bird and tying a rope to its legs sent it into the treasure-house of the King through a window. The bird picked up diamonds or ornaments which it could carry in its beak and came back to them. This continued daily for some days and then Rājyadhara advised his brother to stop it acquainting him with the dangers if it was ever found out. But Prāṇadhara did not heed the advice and continued the theft. When the keeper of the treasury found things missing he was worried. He mused: "Doors are not open. Can it be rats? No, there has never been a single rat here before. Then how did it happen?" Thinking thus he went and reported the matter to the king. The King was confident of the keeper. Soon he put guards over the treasure-house to keep watch over it at night. Little knowing that he was being watched Prânadharâ put his bird into action that night also. The watchmen caught hold of the rope as soon as the bird came out with the booty from the treasure-house. Prânadharâ knew that the trick had been found out and he rushed to his brother and told him what had happened. Immediately Prânadharâ made a Vimâna and escaped from the place with his family. Râjyadharâ also made a Vimâna and escaped. When he had travelled in the Vimâna for four hundred Kâtras (Kâta=four miles) he reached a sea-shore and then leaving the Vimâna there started walking. On the way getting tired he slept inside a garden. When he woke up, a man on a peacock came to his side and said “You live here. When you are hungry and feel like taking food go to the second floor of this house and you will find there whatever you want.” The visitor disappeared and he found a house in front of him. When he had finished his daily ablutions he went inside the house which was empty. But when he went up he sawample food in gold vessels arranged there. He never heard about his brother again. (Taranâga 9, Ratnaprabhâlambaka, Kathâsarasâgara).

PRÂNÂKA. Son of an agni called Prâna. (Sloka 1, Chapter 22, Vana Parva).

PRÂNÂRODHA. One of the twenty eight hells. (See under Kâla).

PRÂNÂYÂMA. Prâna means the wind in the body and âyâma means restraint. Prânâyâma means restraining or suspending breath. Spread on the floor a piece of cloth, or animal-skin or Kuśâ grass and sitting on it cross-legged, controlling all actions of the sense-organs and concentrating on one single object do prânâyâma for the purification of the soul. There are three different kinds of prânâyâmas namely Recâkaprânâyâma, Pûrâkaprânâyâma and Kumbhakaprânâyâma.

Holding the nostrils with the left hand and massaging the belly with the other hand one sends out the air within the belly. It is called Recâkaprânâyâma. Doing just the reverse and getting air inside is called Pûrâkaprânâyâma. Then the yogi sits, with his belly full of air. Sitting thus without either letting the air out or letting it in is called Kumbhakaprânâyâma. Here the yogi sits like a pûrâna-kumbhâ (full jar). The body of man is a chariot, the sense organs its horses, mind the charioteer and prânâyâma the whip. (Chapter 373, Agni Purâna).

PRÂNIDHI. Son of an Agni called Pâncajânyâ. (Sloka 9, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

PRÂNYTTA. A Son born to one’s own wife by the grace of great men. (Sloka 19, Chapter 119, Adi Parva).

PRÂNNADI. A sacred place. He who visits this place would attain Indraloka. (Sloka 15, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

PRAPÂNCA. See under Sṛṣṭi.

PRAPÂNÇA+BUDDHI. A beggar with astonishing powers mentioned in Kathâsarasâgara.

PRÂPTI. A wife of Karâsa. Karâsa had two wives and the other was called Asti. (10th Skandha, Bhâgavata).

PRÂRUJA I. A division of râksasas (demons) and Pîsâcás (devils). (Sloka 1, Chapter 285, Vana Parva).

PRÂRUJA II. A deva who once guarded the Amrta (nectar). Once there was a fight between Praruja and Garuḍa. (Chapter 28, Adi Parva).

PRÂSÂDA. A King of the family of Manu. (4th Skandha, Bhâgavata).

PRÂSAMI. A nymph of Alakâpurî. This nymph once gave a dance performance in honour of Aṣṭâvakra. (Sloka 45, Chapter 19, Anuśasana Parva).

PRÂSANDHI. A son of Vaivavasata Manu. Kuspa is the son of Prasandhi. (Sloka 2, Chapter 4, Aśvamedha Parva).

PRÂSÄNTÂTMÂ. A synonym of Sûrya (Sun). (Sloka 27, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).

PRÂSÂSTÂ. A holy river. During their pilgrimage the Pândavas came to this place and bathed in this river. (Sloka 2, Chapter 118, Vana Parva).

PRÂSENA I. A son of Karna. He was killed in the great battle by Sâtyaki. (Sloka 6, Chapter 82, Karna Parva).

2) Prasena and the Syamantaka. Saträjît and Sûrya (Sun) were friends. Once Saträjît requested Sûrya to give him some gift as a token of their friendship. Then Sûrya gave him the Syamantaka gem. If that stone was worshipped daily with pûjâs by brâhmaṇas it would yield eight loads of gold daily. When once Saträjît travelled by air with that gem round his neck the people of Dwârakâ mistook him for Viṣṇu. Śrî Kṛṣṇa was attracted by the beauty and power of that stone and he asked Saträjît that gem for a good price. Śrî Kṛṣṇa offered as much money as he wanted and still Saträjît did not part with it.

Once Prasena went hunting with that gem round his neck and he was attacked and killed by a lion. The lion while carrying the Syamantaka was killed by Jâmbavân and the latter carried the gem to his den and gave it to his children to play with.

When Prasena did not return from his hunting and was found later lying dead without the gem the news spread that the stone might have been stolen by Kṛṣṇa after killing Prasena. The slander reached the ears of Kṛṣṇa also and he went to the forest in search of the Syamantaka. He found the cave of Jâmbavân and on peeping in found the children of Jâmbavân playing with the gem. Jâmbavân attacked Kṛṣṇa and after a grim battle which lasted for several days Jâmbavân was defeated. When he knew that it was Kṛṣṇa who had defeated him he gave him along with the Syamantaka his daughter Jâmbavatî also Kṛṣṇa brought the gem and the girl to Dwârakâ and gave back the gem to Saträjît. (Chapter 38, Harivamsa; Chapter 13, Part 8, Padma Purâna).

PRÂSENAJIT I. Father of Suyajînâ, wife of Mahâbhâma. As a King he did godâna (gift of cows) for many years and attained Purâvaloka in the end. (Sloka 20, Chapter 95, Adi Parva).

PRÂSENAJIT II. Father of Renukâ, wife of the sage Jamadagni. Jamadagni abandoned the beautiful Renukâ once but fearing a curse Prasenajit gave her again to Jamadagni. (Chapter 58, Brahmadâta Purâṇa).
PRASENJIT III. A distant brother of Satrājīt called Bhāva. (Dvākinītāyā Pātha, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva).

PRASENJIT IV. A King who lived in the city of Śrāvasti. Once a very virtuous brahmin came to this city. Finding him to be a man of great virtues a Vaśyā took him to his house and kept him there worshipping him. Many rich men coming to know of the brahmin came and worshipped him with offerings of costly clothes and ornaments. Within a short time the poor brahmin got a huge heap of gold and silver. He collected his lot and at night without letting anybody know went and buried it in a secret place in the forest. After some days he went and looked for it and found his buried wealth missing. When the brahmin returned weeping, the host, the Vaśyā, gathered from him all that had happened. The house-holder consoled him but the miserly and greedy brahmin was not to be pacified thus and he started to commit suicide. He went to a pond nearby and was about to jump into it when Prasenajit who heard about this came to the spot and told him thus:—"Do not grieve over your loss. I shall make enquiries about it and if the stolen wealth is not recovered I shall give you compensation from my treasury."

After consoling the brahmin thus the King went to his palace. He pretended to be ill and called the physicians of the city to his side. He asked them about their patients, their illness and the medicines prescribed for them. One of the physicians during the enquiry said thus:—"Oh lord, Mātrādattavanik is my patient. Yesterday I prescribed to him the root of Ūraka plant." The King soon dispersed the physicians and sent for Mātrādattavanik and asked him who had brought for him the root. When Mātrādattavanik replied that it was his servant the King sent for the servant and on questioning the servant the latter confessed having taken the hidden treasure. Thus because of the intelligence and wisdom of the King the brahmin got back his wealth. (Taraṅga 7, Madanamucūkīlamba, Kathāsarītāgāra).

PRĀŚITA. One of the Pañcamaḥāyājnas. The five vaṇas are Ahuta, Huta, Prahuta, Bhraṃyaḥuta and Prāśita. (Sloka 73, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

PRASKAṆYA. I. A King who was the son of Medhātithī. The Kings of Praskaṇya line were Kaśtrivas formerly but they became brahmṇins later. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASKAṆYA II. A sage who was the son of Kaṇva-muni. The sūkta 44 of anuṃkā 9 of mandala one of Rγveda was written by this sage.

PRASRĀYA. A King of the family of Manu. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASRTA. A demon. This demon was killed by Garuda. (Sloka 12, Chapter 105, Udyoga Parva).

PRASTHALA I. The palace of Suśarmā. (See under Suśarmā).

PRASTHALA II. A greatly condemned place. (Sloka 47, Chapter 44, Karna Parva).

PRASHUHMA. A country which was conquered by Bhīmasena during the Mahābhārata times. (Sloka 16, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

PRASŪRUTA. A King who was a descendant of Śrī Rāma. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASŪṬĪ. A daughter of Svāyambhuva Manu. Svayambhuva Manu had two sons named Priyavrata and Uttanapāda and three daughters named Ākūti, Devahūti and Prasūṭi. Ākūti was married to Ruciprajāpati, Devahūti to Kardamaprajāpati and Prasūṭi to Daksiprajāpati. Yajñā is the son of Ākūti. Kapila is the son of Devahūti. Prasūṭi got only a number of daughters. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PRATĀPA. A prince of the country of Sauvira. He stood behind the chariot of Jayadratha holding his flag. Arjuna slew him. (Sloka 10, Chapter 265, Vana Parva).

PRATĀPAMUKUTA. Father of Vajramukūṭa. Vajramukūṭa is the hero in the tale of Vetalakathā described beautifully in Kathāsarītāgāra. (See under Vetalā).

PRATĀPI. Cyavanamahārṣī got his wife Sukanyā a son named Pramati. Pratāpi is the beautiful wife of Pramati. Kuru is the son born to Pramati of Pratāpi. (2nd Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PRĀṬARA. I. A serpent born of the Kauravya race. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 13, Chapter 5, Ādi Parva).

PRĀṬARA II. A son born to Dētā, the seventh āditya, of his wife Rākā. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATARDANA.

1) General information. A King of the line of Pūru. Pratardana who was the son of the daughter of King Yayāti ruled the country after making Kaśi his capital. Pratardana's mother was Mādhavi, Yayāti’s daughter, and father, Divodāsa. Pratardana once found on his way his grandfather, King Yayāti, who had fallen from Svarga. (See under Yayāti).

2) Other details.

(i) Emperor Śibi gave Pratardana a sword. (Sloka 80, Chapter 166, Sānti Parva).

(ii) He once gave a gift of a netra (eye) to the brahmṇins. (Sloka 20, Chapter 224, Sānti Parva).

(iii) He slew the son of Vītaḥavāya. (See under Vītaḥavāya).

(iv) Pratardana courteled death after appointing his sons for the service of brahmṇins. (Sloka 5, Chapter 137, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRATIBHĀNū. A son born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa of Satyabhāmā. Bhānu, Subhānu, Svarbhānu, Prabhānu, Bhānumāṇ, Candrabhānu, Bṛhadbhānu, Havīrbhānu, Śrībhānu and Pratībhānu are the sons born to Satyabhāmā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATICYA. A King born of the race of Bharata. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATICYA. Wife of Pulastyamahārṣī. (Sloka 17, Chapter 116, Udyoga Parva).

PRATIHĀRA. A King born of the race of Bharata. Pratihāra was the son of Parameśhī and the father of Pratihartā. (Chapter 1, Arīśa 2, Viśu Purāṇā).

PRATIHARTĀ. A King who was celebrated for his yajñakarmans. His father was Pratihāra and mother Suvarcalā, Pratihartā got two sons of his wife Stuti. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIJṆĀPARVA. A sub-divisional Parva of Droṇa-Parva. This comprises chapters 72 to 84 of Droṇa Parva.

PRATIK. Son of a King called Vasu. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIKĀMĪ. The charioteer of Duryodhana. It was Pratikāmī who brought Pṛūṣottāma to the court of the Kauravas when the Pāṇḍavas were defeated at the game of dice by the Kauravas. He was killed in the Kuruksetra battle by the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 67, Sabhā Parva; Chapter 33, Sālya Parva).

PRATIKŚATRA. A King born of the family of Paraśurāma. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

PRATIMATSYA. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva.)

PRĀTĪPA. A King of Candravatiśa (Lunar dynasty). He was the father of King Santanu. There is a story behind the birth of the son Santanu to Prātipā. One day this Rājārshi was worshipping the Sun-god in the waters of the river Gaṅgā, when a beautiful maiden rose from the waters and sat on the right thigh of the royal ascetic. The King was embarrassed and he told her thus:—“Oh sweet girl, who are you? Do you realise what an unrighteous deed you have done? Why did you thus climb on my thigh without seeking my permission? The right thigh is for the daughter and the wife of the son. Since you have thus sat on my right thigh, you shall be the wife of my son when one is born to me.”

Hearing this the maiden jumped out from the thigh of the King and left the place and the King went to his palace. After some time Prātipā got a son named Santanu. Santanu was none other than emperor Mahābhiṣaṅk who was forced to be born on earth due to a curse of Brahmā. When Santanu came of age Prātipā decided to spend the rest of his life in forests and calling his son to his side gave him all advice and added “Son, perhaps a maiden may come to you and if she comes accept her as your wife. Do not ask her about her identity. By making her your truthful wife you will acquire a great many benefits.”

Prātipā, thereafter, entrusted the kingdom to his son and after performing severe penance in the forests attained divyaloka. (2nd Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata.)

PRATIPĀDA. A King of the race of Bharata. He was the son of Gandhamādana and the father of Svavalkāla (?) (Navama Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

PRATIRĀTHA. A King of the Pūru line of kings. Pratiratha, Dhruva and Sumati were the sons of King Antibhirā. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

PRATIRŪPA. An asura (demons). This demon who held sway over all the worlds also died. His story was told to illustrate that there was an end to all lives. (Sloka 53, Chapter 227, Śānti Parva.)

PRĀTISĀKHYA. See under Kramapātha.

PRĀTISRĀVAS. A son born to the queen Kumāri of king Bhīmasena of the family of king Pariksit. Pratiśrāvas had a son named Pratipā. (Sloka 42, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva.)

PRĀTISĪTHĀ I. A female follower of Subrahmanya (Sloka 29, Chapter 46, Śālīya Parva.)

PRĀTISĪTHĀ II. The installation of deities in temples. According to Agni Purāṇa it is the installation of Śiva-liṅga that is called Pratiśīthā.

Piṭha is Sakti (Power) and Liṅga is Śiva. It is the union of Sakti in the form of Piṭha and Siva in the form of Liṅga that is called Pratiśīthā. This Pratiśīthā is attained by means of Śivamānas. There are five different kinds of Pratiśīthās:—

1) Viṣṇu-pratiśīthā. Any pratiśīthā in which Brahmā-nilā is used in combination is called Viṣṇupratiśīthā.

2) Śiva-pratiśīthā. Fixing the liṅga on the piṭha (platform) is called Śikha-pratiśīthā.

3) Sūkti-pratiśīthā. The fixing of the liṅga (idol) on the piṭha (platform) when the liṅga gets shaky on it is called Sūkti-pratiśīthā.

4) Uṭhāṇa-pratiśīthā. Taking the idol out from the platform and refixing it, is called Uṭhāṇa-pratiśīthā.

5) Aṣṭāṇa-pratiśīthā. A pratiśīthā in which after the fixation learned priests conduct purification ceremonies, is called Aṣṭāṇa-pratiśīthā.

PRĀTISĪTHĀNAPUKA. A sacred place in Prayāṇa. The place is at present called Jhūsi. Once this place was ruled over by a king called Yayāti. The sage Gālava accompanied by Garuda visited this king one day. (Sloka 9, Chapter 114, Udvyoga Parva.)

PRATITTA. A Viśvadeva. (Sloka 32, Chapter 92, Anuśāsana Parva.)

PRATIVINDHYA I. A son born to Pāṇcālī of Dharma-putra. The details available about him from Mahābhārata are the following:—

(i) Prativindhya was born from a part of a Viśvadeva. (Sloka 127, Chapter 37, Ādi Parva.)

(ii) On the first day of the Kuruksetra battle Prativindhya fought against Śakuni. (Sloka 63, Chapter 45, Bhīṣma Parva.)

(iii) Prativindhya was defeated in fight with Alambuśa. (Sloka 39, Chapter 100, Bhīṣma Parva.)

(iv) He fought against Aśvatthāmā. (Sloka 29, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva.)

(v) Prativindhya accepted defeat after fighting with Duṣṇāsana. (Sloka 34, Chapter 160, Droṇa Parva.)

(vi) He slew king Gitra in a battle. (Sloka 20, Chapter 14, Karnā Parva.)

(vii) Prativindhya died fighting Aśvatthāmā at night. (Sloka 48, Chapter 8, Saupītika Parva.)

(viii) The synonyms found used in the Mahābhārata for Prativindhya are the following:—Yaudhiśṭhira and Yaudhiśthiri.

PRATIVINDHYA II. A violent king born of the family of Ekaakra. Arjuna defeated this king during his victory march. (Sloka 5, Chapter 25, Sabhā Parva.)

PRATYAGRAHA. An ancient king of Bhārata. He was the second son of Uparicaravas. (Sloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva.)

PRATYĀNGA. An ancient king of Bhārata. (Sloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva.)

PRATYUCSHA. A son born to Dharma-deva of his wife Prabhāṭa. Pratyuṣa is one of the Aṣṭavasus. The Aṣṭavasus are Āpa, Dhruva, Soma, Dharma, Anīla, Agni, Pratyuṣa and Prabhāṣa. The sage Devala is the son of Pratyuṣa. (Sloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva.)

PRAVAHA. A vyūha (wind). This wind of life in the body always moves upwards. (Sloka 21, Chapter 301, Śānti Parva.)

PRAVĀHA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 64, Chapter 45, Śālīya Parva.)

PRAVĀHA. A king of Pāṇcāladeśa. He was a contemporary of Uddālaka.

Pravāhaṇa was a great Dārśanika (philosopher) and he once held a Tattvajñana Parisad (seminar of philosophers). With a view to defeating the king in a discussion Śvetaketu also attended the seminar. But Śvetaketu was unable to answer the five questions put to him by Pravāhaṇa. Ahamed of the defeat Śvetaketu went to his father Uddālaka, who was his Guru in Jñānavidyā also, and asked him the questions put by Pravāhaṇa. Uddālaka also was unable to answer the questions and they both went to Praváhaṇa and the latter gave as a gift to those brahmins whatever knowledge he had on Tattvajñāna then. (Chândogyopaniṣad).

PRAVÁLAKA. A Yakṣa of the court of Kubera (Śloka 17, Chapter 10, Sáhā Parva).

PRAVARA. A Yadava. He was one of the ministers of Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 71, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRAVARA. A river of Purānic fame. (Śloka 23, Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva).

PRAVARAKA-PRAVĀRA. An ancient Purānic place included in Kraunadvāpa. (Śloka 22, Chapter 12, Bhīma Parva).

PRAVARAKAR. An owl without death living in the Himālayas. (See under Indradyumna).

PRAVARASENA. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the sixth century A.D. He is the author of the book ‘Setubandha’ written in Prakrit language. The book is called ‘Setukāya’ and ‘Ravanavadha’ also.

PRAVARASAŅA. A peak of the mountain Govanta. Śri Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma once went to its top to observe the movements of their enemy Māgadha. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAVASU. A son born to Ilīna of the Candravānśa (lunar dynasty) of his wife Rathantari. Pravasu had four brothers named Duṣyanta, Sūra, Bhīma, and Vasu. (Śloka 17, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

PRAVEŅI. Kanvārama was on the shores of this river. (Śloka 11, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

PRAVEPANA. A serpent of the family of Taksāka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PRAVIRA I. A king of the Pūru dynasty. His father was Santurodha. He had two brothers named Duṣyanta and Sumanta. (Chapter 278, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAVIRA II. A son of Pūru, a king of the Pūru dynasty. His mother was Pauṣṭi. He had two brothers named Īśvara and Raurdrāvya. Pravira got of his wife Sūrasenī a son named Manasyu. He was known by the name Janamejaya also. After conducting three avemadhanas, Pravira accepted Vānaprastha (third stage of life). (Śloka 11, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

PRAVIRA (S) III. A special class of Kṣatriyas. King Vṛṣadhvajana was born in this class. (Śloka 16, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).

PRAVIRA IV. A candāla (the lowest and most despised of all classes of people). In order to keep his word of honour Hariścandra allowed himself to be sold to this candāla Pravira. He was none other than Lord Śiva himself. (See under Hariścandra).

PRAVIRSEYA. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 50, Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva).

PRAVRTTA. All religious ceremonies are divided into two classes, Pravṛttta and Nivṛttta. All ceremonies connected with worldly life are classed under Pravṛttta and those of a spiritual nature under Nivṛttta. (Chapter 262, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAYAGA. A sacred place situated at the meeting point of Gāṅgā and Yamunā. He who bathes at this holy spot would get the benefit of doing ten aśvamedhas. (Śloka 35, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

It is believed that at Prayāga there is the presence of Brahmā, devatās, dikpālakas (guardians of the quarters), lokapālakas (guardians of the world), Śādhyas (realised souls), Pitrīs (manes), Mahāris like Sanatkumāra, Arīgas, Brahmarśis, Nāgas, Garuḍa, Siddhas, Śūryadeva and Mahāviṣṇu. There are three fire-pits there. The river Gāṅgā runs through the centre of these pits. The Centre of the confluence of Gāṅgā and Yamunā is believed to be the waist of the world. There is at Prayāga the world-famous Triveṇi confluence. If one bathes at that place one gets the benefit of Aśvamedha and Rājasūya together.

The greatness of Prayāga is described thus: Prayāga-tirtha, Pratīṣṭhānātirtha, Kamalatirtha, Aśvatatarātirtha, and Bhogavatītirtha are said to be the Yāgavedīs of Prajāpati. At such a Prayāga Vedas and Yajñas live personified. If one praises it or chants its name in songs or smears the mud from it on one’s body, one would be absolved of all sins. If one gives away anything in charity at this place or conducts Śrāddha (ceremony of giving offerings to deceased relatives) or does pious utterings one would get benefits of an imperishable nature. There are about seventy thousand tirthas in this world, ten thousand of one kind and sixty thousand of another kind. Prayāga has the presence of all these tirthas and so it is considered as the best of all tirthas. Here is the Bhogavatītirtha of Vāsuki and the tirtha called Hamsaprapatana. If one bathes in the ponds there for three days together one would get the credit of giving as charity a crore of cows. The three important places are the Gaṅgādvāra, Prayāga and Gaṅgāsagarasangama. Chapter 211, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAYĀṢCITTA. In ancient Bhārata sacred injunctions existed about religious rites to be performed for the atonement of sins committed. The following are a few of them.

Murder is that act which ends in loss of life. One who kills a brahmin is a Brahmaghātaka. Even if murder is actually committed by one man, all those involved in a conspiracy for murder are murderers. If death occurs while treating a patient it is no murder. If death occurs when you punish your son, disciple or wife it is no sin. If he who has killed a brahmin or a cow commits suicide he will be absolved from his sin and he should go about begging with a skull and the organ of generation of any animal. If he spends twelve years begging eating little and with repentance in his heart the Brahmaghātaka will be absolved of his sin and he will become pure. If the murder is done to serve a purpose of his he should live as a beggar for twelve years but if it is not done to gain any end of his, he need live only for six years as a beggar. If a brahmin attempts to murder another brahmin he should observe the above vow for three years. If the attempt is made by a Kṣatriya he should double the period; if by a Vaiśya or Śūdra, triple the period. If a brahmin kills a Kṣatriya he need observe only three fourths of the pṛāyaṣcitta. If a brahmin kills a Vaiśya or Śūdra he need observe only an eighth part of the pṛāyaṣcitta. If he kills a woman he should observe the punishment fixed for killing a Śūdra.

If a brahmin does ‘gohatya’ (killing a cow) he should practise penance drinking Pañcagavya (five products of the cow taken collectively). He should sleep in a cowshed and go about feeding the cow and should also give away cows as gift. If a gohayā is committed by a person of any other caste, he need observe only three fourths of the pṛāyaṣcitta. Hitting the cows by fists, piercing their body with nails and cutting their horns are to be classified under gohayā. If one kills a cat mongoose, frog dog, or a bird, one should drink milk for three days. Though wine, date-palm-juice sugar-cane-juice, black-palm-juice, tamarind-juice and toddy are intoxicants they are not classified under alcoholic liquors. Real liquor or surā is that made from rice flour. Drinking liquor is prohibited to Brahmins, Ksatriyas and Vaiśyas. If any one of these castes drinks he should drink water after performing penance or live eating pippali (long pepper) for a year or eat oil cake at night for a year. If one drinks water in a pot used for taking liquor one should observe the prāyaścitta for seven days. If he drinks water from a cāṇḍāla he should observe the prāyaścitta for six days. If one eats rice from a cāṇḍāla one should observe Cāndrāyaṇa, (an expiatory penance of decreasing and then increasing food according to the waxing and waning of the moon). If one eats food in the house of a Śūdra during times of distress, one would be absolved of the sin by repentance alone. Taking another man’s property and appropriating it to himself is called theft. He who steals gold should be struck on the head by a wooden pestle by the king and killed. Alternatively he should live for twelve years with matted hair, eating one time a day only such things as leaves, fruits and roots and lying on earth. He who steals diamonds, pearls, corals, copper, silver, iron, bronze and granite stones should fast for twelve years. He who enjoys sexual intercourse with his father’s wife, own sister, daughter of his preceptor or wife of the preceptor should burn himself in a hot iron pot. Alternatively he should embrace a red hot iron idol of a woman and die. (Chapters 183 and 184, Agni Purāṇa).

PRIYADHRA. A Devagandharva. He was born to Kasyapaprajāpati of his wife Muni. (Sloka 43, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

PREKSĀGRHA. A building for staging dramas, and conducting festivals well-designed and ornamentally constructed. Droṇācārya made the royal architects construct a Prēksāgrha for exhibiting the skill of the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas in archery. (Sloka 11, Chapter 133, Ādi Parva).

PRETAGRANTA. A very ancient book of the Egyptians. There are only two books which can claim to be as old as the Rgveda, the most ancient treasure-book of mankind. One of them is Pretagrantha which the English people call the Book of the Dead. The other is Gilgamish of the Babylonians.

PRITI. Wife of sage Pulastya. Priti got a son named Dattoli of her husband Pulastya, That Dattoli was in his previous birth the Agastya of Svaṭyambhuva Manvantara. (Chapter 107, Amśa 17, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRIYABHĪRTYA. An ancient King of Bhārata. (Sloka 236, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

PRIYADARSHANA I. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 59, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYADARSHANA II. A son of the king Drupada. In the battle that ensued after the marriage of Draupadi, Karna killed him. (Adi Parva, Mahābhārata).

PRIYAKA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 65, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYAMĀLĀNULEPANA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 60, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYAMVADĀ. A companion of Rādhikā. This girl gave all protection and service to Arjuna when the latter was conducting Jālānuṣṭhāna taking the form of a woman named Arjunī. (Chapter 74, Pāṭala Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PRIYAVARCCAS. A nymph of the court of Kubera. Arjuna saved her when she was lying as a crocodile due to a curse. (Chapter 1, Skanda Purāṇa).

PRIYAVRATA. The eldest son of Śvayambhuva Manu. He had another son named Uttanapāda and three daughters named Ākūti, Devahūti and Prasūti. The daughters were married to Ruci, Kardama and Daksā respectively. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Priyavrata married Barhiṣmati daughter of Kardama-prajāpati. He got of her two daughters named Samrāt and Kuksi and ten sons named Agniḥdra, Agniḥbhu, Vapiṣṭā, Dvitiyā, Medhas, Medhātithi, Bhavya, Savana, Putra and Jyotisā. Of these Jyotismān was really possessing jyotis (brilliancy). All the sons, Medhas, Agniḥbhu and Putra, were interested in the practice of yoga and were aware of their previous births. Priyavrata distributed seven islands to seven of his sons as follows:

Jambūdvīpa to Agniḥdra; Plakṣadvīpa to Medhātithi; Sāmalidvīpa to Vapiṣṭā; Kuśadvīpa to Jyotisā; Krauṇḍadvīpa to Dvitiyā; Sākadvīpa to Bhavya; and Puṣkāradvīpa to Savana.

Agniḥdra had nine sons named Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Harivarṣa, Ilāvṛta, Ramya, Hiraṇya, Kuru, Bhadrāśva and Keteṭumāla. (Chapter 1, Amśa 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

Priyavrata once circled round Meru in his chariot. As if competing with the Sun Priyavrata started his circling along with sunrise and ended it at sunset. He did so seven days making nights look like day and the sun appear dim and faded. The Sun was dejected and it was at the request of the Trimūrtis that Priyavrata stopped his circumambulation. It was the path of Priyavrata’s circling for seven days that later became the seven oceans of Purāṇic fame. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

PROSAKA. An ancient place of human habitation in western Bhārata. (Sloka 61, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PROSTHA. An ancient city of Bhārata. (Sloka 61, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRASĀDVYA. An ancient King who got a dagger from king Aṣṭaka. (Sloka 80, Chapter 166, Sānti Parva).

PRŚADHRA I. The ninth son of Vaivasvata Manu. He is described as one of the sacred and virtuous persons to be remembered during early mornings. He did penance at Kurukṣetra and attained Svarga. (Sloka 11, Chapter 20, Aśvamedha Parva).

Even from boyhood Prśadhra started practice of penance. He got disgusted with life even from his boyhood. A story is told how it happened so. Once when Prśadhra was studying under his Guru, a tiger entered the shed of the cows at night. Hearing the pitiable wails of the cow he went to the shed with his sword and gave a strong and fatal cut to the tiger with it. Unfortunately the stroke fell on the cow instead of the tiger and not knowing the truth in the darkness Prśadhra went and slept peacefully. In the morning when he went to the shed he found the cow lying dead with his sword-cut. He then knew the mistake he had made at night and was so distressed with the accident that he at once left for Kurukṣetra and started doing penance there.
PRṣADHRA II. A son of King Drupaḍa. He was killed in the great battle by Aśvatṛṭhām. (Śloka 18, Chapter 136, Dvīpa Parva.)

PRṣADHRA III. A brahmin boy. One night while he was living in the āśrama of his Guru he saw a lion going out from the premises of the āśrama with an āśrama cow in its mouth. The brahmin boy rushed at it and struck the lion with a sword. But due to want of proper light the sword-cut fell on the cow and the cow fell down dead. The next day the Guru finding the cow lying dead mistook it for a deliberate killing by his disciple and cursed Prṣadhra to death, to be born as a Sūtra. When Prṣadhra was thus roaming about in the forests in his cursed form he fell into a big forest fire and was burnt to death. (Chapter 2, Śṛṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa; Chapter 1, Aīścā 4, Viṣṇu Purāṇa.)

PRṣATA. A king of Pāṇcilā. He was the father of Drupaḍa and a friend of the sage Bharadvāja. It was from Prṣata that Pāṇcilā, daughter of Drupaḍa, got the name Pārṣaṭī. (Śloka 41, Chapter 129, Ādi Parva.)

PRṣATASVA. A King of the Sūryavāṁśa (solar dynasty). He was called Viṁpā also. Himself, Ketumā and Sambhū were the sons of king Ambariśa. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

PRSNĪ I. Wife of the Prājāpati named Sutapas. (See under Aditi.)

PRSNĪ II. An ancient sage. He approached Drona during the Kurupiṇḍava battle and commanded him to stop the battle. (Śloka 34, Chapter 190, Drona Parva.) He attained svarga by the power of his penance. (Chapter 26, Sānti Parva.)

PRSNIGARBHA. A name of Mahāviṣṇu. There are two opinions in the Purāṇas regarding how Viṣṇu got this name.

1) In the early part of the period of Svāyambhuvah Manu the Prājāpati named Sutapas and his wife Prśī did penance for twelve thousand divine years to get Viṣṇu as their son. As a result of that Viṣṇu was born in the womb of Prśī as Prśīnīgarbha. The name was suited for Śrī Kṛṣṇa the incarnation of Viṣṇu also. (Chapter 3, 10th Skandha, Bhāgavata.)

2) Anna (rice), Veda, Jala (water) and āmṛta (nectar) are called Prśīni and so Mahāviṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) who bears these inside is called Prśīnīgarbha. (Śloka 45, Chapter 342, Śānti Parva.)

PKTĀNA. The name of a division of the army. (See under Aksaunjha.)

PRṬHĀ. See under Kuntī.

PRṬHĀŚVA. An ancient king who worships Yama. (Śloka 19, Chapter 9, Sāṁhā Parva.)

2) Birth and Coronation. Sutānī, wife of Anga, was the eldest daughter of Yama. Vena was born of her. Vena was the grandson of Yama, because of hereditary traits from his grandfather, was very wicked even from birth. When Vena was crowned king by the mahārsis and he became the supreme lord of the world he announced to the world thus: “Yāgas should not be performed; gifts should not be given; no kind of homa should be done. There is nobody but me to accept as Yajñapurūṣa the share of yajñas. I am the sole lord and consumer of yajñas.”

The sages were dumbfounded. They all approached Vena and impressed upon him the necessity of performing a Yāga to propitiate Mahāviṣṇu. Vena who got angry at this request of the sages told them thus: “There is nobody greater than I and I have none to be worshipped. Who is Hari, your Yajñēśvāra? (lord of the yāga). All such great powers who can bless and curse alike and such eminent deities and entities like Brahmap, Viṣṇu, Śiva, Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Varuṇa, Śrīya, Agni, Dhātā, Pūṣā, Bhūmi and Candra are merged in me, the king. Do understand this fact and obey my orders.”

Despite repeated requests Vena did not give permission to conduct a Vaiṣṇava yajña. The sages got angry and cried aloud “Kill this wicked man”, “Kill this wicked man”. Saying thus the sages killed Vena by Kusa grass made sacred and powerful by mantras—Vena, who was spiritually dead because of his contempt of the gods even before. Then the sages saw dust rising in columns from all sides and asked the people the cause of the same. The people said “When they knew that there was no king poor people have turned themselves into rogues and are plundering the wealth of the rich. The swift movements of these running in haste are raising dust from the ground below.”

The rṣis conferred together and to get a son from the dead Vena they churned the thigh of the wicked king. Then from the thigh came out a short and black (as black as a burnt pillar) man with a compressed face who stood before the sages in distress and asked “What am I to do?” The sages said ‘Nīṣāḍa’ meaning ‘sit down’. He thus became Nīṣāḍa (an illiterate forest-dweller). He went to the mountain of Vindhyā and along with him went all the sins of Vena. Nīṣādhas thereafter are said to be those who have destroyed the sins of Vena.

Then the sages churned the right hand of Vena and from it came out a brilliant boy of great strength and power and he was named Prṭhu. At the time of his birth there dropped from heaven the divine bow Ajagava and many powerful arrows and a divine armour. All animate objects of the world were happy at his birth. Vena attained svarga for having delivered such a brilliant son. For the coronation of Prṭhu the oceans brought very many precious diamonds and the rivers holy water. Brahmā along with Āṅgirases came and crowned Prṭhu as the emperor. Brahmā saw the line of Candra in his right hand and was, therefore, pleased to know that he was part of Mahāviṣṇu. Thus Prṭhu, valiant and brilliant, was crowned their emperor by the virtuous people of Bhārata.

He united his people by his love for them. When he travelled through the ocean the water stood still and when he travelled on land the mountains gave way and his flag-pole was never obstructed anywhere.

3) Sūta-Māgadhas. Brahmā performed a yāga as soon as Prthu was born. From that yāga was born a very wise and intelligent demon named Sūta. A scholarly Māgadha also was born from the yāga. The mahārṣis commanded the Sūta-Māgadhas to praise Prthu and they then said “Oh revered sages, we do not know anything good or bad about this king just born. He has not earned a name or fame. Then on what basis are we to sing praises about him?” The mahārṣis said that they should praise him for the qualities he should have in future. Prthu heard that and feeling elated decided to become a very virtuous emperor. When Prthu was thinking like that the Sūta-Māgadhas sang in melodious tones thus: “This king speaks the truth always, is charitable, is one who keeps his promises, is valiant and full of all good qualities.” Thus with the blessings and good wishes of all, Prthu started his reign.

4) Prthu attacks the Earth. The people were hungry for want of proper food crops. They approached Prthu and told him that during the short interval between Vena’s death and Prthu’s assuming charge the goddess of earth drew inside all her vegetation and so the people were put to great difficulties. They requested him to generate vegetation again.

Prthu got angry on hearing this and taking his bow Ajagava and several arrows went in search of the goddess of earth. The goddess got frightened and fled taking the form of a cow. She went to all lokas but Prthu followed her with his bow and arrows everywhere. At last desiring to escape from the arrows of such a valiant king Bhūmidevi went to him and trembling with fear said “Oh king, why do you make such a persistent attempt, to kill me which would be the great sin of Strivadha? (killing a woman).” The Rājā replied that there was no sin in killing wicked persons. The goddess asked what refuge was there for the people if the earth was destroyed. The king said that he would protect his people by the power of his yaga. Bhūmidevi was frightened and she said “Oh king, I shall give you back all I have destroyed in the form of milk. Therefore, virtuous as you are, if you are really interested in the welfare of the people I shall allow you to milk me and take back everything you want. Do bring a calf.”

5) Prthu milks the Earth. Prthu by the end of his bow put in arrangement at one place the thousands of mountains which were lying scattered over the country. The grounds were not even and so there were formerly no divisions into villages and towns. There were no grain-plants like paddy or wheat, no agriculture, no cow-protection and no trade. It was since the time of Prthu that all these came into being. People desired to live in places where the grounds were even. Then the people lived on fruits, leaves and roots. When they were all destroyed people found it difficult to live.

Therefore Prthu making Śvāyambhuva Manu as calf milked for the welfare of his people all plants from the earth. People do live even today by what was milked then. Prthu, because he gave life to Bhūmidevi, became her father and she got the name Prthvi.

The brahmin sages milked the cow of earth again. Then Agastya became the calf and Bṛhaspati milked. When the planets milked, Candra became the calf and again Bṛhaspati milked. The devas even now feed on the Uṛjākṣīra (milk rich in food value) they got then. All the animals live because of their virtue and truth. The rāṣṭras milked truth and virtue. The manes made Yama the calf and Antaka the milker. They milked Svadhā in a silver pot. The cobras and serpents making Takṣaka the calf milked poison making Dvīṭarastra the milker. They live by their poison which is their great defence also. The dānavas and dānavaus using Virocana as calf and making the two-headed Rtvik Madhu as the milker milked jointly courage, valour and the sarvaśatrūvināśini māya (māya, the destroyer of all enemies). They milked in an iron pot. All their knowledge, bodily health, strength, vigour, brilliance and valour are made from this and that is why they are adepts in the art of māya even now.

Yakṣas milked in an iron pot milk that disappeared from the earth. Rajatanabhā milked using Vaishravaṇa as calf. That Yakṣarājaputra was sarvajña (knowing all) and Sarvadharmajña (conversant with all charitable things) with two heads and eight hands. The rákṣasas, pīśacās and wicked maruts using Rajatanābha as milker and Sumālī as the calf milked blood in a pot made of a skull. They live on this.

The Gandharvas and nymphs using lotus as their pot, Surucī as milker and Citraratha as calf milked music from her. The mountains making Mahāmeru as milker and Himalayas as the calf milked diamonds and medicines. The sacred trees made Sāla the milker and plāka the calf and milked in a pot of pālāśa Chinmaḍgadha-prarohana (the power of growing again even if cut or burnt). The siddhaguhvayacakrāraṇavidādharaśtras also milked her each using different pots, calves and milkers and they all got what they wanted.

6) Aśvamedha. Prthu’s land became rich and prosperous. Then he performed an Aśvamedha. The Yāga horse was led by Vijitāśva, son of Prthu. Indra did not like Prthu conducing the yāga. Indra hid at a place on the path of the yāga horse. The sage Atri helped Indra. Indra bound the horse and a fight ensued between Indra and Vijitāśva in which Indra was deplorably defeated and confessing his guilt he craved for pardon and Prthu granting him pardon became his great friend. (4th Skandha, Bāhagavata).

7) Prthu’s rule. In the history of Bharata the period of Prthu’s rule is considered a golden period. When Prthu became the emperor, Brahmā divided the universe into several kingdoms and made a separate ruler for each of them. Some was appointed King of the stars, planets, brahmins, plants, yāgas and austerities. He appointed Kubera as the lord of Kings, Varuna as the lord of all waters, Viṣṇu, as the lord of all ādītvas and Pāvaka as the lord of all Vasus. Dakṣa was given lordship over prajāpatis, Indra over maruts, and Prahlāda over all dānivas and dānavas. Yama, the Dharmarāja was made lord of the manes. Airāvata was made King of all elephants and Garuḍa King of all birds. Uccaiśravas was made King of all horses and Vṛṣabha of all cattle. The lion was made King of all beasts and Himavān the lord of all immovable things. Kapila became chief of all sages and the tiger the leader of all beasts with nails and snouts. Plakṣa was made the King of all trees. After distributing kingdoms thus, Brahmā appointed Dikpālakas (guardians of the zones). In the east he posted Sudhanvā, son of Vairājaprajāpati, in the south he posted Saṅkhapaḍa son of Kardama-prajāpati, in the west he put Ketumā, son of Rajas and in the north Hiranyaromā. Thus Brahmā organised a universe with suitable emperors to control and supervise. (Chapter 22, Aṅī’a 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

8) The end of Prthu. After several years of benign rule Prthu became old. He then entrusted the affairs of the state to his son Vijitāśva and left for penance with his wife Arccis. After doing severe penance for a long time he merged with Parabrahman. Arccis who was all along serving her husband with devotion ended her life by jumping into the funeral pyre of her husband following her husband like Lakṣmī following Viṣṇu.

9) Prthu’s sons. Prthu had five sons named Vijitāśva, Haryaka, Dhūmrakēśa, Vṛka and Dravina. The eldest of these Vijitāśva, with the help of his brothers ruled the country. Haryaka ruled over the east, Dhūmrakēśa over the south, Vṛka, west and Dravina, north. (Padma Purāṇā).

PRTHU II. A virtuous brahamin of good conduct. Once when Prthu was travelling he met five ugly devils. They became devils for their sins of not doing any charity and behaving rudely with beggars. Prthu gave them advice on āhāra (food), ācāra (conduct) and vrata (vow) so that they might get salvation from their devil-lives. (Chapter 27, Śrṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PRTHUDAKA. A sacred pond on the borders of Kurukṣetra. This is one of the celebrated tirthās of Bhārata. He who bathes in this pond would get the benefit of doing an āsvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva; Chapter 39, Śalya Parva).

PRTHUDARA. A celebrated Yaka. This Yaka got a daughter named Saudāmini. Her father took her to different mountains to entertain her. One day when she was playing with her companion Kapi-abhrū she met a Yakasputra named Attaḥāśa. They fell in love and Saudāmini’s father agreed to their marriage and fixed it. After fixing the marriage Prthudara took her daughter to his house. Next day her companion Kapi-abhrū came to Saudāmini in a sorrowful mood and when she asked her the reason she said ‘Friend, how am I to report to you this sad news. On my way to you I passed through a garden named Citrasthala in the valley of the Himālayas. To have some sport with the love-stricken Attaḥāśa his friends staged a drama in which Attaḥāśa was made Vaiśravānārāja and his brother Dīpta-ikha, Nalakūbara, and the rest, his ministers. They were thus acting and enjoying when Nalakūbara himself came that way and seeing his servant Attaḥāśa in the robes and form of his father was angry and calling Attaḥāśa to his side said: ‘A servant like you is ambitious of becoming a king. Let this ambition be the cause of your downfall. You will be born as man.” Attaḥāśa was shocked and he craved pardon “Oh Lord, I did this only for some entertainment. I did not do it with any desire for a big position. Pardon me for my mistake. Nalakūbara then by his divine power understood everything and taking pity on him consoled him and said “She with whom you are in love will be your wife in your life as man. Your brother Dīpta-ikha will then be born as your son. Both of you will then be released from the curse. Dīpta-ikha after ruling the country for some time will also be free from this curse.” Attaḥāśa and Dīpta-ikha soon disappeared by the power of the curse. Attaḥāśa was born as king of Trigarta in the name of Pavitradhara and Saudāmini became his wife. A son was born to them named Dīptaśīkha and as soon as he was born the parents were released from the curse and entered heaven. (Śaṅkāvatīlambaka, Kāthāsarit-sāgara, Tarāṅga 6).

PRTHUDARBHA. A king of the race of Aṅga. (Chapter 277, Agni Purāṇa).

PRTHURĪVRA. When Rāma and Laksmana were staying in Pañcavaṭī a demoness named Šūranakā made approaches to them and Laksmana cut off her limbs and sent her away. Then a rākṣasa army came under the leadership of Khara, Dūṣana and Triśiras and Prthuṛīvra was one of the twelve prominent soldiers of that army. (Sarga 26, Aranya Kāṇḍa Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRTHUKA. A devaṇa of Raivata Manvantara.

PRTHULĀKṢA. A King born of the race of Aṅga. This king lived in the court of Yama and worshipped him. (Śloka 22, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PRTHULĀṢVĀ. A king of the race of Ikṣvāku. He was the son of Prthu and father of Adra. (Chapter I, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

PRTHURĀṢMI. One of those who are named ‘Yati’. The Yatis were a people of anti-yajñā feelings and were all burnt to death in Indra’s fire of wrath. But three yatīs, Bhādgrī, Rayovāja and Prthūrāṣmi were taken care of by Indra and Indra taught them Brahma-vidyā, Kṣatriyavidyā and Vaṣāyavidyā. Prthuṛāṣmi compelled Indra to grant him Kṣatratcjas also along with Kṣatriyavidyā. There is now a sāma even in the name of Prthuṛāṣmi. (Pañca-vīruṣa-Bṛhamāṇa).

PRTHUSENA. A King of ancient Bhārata. (5th Skandra, Bhāgavata).

PRTHUSRAVAS I. A King of Rgveda times. Indra killed the enemies of this King. (Śūkta 116, Anuvāka 17, Mandala I, Rgveda).

PRTHUSRAVAS II. Father of Kāmā, wife of king Ayutanāyi. He lived in the court of Yama. (Śloka 12, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PRTHUSRAVAS III. A sage of ancient Bhārata who was a friend of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 22, Chapter 26, Vana Parva).

PRTHUSRAVAS IV. A soldier of Subrahmanyā (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PRTHUSRAVAS V. A serpent. This serpent was present at Prabhāsātirtha to carry the soul of Balabhadrāma. to Pātāla (Śloka 15, Chapter 4, Mahuṣa Parva).

PRTHUVASTRĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanyā (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PRTHUVEGA. A King of the court of Yama. (Śloka 12, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PRTHVĪRŪPA. A beautiful king of a country called Pratiṣṭhāna. Once three wise yogins came to him and said “Oh King, we have travelled round the world. There is a princess in Muktidvipa called Rūpalatā. In beauty she will be a good match for you.” On hearing this Prthvīrūpa calling the court artist Kumāradatta to his side said “Paint a picture of mine and go along with these three sannyāsins to Muktidvīpa and give the painting in private to the princess there and also bring me an exact painting of hers."

The painter went to Muktidvīpa and the King coming to know of the talents of the artist Kumāradatta commissioned him to paint a picture of his daughter Rūpalatā. He did the work beautifully. The King was immensely pleased and he enquired if Kumāradatta had seen a suitable prince for Rūpalatā. Kumāradatta immediately showed him the portrait of Prthvirūpā. The king found the prince extremely suitable and entrusted the artist himself with the task of negotiating the marriage with Prthvirūpā. Kumāradatta returned to his King with the portrait of Rūpalatā and Prthvirūpā was infatuated with the dazzling beauty of Rūpalatā. Before long the marriage of Prthvirūpā with Rūpalatā was conducted in all grandeur. (Alaṅkāravatilambaka, Kathāsarasīgāra, Tarāṅga 1).

PRTHVITĪRTHA. A sacred pond on the borders of Kurukṣetra. He who bathes in this pond would get the benefit of doing a sahasragodāna (giving away as gift a thousand cows). (Śloka 13, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PUCCĀÑDAKA. A serpent of the family of Taksaka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpsatrala of Janamejaya. (Śloka 8, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PŪJANĪ. A bird of superior intellect. The story of Pūjani was told by Bhīma to illustrate that Kṣatriyas can never be believed.

There was once a king called Brahmadatta in the country of Kāmpilya. The King had a bird named Pūjani. Pūjani was very intelligent and all-knowing and the king treated her as his friend. Days went by and one day the queen delivered a son. At the same time Pūjani also got a child. The prince and the little bird grew up as great friends. The little bird used to bring to the prince whatever eatable it could take in its little beak. They lived as such thick chums.

One day while Pūjani was away from the cage, the prince caught hold of the little bird and strangled it to death. When Pūjani came back she found her child missing and went about crying loudly. She then knew what had happened and got very angry. She flew and pricked blind the eyes of the prince and bade farewell to the King. The parting scene was very pathetic. Pūjani declared that Kṣatriyas were not to be believed and flew away. (Chapter 139, Sānti Parva).

PŪJĀVIDHI. Chapter 155 of Agni Purāṇa states the various acts of worship that should be done daily and they are the acts of worship observed by all brahmacārins during the time of Manusmṛti.

You should rise up at Brāhmamūlūrtta. Finish your excreatory routine sitting facing north during daytime and facing south during night time. If it is at dusk or dawn it should be done as during day time. It should never be done in public roads, water or grass. Wash with sand after your excretions and then wash your teeth. After that take your bath. Baths are of six kinds: Nitya-sūna, Naimittikasūna, Kāmasya-sūna, Kriyāgasūna, Malakarsa-sūna and Kriyāsūna. Any religious act done without a bath is of no use. Therefore you should bathe early. Well-water is good for bathing, water from a fountain is better, water of a lake is much better, river-water is still better and water of a tirtha is still better. The water of the river Gaṅgā is the best.

After washing after excretions you should enter into the waters and wash again and then wash your body. While washing you should recite the following mantras "Hīraṇya-varṇah, Śanno devi, āpo hi śīhā and idam-āpah." You should submerge yourself in the waters and recite the mantras there under the water. You should also recite Aghaṁaṁśa-stūktō or the Rk named Drupada. Gāyairi should be chanted specially. After the Japa you should rub dry with a cloth your head and body and then offer water to the devas and manes. Then you should worship with water reciting Puruṣa-stūktā.

You should give way to anybody carrying a load, a pregnant woman and preceptors. Never look at the Sun at the time of rising or setting. Never look at the reflection of the moon in waters. Never look at a nude woman. Do not peep into a well. Never trample over clothes and sacred ashes. Never enter the bedroom or the treasure room of another man. Those who rub mud blocks against mud block, cut their teeth or bite their nails will perish. Never enter a house through any other opening than its proper gate. Never interrupt when others are talking. Never use the clothes of another man. Tell everybody ‘Bhadram’ ‘Bhadram’ (well well). Never speak to please anybody. Never walk on the shadow of an individual. Do not pass through the space between two respectable persons sitting and talking. Do not fall at falling stars. Never mention the name of another river while in a river. Do not scratch your body with both your hands. Never cross a river before offering water to the devas and manes. Do not throw your excretions into the waters. Never bathe naked. After bath you should pray to gods for your welfare. Never take out a garland from your body by yourself. Avoid dust from the hooves of donkeys sticking to your body. Never laugh at low-caste people, nor live with them nor live in their places. Never live in a place where there are no rivers, doctors or a king. Nor live in a place ruled by barbarous people or a woman or by a number of people together. Never talk with women during their periods of menses. If you have talked with them think of Viṣṇu. Never laugh, sneeze or yawn without covering your mouth. Wise man should hide the disgrace to one superior to himself and protect the words of the superior or his own. Never encourage too much activity of the senses nor should you check the pressure of excretions. Do not belittle even the smallest of ailments or the smallest of enemies. If you walk through public roads you should wash yourself. Never walk bearing water or fire. Do not hiss in the presence of respectable and virtuous people. Do not place one leg over the other leg. Never speak directly or indirectly things which are unpleasant to others. Avoid contempt of Vedas, Kings, sages, science and devas. Do not be jealous of women nor do place confidence in them. Always listen to virtuous talks, be devoted to the gods and observe righteous acts daily. On your birthday worship the moon, gods and brahmins. Never take an oil bath on the fourth (caturthī), sixth (saṣṭhi) and eighth (aṣṭami) days of lunar fortnight. Throw away your excretions far away from home. Never be unfriendly with venerated and noble people.
PULAHĀ. One of the Prajāpatis. The references about him in the Purāṇas are the following:

1) Pulaha was one of the spiritual sons of Brahmā. (Śloka 12, Chapter 204, Vana Parva).
2) Kṣamā, wife of Pulaha, delivered three sons named Kardama, Urvārīvān and Sahiṣṭu. (Chapter 10, Āśīra 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
3) Pulaha got of his wife Kṣamā another son named Kārmaśreṣṭha. (Chapter 20, Agni Purāṇa).
4) Pulaha is included in the group of six powerful sages. (Śloka 4, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).
5) From Pulaha were born the butterflies, lions, tigers, lambs, wolves and Kimpuruṣas. (Śloka 3, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).
6) Pulaha took part in the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Śloka 52, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).
7) Pulaha was also among the sages who dissuaded Parāśara from conducting a yāga to kill all the rākṣasas. (Śloka 9, Chapter 180, Ādi Parva).
8) Pulaha was a member of the court of Indra. (Śloka 17, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva).
9) Pulaha was a worshipper of Brahmā. (Śloka 18, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).
10) Pulaha did penance at a place on the shores of Alakanandā, a tributary of river Gaṅgā. (Śloka 6, Chapter 142, Vana Parva).
11) He took part in the Janmotsava of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).
12) Pulaha is included in the twenty one Prajāpatis. (Śloka 35, Chapter 334, Śaṅti Parva).
13) Pulaha is one among the group of Saptarṣis called Citraśikhaṇḍins. (Śloka 29, Chapter 335, Śaṅti Parva).
14) Pulaha is also one of the Aṣṭapraṇātis. (Chapter 340, Śaṅti Parva).

PULAKA. A daitya who was transformed into an animal. There is a story in the Skanda Purāṇa about him thus — Pulaka performed penance and got from Śiva a boon that he should possess astonishing smell in his body. The demon used to entice even celestial ladies by means of his smell. He thus became a menace to the three worlds. Devas complained to Śiva. Śiva got angry and commanded him to abandon his demoniac form and become an animal. Pulaka agreed to do so but requested Śiva to grant him the smell even in his state of an animal. Śiva granted that.

PULASTYA. One of the Prajāpatis.
1) Birth and marriage. Pulastya is one of the six spiritual sons of Brahmā. Pulastya was born from the Karṇa—ear—of Brahmā. (Chapter 65, Ādi Parva and Bhāgavata).

Pulastya had a son named Dattoli (Dambholi) of his wife Pritī. This Dattoli in his previous birth was the Agastya of Svāyambhuva Manvantara. (Chapter 10, Āśīra 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

Pulastya had a son named Viśravas of his wife Havirbhū. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata). Mahābhārata states that Pulastya had two wives named Sandhyā and Pṛiti. Havirbhū mother of Viśravas had another name, Mānini.

All these statements taken together indicate that Pulastya had four wives named Pṛiti, Havirbhū, Sandhyā and Pṛiti.

2) Genealogy. The race formed by Pulastya is given below: Pulastya got a son named Viśravas of his wife Havirbhū alias Mānini. Viśravas had two wives named Kaikasi and Devavarṇini alias Iliabila. Kaikasi had three sons, Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, and Vibhīṣaṇa and a daughter named Sūparṇakā. Rāvaṇa got of his wife Mandodari three sons, Meghānāda, Atīkāya and Aṣākuṭumāra. Kumbhakarṇa got of his wife Vajra-māla two sons named Kumbha and Nikumbha. Vibhīṣaṇa got of his wife Saramā seven sons. Viśravas got of his wife Iliabila a son named Viśravasāla alias Kubera.

3) Birth of Viśravas. In olden times in Tretāyuga Pulastya Mahārṣi was doing penance on Mt. Meru. On a nearby hillock the sage Tṛṇabindu was also doing penance. Celestial maidens, Nāga maidens and their lovers came to the āśrama and by their erotic sports and dances vitiated the precincts of the āśrama. Pulastya got angry and cursed all the maidens to become pregnant if they entered the āśrama area. Without knowing this curse Mānini, daughter of Tṛṇabindu came to that spot and got pregnant of Pulastya. Pulastya then married her and the celebrated Mahārṣi Viśravas was born to her.

4) How he saved Rāvaṇa. Once Rāvaṇa who started on a victory campaign met Kārttivīrjyājuna on the shores of Narmadā. Kārttivīrjyājuna chanced Rāvaṇa in the former’s prison. Pulastya was griefed much to hear about the plight of his grandson and going to Kārttivīrjyājuna and explaining things got the release of Rāvaṇa. (Chapter 46, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

5) Other details.
(i) Pulastya once blessed Parāśara for the writing of Purāṇas. (Chapter 1, Āśīra 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
(ii) Rākṣasas, Vānaras (monkeys), Kinnaras, Gandharvas and Yakṣas were born from the intelligent Pulastya. (Śloka 7, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).
(iii) He was present for the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Śloka 52, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).
(iv) Parāśara once started to perform a Yāga to destroy all the rākṣasas. Pulastya along with other sages went and persuaded him to withdraw from his venture. (Chapter 180, Ādi Parva).
(v) Pulastya was a member of the court of Indra. (Śloka 17, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva).
(vi) Pulastya sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 11, Ādi Parva).
(vii) Once Pulastya taught Bhīṣma the importance and greatness of all the holy places of Bhārata. From then onwards Pulastya is called the Guru of Bhīṣma also. (Chapter 82, Vana Parva).
(viii) Pulastya got of his wife Gau a son named Kubera. (Śloka 12, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).
(ix) Viśravas was born of half of the body of Pulastya. (Chapter 274, Śloka 13 Ādi Parva).
(x) Pulastya was present for the birth day celebrations of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 43, Salya Parva).
(xi) Pulastya also visited Bhīṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 10, Chapter 47, Śaṅti Parva).
(xii) Pulastya was one among the twentyone Prajāpatis. (See under Prajāpāti).
(xiii) Pulastya is included in the group of Saptarṣis called Citraśikhaṇḍins. (Śloka 29, Chapter 335, Śaṅti Parva).
(xiv) Pulastya is one of the Aṣṭapraṇātis. (Chapter 340, Śaṅti Parva).
(xv) As synonyms of Pulastya the following terms are used: Brahmārṣi, Viprayogī. (Mahābhārata).
PULNDA(S) I. The people of the country of Pulinda. Information available regarding them from the Mahabhárata is given below:

1. Pulindas were originally Kṣatriyas. But they became Śūdras by a curse of the brahmins. (Chapter 33, Anu anśa Parva).

2. Pulindas who belong to the mleccha tribe became rulers in Kaliyuga. (Chapter 186, Vana Parva).

3. Pulindas were born from the foam of the celestial cow Nandinī of sage Vasiṣṭha when she got enraged. (Chapter 165, Āramavāśika Parva).

4. Bhīma fought against the Pulindas and destroyed all their big cities. (Chapter 26, Sabhā Parva).

5. In the great Mahābhārata battle Pulindas fought on the side of Duryodhana. (Chapter 158, Udyoga Parva).

PULNDA(S) II. A mleccha tribe of ancient Daksīna-bhārata. The Vāmāna Purāṇa gives some details regarding them.

PULINDI. See under Candāka.

PULKASA. A son born to a Kṣatriya woman of a Śūdra is called Pulkasa. (See under Cāturvarṇa).

PULOMĀ I. A demon. This asura belongs to the asura race born to Kaśyapa of Diti. This asura fell in love with Pulomi, wife of the sage Bhṛgu. (See under Cyavana). Śacīdevi, wife of Indra, was the daughter of Puloman. (Chapter 19, Agni Purāṇa).

PULOMĀ II. (PULOMI). Wife of the sage Bhṛgu. (See under Cyavana for details).

PULOMĀ III. A demoness. Her sons are called Paulomas. This Pulomā had a sister named Kālakā. Both of them together did severe penance and pleased Brahmā. They got a boon from Brahmā to the effect that their sons would never be killed. The Paulomas were given a golden city in the air to live and he declared that that city could never be destroyed by anyone. (Chapter 173, Vana Parva).

PUM, PUT, PUTRA. Pum alias Put is a hell. Those who die without children go to this hell and he who saves one from this hell is called Putra. (Śloka 38, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva).

Purnānāmo narākādyastu
Trāyate pitaṁputra/sutah/
Tasmāt putra iti praktaḥ
Svayameva svayambhuva/
(Śloka 38, Chapter 9, Manusmṛti).

(Because a son of his own, by birth, saves a father from the hell called ‘Put’ he is called Putra).

There are twelve different kinds of ‘Putras’ (sons).
1) Aurasaputra. A son born to a wife of his own caste begot by the husband himself is called aurasaputra.
2) Kṣetrajaputra. If one dies without children or is impotent or possessed of a disease, his wife is lawfully allowed to lie with the brother of the husband to get a child. The son born of such a union is called kṣetrajaputra.
3) Dattaputra. When one is worrying miserably for getting a son and if at that time a husband and wife willingly hand over a son born to them by mutual consent with the following words: “This son becomes your own from now” with a religious sprinkling of water, such a son is called Dattaputra.
4) Kṛtrimaputra. A son adopted from one’s own caste for the purpose of doing the obsequial ceremonies for the manes is called Kṛtrimaputra.
5) Gudhotpanna. A son born to one’s wife by another man is called Gudhotpanna.
6) Apaviddhaputra. When a son is rejected by either a father or mother or by both and that son is taken care of and brought up by another man, that son becomes an apaviddhaputra.
7) Kāninaputra. If a son is born to a virgin before marriage while living with her father, that son is called a Kāninaputra.
8) Sahodhaputra. When a girl is married while pregnant the son born to her after marriage is called a Sahodhaputra.
9) Kṛitakaputra. A son purchased and brought up by a sonless man is called Kṛitakaputra.
10) Paunarbhavaputra. A son born to a woman after becoming a widow or after being divorced by her husband by her willingly going with another man is called a Paunarbhavaputra.
11) Svayanadattaaputra. When a son after becoming an orphan or after being abandoned by his parents goes willingly to another man and remains with him as his son, that son is called Svayanadattaaputra.
12) Sauḍra (Pāraśava) Putra. A son born to a brahmin of a Śūdra wife.

PUNARJANMA. It is the theory that the soul of a man is born again after his death. The Purāṇas and Vedas contain many statements regarding this of which the following are a few:

1) What is Death? When the Jīva (soul) of an individual leaves his body with all its upādhis (attributes and adjuncts) it is called Death. By upādhis are meant the following four things: (i) Mind and the senses. (ii) Five Prānas namely Prāna, Apāna, Udāna, Vyāna and Samāna. (iii) The Śūkṣma arira, that is, the Prāṇa-manovijnānakāra ashāgāta (the subtle body that is invisible with the grosser elements). (iv) Karman (action). All these four things follow the soul even after his death. Only when the soul attains mokṣa (salvation) do the upādhis leave it. It is the breath Udāna that guides the soul out of the body. It is the Śūkṣmaśārīra that gives heat to the body while there is life and that is why when the soul leaves the body with the upādhis the body becomes cold.

2) After death. When the soul leaves the body with the upādhis it becomes active again and its activities and movements depend upon the actions of the soul while living. The spiritual actions of the individual are classified into three.

(i) Aparabrāhmaṇopāsana. He who has done all his deeds according to scriptural injunctions is said to be one who has done upāsana of aparabrahma. When such an individual dies his soul with all the upādhis attains Candra, He goes to Candra through dhūma (smoke), rātri (night), Kṛṣṇa-paśaka (the dark fortnight), daksīnakāla (the sun’s passage south of the equator), pīṭloka (world of the manes) and Ākāśa (ether). He enjoys the rewards of the deeds done on earth there and reserving some to be enjoyed or suffered in his next birth the soul with the upādhis comes back to earth to enter another body. The soul comes back to earth through ether, vāyu, dhūma, megha, varṣa, vṛti, yava, aṣadhī, vṛkṣa, Tilā, Purusābija and strigarbha.

When the Jīva (soul) goes to Candra its padārthatva (attribute) diminishes gradually and when it comes back to earth it increases gradually. Thus the jīva (soul) takes thousands of births going to and from the moon. The jîvâtmā coming back from the moon evolves from a plant to man. Plants are the food of man and the soul entering the plant enters the puruṣâbhinâ (semen virile) through food. The souls coming out as rebirths do accept wombs according to a definite principle. In the order of the merit of their good deeds on earth they are born in Brahmin, Kṣatriya, Vaiśya or Śūdra wombs. The souls with great sins are born as worms and insects. This passive of the soul from earth to Candra and vice versa is called Pitryāna.

(i) Aparavidyopāśana. There are some people who do not consider performance of religious rites as important but worship Brahman. They do not treat Brahman and jîvâtmā as one but view them as separate entities. Such devotees are called Aparavidyopāśakas. Their souls as soon as they leave the body move towards aparabrahma. The path to aparabrahma is through Agni, Jyotis, daytime, Suklapaksa (the white fortnight), Uttarāyaṇa (the passage of the sun to the north), samvat-sara (year), Sūrya (sun), Candra (moon) and Vidyut (lightning). The dhanyas (blessed ones) who attain Vidyut go to Varunaloka, Indraloka and Prajāpatiloka and then merge with aparabrahma (the supreme being). This path is called Devayāna. Since for both Pitryāna and Devayāna the jîvâtmā has to depend upon Candra it is to be surmised that there is some special connection between jîvâtmā and Candra. Those who attain Aparabrahma by the path of devayāna do not come back to earth. They have no rebirths. Those who have merged with aparabrahma attain Brahman by the end of a lifetime of Brahms. Thus those who attain Brahman and do not believe that jîvâtmā and Brahman are one and view them separately attain Parabrahma through the merger with aparabrahma. This is called Kramamukti. Some sages are of opinion that those who attain aparabrahma enjoy prosperity by mind. Those who live attached to worldly pleasures but not do things prohibited by the Vedas attain Pitṛloka by the path of Daksināyana. After enjoying all the accrued ‘punya’ they come back again to earth to be born again.

(iii) Pāpopāsana. The jîvâtmā of one who does not follow the injunctions of śāstras correctly does not follow Candraloka. It is born again as pests and insects attaining a place called Trīṭiya. There is no evidence in the Purāṇas of their attaining moksa. How a soul subjected to rebirths attains moksa is described under ‘Mokṣa’. (Chāndogya Upaniṣad, Gītā, Bhāgavata, Śvetāvästrara Upaniṣad).

PUNARVASU ĀTREYA An ancient preceptor of Āyurveda. He was the Guru of Agnieva author of the book ‘Agniśeṣatantra’ which is the basis of Carakasanihitâ and also of his classmates like Bhela. Punarvasu was the son of the sage Atri who was one of the spiritual sons of Brahms. In support of this statement it can be found in many places in Carakasanihitâ his name referred to as ‘Atrisuta’ or Atrimandana.

Atri maharṣi was also a learned preceptor of Āyurveda. According to Kaśyapasanihitâ Devendra taught Āyurveda to Kaśyapa, Vasiṣṭha, Atri and Bhṛgu. The incomplete work ‘Āyurveda-ākṣīṣatantra’ by Atri was completed by Punarvasu according to Aṣvaghōṣa.

Punarvasu’s mother’s name was Candrabhāgā. Getting knowledge in Āyurveda from his father and also from Bharadvāja, Punarvasu became an authority on Āyurveda. His important work is ‘Aṭreyasanihitâ’. There are about thirty prescriptions in his name. The prescriptions regarding ‘Bālātaila’ and ‘Aṃḍātaila’ are found in Carakasanihitâ.

I’UNASCANDRA. A sacred place. This is situated in the Jamadagnividi in Śūrprakāṣṭera. (Sloka 108, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

PUNCU. A King of Sūryavānša (solar race). He was the son of Harita and father of Vijaya. (Brahmaṇḍa Purâṇa, Chapter 1).

PUNAḌARIKI. I. A King loan of the race of Śī Rāma. He was the son of Niṣadha and father of Kṛṣṇadhanva. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. II. One of the Aṣṭadigajas (elephants guarding the eight zones). (See under Aṣṭadigajas).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. III. A brahmin who lived during the period of Nārada. Nārada once held a scholarly conversation with him on virtue. He saw Mahāviṣṇu in person and attained sāyujya (intimate union with a deity). (Chapter 124, Anuṣāsana Parva).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. IV. A great yājñī. (Sloka 100, Chapter 5, Sabhā Parva).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. V. A holy place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. One who bathes in a sacred pond there would get the benefit of doing a Punarihakajya. (Sloka 89, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. VI. A nymph. This maiden was present for the Jambomtsava of Arjuna and performed a dance then. (Sloka 13, Chapter 122, Aḍī Parva).

PUNAḌARIKAMUKHA. An eminent serpent King. His subjects, Punarihakamukhas, lived with him in the beautiful serpent-city surrounded on all sides by gold castles. Gandharvas and Kinnaras of both sexes lived inside the city. A Gandharva of name Lalita fell in love with a Gandharva lady named Lalitā and they lived there happily enjoying amorous sports. One day Punarihakamukha held a music concert in which Lalita was asked to sing as the leading musician. His love Lalitā was absent at the assembly and Lalita could not sing or dance in proper form that day. Karkaṭaka, a serpent chief, privately informed his King the reason for the poor display of Lalita that day. The King got angry and cursed Lalita thus: “Wicked one, you will be born as a man-eating rākṣasa. This is the penalty for thinking about your wife while singing for me.” Lalita immediately became an ugly, fierce-looking demon. Lalitā deeply mourned over this pitiable plight of her husband and followed him in the forests where he roamed about making loud roaring sounds. While they were thus wandering in the forests, they found a pretty āśrama in which there was an ascetic engaged in penance. Lalitā stood before him with tears rolling down her cheeks. When the sage opened his eyes Lalitā told him that she was the daughter of the Gandharva named Viradhavā and that her husband had become a demon by the curse of the serpent King Punarihakamukha. The sage advised her to observe Ekādaśi Vṛata. She observed the Vṛata with devotion and her husband Lalita, was freed from the curse. He became the former handsome Gandharva once again. They then went back to Gandharvaloka. (Chapter 49, Bhāga 4, Padma Purāṇa).
PUNḌARĪYAKA. A Vīvadeva. (Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).
PUNDRA I. An ancient King in Bhārata. (Śloka 224, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).
PUNDRA II. An ancient region of Bhārata. The region comprised then the present district of Mālāda, certain portions on the east coast of river Kosi and certain portions of Dinājpur. King Pāṇḍu conquered Pundra. (Chapter 112, Ādi Parva). The people of Pundra came to the Rājasūya of Yudhishthira with presents. The Paṇḍrakavāsudeva mentioned in the Bhāgavata was the King of Pundra. Kārṇa and Arjuna conquered this country at different times. (Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva; Chapter 8, Kārṇa Parva; Chapter 82, Āśvamedhikā Parva).

PUNJIKASTHALĀ. A nymph. She was the servantmaid of Bṛhaspati. One day she was collecting flowers for her Guru in a garden when a set of young men and women came to the garden for amorous sports. They were roaming about in the garden in pairs doing all sorts of erotic acts and Punjikasthalā stood watching them for some time with passion aroused in her. She returned to the āśrama thinking all the way about her miserable lot of having no husband to enjoy a similar life. She was full of lust when she returned to the āśrama and on seeing Bṛhaspati she caught hold of him by the hand and pleaded to satisfy her passion. Bṛhaspati was angry at this improper request and cursed her "You have become rotten. You have become lustful by seeing the amorous sports of others. May you be born as a monkey. Get out of this āśrama." Punjikasthalā came to her senses and regretting her hasty act begged her Guru to grant her release from the curse. Bṛhaspati felt pity on her and said "Go and enjoy to your full sexual life with a lover whom you like best. Then you will get a son from the vitality of Śiva. When that son is born you will be released from the curse and you will go to heaven.''

She became immediately a monkey girl named Aṇjānā and started living in a forest of that name itself. She fell in love with a monkey boy named Kesari there and lived for many years enjoying an amorous life. She did not get a child even after several years and then she prayed to Śiva for a child. It was at that time that Pārvatī and Paramevara played amorous sports in the form of monkeys and Pārvatī became pregnant. Pārvatī expressed reluctance to be the mother of a monkey child and then Śiva by his divine powers deposited his semen virile through Vāyubhagavān (god of wind) into the womb of Aṇjānā who was then praying to him for a child. Coming to know of this through Nārada and fearing that his lordship over the monkeys would be lost if such a monkey were born to Aṇjānā Bāli poured into the belly of Aṇjānā molten liquid of pañcaloha (five metals). Aṇjānā was not the least injured and she gave birth in due course to a monkey son who became the celebrated Hanumān, the life-force of the Rāma-Rāvaṇa tussle. (Pūrvakānda, Kamba Rāmâyana; Kiskindhā Kānda, Vālmiki Rāmâyana).

This Punjikasthalā belongs to the famous set of eleven devakanyākas. They are: Menakā, Sahajānyā, Karnikā, Punjikasthalā, Rūṣṭhalā, Ghaṛtāci, Pūrvacitti, Ullocā, Pralocā, Urvaśī and Viśvācī. These were the celebrated courtisans of Svaroga. (Chapter 123, Ādi Parva).

Punjikasthalā was the dancer at the court of Kubera. (Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva). She took part in the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PUNTĀNAM NAMBĪTIRI.

1) General information. The illam (house) of this Nambītiri who was a contemporary of Meppattur Nārāyaṇa Bhāṭṭatiri was in Nemmeni aīśa of the taluk of Valluvanādu in south Malabar. Though some say that his original name was Brahmadatta there are no sufficient records to support the statement. His Guru according to the work Śrī Kṛṣṇakārṇa was a nambītiri named Nīlakaṇṭha. Puntānām had only ordinary education. He worshipped Kṛṣṇa at the temple of Guruvāyur for a very long time and became a great devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He lived for ninety years. When he became very old he found it difficult to come to Guruvāyur for worship and so one day he bade farewell to the deity. Then a voice from heaven said "Do not worry. I will be near you on your left side." He went and sat on a hill named Tirumāndham and to his astonishing ecstasy he found Kṛṣṇa sitting on his left side. He then constructed a temple there and installed his deity Kṛṣṇa there and continued his worship. That was the Vānapura (left place) of Puntānām.

2) Kṛtis (works). The following are the works of Puntānām: (i) Bhaṣākārṇāṃtra (ii) Kumārāharanam (Pāna) (iii) Jñānapāna (iv) Pārthasārathistava (v) Ghanasangha (vi) Nārāyaṇakirtanas (vii) Govindakirtana (viii) Anbandantiya (ix) Dvāśaśākaraṇākirtana (x) Śrīkṛṣṇakirtana (xi) Aṣṭākaraṇakirtana (xii) Brahmaparagovindakirtana (xiii) Gopālaκṛṣṇakirtana (xiv) Gaurikirtana (xv) Vāmāpureśakirtana (xvi) Padamanabhaκirtana (xvii) Vivekodayakirtana (xviii) Jayaκṛṣṇakirtana (xix) Viṭakkolκirtana (xx) Śrī Rama Kirtana (xxi) Mukundakirtana (xxii) Daśāvatārastotra. Besides these he has composed some philosophical songs in Tamil also.

3) Jñānapāna. Puntānām got a son after a long time of prayer and for the ceremony of Annappāna (feeding rice for the first time) all the people of his community were invited. The women who came for the function threw their upper garments on to the cradle where the little child was suffocated to death. Puntānām thereafter became disgusted with life and Jñānapāna was written at that time.

4) Santānagopālam. Puntānām spent most of his time in the temple of Guruvāyur after the death of his child. It was at that same time that the great scholar Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭatiri, author of the famous Nārāyaṇiya, was in the temple worshipping the deity there. Puntānām had written a poem Santānagopālam in the pāna style and he took it to the great pandit Nārāyaṇa Bhāṭṭatiri for correction. With the haughtiness that was his trait he said "What is there for correction in a Malayālam poem? Nothing but blunders will there be in it. Especially when Puntānām is not well-versed in Sanskrit grammar. It will therefore be full of mistakes," Puntānām could not contain the rebuff and he wept bitterly. Then from the inside of the temple came a voice which said "Though Puntānām is not a grammarian like you Bhāṭṭatiri, he is a greater devotee of mine than you. His Bhakti is more appealing to me than your vibhakti." The divine voice made Bhāṭṭatiri feel sorry and ashamed of his behaviour and he begged Puntānām to grant him pardon and immediately went through his work giving suggestions for improvement.

18. PUNYA I Son of the sage Dirghatamas. The story of Punya as found in Juñánavâsishtha is the following:— There is a mountain called Mahendra in Jambudvipa. Dirghatamas who was doing penance there had two sons named Punya and Pâvana. Punyakumâra grew up into a boy abounding in virtues. Pâvana was not so broad-minded. When after some time Dirghatamas, their father died, Punyakumâra controlling his sorrow did all the funeral rites; but Pâvana unable to control his sorrow left the place and wandered in the forests weeping bitterly. After some days Punyakumâra went in search of his brother and on finding him consoled him and told him that there was nothing to be worried about their father’s death. On hearing the learned and moral teachings of Punya, Pâvana also got enlightened and after living in that forest for a number of years both of them abandoned their lives.

19. PUNYA II The name of the aśrama of the sage Vîbhâñjaka. (Sloka 23, Chapter 110, Vana Parva).

20. PUNYAJANA. A râkṣasa. Raivata, king of Kuśasthali, born of the race of Sâryâti, went to see Brahman. Taking advantage of his absence from the place Pûnya-jana took control over Kuśasthali. Afraid of the demon all the hundred brothers of Raivata left the country. After some time the Sâryâti dynasty merged with that of Hehaya. (Chapter 2, Arîha 4, Viśnu Purâṇa).

21. PUNYAJANI. Wife of Manîbhadra, one of the Sivapârasâdas. Her father’s name was Krûstuthâ. Manîbhadra got thirteen sons of Punya-janâ. (Chapters 3 and 7, Brahmanâda Purâṇa).

22. PUNYAKRT. A Viśvadeva. (Sloka 30, Chapter 91, Anuśasana Parva).

23. PUNYANÂMA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

24. PUNYANIDHI. A king of the lunar race. The king was a great devotee of Viṣṇu and he went to Râmâśvara to do worship of Viṣṇu there. Pleased with the pure devotion of the king Mahâviṣṇu started living at Râmâyâra under the name of Setumâdhava. (Chapter 3, Skanda Purâṇa).

25. PUNYÂSILA. A brahmin who was residing on the banks of the river Godâvari. Once Pûnya-sîla engaged a brahmin widower for officiating in a Śrâddha ceremony. As a result of that sin Pûnya-sîla’s face became that of a donkey. To be freed from the sin he went and bathed in the Sâvitrîthra and Âkâśa-âgâthîthra of Venkâślaca. His sin was washed away and his face regained its original form. (Chapter 2, Skanda Purâṇa).

26. PUNYAŚRAVAS. A sage. This mahârâja who was a great devotee of Viṣṇu was born to the brother of Nanda gopa, during the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Kâraṇa, as a daughter named Lavaṅgâ. (Pâtala Khânqâha, Padma, Purâṇa Chapter 72).

27. PUNYÂTOYĀ. A river seen by the sage Mârkaṇḍeya when he moved about inside the belly of Bâlâmukunda. (See under Mârkaṇḍeya).

28. PURA. A demon.

29. PURAMÂLINI. A river of Purânic fame. (Sloka 21, Chapter 9, Bhishma Parva).

30. PURANDARA I. Indra.

31. PURANDARA II. Tapa, son of the agni called Pâncayâna. Indra once became the son of this Purandara. (Sloka 3, Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

32. PURANDARA III. The name of Indra in Vaivasvata Manvantara. (See under Manvantara). In Matsya Purâṇa Purandara has been considered to be one among the eighteen Vâstu-âsrakâras (advisers in house building). The other seventeen are: Bhûgu, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvakarma, Maça, Nârada, Nagnajît, Viśâlaksha, Brahman, Kumâra, Nandiṣa, Saunaka, Garga, Viśveuda, Sukra, Brahma and Aniruddâ. (Matsya Purâṇa, Chapter 252, verses 2 and 3).

33. According to Mahâbhîrata Lord Sîva wrote a book “Viśâlaksha” containing ten thousand chapters dealing with Dharmarâthakâm. Purandara condensed it into a book of five thousand chapters called ‘Bhûbudanta’. Purandara gave that book that name in honour of his mother who was called Bûbudantâ. (Chapters 59, 89 and 90, Sânti Parva).

34. PURANJANA. A king. The story of this king was told to king Prâcinâbarhit by Nârada to illustrate the truth that those who kill yajña cows on earth would surely suffer its consequences at one time or another. Puranjanâ once started on a tour after killing a few yajña cows. His aim was to build a new palace. After walking alone for a long time he reached the neighbourhood of Himâlayas. While wandering in the forests he saw a beautiful garden and by its side a big castle with nine tower-gates. It was the residence of the Gandharva lady Puranjanî. She had innumerable girl companions and her castle was guarded by a five-hooded cobra called Prajâgiri.

Puranjani fell in love with Puranjanâ at first sight and their greetings and subsequent talks ended in their marriage. Thus Puranjanâ became the husband of Puranjanî and they lived happily an erotic life for a hundred years. Then one day the king went for hunting alone. Even that separation for a little while from Puranjanî was unbearable to Puranjanâ and he returned to his palace soon. Puranjanî did not come to receive him. On enquiry her companions informed the king that Puranjanî was lying on the floor with grief unable to bear the separation from the king. Puranjanâ consoled her and they lived again for many years in perfect happiness. Then one thing happened.

Kâla had a daughter named Kâlakanyâka who lived a very wicked and vicious life. She wanted to get married but nobody wanted to be her husband. She went about in search of a husband. Pûru became her husband for some time but she was soon divorced by him. She approached a Yavana king named Bhaya who had a brother called Prajâvara. Bhaya did not want to take that woman as his wife and so sent her back with a boon that she could stand in hiding and enjoy all men she liked. He sent his brother Prajâvara for her help. She roamed about like that for some time and came back again to Bhaya. Kâlakanyâka, Bhaya and Prajâvara joined together and gathering a strong army attacked Puranjanâ. A grim battle followed which lasted for several years in the end of which Puranjanâ was defeated and taken captive. While he was being taken as a prisoner a herd of wild cows attacked Puranjanâ and he was killed. After that he was born as a princess named Vaidarbhî. Malayadwâja, king of Pândya, married her and got seven celebrated sons. Agastya married the daughter of Malayadwâja. (4th Skanda, Bhâgavata).

35. PURANJAYA. A king of Ayodhya. See under Kâkutstha.
1) General information. The Amarakośa describes a Purāna thus:

Sargaśca pratisargaśca
Varṇīśo manvantarāṇi ca / Varṇīśānuccaritān cāpi
Purāṇam pañcalakṣaṇam //

According to this definition, Purāṇa is one which describes Sarga, Pratisarga, Varṇīśa, Manvantara and Varṇīśānuccarita. Among these Sarga and Pratisarga are natural creation and renovation (Cosmogony). Varṇīśa means history of sages and patriarchs. By Manvantara is meant the period of different Manus. Varṇīśānuccarita means Genealogy of kings. In the Purāṇas which are current now some of these five divisions are wanting.

Statements about Purāṇas are found even in the Brāhmanas. Therefore it is to be surmised that Purāṇas existed even before historic times. Mahābhārata has used the term Purāṇa to mean stories about devas and siddhas. The Upaniṣads say that Purāṇas are itihāsas and as such constitute the fifth Veda. Śrīmānti says that Purāṇas are commentaries on Vedas. From all these statements it can be gathered that Purāṇas have a hoary past. The great Sanskrit scholar Raṅgacārya has defined Purāṇa as Purā nava (Purā = old; nava = new) meaning things which are as good as new though existing from olden times. Though there are large portions of wide imagination dealing with the human side in the Purāṇas many truths about the universe can be grasped from them. All the Purāṇas contain praises of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Mahēśvara. In most of the Purāṇas of old, new additions and interpolations are seen. The Purāṇas in original were in existence before Christ.

Akhāyānaśācyupākhyānair
Gāthābhīṣ Kapaśuddhibhīṣ /
Purānaṁ sānhiḥ tām cakre
Purāṇārthavaiśāradāḥ //

(Śloka 15, Chapter 6, Aṇिś 3, Viṣṇu Purāṇa)

Aṣṭādaśa Purāṇāni
Kṛtvā Satyaavatātāḥ /
Bhāratākhyānamakhilaṁ
Cakre tadupābhiḥanām //

(Śloka 70, Chapter 53, Māṣya Purāṇa)

From the above it can be gathered that it was Vyāsa who composed all the Purāṇas. Bāna who lived in the seventh century A.D. speaks about Vaiyu Purāṇa. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa who lived in the eighth century and Saṅkarācārya who lived in the ninth century speak about the Purāṇas. Purāṇas must have therefore taken their present forms before the sixth or seventh century A.D. There are eighteen major Purāṇas and another eighteen minor ones. The major Purāṇas contain over four lakhs of Ślokas. All the Purāṇas are in verses like Mahābhārata. But none of them is as good as Mahābhārata as a piece of literature. Still the Purāṇas splendidly reflect the culture of Bhārata. The Purāṇas are the basis of the bulk of Indian thinking on matters social, cultural, religious and political. Even the Indian art has taken form from the Purāṇas. The Purāṇas are classified into three, those pertaining to Brahmā, those pertaining to Viṣṇu and those to Śiva.

2) A. Viṣṇu-based Purāṇas.

(i) Viṣṇu Purāṇa. This is one of the most important of all the Purāṇas. This contains the five technical divisions of the Purāṇas. This is divided into six amās. This deals with the events of Vārāhakaḷpa and contains two thousand Ślokas. The theme is the ten incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu. Viṣṇu Purāṇa is the most ancient of all the Purāṇas and has got the name Purāṇaratna (gem of Purāṇas).

The method of narration is in the form of teaching his disciple Maitreya by sage Paśarara. Since there is a reference in it to the Maurya dynasty it is to be surmised that this was composed in the first or second century A.D. The narrator himself states thus: "Vyāsa an adept in the composition of Purāṇas composed this Purāṇasamhitā with ākhyānas, Upākhyānas, gāthās and Kalpanirnayas. A Śūta named Rohmaharṣana was Vyāsa's chief disciple. The broad-minded Vyāsa gave that samhitā to that sūta. Rohmaharṣana had six disciples named Sūmitra, Agnivarcas, Mitrāyus, Śaṃśāpayana, Ākṛtvārana, and Sāvarni. Of these Ākṛtvārana, Sāvarni and Śaṃśāpayana born in the Kaśyapa gotra have composed Purāṇasamhitās. There is yet another saṁhitā composed by Rohmaharṣana which was the basis of the saṁhitās of his three disciples. I have composed Viṣṇupurāṇa basing on the above four saṁhitās."

If a man gives as gift a book of Viṣṇu Purāṇa on the full moon day in the month of Āśadha (July) with Jaladhenu he will attain Viṣṇupāda.

(ii) Bhāgasuta Purāṇa. This is the most popular and widely circulated of all the Purāṇas. It is dear to Viṣṇu-devotees. Divided into twelve Sāṅkhas this contains eighteen thousand Ślokas. All the incarnations of Viṣṇu are described in this. The most interesting Skanda is the tenth Skanda in which the author has described the life and activities of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. There was once a belief that it was Baladeva who lived in the thirteenth century A.D. that had composed this Purāṇa. But this belief was smashed when it was found that Vallālasena of Bengal who lived in the eleventh century A.D. had made reference to this Purāṇa in some of his works. Bhāgavata accepts Kapila and Buddha as incarnations of Viṣṇu. This has been translated into all Indian languages. This book has to be given as gift on the full moon day in the month of Pṛṣṭhapada (September).

Agni Purāṇa instructs that this book is to be given along with a golden image of a lion.

(iii) Nārada Purāṇa. This is in the form of a narration by Nārada to Sanatkumāra. In this book of twenty-five thousand verses Nārada teaches the dharmas of Bṛhatkalpa. If this is given as gift on the full moon day in the month of Āśvina there will be great prosperity.

(iv) Garuda Purāṇa. This is in the form of instructions to Garuḍa by Viṣṇu. This deals with astronomy, medicine, grammar, and with the structure and qualities of diamonds. This Purāṇa is dear to Vaiṣṇavites. The latter half of this Purāṇa deals with life after death. The Hindus of north-India generally read this Purāṇa while cremating the bodies of the dead. This has given great importance to the origin of Garuḍa. There are eight thousand verses in this book. This book should be given as gift along with an image in gold of a swan to get prosperity.

(v) Padma Purāṇa (Pāṭama Purāṇa). This book is divided into six Khaṇḍas comprising fifty-five thousand verses. The six Khaṇḍas are Śṛṣṭikhaṇḍa, Bhūmi-khaṇḍa, Svarga-khaṇḍa, Pātalakhaṇḍa, Uttarakhanda and Kriyāyogāsāra. The Uttarakhanda describes the importance of all months and also the lotus, the seat of Brahmā. This contains the stories of Śākuntalā and Śrī Rāma as described by Kālidāsa in his works Śākuntala and Raghuvamśa which has made some believe that this Purāṇa was written after Kālidāsa. If this Purāṇa is given as gift with a cow in the month of Jyeṣṭha (June) it brings prosperity.

(vi) Varāha Purāṇa. The mode of narration is in the form of narrating the story by Varāha, the third incarnation of Viṣṇu. The theme is about holy places and mantras. It states that the goddess of earth prayed to Mahāviṣṇu and that prayer took the form of a goddess. This book contains fourteen thousand verses. If one copies down this Purāṇa and gives it as gift along with a golden image of Garuḍa on the full-moon day in the month of Caitra (April) one will attain Viṣṇuloka.

B. Purāṇas relating to Brahmā.

(i) Brahma Purāṇa. This is in the form of teachings by Brahmā to Dakṣa. This contains twenty-five thousand verses. This is called Ādi Purāṇa also. There is a special treatise in this book on Orissa, an ancient holy region of Bhārata. There is in this a special annexure explaining the intimacy between Śiva and Śūrya which is a derivation from other Purāṇas. Brahma Purāṇa states about a sūryakṣetra (sun-temple) situated at a place called Koṇārk near the holy place of Purī, installed there in the year 1241 A.D. If this Purāṇa along with Jaladhenu is given as a gift on the full-moon day in the month of Vaiśākha (May) the donor will attain heaven.

(ii) Brahmānāṇḍa Purāṇa. This deals with the origin of the universe as told by Brahmā. In the beginning there was a golden egg and the prapāne (universe with its activities) was formed out of it. Portions of Adh-yātma Rāmāyaṇa, references to Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa and the incarnation of Parasu-rāma are included in this. This book contains twelve thousand verses and it is believed to be uttama (best) to give this book as a gift to a brahmin.

(iii) Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa. This was instructed to Śāvānicka by Nārada. The theme is the story of Rathantara. There are four khaṇḍas in this Purāṇa called Brahmakāṇḍa, Prakṛtikāṇḍa, Ganeśakāṇḍa and Kṛṣṇa-janamkāṇḍa. This deals with Prapāca-ṛṣṭi (creation of the universe). It says that Prapāca is nothing but the Vaivarta (transformation) of Brahman. It is considered to be holy to give this book containing eighteen thousand verses as a gift on the full-moon day in the month of Māgha (February).

(iv) Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa. This is one of the ancient Purāṇas. There are many stories regarding Indra, Śūrya and Agni in this. This includes a division called Devmāhāmya containing praises about the goddess Durgā. This contains nine thousand verses and it is considered as uttama (best) to give this book as a gift to a brahmin on a full-moon day in the month of Kārttika (November).

(v) Bhāvishya Purāṇa. This is what is told to Manu by Śūrya (Sun). This contains statements about future events. The book praises the worship of Śūrya (Sun), Agni (fire) and Nāga (serpent). There is an annexure dealing with the several holy places of Bhārata and the rights of pilgrims. The book contains fourteen thousand verses and it is considered to be uttama (best) to give this book along with treacle as a gift to a brahmin on the full-moon day in the month of Pauṣa (January).

(vi) Viṣṇu Purāṇa. There is a great similarity between the contents of this Purāṇa and that of Vaḍāṛā Purāṇa. All the incarnations of Viṣṇu from Vāmana downwards are described in this Purāṇa. The scene of Śiva marrying Pārvatī is vividly described in this book. This Purāṇa contains ten thousand verses and it is considered to be uttama (best) to give this book as a gift in the autumn season or at the time of Viṣṇuva to a brahmin.

C. Purāṇas relating to Śiva.

(i) Viṣṇu Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is told by Viṣṇu. Bāṇabhāṭṭa who lived in the seventh century A.D. makes references to this Purāṇa in his works. There are many references in this Purāṇa about the Gupta Kings who ruled Bhārata in the 4th century A.D. So it is believed that this Purāṇa must have been written in the fifth or sixth century A.D. The book contains plenty of verses in praise of Śiva. There are fourteen thousand verses in the Viṣṇu Purāṇa and it is considered to be best to give this book as a gift to a brahmin on the full-moon day in the month of Śrāvaṇa (August).

(ii) Rāṣṭrapurāṇa. This contains instructions of Śiva on Dharma sitting in the form of Ṛṣi (Phallus). The twenty-eight different forms of Śiva are described in this. This contains twelve thousand verses and if this book is given as a gift to a brahmin with tiladhenu on the full-moon day in the month of Phālguna (March) the donor will attain Śivaśānyujya.

(iii) Skanda Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is narrated by Skanda. The theme is the slaughter of the demon Tārakāśura by Skanda (Subrahmanya). There is a great similarity between this Purāṇa and the Kumāra-sambhava of Kālidāsa. There are eighty-four thousand verses in this Purāṇa and giving this book as a gift is thought to be good.

(iv) Āgni Purāṇa. This Purāṇa was instructed to the sage Vaśiṣṭha by Agnideva. There are several references to this in Śivalīṅga and Durgādevī. The incarnations of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa are also dealt with in this. Distinct from other Purāṇas this book deals with arts and science like Kavyālākāranaṇakas (Poems, dramas, figures of speech), Jyotīśastra (Astronomy) and Śilpa-kalā (architecture). This Purāṇa contains twelve thousand verses and is capable of imparting knowledge on all arts and sciences.

(v) Matsya Purāṇa. This Purāṇa was taught to Manu by Matsya, the incarnation of Viṣṇu. The incarnation of Matsya is dealt in this. Several subjects like Jaina-mata (religion of Jainism), Buddhamaṭa (Buddhiṣu), Nāyāṣṭra (histrionics) and Āndhharājāvanīya (kingdom and Kings of Andhra) are discussed in this book. The book contains thirteen thousand verses and this is to be given as gift along with a golden image of a fish at the time of Viṣṇuva.

(vi) Kurma Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is taught by Kūrma-mūrti (incarnation of Viṣṇu as Kūrma (tortoise) while narrating the story of Indradvīma at Pālāla. All the seven islands and seven oceans are described in this book. Bhārata is situated in the centre of all these and is called Jambudvīpa. Though it is believed that there were four sanhītās for this, only the Brāhmaśanhītā is available now. It includes I-varagītā and Vyāsagītā.
The book contains eight thousand verses and is to be given as gift along with a golden image of tortoise.

3) Upapurāṇas. There are eighteen minor Purāṇas besides the eighteen major ones. They are:—(1) Sanatkumāra (2) Nārada (3) Nārādiya (4) Śiva (5) Durvāsas (6) Kāpila (7) Mānava (8) Uşānas (9) Vāruṇa (10) Kālika (11) Samba (12) Saura (13) Āditya (14) Māleśvara (15) Devībhaṅgavata (16) Viśiṣṭha (17) Viṣṇūdharmottara (18) Nilamata Purāṇa.

The two Upapurāṇas mentioned lastly are associated with Kashmir. The first is about the Vaishāvya religion there and the second about the wise saying of a Nāga King of the place called Nila.

(Purāṇas; History of Sanskrit Literature).

Pūrāṇa. An ancient sage. He was one among the rṣis who visited Bhīma lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 12, Chapter 47 Sānti Parva).

Pūravatī. A river of Bhārata of Purānic fame. (Śloka 24, Chapter 9, Bliṣṭa Parva).

Pūraya. A King of Vedic times. He is mentioned in the dānastuti of Rgveda.

Pūrīkā. A city in ancient Bhārata. This city was ruled by a King named Paurīka. (Śloka 3, Chapter 111, Śānti Parva).

Pūrṇa I. A serpent born of the family of Viṣukī. It was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 2, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇa II. A Devagandharva born to Kaśyapa of his wife Pradā. (Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇa III. The name of the tīthi (lunar days) Paṇcami, Daśamī and Paṇcada-ī. Yudhiṣṭhīra was born on the Paṇcami day called Pūrṇa. (Śloka 6, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇabhadra I. A celebrated serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇabhadra II. The son of a Yakṣa called Ratnabhadra living on the mountain Gandhamādana. He had a son named Harikesa (Pingala). Harikesa was a devotee of Śiva and so Pūrṇabhadra who was a devotee of Kubera sent Harikesa away from his house. Harikesa was then taken care of by Śiva and made one of his attendants. (Matsya Purāṇa, Chapter 10).

Pūrṇamukha. A serpent born of the race of Dhytarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 1, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇāṅgada. A serpent born of the family of Dhytarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

Pūrṇayus. A Devagandharva who was the son of Kaśyapa of his wife Pradā. (Śloka 46, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

Purocana. A minister of Duryodhana. It was under the guidance of this minister that the lac-palace was constructed and set fire to in order to kill the Pāṇḍavas. Purocana was also burnt to death when the lac-palace was destroyed by fire. (See under Arakkila).

Purojaya. The youngest son of the Vasi, Prāna, born to him of his wife Urjjasvatī. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

Purovasa. A King of the Aṅga line of Kings. He was the son of Babhrustu. He ruled over the country of Gāndhāra. (Chapter 270, Agni Purāṇa).

Puru I. A Kṣatriya King. He was the son of Manu. Manu had eleven sons of his wife Nadvālā.

Puru II. A mountain. (Śloka 22, Chapter 90, Vana Parva).

Puru I. A celebrated king of Candravānī.
1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu are Brahman-Atri — Čandra—Budha—Puru-avas—Ayus—Nahuṣa—Yayāti—Puru.

Puru had two wives named Śarmiṣṭhā and Devayāni.
Śarmiṣṭhā gave birth to Druhyu, Anu and Puru. Devayāni gave birth to Yadu and Turvasu.

2) Puru becomes king. Yayāti, Puru’s father, was turned into an old man by a curse of Śukrācarya. The king called all his sons to his side and requested each to take his old age and give him their youth. All the elder sons refused to do it but Puru agreed to do so. Taking the youth of Puru, his father, Yayāti lived a sensuous life for a thousand years. Then the king gave back Puru his youth and crowned him as the heir apparent to his kingdom. (See under Devayāni).

3) Other details.

(i) Puru got of his wife Kausalyā alias Pauṣṭi three sons named Janamejaya (Pravīra), Iśvara and Raudrā-śva. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

(ii) After his death Puru entered the court of Yama.
Śloka 8, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

(iii) Puru along with Indra in the latter’s Vimāṇa watched the war between Arjuna and the Kauravas.
(Śloka 10, Chapter 56, Viṣṇa Parva).

(iv) A king called Māndhātā once defeated Puru in a battle. (Śloka 10, Chapter 62, Droṇa Parva).

Puru II. The name of the charioteer of Arjuna. (Śloka 30, Chapter 33, Sabhā Parva).

Purucchepa. (Purucchepa). A sage praised in the Rgveda. He was the son of Divodāsa. (Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

Purujit. A king who was the son of Kuntiibhoja and brother of Kunti, mother of the Pāṇḍavas. He had a brother named Kuntībhōja. In the great battle he fought against Durmukha of the Kaurava army. When he died Purujit went to Yamaloka. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva; Chapter 6, Kaṇḍa Parva, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

Purukutsa. The son born to the celebrated king, Māndhātā of his wife Bindumati. (See under Māndhātā for Genealogy). Purukutsa had a brother named Mucu-kunda. Descending in order from Purukutsa were Araṇya — Bhṛdaya—Haryāśva—Tridhāna—Aruṇa—Satyavrata—Triśāṇku.

One Purukutsa is praised in the Rgveda. It is not known whether both are one and the same person.
Purukutsa with his wife Narmādādevī went to the forest of Kurukṣetra and doing penance there attained mokṣa. (Chapter 20, Āśramavāśika Parva).

Purumīdha. A king of Pūrvaōma. He was the son of Bṛhatputra. Bṛhatputra had two more sons named Ajaṁidha and Dvīmiṇḍha. Of these three sons the most valiant Ajaṁidha became the propagator of the dynasty.
(Chapter 278, Purāṇa).

Purumītra I. One of the eleven valiant sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. In the great battle of Mahābhārata Abhimanyu wounded this soldier. (Chapter 73, Bīṣma Parva).
PURUMITRA. II. The first Mandala of the Rgveda mentions a Rājārsi youth Vimada marrying the daughter of Purumitra.

PURUNĪTHA. See under Parunitha.

PURŪRAVAS. I. A prominent king of Candradvain a (lunar race).

1) Origin of Candramanśa and birth of Purūravas. Descending in order from Brahmā came Atri—Candra—Buddha Purūravas. The dynasty which came from Candra was called the Candramanśa. Though Buddha was the first king of Candramanśa it was Purūravas who became celebrated. The story of the birth of Purūravas is given below:

Brahmā in the beginning deputed the sage Atri for the work of creation. Atrimahārśi started the penance called anuttara to acquire sufficient power for creation. After some years Saccidānanda brahma with an aura of lustre reflected in the heart of that pure and serene soul. In sheer ecstasy tears rolled down his cheeks and the glittering flow of water was lustfully drunk by the zones taking the form of women with a view to producing progenies. They became pregnant but were unable to bear the embryo of Atri and so they threw them away. Brahmat took them all and made them into one armoured youth and took him in his chariot to his land. Then the brahmārśi requested Brahmat to make him their lord. When the rśis, devas, gandharvas and nymphs praised him reciting sāmveda the majestic lustre of the youth increased. It was from this that ausadhas (medicines) originated and that is why Candra is considered to be the lord of medicines, dvija and Vedasvarūpā. The Candramandala is full of chemicals. It increases and decreases according to the white half and black half of the moon-based month.

Daksā gave in marriage to Candra twenty-seven beautiful maidens. Then Candra did penance meditating on Viśṇu for ten thousand Kaḷpaś. Viśṇu pleased by his penance asked him to name a boon and Candra said “When I perform a yāga in svarga all the devas like Brahmā should come in person to my yāgaśālā and take the yāgabhāga. Śulāpāṇī should remain as a watchman at my Rājasīya.” Accordingly with the blessing of Viśṇu, Candra conducted the yāga in which Atri, Bhṛgu, Brahmā, Viśṇu, Devas, Vasus, Maruts and Viśvadevas took part. Candra gave as yāga-fees to Ēuviks all the three worlds. The yāga was complete and when Candra rose up after a bath nine devis fell in love with the amorous beauty of Candra. Lakṣmī, wife of Viśṇu, Sinīvālī, wife of Kardama, Dyutī, wife of Viḥivāsa, Puṣṭī, wife of Dhārta, Prabhā, wife of Sūrya, Kuhā, wife of Havīṃśān, Krītī, wife of Jayanta, Amūruli, wife of Kaśyapa and Dhirīt wife of Nanda, abandoned their husbands and went with Candra. Candra treated them all as his own wives and gave them erotic pleasure to their hearts’ content. Those who saw this non-virtuous act stood dumbfounded unable to curse Candra.

Attracted by the dazzling brilliance of Candra Tārā, wife of Bhaṣpati, went with him. Enraged at this, Bhṛṣpati joining with other devas prepared for a fight against Candra. Devas took sides and by the mediation of Indra a conference of both the parties was held and Tārā was sent back to Bhaṣpati. Tārā was pregnant then and Tārā confessed that the child in her womb was that of Candra. So when that child was born Candra took it away and named it Budha. Brahmā and other rśis gave Budha a seat among the planets.

Budha married Iīā and they got a son named Purūravas. (See under Iīā). After that Budha performed a hundred Aśvamedhayāgas. He then enjoyed world prosperity as lord of Saptadvipa living in the beautiful Himādriśrīga, worshipping Brahmā. (Chapter 12, Bhāgā 3, Padma Purāṇa).

2) Testing Purūravas and the curse. Purūravas by his brilliance performed a hundred Aśvamedhayāgas and lived in glory at Himādriśrīga. Great demons like Keśi found his servants. Urvaśī attracted by his beauty became his wife. While he was living like that Dharma, Artha and Kāma went in disguise to his palace to test him. He received them all well but paid more attention to Dharma. Artha and Kāma got angry and cursed him. Artha cursed him saying that he would be ruined by his greed and Kāma cursed him saying he would go mad by being separated from Urvaśī. Hearing that Dharma blessed him thus: “You will live long leading a virtuous life. Your race will increase and remain in glory till the end of the moon and the stars. The insanity caused by your passion for Urvaśī would end by the end of sixty years. That celestial maiden would remain then with you for one Manvantara.” (Chapter 12, Bhāgā 3, Padma Purāṇa).

Purūravas used to visit Indra daily. One day while he was going through air wellarmed with a bow and arrows he saw a demon named Keśi carrying away by force Urvaśī and Cīrākeśā and after defeating Keśi a fight recovered the nymphs and gave them back to Indra. Indra praised Purūravas and in his honour a drama, Lakṣmisvarāyinava, was enacted by Urvaśī, Menakā and others. Urvaśī taking the part of Lakṣmī started to dance but seeing Purūravas before her she became lustful and made wrong steps. Nārada who was present at the function got angry and cursed her “You will forget all you have learnt. Not only that, you will live as a creeper separated from Purūravas for a period of sixty years.” (For details see under Urvaśī).

Padma Purāṇa says that it was Bharata who cursed Urvaśī. This story is slightly different from that found in the other Purāṇas.

3) Sons of Purūravas. Urvaśī got eight sons of Purūravas named Āyus, Dṛḍhayus, Vāśāyus, Daṇṇāyus, Vṛttimān, Vāsas, Dīvījāta and Subhāhu. Of these Āyus became the progenitor of the dynasty. Of the sons born to Āyus five sons, Naḥuṣa, Vṛddhārma, Rājī, Dambha and Vipāpā became celebrities. A hundred sons were born to Rājī. They were called Rājeyas. (Chapter 12, Bhāgā 3, Padma Purāṇa).

Some Purāṇas state that Purūravas had six sons while some state that he had seven sons.

4) Other details. The following references are made about him in the Mahābhārata.

(i) Once Purūravas stole the wealth of some brahmins. The brahmins took Sanatkumāra along with them and made representations to the king. Purūravas did not give back their wealth. The brahmins cursed him and as a result the prosperity of the King waned. Then Purūravas brought down from svarga three Aegis and performed a yāga and thus regained his lost splendour and prosperity. (Chapter 75, Ādi Parva).
(ii) Pururavas got six sons of Urvâsi named Āyus, Dhīmān, Amāvasu, Drjâhâysu, Vanâyus and Śâtyus. (iii) Once he asked Vāyu the wind-god about the origin of the four castes and the superiority of the brahmins over other castes. (Śloka 3, Chapter 72, Sânti Parva).
(iv) At another time he discussed about yajnapurohitas with Kaśyapa. (Chapter 73, Sânti Parva).
(v) Iksvâku gave Pururavas a sword which in his old age he gave to his son Āyus. (Chapter 166, Sânti Parva).
(vi) He once declared that one can attain svarga by the blessings of brahmins. (Śloka 31, Chapter 6, Anu-śâsana Parva).
(vii) Pururavas was famous as a donor of cows. (Śloka 26, Chapter 76, Anu-śâsana Parva).
(viii) Pururavas never ate meat. (Śloka 65, Chapter 111, Anu-śâsana Parva).

PURURAVAS II. A king of the race of Diptâkṣa. (Śloka 15, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).

PURUṢĀ. See under Prakṛti.

PURUṢĀDAKA. An ancient place. (Chapter 57, Sabhâ Parva).

PURUṢĀNTI. A maharṣi well-praised in the Rgveda. The Aśvinidevas once saved the following from trouble viz. Turvî, Dabhîtî, Dhvasantî and Puruṣânti. (Śûkta 113, Anuvâka 16, Maṇḍala 7, Rgveda).

PURUṢOTTAMA. Śri Kṛṣṇa. He got this name because of his Puraṇa (filling) and Sadana (sitting) (Chapter 70, Udyoga Parva).

PURUYÂŚA. A king of Pâñcâla. He was the son of Bhūrīyāsas. The King became more and more prosperous observing 'Vaisākhadhârma' following the instructions of the King's preceptors Yâja and Upâyâja. (Chapter 2, Śûdravyâ Grahamâ). PVRÂBHÎRAMĀ. A river of Purânic fame. (Śloka 22, Chapter 9, Bhrîṣma Parva).

PVRÂCITI. A celebrated celestial maiden. She belongs to the group of six celebrated nymphs named Urvâsi, Pvrâciti, Sahajânya, Châta, Visvâci and Menâkâ. (Śloka 68, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva). Pvrâciti was present for the Jannmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva). Once when Arjuna went to svarga Pvrâciti and others danced in his honour. (Chapter 43, Vanâ Parva).

PVRÂDISHÂ (PVRÂDIK). The East. Of all the sides Pvrâdisha is the most prominent.
1) The Sun rises in the east.
2) The sâdhya come and do severe penance in the east at dusk.
3) The moon rises here.
4) The result of offering havya to the fire spreads to the east.
5) The daughters of Dakṣa after becoming the wives of Kaśyapa delivered in the east.
6) Devas made Indra the king of the east.
7) Indra and the devas did penance jointly in the east.
8) Because the devas accepted this side first (pûrva) the side got the name Pvrâ.
9) The sun gives away as gifts the yajur Mantras at this place.
10) The devas drink the soma juice facing the east
11) Varuṇa once entered Pâtiśa by the east and attained prosperity.
12) Indra selected the sacrificial animals at this place.
13) The soul of man comes to Svarga and the earth through the east. (Chapter 108 Udyoga Parva).

PVRVÂPÂLI. An ancient king. The Pâṇḍavas invited this king for the great Mahâbhârata battle. (Śloka 17, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).

PVRVÂŚRAMA. A sacred place on the shores of the river Sarayû. While going along the shores of this river with Râma and Laksmana, Vîvêmîtra showed the boys this Âśrama and explained to them its importance. It was at this place that Śiva burnt Kâmadeva (god of love) to death. Kâmadeva got the name Auaîga at this place. (Bâla Kânda, Vâlmiki Râmâyâna, Sarga 23).

PUSÂNÂ. A female follower of Subrahmanyâ. (Śloka 20, Chapter 43, Sâlya Parva).

PUSÂI (PUSAN). Pûṣa attended the Jannmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva). When Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa fought against Indra at Kândavaprastha Pûṣa stood as an ally of Indra. (Śloka 55, Chapter 226, Ādi Parva). Once all the devas together performed a yâga and not knowing the importance of Siva, they did not invite him to the Yâga. Siva attended the function uninvited. The devas did not like it and they attacked Siva. The twelve âdityas as a team fought against Siva and in the fight Pûṣa lost his teeth. (Chapter 18, Saupitika Parva). Once Pûṣa presented to Subrahmanyâ two warriors named Pâṇitaka and Kâlika.

PUSÂI II. (PUSAN). Another name for the Sun. (Śloka 16, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).

PUSKALÂ I. A valiant soldier who fought on the side of Râvana. Hanûmân fought against this soldier fiercely. (Bhâga 2, Padma Purâṇa).

PUSKALÂ II. The youngest son of Bharata, son of Daśaratha. Mâṇḍâvî was the mother of Puskala. (Chapter 88, Vâyu Purâṇa; Chapter 6, Brahmanda Purâṇa; Chapter 4, Visû Purâṇa; Chapter 11, Agni Purâṇa).

Details available about Puskala from Padma Purâṇa and Vâlmiki Râmâyâna are the following :
(1) Puskala was with Sâtrughna when the latter served as the guardian of the horse in all the three aśvamedha-âyagas conducted by Śri Râma. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapters 1 and 22),
(2) He defeated Damana, son of Subâhu, while he was following the sacrificial horse. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 34),
(3) He fought fiercely against the demons, Vidyunmâli and Ugradâmiṣṭra. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 34).
(4) He fought against Rukmângada and Vîrâmanî. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 41).
(5) He was defeated by Lava who checked the progress of the sacrificial horse. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 61),
(6) Puskala conquered the country of Gandhâra and built there a city called Puskâlavaṭi alias Puskâlavadva and made it his capital city. (Vâlmiki Râmâyâna, Uttara Kânda).
(7) His wife's name was Kântimati. (Padma Purâṇa, Pâțâla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 67).

PUŞKARA I. Son of Varuna. Soma's daughter was attracted by the beauty of Puṣkara and married him. (Śloka 12, Chapter 98, Udyoga Parva).

PUŞKARA II. The younger brother of Nâla. It was this Puṣkara who jointly with Kâli defeated Nâla in a game of dice and drove him away from his country.
At last Puṣkara apologised to Nala and gave him back his country. (See under Dāmayantī).

111. A sage. He was the Guru of Pāraśu-ramā. (Chapter 151, Agnī Purāṇa).

114. 1) General information. This is a holy place situated 36 Kilometres to the north of Ajmer. Bhrāma once did penance there. There is a temple of Bhrāma there. Padma Pūrṇa gives a story about the origin of this tīrtha:—

Once Bhrāma came to a place holding a lotus. Then Bhrāma saw Vajranābha who was engaged in penance for the destruction of the devas. Suddenly the lotus in the hands of Bhrāma fell down making a thundering noise. The sound was so loud that its vibrations killed Vajranābha. From that day onwards the place was known as Puṣkara.

2) Other details.
   (i) Arjuna spent the period after his pilgrimage in this tīrtha. (Sloka 14, Chapter 220, Adi Parva).
   (ii) Once sage Pūlasya praised the greatness of Puṣkara. (Sloka 20, Chapter 82, Vana Parva).
   (iii) Sage Dhanumya praised the greatness of Puṣkara tīrtha. (Sloka 16, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).
   (iv) Once the god of death came and did penance at this place. (Sloka 26, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).
   (v) Once Bhrāma performed a Yāga at this place and then Sarasvatī rose up from the place in the name of Suprabhā. (Sloka 5, Chapter 38, Śalya Parva).
   (vi) If one performs penance at this place peacefully one can attain mokṣa. (Chapter 297, Śanti Parva).

V. A mountain in the island of Puṣkara. This mountain is full of precious stones. (Sloka 24, Chapter 12, Bhīma Parva).

VI. One of the seven islands. The other six are Jambūdvīpa, Plakṣadvīpa, Śālmalidvīpa, Kuṣadvīpa, Krauṇadvīpa, and Śākadvīpa. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

The wife of a sage. There was once a sage named Satyā in the country of Vidarbha. Puṣkaradhārīṇī was the wife of Satyā. Satyā who believed in Ahimsā performed a Yāga with fruits and roots. It is believed that no yāga is perfect if performed without a sacrificial goat. But even his wife for fear of a curse did not object to a Yāga of the kind.

There was another sage living in that forest in the form of a deer due to a curse and he was a great friend of Satyā. The deer came to the place of the Yajñā and requested Satyā to kill him as the sacrificial animal to make the Yāga a success. Satyā did not agree to that but then Svāvitridēvi appeared in person and compelled him to kill the deer and conduct the Yāga. With great reluctance Satyā killed the deer and conducted the Yāga; but the power of penance of Satyā faded away by that deed of his. Then Puṣkaradhārīṇī performed penance to regain the power of her husband and Dharma appeared in person and blessed Satyā. (Chapter 272, Śanti Parva).

1. A King of Purānic fame. There was once a King called Bhadrakāśa or Bhadrakāśa in Takṣaśilānagara. He worshipped Bhagavatī with 108 lotus flowers daily in order to obtain a son. One day he found one flower missing and the brave king tore open his heart and made the number complete. The goddess was pleased and she blessed him saying that he would have a son worthy of becoming an emperor. Puṣkarākṣa was the son thus born.

The boy grew up and after crowning him as King Bhadrakāśa left for the forests. Puṣkarākṣa worshipped Siva daily to get a suitable wife. After some time Siva blessed him saying that he would get a very good wife. One day he went for hunting. He saw a camel trying to eat two cobras engaged in the act of mating. Instantly the King sent an arrow against the camel and the camel falling down turned into a Vidyādhara and that Vidyādhara told the King thus:—"Oh King, there was once a Vidyādhara named Rāngāmāli. A Vidyādhara maiden named Tārāvali was attracted by the handsome form of Rāngāmāli. She married him without the consent of her parents. The angered father separated them by a curse. The curse took effect and they soon got separated losing their way in the forest. Pining to see her husband Tārāvali roamed about in the forests and reached the other shore of the western sea. It was a colony of tīrṣas and there was a fig tree there standing in full blossom. Tārāvali took the form of a beetle and sat on the tree sucking honey. After some days Rāngāmāli also came to the place. On seeing her husband she had emission and from the virile fluid was born a fig fruit. After that both of them flew to the Gandhara loka. I am Rāngāmāli. One day a sage named Jītāsu came that way and this fruit fell before him. From the fruit came out a beautiful maiden and Jītāsu with his divine power understood the whole story behind it and so took the girl to his āśrama and named her Vinayavatī. Vinayavatī grew into a beautiful maiden and stayed in the āśrama. One day by accident I happened to see her and attracted by her beauty tried to rape her. She cried aloud and hearing the noise the sage came out and cursed me and turned me into a camel. I pleaded for mercy and the sage said I would be released from the curse when I was killed by the future husband of Vinayavatī, Puṣkarākṣa by name. Oh King, I am now released from the curse and you should go to the forest named Surabhīmarūta on the other side of the western sea and marry that maiden."
a girl named Vidyullekhā. All their wealth was stolen by thieves and grief-stricken they attempted to commit suicide by jumping into the fire. They saw two swans flying towards them and without waiting for them to reach them they committed suicide. In their next birth they became a swan couple. They lived on a date tree during rainy seasons. Once in a storm the tree fell down and in the darkness each went its own way. In the morning the male swan started searching for his mate. In the end he found her in the lake of Mānasa in Svarga. They lived there happily till the rainy season was over and then they went and stayed on a mountain. One day a forester killed the she-swan and while coming with the dead swan in his hands he saw a set of armed men coming that way and the frightened forester threw the dead swan into a lake nearby. The dead swan came in touch with the Mṛtasaṅjīvani herb in the pond and coming to life flew away. The husband swan went into another group of swans and lived there in sorrow. One day a fisherman came and caught all the swans in a net. At that time the she-swan came there and finding her husband in the net felt very sad. She was thinking of some way to get her husband released from the net when a man came to bathe in the pond. He wrapped the diamond necklace of his in a cloth and placed it on the shore. The she-swan took the necklace and flew making the fisherman see everything before him. Seeing the swan going with the necklace the fisherman went after it. The swan flew to a mountain nearby and placed it on its top. The fisherman started climbing up and the she-swan then flew back and released her husband from the net. One day while they were flying making a lotus as an umbrella a hunter shot them down with arrows. Fortunately the lotus fell on an idol of Śiva and by the power of Śiva they were born in their next birth as a king and a woman. The king is yourself and the woman is Vinayavatī.

Puṣkaraṅkṣa married her there and returning to his land lived happily for a long period. (Taraṅga 2, Saṅk-verticalalamaka, Kathāsārasaṅga)

Puṣkaraṅkṣa II. A king. Puṣkaraṅkṣa, son of king Sucandra, was cut to death by Parāsuraṁa. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 3)

Puṣkaraṅkṣa III. A very virtuous woman. She was the wife of a sage named Satya who lived on alms in the country of Vidarbha. Because she was very strict and perfect in the observance of vrata she became lean but pure. She was very obedient to her husband and she made her own dress out of peacock feathers gathered from forests. Puṣkaraṅkṣa was again sacrificing cows in yajñas. (Chapter 246, Sānti Parva)

Puṣkaraṅkṣa I. Wife of Cākṣuṣa Manu. Cākṣuṣa got of Puṣkaraṅkṣa a son named Manu. (Chapter 18, Agni Purāṇa)

Puṣkaraṅkṣa II. Wife of Bhumanyu, emperor of Bhārata. Bhumanyu got of his wife Puṣkaraṅkṣa, six sons named Suhotra, Diviratha, Suhotā, Suhavī, Suyajas and Reika. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva)

Puṣkaraṅkṣa III. Wife of king Unmukha. Unmukha got of his wife Puṣkaraṅkṣa six sons named Aṅgga, Sumanas, Khyāti, Kratu, Aṅgiras and Gaya. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata)

Puṣpa. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva)

Puṣpadaṁśtra. A prominent serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva)

Puṣpadaṁantarā. One of the Aṣṭadīgajas. (The eight elephants of the quarters)

Puṣpadaṁantarā II. One of the three soldiers given to Subrahmanya by Pārvatī. The other two were Unmāda and Śaṅkukarṇa. (Śloka 51, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva)

Puṣpadaṁantarā III. One of the attendants of Śiva. Due to a curse Puṣpadaṁantarā was born on earth as Vararuci. (See under Vararuci). There was another curse also on him. (See under Jambukēsvaṇa)

Puṣpadaṁantarā I. A relative of a Gandharva named Citrasena. Puṣpadaṁantarā was once dancing in the court of Indra with Mālyavān and other Gandharvas. Puṣpadaṁantarā faltered in her steps as she was admiring the beauty of Mālyavān and Indra cursed them both and turned them into devils. They then observed the Ekādaśī (eleventh day of every lunar fortnight) called ‘Jāya’ and got themselves released from the curse. (Chapter 43, Īṭṭara Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa)

Puṣpaka I. A divine Aerial Chariot.

1) Origin. Viśvaksara had a daughter named Saṅjiṇī. She was married to Śūrya. But Saṅjiṇī could not live with Śūrya for long because of the terrible heat and so she came back and told her father about it. At once Viśvaksara ordered Śūrya to come to him and the former then tried to reduce his brightness by rubbing him on a grindstone. However much he tried he was not able to reduce even an eighth of his brightness. The brightness of the Sun which was rubbing out spread in the atmosphere as suspended lustrous particles. Viśvaksara collected that lustrous dust and from it created four brilliant things. The Čakrāyudha of Mahāviṃśu is one, the Triśūla of Śiva is another, and the third is Puṣpaka-vimāna (Puṣpaka Aerial chariot). The fourth is Śakti, a weapon of Subrahmanya. Viśvaksara gave them all as presents to Brahmā. (Chapter 2, Aīna 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇa)

2) How Kubera got the Puṣpaka. Viśravaṇa alias Kubera was the son born to Viśrava, one of his wife Devavārmanī, daughter of sage Bharadvāja. Viśravaṇa did penance to please Brahmā to get a son and Viśravaṇa was born by the blessing of Brahmā Kubera also, even while he was a boy, went to the valley of Himavān and did penance there. Kubera did penance for ten thousand years with his head downwards in cold water and another ten thousand years in Paṇcāgni standing on one leg. At that time Brahmā appeared in person and asked what boon he wanted. He said he wanted to be one of the lokāpālakas (guardians of the universe). Granting Kubera that, Brahmā gave him two treasures named Saṅkhanidhi and Padmanidhi and also the Puṣpaka-vimāna. After that Kubera built a city named Laṅkā on the mountain of Trikāṭa in the southern ocean and started living there.

3) How Rāvana got the Puṣpaka. Viśravaṇa had three more sons named Rāvana, Kumbhakarṇa and Vibhit-sapa. They did penance and acquired divine powers. Rāvana then went to Laṅkā and after defeating Kubera and sending him north captured Laṅkā and made it his capital. He also took by force the Puṣpaka from Kubera.

All the victory marches of Rāvana were in this Puṣpaka. Once Rāvana was going in his Puṣpaka with a Yakṣa PUŚPAKA II. The great forest lying on one side of the mountain Latāveṣṭa situated to the south of Dwārakāpuri. (Chapter 38, Dākinīyatī Pātha, Sabhā Parva).

PUŚPĀNĀ. A Yakṣa. He lives in the court of Kubera. (Sklo 17, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PUŚPARĀGAPRĀKĀRA. (RATNASĀLĀ). The Purāṇas state about a fort made of diamonds called Puṣparaga shining red above the heavenly place called Maṇidvīpa above Brahmaloka. This fort is seven yo-janas high. All things inside it, the ground, the trees, the birds, the animals, plants, creepers and gardens are puṣparāga-studded and look red like saffron. Therefore the fort is called Ratnasālā also. All the dikpālas of the universe live with their family and attendants in this fort. (12th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PUŚPĀRATHA. The chariot of the King called Vasu-manas. This chariot was capable of travelling through air, mountains and oceans. (Chapter 198, Vana Parva).

PUŚPĀRĀṇA. A King born of the family of Dhruva.
He married a girl named Prabhā. (Skandha 4, Bhāgavata).

PUŚPAVĀHANA. A King of Rathantarakaḷa. He got ten thousand sons of his wife Lāvanyavatī. Puśpa-vāhana was a hunter in his previous birth. He used to give daily lotus flowers to a harlot who was doing worship of Viṣṇu observing the Dvādaśīvarta. He was doing this service with such devotion that in the next birth he was born under the name Puśpavāhana (carrier of flowers). The sage Bhrigu once told him about his previous birth and asked him to observe dvādaśīvarta. Puśpavāhana observed the vratā and attained bliss. (Sṛṣṭi khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PUŚPAVĀN. A King. This King who ruled supreme over the three worlds also met with his death. The story of this King was quoted by Bhīma to illustrate that everything is transitory in this world. (Chapter 277, Śaṅkī Parva).

PUŚPAVĀT. A sacred place. If one stays here for three nights fasting and basking in the holy pond there one would get the benefit of making a thousand godānas (cow-gifts) and his family will be absolved of all sins. (Sloka 12, Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

PUŚPOTIKĀ. Mother of Kubera.
1) Genealogy. From Brahmā were born two demons Heti and Prabheti. Heti married Bhayā, daughter of Kāla and to them was born a son named Vidyutkeśa.
Vidyutkeśa married Saḷakaṭāṅkā daughter of Sandhyā did not to them was born a son named Suke a. They abandoned the child in a forest and went away. Sīva took care of the child Sukeśa who married Daiva-vatī dughter of the Gandharva called Maṇiṣayāma and she delivered three sons named Māyavān, Sumālī and Mālī and all the three started living in the crystal palace built at Lahākī by Viśvakarmā.

At that time a Gandharva woman called Narmadā delivered three daughters named Sundari, Ketumi ti and Vasudhā. When they came of age Sundari did not to them was married to Māyavān, Ketumati to Sumālī and Vasudhā to Mālī. Māyavān got of Sundari seven demons named Vajrapuṣṭi, Viṃpūṣṭa, Durmukha, Suptaghna, Yaṅīkeśa, Matta and Unmatta and a demoness of name Nalī. Sumālī got of Ketumati ten sons named Brahasta, Akampaṇa, Viṅka, Kālākumukha, Dhumrāśa, Daṇḍa, Supārṣa, Saṃhrāda, Prakvāta and Bhāskarṇa and four daughters named Vekā, Puṣpotakaṭa, Kaikasi and Kumbhīnasi. Mālī got of Vasudhā four sons named Anala, Anila, Aha and Sampāti.

Sumālī wandered in the forests with his daughters.
He gave all the four daughters in marriage to Viśravas, son of Pulastya. Viśravas got of Kaikasi three sons named Rāvana, Kumbhakārṇa and Viṃhaṣā and a daughter named Surpanakhā. Viṃhaṣā got of Puṣpotakaṭa a son named Vaiśravāna or Kubera. (Chapter 11, Agni Purāṇa; Chapter 275, Vana Parva, Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

PUŚṬI. A daughter born to Dakṣaprajāpati of his wife
Prasūti. Dharma married her. Puṣṭi had twelve sisters.
Dharma married them also. Besides these thirteen daughters Dakṣa got of Prasūti another eleven daughters. They were Khyāti, Satī, Saṃbhūti, Śrīmata, Pritī, Kṣatī, Saṃta, Anasūyā, Urjā, Śvāhādevī and Svadhā. They were married in order to Bhrigu, Śiva, Marīcī, Atigiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kṛtā, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Agni and the Piṣṭ. (Chapter 7, Anāśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).

PUŚṬIMATI. Another name for the agni called Prasūti. If this agni is appeased there will be health.
(Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

PUṬANĀ I. A demoness who was killed by Kṛṣṇa at Amādi. Her previous birth, her relationship with Kāṇsā and such other details are found differently in different Purāṇas.
1) Kāṇsā and Puṭanā.
(i) Puṭanā was the daughter of a demoness called Kāitavī and was the servant maid of the wife of Kaṁsa. She had a younger sister called Vṛkodari. (Adi Parva, Chapter 18).
(ii) Pūtana was the daśātri (foster-mother) of Kaṁsa. She entered Gokula in the form of a bird. (Harivāma, Chapter 2, Verse 6).
(iii) Pūtana was the sister of Kaṁsa and the wife of Ghāṭodara. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa).
2) Pūrṇajāma (precious birth).
(i) Pūtana in her previous birth was born as the daughter of Mahābali bearing the name Ratnamālā. When Vāmana appeared before Mahābali during the time of the latter’s Yaṭā, Ratnamālā mentally desired thus:—“Oh if only this Vāmana became my child! I could have then breast-fed him.” Vāmana, the omniscient, understood the desire of Ratnamālā. So during the incarnation as Kaṁsa, Ratnamālā was born as Pūtana and Kaṁsa gave her salvation by drinking her breast-milk. (Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa, Chapters 4 and 10).
(ii) Once when the sage Kālabhiru and his daughter Ārūmati were travelling together they saw the sage Kākṣivān doing penance on the shores of the river Sarasvatī. Kālabhiru saw in Kākṣivān a suitable husband for his daughter and so gave Ārūmati in marriage to him. They were thus living happily together when once Kākṣivān had to go on a pilgrimage alone leaving Ārūmati in his āśrama. Taking advantage of her loneliness a Śūdra made her his concubine and when Kākṣivān returned he found out the deceit and cursed her to be born as a demoness. She begged for relief and the sage said she would get relief when Viṣṇu incarnated as Kṛṣṇa. Pūtana was the cursed form of Ārūmati. (Chapter 18, Adi Parva).
PŪTANA II. An evil spirit. This spirit which torments children stays with Subrahmanyā. (See under Graha-piṭā). (Chapter 23, Vana Parva).
PŪTIKĀ. A creeper. This can be used in Yāgas as a substitute for Somalata. (Śloka 33, Chapter 33, Vana Parva).
PUTRADĀRŚANAPARVA. A sub-divisional Parva of Aśramavāsika Parva. It comprises chapters 29 to 36.
PUTRAKA. A King. (See under Pātaliputra).
PUTRIKĀPUTRA. A son born to a woman who is either a prostitute or one without a brother. (Śloka 11, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).
PŪYAVĀHA. A hell. (See under Naraka).

R
R. This letter means “sound”. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).
RA. The letter ra means fire, strength, Indra. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).
RABHASA I. A monkey in Śri Rāma’s army. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddhakāpāda, Canto 4).
RABHASA II. A Rākṣasa on Rāvaṇa’s side. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Canto 9).
RABHYA. An ancient king wedded to justice and fair-play in ruling the kingdom. (For details see under Ekāvīra).
RĀDHĀ I. Śri Kṛṣṇa’s dearest consort. Rādhā is considered to be one of the two forms of Lakṣmīdevi. When Kṛṣṇa lived in Gokula as a man with two hands Rādhā was his dearest consort. But when he lives in Vaikuṇṭha as four-handed Viṣṇu, Lakṣmī is his dearest consort. (Devi Bhāgavata 9, 1; Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49 and 56-57 and Adi Parva Chapter 11).
Different versions about the birth of Rādhā are given in the Purāṇas, as follows:—
(i) She was born in Gokula as daughter of Vṛsabhānu and Kalāvatī. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49; 35-42; Nārada Purāṇa, 2, 81).
(ii) She was got as Bhūmi-kaṇyā (earth-girl) when King Vṛsabhānu was preparing the ground to conduct a Yajña. (Padma Purāṇa; Brahma Purāṇa 7).
(iii) She was born from the left side of Kṛṣṇa. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa).
(iv) At the time of Kṛṣṇa’s birth Viṣṇu asked his attendants to be born on earth. Accordingly Rādhā, dear consort of Kṛṣṇa, took her birth in Gokula under the star Jyeṣṭhā in the morning of Śuklaśāti day in Bhadrapada month. (Adi Parva 11).
(v) Kṛṣṇa once went with Virāj, the Gopī woman, to the hall of enjoyment (rāsamāṇḍalam). Knowing about it Rādhā followed them to the hall, but both of them were not to be seen. On another occasion when Rādhā found Virāj in the company of Kṛṣṇa and Sudāmā she, in great anger, insulted Kṛṣṇa whereupon Sudāmā cursed her to be born in human womb and experience the pangs of separation from Kṛṣṇa. (Nārada Purāṇa 2, 8; Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49) and Rādhā cursed him in turn to be born in the dānava dynasty. It was on account of this curse of Rādhā that Sudāmā was born as the asura called Śāṅkhacūḍā. (Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 4, 9, 34).
(vi) Rādhā is considered to be one of the five forces which help Viṣṇu in the process of creation. (Devi Bhāgavata 9, 1; Nārada Purāṇa 2, 81).
(vii) Rādhā is the mental power of Śri Kṛṣṇa. (For details see under Pañcaprāṇas).
RĀDHĀ II. Wife of Adhiratha, the foster-father of Kaṁsa and the foster-mother of Kaṁsa. (See under Kaṁsa).
RĀGA. One of the seven daughters of Brhaspati—Āṅgiras. As she was loved by all beings she came to be called Rāgā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 203).
RĀGAKHĀNDĀVA. A cake-like thing formed in a Yaṭā performed by King Dīlīpa. (Drona Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 8).
RAGHU.
1) General. A famous king of the Solar dynasty. The great king Dīlīpa was his father. (For Genealogy, birth etc., see under Da’aratha and Dīlīpa).
2) Other information.
(i) Rāghu also occupies a place in the list of famous kings of ancient days. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 232).
(ii) In the fight between the king of Virāḷa and the Kauravas (over the lifting of cows) Rāghu was present along with Indra to see Arjuna fight. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).
(iii) Rāghu got from King Yuvanāśva a sword, which he presented to Harināśva. (Śānti Parva Chapter 166, Verse 78).
(iv) He did not eat flesh. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 81).
(v) Kṣatriyas who praise Rāghu will not be defeated in war. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 51).
(vi) In the list of kings to be remembered at dawn and at dusk Rāghu too is included. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 51).
RĀGĪṆĪ. A celestial woman, daughter of Himavān and elder sister of Pārvatī. (For details see under Pārvatī).

RAHASyaVEDA. A Veda composed by mni Arvāvasu. This Veda is about Sūrya. (Bhārata, Chapter 137, Verse 19).

RĀHODARA (RAHODARA). A muni of ancient days. There is a story in Chapter 39 of the Vāmana Purāṇa about a skull falling on the muni’s neck and the place where the skull was removed from his neck coming to be known as Kapālamoçana.

Śrī Rāma killed the Rākṣasas who lived in Dānḍaka forest. The head of one of the Rākṣasas cut by a very sharp knife was thrown off at a distance in the forest and it fell on the neck of Rohodara, who happened to be walking at the time in the forest. It (the head) cut deep into the bones of the Sage and that made it difficult for him to move about. Yet, he visited all the holy places on the earth with the skull of the Rākṣasa around his neck. At last he told the noble Rśis about his misfortune and they directed him to visit ‘Aṣanasa-tīrtha’, and the moment he touched the water in the tīrtha the skull fell into the water. Having been told about the incident, the Rśis named the tīrtha ‘Kapālamoçana’.

RAHOVAḌĪ. A king of the Pūru dynasty. He was the son of Sainyāti and the father of Bhadrāśva. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

RĀHU, An Asura. 1) Birth. Son of Kaśyapaprajāpati by his wife Sinhikā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 31).

2) Rāhu and the Solar eclipse. The oldest story about Rāhu is that about the solar eclipse (See under Candra IV, Para 4).

3) Other information.

(i) Rāhu is a member of Brahmā’s court. (Sabhā Parva Chapter 11, Verse 29).

(ii) Sañjayā once spoke to Dhṛtarāṣṭra about Rāhu. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 40).

(iii) Rāhu exists 10,000 yojanas below the Sun. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

(iv) Rāhu is installed in temples as wearing a half-moon on his head. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

RAHUṆAGAṆA. A sage who lived in Rgvedic times. It was his son Gotama, who composed the 74th Sūkta of the first Manḍala of Rgveda.

RAIBHYA I. A hermit who was famous in the Palace of Yudhisṭhira. Information about this hermit, found in the Mahābhārata is given below:?

1) Raibhya who was a friend of Bharadvāja had two sons named Arvāvasu and Parvāvasu. They were great scholars. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 135, Stanza 12).

2) Bharadvāja once forbade his son Yavakrīta from going to the hermitage of Raibhya. Getting angry at this, Raibhya struck his matted hair on the ground and created a wicked fairy and ordered her to kill Yavakrīta. Knowing this Bharadvāja ran to that place and cursed Raibhya that his eldest son would kill him. Once Parvāvasu, mistaking his father for a cruel animal killed him. By the effort of his second son Arvāvasu, Raibhya was brought to life again. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 138, Stanza 137).

3) Raibhya was the son of Aṅgiras. (M.B. Śaṃti Parva, Chapter 208, Stanza 26).

4) Raibhya was once an assistant at the sacrifice of Uparicaravasu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 33, Stanza 7).

5) Raibhya was one of the hermits who visited Śiśma in his bed of arrows. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 26).

RAIBHYA II. An ancient hermit. This hermit learned the Sātvatadharma from Vīraṇa. After that he taught his son Dikpāla, this dharma. (M.B. Śaṃti Parva, Chapter 343, Stanza 42).

RAIBHYA III. The father of Dūṣyanta, the husband of Śakuntalā. This Raibhya was the son of Sumati. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

RAIBHYA IV. One of the sons of Brahmā. Once Raibhya went with Vāsu and Aṅgiras to Bṛhaspati and asked him several questions, about the attainment of Supernal bliss. Bṛhaspati replied that attainment of heaven could be had, not by action but only by devotion. Raibhya immediately started to Gayā to do penance. There he met with the Sanatkumāras. (Varāṇa Purāṇa).

Urvāśī made an earnest effort to hinder the severe vow and penance of Raibhya. But it was of no use, and by his curse, that celestial woman became ugly. She entreated him for liberation from the curse. Raibhya blessed her and said that she could obtain her original form by bathing in Yodhinikūṇḍa. (Yogini Kūṇḍa). Urvāśī bathed in Yodhinikūṇḍa and from that day onwards that tīrtha (holy bath) came to be known as Urvāśi-yoginikūṇḍa.

RAIKVA. There was a noble King in ancient India named Jānaśrutī. The following is a story about the fame of this King.

One night while this King was sleeping, some hermits took the form of swans and were flying through the air. One of them saw the radiance of the fame of Jānaśrutī shining brightly. The other swans said that the fame of Raikva was far greater than this. Jānaśrutī heard this. He found out Raikva and placed all his wealth at the foot of Raikva and gave him his daughter in marriage.

RAIVATA I. Information about this King found in the Mahābhārata is given below:—

1) An ancient King in Bhārata. Once he heard the Gandharvas singing songs from Sāmaveda in the arbours of Mandara mountain in the south and becoming so much immersed in it, he desired to renounce his country, city, wife and everything and go to the forest. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 109, Stanza 9).

2) He got a sword from Marutta. He gave that sword to Yuvanāśvā. (M.B. Śaṃti Parva, Chapter 166, Stanza 77).

3) Raivata never ate meat. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Stanza 63).

4) He is one of the Kings who should be praised in the mornings and evenings. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Stanza 53).

RAIVATA II. One of the eleven Rudras. (M.B. Śaṃti Parva, Chapter 208, Stanza 19).

RAIVATAKA I. A mountain in Gujarāt. It stands near the present Junagadh. The present name of Raivatakaka mountain is Girnar. In Mahābhārata it is spoken of as Ujjayantagiri. It is stated in Mahābhārata that while ŚrīKrśna and Arjuna were travelling through Prabhāsakṣetra once, they got to the top of this mountain. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 217, Verse 8).
The Yādavas once celebrated a great festival on the Raivatāka mountain. It was during this festival that Arjunā carried away Subhadra, the sister of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 219; Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

RAIVATAKA II. A mountain in Śāka Island. Mention is made about this mountain in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 18.

RAIVATAKA (RAIVATA). Son of Priyavrata, the brother of Uttānapāda. Priyavrata had two wives: Surūpā and Barhiṣmatī. Surūpā gave birth to ten sons beginning with Agni. Three sons Utama, Tamasa and Raivata were born to Barhiṣmatī. These three sons became Lords of Manvantara, in course of time. (See under Manvantara).

RAJA I. A warrior of Subrahmaṇya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 78).

RAJA II. A Sage. He was one of the sons born to Vasīṣṭha of Urjā.

RAJA. One of the two gate-keepers of Sūryadeva. (Bhāviṣya Purāṇa, Brāhmaṇakaṇḍa).

RAJA (N). All the important Purāṇas have laid special emphasis on the importance of rule by Kings. All living beings will have Kings of their own. It was Brahmā who first assigned or ordained Kingship. After the creation of the Prajāpātis, Brahmā made Candra the King of the stars and medicines; Varuṇa was appointed King of waters like sea, river etc.; Vaiśrāvana was appointed King of Kings; Viśnu, King of Devas; Agni, King of Vasus; Indra King of Maruts; Dakṣa King of the Prajāpātis; Prahlāda King of the dānavas; Hima-vān, King of mountains; Cītrarātha, King of Gandharvas; Vāsuki, King of nāgas; Garuḍa, King of birds; Airāvata, King of elephants; Oṣ, King of cattle, Tiger, King of animals, Peepal tree, King of trees and Uccaiśrāvas, that of horses. (Agni Purāṇa).

As to what type the King of man-kind should be and what should form his duties it is ordained as follows. The Rājā should appoint either a Ksatriya or a brahmin as his Commander-in-chief. The Commander-in-chief should be of noble birth and well-verbed in law. Only a strong man who can speak boldly and openly should be appointed emissary or ambassador. Either a male or a female may be appointed to carry chewing materials. But, that person should be loyal, friendly and capable of putting up with hardships. The body-guard of the King should be a good swordsman. Ministers should be conversant with dharmāśāstras (moral and ethical codes).

Also, the King should be surrounded by the royal physician, chief of the elephant division of the army, the mahout, chief of the cavalry force, master of the forts, the architect, preceptor in archery and the chief of the internal administration of the palace.

When it is yet three hours for the dawn, the King should wake up from sleep. Music, praises by courtiers etc. should herald his waking up. As soon as he has woken up, the King should hold talks with his spies. Then he should examine accounts and only after this he should begin the ablutions. After his pūjā (worship) is over, cows with gold should be gifted to brahmins. With their blessings he must look first into the mirror and then in ghee along with gold. Then he must look up the almanac for the day’s star etc. And after having taken the medicine prescribed by the physician and also the blessings of the preceptor the King should attend court. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 235).

According to Chapter 8 of the Manusmṛti (a great authority on law and ethics) Kings are born from the shoulders of Indra, Viṣṇu, Yama, Śūrya, Agni, Varuṇa, Candra and Kubera.

RAJA (S). One of the seven sons of Vasiṣṭha by Urjā, the other six being Gotra, Īrāvavān, Savana, Anagha, Sutapās, and Sukra. Holy souls, these seven were Saptarṣis in the third Manvantara. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

RĀJADHARMA. A stork, which was a friend of Brahmā and a son of Kaśyapaprajāpati. This stork was known as Nādiśaṅga also. (See under Nādiśaṅga).

RĀJADHARMĀNUSĀSAṆA PARVA. A sub-Parva of Sānti Parva, Chapters 1-130.

RĀJĀDIDEVI. The youngest of the five daughters of the solar King Śūra by Mārisī. King Jayasena of Avanti married Rājādidevi. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

RĀJAGRAHA (GIRIVRAJA). An ancient city in India, capital of Magadha. Dirgha King of Girivraja was killed by King Pāṇḍu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112, Verse 27).

Another King, Ambūvaca, had for a time ruled over the city. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 203, Verse 17). Afterwards Jarāsandha became its King. Girivraja is a holy place as well. He who bathes here will become as pleasant-looking as King Kākśīvān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 104).

RĀJAMUKHĪ. A celestial woman. (Skanda Purāṇa).

RĀJANI. A holy river in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 21).

RĀJANĪTI. (Politics and administration).

Politics and administration or administrative politics in ancient India is dealt with in Manusmṛti and Agni Purāṇa. A very brief summary of it is given below:

The King should organise six kinds of army formations, worship the Devas duly and then set out for war. Mūlabala, Bhūtabala, Srenibala, Suhṛtabala, Satrubala and Aṭāvikabala are the six kinds of army formations. The list is given in order of the comparative importance of the bala. The army has six parts i.e. Mantra (advisers), Kosa (treasury), Panditī (infantry), Turaga (Cavalry), Gaja (elephant) and Ratha (chariot).

If an attack is feared either against the forts or across rivers or trenches, the army should be marched for their protection. The Army Chieffains surrounded by mighty warriors should lead the divisions. The King and his wife should be at the centre of the army-division along with the treasury and first class soldiers. On both sides of the King should march the cavalry and the chariots should form the farther wings. Elephants should proceed on the two sides of the chariot and soldiers recruited from forests must march on the sides of the elephants. The supreme commander will march behind all the others guiding the army.

If there is cause for fear in front of the army during the march, three Vyūhas (Phalanxes) Makara, Śvēna or Śucci should be put in the Vanguard. The Śakaṭa Vyūha is more suited to meet an attack from behind. If attack is feared from the flanks then also the Śakata-vyūha is advisable. When attack from all the sides is feared sarvatobhadrayavyūha is indicated. It is the duty of the Supreme Commander to safe-guard his army and suppress reactionary forces whenever the army gets weakened, when it marches through caves, mountains or rocks or other difficult terrain or weakened by the persistent attacks of the enemy.

When the time, place and the people's attitude are favourable, the King should engage himself in open war with the enemy, and if they are unfavourable he shall not go in for war. If confrontation with the enemy occurs under circumstances in which the King is visible to the enemy, powerful divisions of the army consisting of warriors of great calibre should be stationed either at the front or in the rear.

In the formation of vyūhas (phalanx) there are seven factors called Uras (breast), Kāskas (arm-pits), two Pakṣas (sides), two Madiyas (centre) and Prṣṭha (rear). The commanders should be surrounded by bold soldiers. The leader is the very life of the war. At the Uras of the vyūha powerful elephants, at the Kāskas chariots and at the Pakṣas cavalry should be stationed. This is called paśaḥbhedivyūha. If at the centre cavalry and at Kāskas and Pakṣas elephants are stationed, it is called antarbhedivyūha. If there are no chariots, cavalry or infantry may be put in their place. Certain authorities maintain that in every vyūha elephants may be stationed in the place of chariots, if chariots are not available. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 242).

Rājapura I. An ancient and famous city in Kāmboja. Here Karna defeated the Kāmbojas. (Droga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 5).

Rājapura II. Capital city of King Citrāṅgada of Kaliṅga. Innumerable kings gathered together in the city in connection with the Śvayamvara of the princesses. (Śantī Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 3).

Rājāsekhara. A Sanskrit dramatist who lived in India in 7th century A.D. Bālabhārata or Prakāṇḍapāṇḍava, Bālārāmāyana, Viddhāsālaḥājīkāya and Karṇaprayaṇājīri are his more famous dramatic works. Karṇaprayaṇājīri refers to him as the preceptor of a king of Kānauj. Rājāsekhara was born in the city of Kāvirājā also.

Bālārāmāyana, called also Mahānāṭaka, is a drama in ten Acts. Bālabhārata contains only two Acts. Its theme is the wedding of Draupadi and the ruin caused by the game of dice. Viddhāsālaḥājīkāya is a drama in four Acts. He has a further work to his credit, Kāvyamāmāṁśa in eighteen chapters.

Some scholars hold the view that Rājāsekhara lived in the 10th century A.D.

Rājasūya. A great yajña, Hariścandra and also Dharmaputra performed it. (Śabhā Parva, Chapters 33, 35, 84).

Rājasūyaparva. A sub-Parva of Śabhā Parva. (Chapters 33-35).

Rajatanābha. A Yakṣa. He married Maṇivara, daughter of Anuhrāda and two sons, Maṇivara and Maṇiḥbhāra were born to them.

Rājavān. A muni born in the Bhrigu dynasty. To Bhrigu were born of his wife Khyāti, Lakṣmi, the wife of Viṣṇu and also two sons called Dhātā and Viḍhātā. They married Ayāṭi and Nīyaṭi daughters of Meru. Two sons, Prāṇa and Mrkāṇḍu were born to the couples. From Mrkāṇḍu was born Ṣṛṇaṇḍeya and from him Vedāras. Prāṇa had a son called Dvutiṃāṇ and he a son called Rājavān. It was from Rājavān that the Bhrigu dynasty multiplied. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

Rājāyoga. See under Yoga.

Rājī (Rājī). A prominent king of the Puru dynasty. He was one of the five sons of Ayus by Svarbh inu the other four being Nāhuṣa, Kaṭaravṛddha, Vṛddhāśarman Rambhā and Anenas. (Āśrama Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 23).

Puruṇas contain stories that Indra destroyed people born in Rājī's dynasty as they hated the former. That side in which the powerful Rājī fought used to win. In a fight between the asuras and the Devas, when Indra felt that his side was losing, he secured the participation of Rājī in the fight on condition that the latter would be given Indra-hood. The asuras were defeated and Rājī was made king of svarga.

Rājī had thousands of children and they were known under the common name Śihējeyakṣāriyās. But they were a foolish lot and lacked the capacity to distinguish themselves in Indra's place. Therefore, at the instance of Bṛhaspati, preceptor of the Devas, Indra destroyed them all and resumed his former position and status. (Bṛhadāraṇyaka, 9th Skandha; Vāyu Purāṇa, Chapter 92, Verse 76; Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa 11; Harivamśa 1, 28; Matsya Purāṇa, Chapter 24, Verses 34-49).

Rājjukāṇṭha. A grammarians. In Pāṇini's aśītdhyāyi he is depicted as a mahārṣi possessing great knowledge of the Vedas.

Rājī. Second of the three wives of Vivasvān. The couple had a son called Revata.

Rājīyavarddhana. A king of Vaiśāli. Rājīyavarddhana was great ascetic, who could comprehend the past, the present and the future. Knowing that his death was near, he told his subjects about it and went into the forests for tapas.

Sorry over the departure of their king, his subjects as well as ministers began worshipping Śūrya, who appeared and blessed them saying that their king would live for ten thousand years in perfect health, victory and with all wealth and prosperity and other resources and with unimpaired youthfulness.

The ministers and subjects greatly elated over the boon informed their king in the forest about it, but he only felt sorry about it. He told them that during his life for ten thousands years he would have to witness the death of his sons, grandsons and subjects and would thus have to be sad throughout life.

The king consoled and made them return. Then he did rigorous tapas to Śūrya and secured from him the boon that during his life-time none would die. (Mārkanaḍeya Purāṇa).

Rākā. The presiding Devi of the full moon. She too was present at the birth of Subrahmaṇya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 14).

Rākādevī was the daughter of Āṅgiras, who had by his wife Śrītī four daughters called Śivīvali, Kuṇhī, Rākā and Anumati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 1).

Rākā 11. A Rākṣasa girl. She served at the instance of Kubera, Mahārṣi Vīravas, and a son called Khara and a daughter, Śīrpanakhī, were born to her by the maha-ṛṣi. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 3).

Rākṣas. A particular sect of asuras. Yaksas and Rākṣas were offsprings born to Kāyapa prajāpati of his wife Muni. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).
Rākṣasa I. A particular sect of asuras. The ancients had ordained that Rākṣasas should not be killed at dusk. Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 22, Verse 22). Uttarārāmāyana, contains the following story about the origin of Rākṣasas. When Brahma was reciting the Vedas at the beginning of Krtyayuga he felt very hungry and certain forms emanated from his face. Those who were born from his anger assumed the form of Rākṣasas and those from his hunger that of Yakṣas. The Rākṣasas turned out to be evil folk killing and eating cows and brahmans. Praheṭi and Hete were the first born Rākṣasas, the latter of whom wedded Bhayā, daughter of Kāla, and to them was born a son called Vidyutkeśa. He married Sālakaṭaṅkā, daughter of Sandhyā. Though a child was born to them they forsook it in the Himaḻayan slopes and went their own way.

At that time Śiva and Pārvatī came that way and after blessing the child returned to Kailāśa. The child was named Śukeśa. He married Devavati, daughter of the Gandharva called Maṇि�maya and three children were born to the couple, viz. Mālyavān, Sumāli and Māli. They did tapas to propitiate Brahma and when he appeared requested him thus: “We must defeat Yakṣa Kinnaras, Gandharvas, Śiddhas, Vidyādrhas, Yama, Kubera, Vāsava, Nāga kings and daityas and dānavas and we must not be defeated by any one. We must kill all enemies and they shall not kill us. We three shall never quarrel among ourselves.” Brahma granted all their prayers. The three, proud and haughty due to these boons, began roaming about consuming cows and brahmans. They asked Viśvakarma to build a city for them and he built for them Lānkā on Mount Tīkūṭa in the south sea. The three brothers took their abode in Lānkā. Mālyavān, Sumāli and Māli married respectively Sundarī, Ketumati, and Vasudhā, daughters of the Gandharva woman Narmadā. Mālyavān begot of Sundarī seven sons called Vajranaṇi Viṛūpākṣa, Durmukha, Suptagūha, Yajñakoṣa, Māta, and Ummattā, and also a daughter called Nalā. To Sumāli were born of Ketumati ten sons and also four daughters. Four sons were born to Māli of his wife Vasudhā, and they became the ministers of Viṁśṭiṣaṇa. Then thousands of Rākṣasas were born as sons, grandsons, brothers, nephews, etc. to the above and they lived in Lānkā, a terror to the whole world.

While the daughters of Sumāli, Vekā, Puspata, Kaikasi and Kumbhinasi were once walking in the forest they saw Kubera on a visit to Brahma in all pomp and glory. They understood that Kubera owed his pomp and glory to his being the son of Viśravas and therefore, the next day one of the four, Kaikasi, went to Viśravas’s āramba and prayed for children by him. Three sons called Rāvaṇa, Viṁśṭiṣaṇa and Kumbhaṅkāṇa and a daughter called Śūpapāṇkāṇa were born to her by Viśravas. They secured boons by performing tapas and Rāvaṇa lived in Lānkā as king of the Rākṣasas.

Rākṣasa II. An approved system of marriage. (See under Vivāha).

Rākṣasagraha. An evil spirit connected with the Rākṣasas. Affected by this spirit man will immediately become mad. (Vana Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 50).

Rākṣasayajña (Rākṣasastra). Parāśara Muni once conducted a yajña to annihilate the Rākṣasas altogether. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 180). The provocation for Parāśara to conduct the yajña was that a Rākṣasa called Kalmāṣāpaḍā ate Śakti, the father of the muni and the son of Vasīṣṭha. When the yajña had reached its climax Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu went to Parāśara and held conciliatory talks with him, and Parāśara, ended the yajña. The Agni that he had made to devour the Rākṣasas was discarded on the slopes of the Himaḻayas. According to the Purāṇas that fire, even to this day, continues consuming the Rākṣasas, trees and rocks. (For details see under Kalmāṣāpaḍā and Parāśara).

Rākṣita. A celestial woman, daughter of Kaśyapa-prajāpati by Pradhādevī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 50).

Rākṣobhākṣa. A hell. (For details see under Kāla.)

Rākṣovāha. A kingdom in ancient India. The Kaṣaṇyīnas there were annihilated by Parasurāma. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 12).

Rākta. A son of Mahiṣāsura. He had two sons called Bala and Aitilā. He had also a number of mighty army generals like Dhumrākṣa and thousand aṣaṇiṇiṣ under each general. (Skanda Purāṇa, 7.1.119).

Rāktaḥ. 1) General. Rebirth of Rambhāsura, father of Mahiṇḍra. Stories of Raktabija and Rambhāsura are inextricably intertwined.

2) Origin of Raktabija. Once upon a time there lived an asura king called Dānu. His two sons, Rambha and Karambhā who had no children, did tapas at Pañcānada for the blessing of having issues. Rambha and Karamba meditated upon Mālaṇa. Yakṣa, the former seated at the centre of the five fires and the latter standing in the water. Indra in the guise of a crocodile dragged Karamba away by the feet and killed him. Angry at the death of his brother, Rambha decided to cut off his head and offer it in fire. When he was about to do so, Agni appeared and told him that suicide was worse than killing others, and promised to grant him whatever he desired. Accordingly Rambha requested Agni for a son more effulgent than the latter, who would conquer the three worlds and would not be defeated even by the Devas and the Aṣuras. Rambha further wanted that son to be as powerful as Vāyu, exceptionally handsome and skilled in archery. Agni blessed Rambha that he would have, as desired, a son by the woman whom he coveted. On his way back home he saw a beautiful she-buffalo, which he married. He took the buffalo which got pregnant by him, to Pāṭala to protect it from the attack by other buffaloes. One day another buffalo felt a passion for Rambha’s wife and in the fight that ensued Rambha was killed by it. Rambha’s wife died in his funeral pyre. It was from the centre of the fire that the very powerful Mahiṇḍra was born. Rambhāsura also rose from the fire under the name Raktabija. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 17; Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

3) Boon to Raktabija. Raktabija secured from Śiva a boon according to which if one drop of blood from his body fell on the battlefield, many Raktabijas would arise from the blood and fight the enemies. Each of these Raktabijas would also be like the others in the matter of strength, form and weapons. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).
RAKTAJA

4) His death. War between Devas and Asuras broke out and in the fight between Devi and Raktabija blood from his body flowed. When Devi found it impossible to kill the lakhs of Rakta Asuras who arose from the blood, she resorted to a trick. She asked Cāmuṇḍi to lick off the blood flowing from Raktabija before it fell on the ground. Accordingly Devi began killing the asuras and Cāmuṇḍi consuming their blood and flesh. When the artificial Raktabijas were all killed thus, the original Raktabija alone remained and in the fight between them, Devi cut off his head with her sword. Cāmuṇḍi did not permit even a drop of blood to fall on the ground. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RAKTAJA. A form assumed by Arjuna in his previous birth. The following story is told in Padma Purāṇa (Chapter 14) about Arjuna being reborn as such at the meeting of Kali and Dvāpara yugas and Svedaja being born as Karna during the same period.

Once during a quarrel between Siva and Brahma the former nipped off Brahma’s head. (For details see under Brahma). Some drops of sweat appeared on the forehead of the angry Brahma, and from the sweat which Brahma wiped with his hand arose a person wearing a thousand shields, bow and quiver. That person was Svedaja. He asked Brahma what he should do and the former granted him permission to destroy Siva. He then approached Siva with bow drawn and the frightened Siva ran to Viṣṇu and sought refuge. Svedaja followed Siva and when Viṣṇu, seeing him, raised a loud noise ‘Hum’, Siva prostrated at Viṣṇu’s feet. Siva extended the skull in his hand towards Viṣṇu requesting something to be given to him. Mahāviṁśu, who had nothing else to give Siva, put his right hand into the skull as alms, Siva wounded the hand with his Śāla (three-pronged weapon) and pure red blood began flowing from the hand into the skull. The blood continued flowing for a thousand years in a length of fifty yojanas and thickness of ten yojanas. At the end of the period Viṣṇu asked whether the skull was not filled yet, and looking into the skull with his three eyes Siva answered that it was full. Then Viṣṇu stopped the flow of blood, and Siva, in the presence of Viṣṇu, looked into the blood for a thousand years and stirred it with his hand. The blood gradually turned into a bubble, and a person possessing thousand hands and as glowing as fire appeared in the skull. He had a crown on his head and he held in his hands a bow and quiver. He wore gloves on his hands. And, that was Rakta, an incarnation of Narāśiṃha.

Looking at Rakta, Śiva told Viṣṇu thus: “This master in archery is Nara. You spoke Nara, and let his name, therefore be Nara. Oh Narāśiṃha, you both will be called Naranārāyaṇas. This Nara will be of help to you on behalf of the Devas and also in the sustenance and protection of the world. He will further help you to kill the asuras. Nara, the great intellectual that he is, will become a mūnī, of surpassing wisdom. Brahmas divine fifth head possesses so much of effulgence. Nara is created from that effulgence and also from the blood from your hands and my look at it. He will annihilate all enemies in war. He will be a terror to those persons who cannot be conquered by you, Indra and the other Devas.

While Viṣṇu stood there amazed Rakta praised him and Siva with folded hands and asked from the skull what he should do. Then Śiva ordered him thus: “You kill this asura (Svedaja) created by Brahmā with his own effulgence.” And Siva led Rakta out of the skull by his hands and told him again:—“Look, here lies the terrible person I spoke about made unconscious by the cry of ‘Hum’ by Viṣṇu. Awake him immediately.” After having said this Śiva disappeared. Nara, in the presence of Narāśiṃha, kicked the unconscious Svedaja with his left foot, and he came out of his unconscious state.

The fierce fight that ensued between Rakta and Svedaja continued for two years. By then Svedaja had lost everything but one of his shields and Rakta had only his two arms to fight with. At this stage Vāsudeva (Viṣṇu) in great alarm went and asked Brahma whether Rakta might not kill Svedaja. Brahma answered, “In the next birth Nara may defeat Svedaja.” Saying “Right, let that be so”, Viṣṇu returned to the battlefield and withdrew them from fighting with the assurance that they would be given an opportunity to fight again during the period of the Kali and the Dvāpara yugas.

Afterwards Viṣṇu directed Āditya (Sun) and Ākhanḍala (Indra) to look after Rakta and Svedaja. He told Āditya further:—“At the end of the Dvāpara yuga you should see that Svedaja is reborn, in the interests of the Devas, as your son. In the Yadu dynasty will be born a very powerful fellow called Śūra and he will have a very beautiful daughter named Pṛthā. Durvāśas will advise her some mantras as a boon and she will have some sons from the Devas whom she will invoke with the mantras. With that object in view, while in her periods, she would, at the time of dawn gaze at you with love. Then he (Svedaja) will be born as the son called Vasūṣeṇa of Kunti, the virgin.”

The Sun-God agreed to obey the above instructions of Viṣṇu and told him further:—“I shall procreate in the virgin a very powerful and valiant son, who will become well-known in the world as Karna. He will gift away all wealth to brahmins.” After saying this Śūrya disappeared.

After this Viṣṇu told Indra as follows:—“You should, at the end of the Dvāpara yuga see that this Nara, born from blood, is reborn as an aspect of yours on earth. King Pāṇdu will one day go into the forest with his wives, Kunti and Mādri, and he will then become the object of an animal’s curse. He will therefore, in a spirit of renunciation, go to mount Śatārūga where he would ask Kunti to become a mother by another man. Unwilling to do so Kunti will desire to have sons by Devas, and when she prays to you, you should favour her with this Nara as son.

Devendra raised a legal objection to the above injunction of Viṣṇu as follows:—“You, who incarnated yourself as Rāma in the twentyseventh yuga of the last Manvantara for the purpose of killing Rāvaṇa, killed my son Bāli. Therefore I do not wish to procreate Nara as my son.” To this objection of Indra Viṣṇu assured him that as a penalty for the mistake of killing Bāli, he would be a companion of Nara (Arjuna) who would be born as Indra’s son.

According to the above terms and conditions fighting between Rakta and Svedaja ended. In the next birth Rakta was born as Arjuna and Svedaja as Karna. Mahavishnu incarnated himself as Sri Krsna. The meeting of the three in the battle-field is well-known.

RAKSHA. A naga born in Dhrtarastra's dynasty. It was burnt to death at the yakusa of Janamejaya. (Adi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 18).

RAMA. A synonym for Mahakshmi. There is a story in the eighth Skandha of Devi Bhagavata as to how the name Ram came to be attached to Lakshmi. Revanta, the very handsome son of Surya one day came to Vaikuntha mounted on his horse Uccalaarasavas to pay his respects to Mahavishnu. Even Laksmidevi stood aghast for a very short time at the charm of Revanta changing her looks between him and his horse. Mahavishnu did not at all like this and cursed that since Lakshm's eyes enjoyed the sight of some one she would come to be called Ram also and that she should be born as a mare on earth.

RAMA (SRI RAMA). The seventh incarnation of Mahavishnu, a very powerful king of the solar dynasty.

2) Reason for his birth. When Ravana was ruling over Laaksh, as a terror to the world, evils and cruelties like matricide, patricide, fratricide, killing of cows, hatred for good people, children's death, abduction of women, killing of muni's, thefts etc. became rampant. When the world became grief-stricken Bhumidevi (Goddess of earth) assumed the form of a cow and took refuge with Indra in Svarag. She told him about the atrocities committed by Ravana and the other Rakshasas. Then Indra took Bhumidevi (cow) to Brahma, who took them to Siva at Kailasa as killing Ravana was beyond his (Brahma's) power. Siva thought it improper on his part to kill Ravana and so he took Brahma and others to Vishnu and submitted their grievance to him. Vishnu consolved them by saying as follows: - "I have decided to incarnate myself as the son of Dasaratha, king of Ayodhya. You Devas also should take birth on earth to help me to kill Ravana and other evil Rakshasas and to protect Bhumidevi and the good people on the earth." (Kamba Ramayana, Purva Kanda).

3) Birth. King Dasaratha of the solar dynasty ruled Kosala with Ayodhya as his capital. Maharshi Vasishtha was his family preceptor. With the cooperation of eight ministers such as Sumantra and others he ruled the country in the path of supreme welfare and prosperity. A daughter, Sata, was born to him of his wife Kausalya. Years passed by, yet he had no son. One of those days King Lomapada, a close friend of Dasaratha visited Ayodhya. Lomapada, who was childless requested Dasaratha for Sata and she was given as his adopted daughter by Dasaratha. Lomapada gave her in marriage to Ryaasrnga, who had once caused rain-fall in Aiga. (For details see under Ryaasrnga).

To have a son, Daaaratha took as his second wife Kaikseyi, daughter of the King of Kekaya and younger sister of Yudhajit. But she turned out to be barren. Then he married Sumittra, daughter of the King of Kasi. Even after many years none of the three wives of Daaratha presented him with a son.

One of those days Daaratha went deep into the forest, hunting. While resting on the banks of river Sarayu he heard a sound like that of an elephant drinking water in the river. Without realising the fact that the voice was that of the son of a muni filling water in a pot for his aged parents, the King released an arrow against him. When Daaratha walked to the spot, he realised his mistake. He had hit unknowingly a brahmin-boy, a muni's son. The boy lay wounded about to die. The boy explained to Daaratha who he was and how he had come to the river to carry water to his aged parents. After telling the King details about him he breathed his last. Sobbing at his misadventure, Daaratha went to the aged parents of the dead boy with the pot filled with water. The parents, who were blind thought that it was their son who was approaching them when Daaratha revealed the sad story to them. After cursing Daaratha that he too would be separated from his son, the aged muni expired; his wife also died in his funeral pyre. The grief-stricken King returned to Ayodhya.

Only Vasishta and Sumantra were told about the curse, which, though a cause for great sorrow, implied that Dasaratha would have sons. Vasishtha, therefore, advised Daaratha to get the yajna, called putrakamesti performed by Ryaasrnga. Accordingly the King invited his daughter Sata and his son-in-law, Ryaasrnga to Ayodhya, and the yajna began. Ryaasrnga made offerings in the sacred fire chanting the putrakama hymn. Then a divine person arose from the fire with a golden vessel full of pudding (nectar of the Devas) and disappeared again in the fire after giving the vessel to Ryaasrnga. Ryaasrnga handed it over to Daaratha, who as advised by the maharshi divided the pudding between Kausalya and Kaikseyi. They gave a part of their shares of the pudding to Sumittra also. The three queens conceived, and in due course of time Kausalya and Kaikseyi delivered a son each and Sumittra two sons. The son of Kausalya was named Rama, the son of Kaikseyi, Bharata, and sons of Sumittra were named Laksmana and Satrughna. (Valmiki Ramayana, Balakanda).

4) Boons granted to Kaikseyi. Before the sons were born to Dasaratha, the mighty asura called Sambara once attacked Devaloka. Dasaratha was at that time known as Nemi, and he was a great friend of Indra, and on his invitation Nemi, along with Kaikseyi, went to Devaloka in a chariot. Nemi killed the asura army within half an hour. Then Sambara assumed the form of ten Sambaras and attacked Nemi from ten points. In this context Nemi turned and twisted his chariot in all the ten directions at the same time and killed all the ten Sambaras and recaptured Svarag. It was from that day onwards that Nemi came to be known as Daaratha.

In the fight with the Sambaras on all points Daaratha's chariot was so violently shaken that the key of its axe was about to slip off and fall down. Noticing the threatened danger Kaikseyi applied her finger to the proper place of the axle and thus averted the mishap. When Daśaratha knew about this timely action of Kaśyapa he was so very pleased that he asked her to choose any two boons she desired, and she asked him to keep the boons with him to be granted whenever she requested for them. Daśaratha and Kaśyapa took leave of Indra and returned to Ayodhya. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāṇḍa).

5) In the company of Viśvāmitra. The four sons of Daśaratha grew up in Ayodhya. Though they were equally friendly to one another, intimacy between Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and also between Bharata and Satrughna came to be thicker. Once Viśvāmitra decided to conduct a yajña for the happiness and contentment of all people. At the very commencement of the yajña, Rākṣasas, in batches, tried to spoil it, and Mārica and Subhānu, sons of Tāṭakā were the leaders of the obstructionists. Viśvāmitra knew that Rāma was the most effective weapon against the Rākṣasas and requested Daśaratha to lend him Rāma's help. Daśaratha felt sad about it and Viśvāmitra was getting excited over the former's attitude when Vasiṣṭha advised Daśaratha to send Rāma along with Viśvāmitra. Accordingly Daśaratha sent Rāma to the forest in the company of Viśvāmitra. Lakṣmaṇa too followed his brother.

While walking in the forest Viśvāmitra related many old stories to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. They crossed river Sarayu, passed by many āśramas of munis and reached the Pāla forest. Here Viśvāmitra imparted to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who felt too weak on account of hunger and thirst the two mantras Balā and Aśīlā, which would ward off hunger and thirst. He also taught them the use of certain rare arrows. Śrī Rāma was specially taught the use of a divine arrow called Jṛmbhakāstra.

6) Tāṭakā killed. While Viśvāmitra was relating to them the story of Tāṭakā, who dwelt in the forest, they saw the fierce Rākṣasi coming fast with a long spear in her hand. She threw a big rock at Viśvāmitra. Rāma shattered the rock with an arrow. Next, Tāṭakā dashed forward against Rāma roaring furiously, and Rāma, with another arrow killed her. The soul of the dead Tāṭakā assumed the form of a Gandharva woman and ascended to heaven.

7) Salvation to Ahalīyā. Rākṣasas like Subhālu lined up to obstruct the yajña, which Viśvāmitra began after the killing of Tāṭakā. Rāma killed Subhānu; Mārica ran away in fright and hid himself in the sea. Rāma drove away the other Rākṣasas.

Next, Viśvāmitra, hearing about the Svayaṁvara of Sītā, daughter of King Janaka started for his palace with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, and on the way he told the boys many Purāṇic stories. They bathed in the river Gaṅgā and a short walk took them to the vacant āśrama of Gautama. The great muni called Gautama had once lived in this āśrama with his dutiful wife Ahalīyā and their son Satīnanda, an erudite scholar in all sciences. Indra, who lost his head over the great beauty of Ahalīyā went to the āśrama one midnight in the form of a cock and crew. Thinking it was already dawn Gautama went to the river for bath when Indra assumed the form of the muni, entered his bed room and slept with Ahalīyā. When Gautama understood the fraud thus played upon him, he cursed her into a stone. She was to resume her old form when, during Tretāyuga, Śrī Rāma trod upon the stone. Accordingly, as soon as Rāma trod on the stone Ahalīyā cast off her form as stone and resumed her old form as Ahalīyā. Immediately Gautama and Satīnanda also appeared on the scene. Ahalīyā ascended to the sky as a devī.

8) Marriage. Viśvāmitra came to king Janaka’s palace with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Janaka’s daughter Sītā and his younger brothers’ daughters Māṇḍavi, Īrānīla and Śrutakirti were living in the palace as sisters and very good friends. One day the princesses who were playing in the garden could not pluck jasmine flowers from a height. Sītā then brought the Saiva-cāpa (Śiva’s bow) from the weapon-room and shot down Jasmine flowers with it. As Janaka watched Sītā’s action of shooting with the Saiva-cāpa an idea came into his head. He announced that the hero, who succeeded in shooting with Saiva-cāpa, would be given Sītā in marriage. Just as Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were inseparable companions Sītā and Īrānīla were always to be found together and Māṇḍavi and Śrutakirti were particular friends. Śrī Rāma shot an arrow from Śiva’s bow and he was selected as Sītā’s husband. Janaka informed Daśaratha of the marriage and he came with his attendants. Bharata married Māṇḍavi, Lakṣmaṇa, Īrānīla and Satrughna, Śrutakirti. After living in Mithūla for sometime Daśaratha and others returned to Ayodhya. Viśvāmitra went to the Himālayas for rest.

9) Paraśurāma’s threat. Daśaratha and others on their way back to Ayodhya passed the Videha kingdom and reached the suburbs of Bāhagavārāma. All of a sudden a shining form of a brahmin with Śaivāta effulgence appeared in front of the procession. Vasiṣṭha understood that it was Paraśurāma and Daśaratha and others were alarmed. Paraśurāma approached Śrī Rāma who was viewing the former with quiet serenity. Paraśu- rāma was very angry that Rāma broke the bow of Śiva who was his (Paraśurāma’s) preceptor. All Rāma’s conciliatory talk failed to pacify Paraśurāma, who spoke thus to Rāma: “You, impudent fellow! you insulted me and my preceptor. All right, let me see your power. Take this my bow, and shoot with it.” Śrī Rāma took hold of the bow and bent it easily and fixing an arrow on it asked Paraśurāma to point out the target for it. As Paraśurāma feared that if the arrow was sent, it might crush the whole universe, he asked Rāma so choose the result of his (Paraśurāma’s) taps as target for the arrow. Both the bow and the arrow were of Viśu’s power. That power as well as his own Viśvāpya power, Paraśurāma transferred to Śrī Rāma and having thus fulfilled the object of his incarnation Paraśurāma went to Pūnyārāma for permanent taps.

10) Ruin of the country. Daśaratha decided to install Śrī Rāma as crown prince. The people whole-heartedly welcomed it. During the night previous to the coronation, while the wives of Daśaratha were gladly discussing the happy incident, Mantharā, the tale-bearing maid of Kaśyapa advised her mistress to prevail upon Daśaratha to exile Rāma into the forest and install Bharata as crown prince. Mantharā also reminded Kaśyapa about the boons, which had been promised to her by Daśaratha during the devāsura war. Kaśyapa fell into the trap thus set by Mantharā. Kaśyapa put on a wrathful face and shut herself up in a room. When Daśaratha enquired of her the reason for her anger she asked him to make her son Bharata, the crown prince and exile Rāma for... fourteen years' life in forest. The king fainted when he heard the demand. But, Śrī Rāma, on hearing about it, put on an anchorite's apparel and got ready to start for the forest. Sitā and Laksmaṇa also got ready to follow Rāma into the forest. While the entire population of Ayodhyā stood there weeping, Rāma, Laksmaṇa and Sitā wearing the forest-dwellers' garb started for the forest.

11) Death of Daśaratha and Bharata's decision. As soon as Sumantra, who had accompanied Rāma and others returned to Ayodhyā, Daśaratha expired on account of unbearable grief caused by Rāma's exile. Messengers brought to Ayodhyā Bharata and Satruighna from Kekaya where they were put up with their uncle Yudhājīt at the time of their father's death. But, they were kept in the dark of all that had happened in their absence till their arrival at the palace. Bharata, who heard of everything from his mother was greatly upset and got ready to go to Rāma in the forest. Satruighna too got ready to accompany him. Arundhati and Vasīṣṭha in a chariot in the fore-front, Kausalyā and Sumitrā in another chariot just behind the first one, Bharata and Satruighna behind them—in this manner the great journey into the forest started. Leaving all others behind him, Bharata went forward and prostrated before Rāma and Laksmaṇa at Citrakūṭa. Śrī Rāma broke into tears on hearing about the death of their father. But in spite of Bharata's pressing request Rāma refused to return to Ayodhyā. At last Bharata yielded to Rāma's injunction and returned to Ayodhyā with the latter's sandals. But he did not enter the palace; instead he built an āśrama at Nandigrāma and worshipping Rāma's sandals lived there.

12) Trip to Pañcavaṭī. From Mount Citrakūṭa Śrī Rāma and others started towards the forest. When they continued their journey after visiting the Sage Atri's āśrama a Rākṣasa called Virādha ran away carrying off Sitā. Rāma killed Virādha and regained Sitā. Then they visited the āśrama of sage Sarabhaṅga in the Kumuda forest. Therefrom they went to the Mrkandu forest where they visited mahārṣi Agastya, and there Rāma took the vow to kill Rāvaṇa and other evil Rākṣasas and thus render the land safe for sages to perform tapas. Agastya presented to Rāma a Vaiṣṇava bow, a Brāhma arrow and a Śaiva quiver. Rāma kept them with Agastya himself to be given to him when required. Then Agastya gave Rāma a divine ornament such as was not available in all the three worlds. Rāma tied it round Sitā's neck. Taking leave of Agastya, Rāma and others went to the Daṇḍaka forest. It was on a high peak of Mount Mahākrūṇa in the forest that Jāṭayu, brother of Sampāti and a very close friend of Rāma lived. Rāma and Jāṭayu renewed their old friendship and decided to be of mutual service in future. After that Rāma and others rested themselves on the banks of the near-by Godāvari.

13) Stay at Pañcavaṭī. Pañcavaṭī was on the southern bank of the Godāvari. Five vaṣa (peepal) trees of the same size stood there in a circle, and so the place was called Pañcavaṭī. (See under Pañcavaṭī). Śrī Rāma decided to build an āśrama at the centre of those trees. Laksmaṇa cut down an ebony tree there to put up a pāraṇāśāla (but). At once the log disappeared and the dead body of a Rākṣasa youth was found there. It was the corpse of Śambhukumāra, son of Śūrpaṇakha. He was performing tapas there to propitiate Śiva when he was overcome by the beauty of Sitā and to look at her from a hidden spot he had assumed the form of the ebony tree. It was him that Laksmaṇa had cut down. Śrī Rāma understood the situation and explained to his wife and brother about the trickeries of the Rākṣasas. Then the paraṇāśāla was constructed and they lived there. Hearing about the coming of Rāma all the sages of the Daṇḍaka forest visited them. They lived in Pañcavaṭī for thirteen years.

14) Test by Paramesvara (Śiva) and Pārvati. Paramesvara and Pārvati, who knew that many tricky changes would occur in the thirteenth year of the life of Rāma and Sitā there, decided to submit them to a test. The object of the test was to see whether Rāma and Sitā would recognise each other under all circumstances. When Sitā one day entered the river Godāvari to fetch water, she saw two swans enjoying themselves in a lotus pool in the middle of a sand-shoal in the river. When Sitā went near the pool she saw Rāma bathing in it. But on a closer look she recognised that it was not Rāma, but Śiva, in the guise of Rāma, who was bathing there. To befool Sitā Śiva, who was disguised as Rāma, told her:—Dear one! Please come to me quickly. Why were you so late?

Sitā:—Oh, Deva! Salutations. Why did you alone come to the bath?

Rāma:—I had to come alone as Devi did not come with me at once and was late in coming.

Sitā:—Why did not the Devi come? You two are unique. Devi might be alone at Kailāsa just now. It was not good that you did not bring her also with you.

Śiva:—Oh great Devi! Salutations to your divine greatness. Let me return to Kailāsa after saluting Śrī Rāma. Hail unto thee.

Meanwhile Śrī Rāma was waiting impatiently for Sitā to return. Then Sitā approached him looking into a lotus flower she held in her hand and also throwing, off and on, amorous glances at him. (She was in fact Pārvati in the guise of Sitā). And she told Rāma:—My Lord! you would excuse my delay in returning. The delay was due to my tarrying there to look at the play of two swans. Śrī Rāma looked closely and recognised that it was not Sitā and replied as follows:—Oh Devi! my salutations. Did you come alone? Where is Deva? How is it that you are separated from him? Mahādeva and Mahādevī are one and inseparable. Then how this separation? Sitā (Pārvati):—Salutations. Thou art omniscient and omnipotent. I return to the presence of Śiva.

15) The incident of Śūrpaṇakha. Śūrpaṇakha was the wife of a Rākṣasa called Vidyujjihva. Once in a war which Rāvaṇa, Vidyujjihva and other Rākṣasas fought at Devaloka Vidyujjihva was killed by mistake. Rāvaṇa, therefore, permitted Śūrpaṇakha to choose whomsoever she liked as her husband, and she went about the world in search of a suitable husband. She liked some persons, but they did not like her, and vice versa. Thus she was roaming about discontented. She was also on the look-out for an opportunity to take vengeance on Laksmaṇa for killing her son, Śambhukumāra. Śūrpaṇakha, who heard about the beauty of Rāma and Laksmaṇa came to Pañcavaṭī disguised as Lalitā. Śrī Rāma alone was there in the āśrama at the time and she told him that she was love-sick. Śrī Rāma rejected her prayer on the plea that he was already married.
Then she approached Lakṣmaṇa with the same request. He too refused to oblige her. Then she saw Sītā there and decided to shatter her married life and also to make a present of her to Rāvaṇa. She also thought that if Sītā were got rid of she would have Rāma for husband. Maddened by such thoughts she rushed into the āśrama. But, Lakṣmaṇa drove her out. Then, carrying Lakṣmaṇa with her she rose into the sky and he cut away both her ears, breasts and nose. Thus disfigured she resumed her form of Rākṣaśī. She flew away in the sky roaring loudly.

16) Khara killed. Having heard about the disfigurement of Śūrpaṇaṅkha Khara sent fourteen Rākṣasas to Rāma’s āśrama. Lakṣmaṇa killed them very easily. Next, Khara, his brothers Dūṣaṇa and Trīśiras with fourteen thousand Rākṣasa soldiers came to fight Rāma. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa killed them also. This saddened Śūrpaṇaṅkha very much and she reported the entire affair to Rāvaṇa at Laṅkā. She told him that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were very courageous warriors and he was not to enter into direct fighting with them, but was to abduct Sītā whose loss would cause Rāma’s death. She also assured Rāvaṇa that if Rāma died, Lakṣmaṇa would himself end his life.

17) Sītā abducted. Next day a spotted deer was found playing near the āśrama. Sītā desired to have the deer and Śrī Rāma, after asking his brother to take care of Sītā, followed the deer, which enticed him to a great distance in the forest. At last, finding it difficult to catch the deer alive, Rāma shot an arrow at it. Hit by the arrow the deer transformed itself into a gigantic Rākṣasa and fell down dead crying. “Oh! Sītā O! Lakṣmaṇa, a Rākṣasa is killing me. Come and save me.”

The Rākṣasa, who thus fell a prey to Rāma’s arrow was really Māricca, uncle of Rāvaṇa. Māricca had gone in the form of a deer to Rāma’s āśrama at the instance of his nephews to cheat Rāma. Sītā heard the false cry of Māricca and asked Lakṣmaṇa to hurry up to the spot for Rāma’s protection. Lakṣmaṇa at first did not want to leave Sītā there alone and go after Rāma. But, when she used hard and cruel words against him Lakṣmaṇa quitted the āśrama and went into the forest. When Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were thus absent at the āśrama an old Sannyāsin came for alms at the courtyard. Sītā, who came out to offer alms was forcibly carried away by Rāvaṇa (the sannyāsin was Rāvaṇa in disguise) in his puspaka aerial chariot to Laṅkā. On the way Jāṭāyu saw Rāvaṇa and put up a fight with him to get Sītā released. But, Jāṭāyu had to fall down wounded by the sword of Rāvaṇa and he lay there awaiting Rāma’s arrival.

Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa returned to the āśrama only to find Sītā missing. While they advanced some distance lamenting over the loss of Sītā they saw Jāṭāyu lying in the forest, his wings cut, but happy in expectation of salvation and repeating the name of Rāma. Jāṭāyu gave Rāma all details about Sītā and then gave up his body and ascended to Vaikuṇṭha.

18) Salutation to Kabandha. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa moved towards the south in quest of Sītā. An asura woman called Ayomukhi, sister of Śūrpaṇaṅkha tried to entice Lakṣmaṇa, who went alone to a pool to fetch water. When Lakṣmaṇa resisted and kept away from her allurements, she tried to carry him away into the sky. But, he drove her away disfigured. When the brothers continued their search for Sītā they were caught in the arms stretched out in semi-circular form. It was a Rākṣasa called Kabandha, and they cut away one arm each. At once the fierce Kabandha (headless body) form disappeared and a Gandharva youth appeared in his place. After offering mokṣa to Kabandha Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa continued their search for Sītā. (See under Kabandha).

19) Salutation to Śabarī. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa reached Śabarīyāśrama and were duly received by the female hermit Śabarī. She presented them with fruits. Not only that, she personally tasted each fruit for its quality and then gave the best to the guests. Rāma was so very pleased with her purv devotion that he offered her salvation. (For details see under Śabarī).

20) Rāma—Sugriva alliance. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa bathed in the Pāmpa river and thus refreshed they travelled up to the height of Mount Rṣyamūkha where Sugriva lived with Hanumān as his Prime Minister. Sugriva, who saw Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa coming, deputed Hanumān to find out whether they were friends or foes. Hanumān, in the guise of a brahmin boy talked with them, who related their story from the abduction of Sītā. Having understood the matters Hanumān resumed his actual form and carried Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa on his shoulders into the presence of Sugriva. Sugriva related to Rāma the story of his expulsion from Kīṣkindhā by Bālī, his elder brother. Sugriva wanted a powerful ally to recapture the country. Similarly Śrī Rāma too wanted a powerful ally to regain Sītā. So both the parties entered into an alliance, Rāma undertaking to kill Bālī and restore his kingdom and his wife to Sugriva and Sugriva undertaking to search for and find out Sītā for Rāma.

Though the above pact was made, Sugriva was doubtful about Rāma’s capacity to honour his part of the contract, and Rāma, knowing this suspicion of Sugriva, wanted to dispel it. The mountain-like body of Dun-dubhi, the Rākṣasa killed by Bālī, lay there in a big heap of bones and at the instance of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa threw it into the distant southern sea with the big toe of his left foot. Sugriva was wonder-struck at this feat of Lakṣmaṇa and praised him. Yet Sugriva was not quite cured of his doubt and Rāma wanted to further convince him of their prowess.

There were seven big trees there known as Saptasālas. Bālī used to wrestle with the trees due to his overflowing vitality and power. (See under Saptasāla). Śrī Rāma went near the trees and suddenly fixed an arrow on his bow-string and shot it by drawing the bow, with the big toe of his right foot pressed against a rock. The arrow cut down the seven trees at one and the same time and then automatically returned to its quiver. Sugriva was taken aback by this marvellous show of power.

21) Exhibition of ornaments. They came again to Rṣyamūkacala and Sugriva placed before Rāma a bundle of ornaments and said that it was dropped down by a weeping woman from an aerial chariot, which had, a few days back, passed above the mountain. Rāma recognised them as Sītā’s ornaments, shed tears and sat there motionless for some time. At last Sugriva and Lakṣmaṇa consoled him and he handed over the bundle of ornaments to Lakṣmaṇa.
22) Kingdom restored to Sugrīva. The very next day Sugrīva took Rāma to Kṣiṁkhā, and the former challenged Bāli for a combat. Rāma, from a distance, viewed the fierce fight between the brothers, but he could not do anything as it was impossible to distinguish between Bāli and Sugrīva on account of their very close resemblance. Sugrīva, who was defeated in the first round and retired from fight felt angry towards Rāma, but was soon satisfied with Rāma’s explanation for his inaction. To distinguish Sugrīva from Bāli Śrī Rāma, the next day, put a garland on the former’s neck and wearing the garland Sugrīva challenged Bāli a second time to a duel. Though Bāli’s wife, Tārā, this time prevented him from accepting the challenge Bāli paid no heed to her protests and rushed forth for the duel.

Bāli and Sugrīva fought again, and this time Rāma from his concealment behind a tree shot an arrow at the chest of Bāli. The arrow felled him. Rāma and Laksmaṇa then came into the open and Bāli spoke disparagingly to Rāma about shooting the arrow from concealment. Rāma answered him saying that if he had seen him (Rāma) face to face he would have become his devotee and he had to shoot Bāli from his hiding place as it was not proper to kill one’s devotees. At last, after handing over charge of his wife and son Āṅgada, to Sugrīva, Bāli breathed his last. Śrī Rāma decided to crown Sugrīva as King and install Āṅgada as crown prince and returned to Rṣyamūkācāla for rest after entrusting, under the supervision of Laksmaṇa, Hanūmān and Jāmbavān with the duty of making preparations for the coronation. Though Sugrīva invited Śrī Rāma to Kṣiṁkhā when preparations for coronation were over, the latter declined the invitation gracefully and deputed Laksmaṇa to represent him at the ceremony. Laksmaṇa installed Sugrīva as the Mahārāja, Āṅgada as crown prince, Rūma as queen and Tārā as queen-mother. Also, Hanūmān was appointed as Sugrīva’s minister. Those things over, Laksmaṇa returned to Rāma at Rṣyamūkācāla.

23) Laksmaṇa’s wrath. The next four months were rainy period. Even after that Sugrīva did not make necessary arrangements to search for Sītā. At Rāma’s instance Laksmaṇa went to Kṣiṁkhā to enquire about the reason for the delay. The monkeys were alarmed by the grave appearance of Laksmaṇa and Tārā came out and apologised to him. Arrangements were soon finalised for the quest of Sītā. Armies of many lakhs of monkeys were deputed to the eight regions to search for Sītā. Susēṇa was appointed chief of the army for the west, Satabali for the north, Vinata for the east and Āṅgada for the south. As the south was the chief place for the search, monkeys like Hanūmān, Jāmbavān, Vivida, Nala, Nila, Kumuda, each of them an expert in various ways, were appointed chiefs of different matters. Every chief and his assistant was given suitable instructions by Laksmaṇa and Sugrīva, and accordingly the army of monkeys began its march under the leadership of Hanūmān.

24) Words of recognition. To convince Sītā that it was really the emissary of Rāma who went to her the latter imparted to Hanūmān the following three sentences for timely use.

(i) "When I took leave of you for life in exile in the forest you (Sītā) who were then in the inner apartment dressed in ordinary fashion came out in the same dress prepared to follow me saying ‘I too...’ feigning anger'.

(ii) When, for our life in the forest, we had left the city and approached a shrubbery, Sītā in her childish ignorance and goodness of heart told me ‘This place will do for our forest life.’

(iii) While she was one day massaging my leg in our bedroom she threw away from her finger the ring studded with stones. When I asked her the reason for it she answered me as follows:—This ring studded with stones may prove to be of danger to me. When your feet touched the hard granite rock it turned out into a world beauty (Ahalāyā). Under the circumstances how much more beautiful would be the woman, who would be created by the touch of your foot on the beautiful stone of the ring? And, because of that beauty you may...me...and then...". We two—I and Sītā—alone knew about the above incident.

Carrying thus Śrī Rāma’s signet ring and words of recognition Hanūmān went along with the army, which started for the south. Sugrīva gave one month’s time to the searching parties to find out Sītā and warned them that their throats would be cut if they failed in their mission.

25) Saw Svayamprabhā. Āṅgada, Hanūmān, Jāmbavān and others during their search came to an extensive forest. They were dead tired with hunger and thirst. The leader of the party looked about for something to eat and drink when he saw small birds flying up from a distant pit. From drops of water falling from the wings of the birds it was inferred that the pit contained water. When Hanūmān and others entered the pit (cave) and walked a great distance they came to a spacious garden. They were astonished to find a solitary beauty there, and she related to them her autobiography as follows:—

I am the faithful maid of Rambhā. The powerful asura called Caturāṣya wanted me to procure Rambhā for him and he got this garden city built by Mayācārya, the architect of the Daityas, for me as reward for my service to him in the matter of Rambhā. Various kinds of gems light this place and creepers and trees supply food materials. Caturāṣya, I and Rambhā alone were living here. But, Indra came to know of it, came here, killed Caturāṣya and took away Rambhā with him. He cursed me to lead a solitary life here as punishment for having helped Caturāṣya. I prayed for redemption from the curse and Indra told me, that after thousands of years a company of monkeys would come here in search of Sītā and that after entertaining them with food I must see Rāma and then return to Svarga. I have thus been awaiting your arrival and now I am leaving the place, which will vanish as soon as I quit it. All of you, please stand there with eyes closed and I shall send you back to the place where you were before coming here.

Accordingly the monkeys stood there with eyes closed and when they opened their eyes there was neither the garden city nor Svayamprabhā there but they were standing in the old plain. Svayamprabhā appeared before Rāma, praised him and then went to Svarga.

26) Met Sambahī. The monkeys again went southward, reached Mahendragiri and descending on its southern side came to the shores of the southern sea. They could advance no further to the south. They were suffering from great hunger and thirst and if they returned with no tangible information about Sītā, Sugriva would kill them. They preferred death by fasting on the seashore to death by the sword of Sugriva.

Having decided thus the monkeys spread darbha grass on the extensive plain of Mahendra mountain and lay on the grass to die. In a large cave in the mountain was living Sampāṭī. The huge bird Sampāṭī was starving without food and was not able to fly as it had lost its wings. But it dragged itself to the mouth of the cave and saw the monkeys lying there awaiting death, and it thought of eating the monkeys one by one. The monkeys, who understood this idea of Sampāṭī cursed their fate and sang the praise of Jatāyu.

Hearing the word 'Jatāyu' Sampāṭī approached the monkeys, who related to him the object of their journey. Being told about the death of Jatāyu, Sampāṭī shed tears and told the monkeys as follows:

Jatāyu was my younger brother. Our mother was Mahā-śvetā and father Sūryadeva. On account of the boon of our parents I was King of all the birds and Jatāyu the crown Prince. As our brotherliness grew thicker our haughtiness due to our power and speed also increased. Once we flew up towards the orbit of the Sun to see him, our father. In his youthful enthusiasm my younger brother, Jatāyu, climbed higher up in the sky leaving me behind. Due to the heat of the Sun his wings lost their power and energy. Then, to save him, I flew up above him and shaded him. Therefore he could descend to the earth without his wings being burned and thus killed. But, my wings got burned and I fell down on the Mahendra mountain and got my legs broken. Thus I lost the power either to fly or to walk.

I stayed here as the attendant of Niṅkara Mahārṣi, who could divine the future also. He told me the story about Rāma's incarnation. He told me further that monkeys in search of Sītā would come here when I should tell them where Sītā was and that then I would regain my health."

After telling the monkeys the above facts Sampāṭī, with their cooperation, performed the obsequies of Jatāyu. Then the King of birds (Sampāṭī) raised its head and surveyed the ocean and he saw the following: Mountain Subela in the heart of the southern sea; the plain at the heights of the mountain constituting the base of Lankā; in the centre of Lankā there was Rāvana's capital; nearby the ladies' quarters; near the quarters the aśoka garden; at the centre of the garden the sītā apā tree and under the tree Śītādevī.

As soon as Sampāṭī had finished telling the monkeys the above details he regained his health.

Sampāṭī told the monkeys another story also as follows:

Rāvana once abducted a Yakṣa beauty from Alakāpūri and carried her away in his Puspaka Vimāna. Sampāṭī clashed with Ṛvaṇa on his way and destroyed his plane. But the plane, which was self-generating came again into existence. Sampāṭī threw away its beak the Candraḥūsa (Rāvana's sword) and kicked his crown down. At last, at the request of Ṛvaṇa, he and Sampāṭī signed a non-aggression pact. That was the reason why Sampāṭī could not fight Rāvana in person.

27) Hanūmān saw Sītā. Aṅgada said that for the search for Sītā in Lankā as told by Sampāṭī, some one should jump across the ocean. Though many a monkey tried to do so it was Hanūmān, who succeeded in crossing the sea.

At one jump he reached the heights of Mahendragiri whence he took another jump forward. But, midway Surasa, mother of the nāgas, swallowed him, and he came out through her ear and continued his journey towards Lankā. When he had advanced some more distance an evil spirit called Chāyāgrāhīṇi obstructed his way by a mysterious attack on his shadow. Hanūmān quickly understood what had happened and killed the evil spirit with one kick of his left foot. He again continued his flight. But, he very soon became weak and exhausted. Then Mount Maināka emerged from the ocean and fed Hanūmān with fruits and roots. He reached Lankā at dusk. He defeated Lāṅkālaṅkṣī, who tried to prevent his entry into the city. In fact Lāṅkālaṅkṣī was Vijayalakṣī, who had been cursed by Brah mát. (For details see under Vijayalakṣī.) After defeating her, who was thus absolved from the curse, Hanūmān saw Sītā seated under the aśoka tree. But, none saw him as he was perched on a tree.

28) Hanūmān's return. That night Rāvana dressed in all splendour visited Sītā and tried to secure her favour by soft words and cajolery, all to no purpose. Then he threatened her with punishments, which too proved to be of no avail. After instructing the Rākṣasī women that Sītā should be somehow brought round within a month's time, Rāvana returned to his palace. Rākṣasīs surrounded Sītā and described to her the greatness and various merits of Rāvana. Sītā continued to sob. Then came there Trījāta, daughter of Vībhīṣaṇa, the great devotee of Viṣṇu, and Saramā, to console Śītā. Trījāta had boundless devotion towards Rāma and great love for Sītā. She repeated to Sītā certain dreams she had had.

Left to herself Sītā began saying to herself various things regarding her past. She referred to her infancy, beginning of youth, wedding, stay at Ayodhyā, forest-life and life in Pañcavastra and wept over her recurring thoughts about them. Hanūmān, who heard Sītā's soliloquy completed Sītā's story by relating, from his place on the tree, about Jatāyu's salvation, salvation given to Kābandha and Śābari, alliance with Sugriva, killing of Bāli, expedition of the monkeys in search of Sītā, meeting with Sampāṭī, himself (Hanūmān) crossing the sea and his finding out Sītā. Hearing the words of Hanūmān, Sītā looked up in astonishment. Immediately Hanūmān came down the tree and presented the signet ring at Śītā's feet. When she examined the ring her hands shook and tears dimmed her eyes. Hanūmān talked to her in detail and told her that he would, if only Sītā permitted him, carry her on his shoulders to Rāma. He told her further that if she did not welcome the idea of thus returning to Rāma, he would return with Śrī Rāma and others, defeat Rāvana in war and take her back. Sītā was not convinced about the power and prowess of Hanūmān. He then increased his body in size so that his limbs grew into the size of a mountain, hands into that of trees, head into that of a mountain peak, tail into that of a river etc. His breathing became akin to a storm. Then he roared in such a manner that even the very ends of the world shook and the people of Lāṅkā were awakened by it.

Sītā was now absolutely convinced of Hanūmān's bona fides and faithfulness. She handed over to him her Cūḍāmaṇi (ornament worn on the head) to be given to Rāma and also told him the following three words of recognition so that Rāma might be all the more convinced.

(1) When Rāma first came to the garden near the palace in Mithilā (Sitā) saw his reflection in the blue mirror in the veranda of my palace and the beauty of the reflection attracted me. I looked towards the garden to see the original of the reflection. Then he (Rāma) was looking down into the waters of the glass pond. He also saw my face reflected in the water and suddenly he looked at me. Our eyes met and in all shyness I hurried to and hid myself in the ladies' quarters.

(2) Before our wedding I sent him through a faithful maid, a love letter to which he gave me a suitable reply.

(3) After our wedding while we were living in Ayodhyā when one day I returned to our bedroom after a long chit-chat with my younger sisters, my lord (Rāma) was lying on the cot in feigned sleep. Quietly I went up to him and kissed him on the lips. Because of the pressure on his lips and as my breast then touched his chest he pretended to have suddenly woken up and embraced me.

Having received thus from Sitā the Čudāmaṇi and these words of recognition Hanūmān took leave of Sitā and with her implied sanction went about to have a look at Lāṅkā. At one place he heard Vibhiṣaṇa reciting Viṣṇu's names. After wishing that this house of the devotee should turn into a royal abode he passed Vibhiṣaṇa's house. Then he came to Raśvaṇa's palace and gathered information about the Raśkṣāsa power.

"Now I must see Raśvaṇa in person, let him know personally the fact of my visit and I would give him righteouse advice"—with this object in view Hanūmān began destroying the garden. He drove away the Raśkṣāsas, who came to punish him and some of them were killed. At last Mehaṇāda (Indrajir) attacked Hanūmān. Hiding in the sky he shot the Brahmastra against Hanūmān, who yielded to it. The Raśkṣāsas took Hanūmān captive to Raśvaṇa. He free himself of the cords that bound him, extended his tail which he shaped into circles, one over the other so that the last one rose more in height than Raśvaṇa's throne and seated himself on its top. Raśvaṇa and Hanūmān then began a conversation. Raśvaṇa, who got angry at the disrespect shown to him by Hanūmān, ordered the latter to be killed, but Vibhiṣaṇa opposed it saying that to kill emissaries and messengers was worse than killing one's own mother. Finally Raśvaṇa ordered that Hanūmān's tail be set fire to and he be insulted and humiliated.

Immediately Raśkṣāsas began to cover Hanūmān's tail with clothes. But, as the tail began growing longer and longer with the result that no quantity of clothings sufficed to completely cover the ever-extending tail. At last the Raśkṣāsas poured oil over the tail and set fire to it. Then Hanūmān broke loose from captivity and jumped up into the air causing universal disaster by fire in Lāṅkā. The fire did not affect the palace of Vibhiṣaṇa and also the platform around the Śirihāpā tree where Sitā sat. After thus burning down Lāṅkā Hanūmān extinguished the fire on his tail by dipping it in the ocean. Taking leave once again of Sitā, Hanūmān crossed the sea and reached Mahendragiri.

29) Raśma-Raśvaṇa war. Śri Raśma and Sugrīva, who received Hanūmān's report about his visit to Lāṅkā started for it with an army of monkeys. They camped on the shores of the south sea. Raśvaṇa held a meeting of his war council attended by his brothers and others. He expelled Vibhiṣaṇa, who opposed war and advised his brother to return Sitā to Raśma and to apologise to him. Vibhiṣaṇa quitted Lāṅkā and took refuge with Raśma.

Raśma and others, who had assembled on the sea-shore decided to build a bund to Lāṅkā. The first thing Raśma did, for the successful conclusion of the expedition, was to install a Śivalīnga at Rāmesvara. (See under Rāmeśvara). Then he prayed to Varuṇadeva for a passage across the sea. But, Varuṇa did not present himself and Śri Raśma, angry with him, shot the Āgneya (ferry) arrow into the heart of the sea when Varuṇa appeared, saluted him and advised him to build a bund across the sea. As a reward for Varuṇa Śri Raśma, as requested by the former, killed with one arrow all the Raśkṣāsas, who lived in Gāndhāra island on the north-western shore of the ocean. Varuṇa returned to his abode. The construction of the bund was begun under the leadership of Sugrīva with Nala as chief planner and Nila as his co-planner. Jāmbavān and Hanūmān functioned as supervisors and other monkeys as workers. Mountains, hills, rocks etc. were brought from various quarters and the construction of the bund was begun.

Meanwhile, Raśvaṇa sent a great magician called Marutta disguised as King Janaṅka to Sitā to convert her to the side of Raśvaṇa. But, the attempt failed. Raśvaṇa then sent his two expert spies, Šuka and Sāraṇa disguised as monkeys to Raśma's camp. Jāmbavān and Hanūmān captured and brought them before Sugrīva. Weepingly they both sought refuge in Raśma, who set them free. They returned to Lāṅkā and reported matters to Raśvaṇa, who felt a desire to have a look at Raśma for which purpose he, with his attendants, climbed to the top of the northern tower, Raśma, who knew about it by his spies climbed the heights of Subela mountain whence he stared at Raśvaṇa. Their eyes met in anger seeing which Sugrīva by one leap reached Raśvaṇa and kicked off to Raśma the crown from the central head of Raśvaṇa. After performing something like a destructive dance on Raśvaṇa's head Sugrīva by another leap returned to Raśma.

Full of disappointment Raśvaṇa returned to his palace. His father-in-law, Mālyavān, tried his best to dissuade Raśvaṇa from war, all to no purpose. Raśvaṇa sent an emissary to him to ask him to send Sitā back. Raśvaṇa declined to oblige, and immediately war began. During the first day of the war, the majority of the Raśkṣasas including their great leaders like Mahābāhu, Mahāpāriva, Mahodara, Mahākāya etc. were killed. On the second day the Raśkṣasas army under the command of Atikāya, son of Raśvaṇa, set out from the northern tower to fight. Lakṣmaṇa killed Atikāya with Brahmastra. The other two Raśkṣasas-commanders were Trisīras and Mehaṇāda. Lakṣmaṇa encountered them. When the latter failed to win by righteous fighting he resorted to cunningness. That too did not bring victory to him, and then he hid himself in the sky and shot the nāgīstra given to him by Śiva against the enemy. That arrow rendered Lakṣmaṇa, Sugrīva and all the monkeys unconscious. At that time Vibhīṣaṇa was away to arrange for food.

When Vibhīṣaṇa returned with food he was taken aback to find Laksmaṇa and others lying in an unconscious condition. Rāma was informed about the matter and when he came to the battle-ground and saw Laksmaṇa, Sugrīva, Hanūmān and all the others lying there unconscious he lost self-confidence for a short while and remarked that it was all the result of his having put faith in Vibhīṣaṇa, Rāvana's brother whom he had put in charge of the battle-field. This comment of Rāma pained Vibhīṣaṇa much; but Śri Rāma soon treated him kindly.

Even the Devas who witnessed the scene were alarmed. But Rāma sat there for sometime immersed in meditation and then a light emerged from his right eye, shot towards the north and disappeared in the horizon. At once Garūḍa appeared on the scene from the west and removed with his beak the nāgāstāra from Laksmaṇa's body. Laksmaṇa jumped up from his unconscious state; Sugrīva and others also regained consciousness. In the fighting that followed all the Rāksasas leaders were killed. It was Hanūmān, who killed Kumbhakarna. At the time of his death Kumbhakarna made a last request to Rāma, i.e. his head should be cut off and thrown into the sea as otherwise the Rāksasas would laugh at him to see the head from which the ears have been bitten off by monkeys. Accordingly Rāma got Hanūmān to throw Kumbhakarna's head into the sea.

Then Śri Rāma told Laksmaṇa thus: Today I shall fight Indrajit. The war shall not continue yet further. Today Indrajit and tomorrow Rāvana should be killed and the next day we will return to Ayodhyā. Laksmaṇa answered:—"I shall fight Indrajit. I have told Vibhīṣaṇa that I will kill Indrajit within three days."

With Śri Rāma's blessings, Laksmaṇa began fighting again. Indrajit shot Nārāyaṇāstra which attracted by the seven-letter-Mantra (Namo Nārāyaṇaya) of Laksmaṇa circled him thrice and entered his quiver. The Rāksasa minister called Mahodara converted his elephant into Airāvata and himself changed into Devendra and encountered Laksmaṇa. Saying that he had no quarrel with Indra and would not fight him Laksmaṇa put down his bow, and Indrajit, exploiting the situation shot Brahmagrastra against Laksmaṇa under cover of the clouds. Laksmaṇa, Sugrīva and others fainted. Then Śri Rāma was in the army-camp, worshipping weapons to render them more powerful. Rāma returned to the battle-ground to find Laksmaṇa and others in life-less condition and crying like a mere ignorant fellow he lay by the side of Laksmaṇa. Vibhīṣaṇa, who returned with food prepared for the grace of Devas. Indra appeared, gave to Vibhīṣaṇa Gaṅga water in a golden vessel and asked it to be given to Hanūmān and Jāmbavān, who, though unconscious were not dead.

Vibhīṣaṇa did so and both Hanūmān and Jāmbavān regained consciousness. Jāmbavān told Hanūmān that if mṛtasaṇjivini (herbal medicine which will put life back into the dead) were brought from the distant Himālayas before dawn the next day all the dead ones like Laksmaṇa and Sugrīva could be brought back to life. (See under Mṛtasaṇjivini). Accordingly Hanūmān started for the Himālayas. Meanwhile Indrajit had told Rāvana about his victory, and as suggested by the latter Rāksasas women took Sītā to the battle-field in the Puspaka Vimāna, showed her Rāma, Laksmaṇa and others lying there in a life-less condition and told her that all of them were dead. Sītā wept aloud, but Trijāṭa consoled her by saying that the Puspaka Vimāna would not carry widows and therefore Rāma was not dead.

Hanūmān returned before dawn the next day. As he could not distinguish mṛtasaṇjivini he had brought with him a mountain peak where the four medicinal plants, Śalyaharana, Viśalyakarana, Sandhānakarana and Mṛtasaṇjivini grew. Jāmbavān distinguished mṛtasaṇjivini from the others and carried the four herbs into the battle-field. Contact with the air, which carried the smell of mṛtasaṇjivini brought the dead back to life. Viśalyakarana removed all the arrows from their bodies and Sandhānakarana healed the wounds.

Laksmaṇa again went out to fight Indrajit. Reluctant to fight with the former, Indrajit resorted to a new magical trick. He created an artificial or illusory Sītā and with her seated in a chariot he rose up in the sky and said as follows: "Rāvana has abandoned Sītā who brings about humiliation to the Rāksasas and ruin to Lankā. So, I cut her to pieces." So saying he cut into two, by one stroke of his sword, Sītā, who cried Oh! my lord! oh! brother." Blood fell on the battle-field and Indrajit disappeared. Though Rāma and others were alarmed by all these, Vibhīṣaṇa explained that it was all the magic of the Rāksasas, and in the fierce fighting that followed Laksmaṇa killed Indrajit. By now all the important and prominent Rāksasas were killed. At last Rāvana himself entered the battle-field. His first encounter was with Laksmaṇa. Then the fighting turned into one between Rāma and Rāvana. The former broke the bow of Rāvana and did not want to fight with the weaponless Rāksa King. Next day Rāvana brought Pātāla Rāvana and Kumbhodara to Lankā. Both of them entered Rāma's camp during night, but Pātāla Rāvana, who realised that nothing could be achieved there returned to Pātāla with Kumbhodara. He built a tunnel from Pātāla upwards to earth, where in the fort created by Hanūmān's tail twisted in a circle lay Śri Rāma and others. The tunnel opened into this 'fort', and Pātāla Rāvana and his brother made Rāma and Laksmaṇa unconscious by making them inhale sammohana medicine and carried them off into Pātāla. Rāma and Laksmaṇa were laid in the court-yard of a Kālī temple to be sacrificed to Mahākālī the very same night. Arrangements for the sacrifice were completed.

Hanūmān had been frequently looking inside the fort. As soon as the absence of Rāma and Laksmaṇa was noticed, Sugrīva and others, under the leadership of Vibhīṣaṇa reached the Kālī temple through the tunnel. In the fighting that followed Hanūmān killed Pātāla Rāvana and Aṅgada killed Mahodara. The only son of Pātāla Rāvana, Sumālī, was crowned King of Pātāla. Rāvana entered the field again against Rāma. Rāma shot the Mahendra arrow against Rāvana. The arrow, which represented in itself the effulgence of Mahendra, the hardness of diamonds, the intensity of fire and Viśu's glow cut off the ten heads of Rāvana. His physical body fell on earth and his spirit ascended to heaven.
30. Return. Rama and others, who were pleased with the turn of events, crowned Vibhishana King of Lanka. Trijata was put in charge of dressing Sita in new clothes. Apsaras appeared on the scene. Saciddev presented to Sita a chain, Urvashi an ornament for the head, Menaka, two bangles, Rambha a waist-let, Tilottama a set of chains for the feet, and Anasuyaa, wife of Atri, a Cudama. When she wore all these ornaments Sita appeared to be equal to Lakshman Devi in grandeur and charm. She was brought in a palanquin to Sri Rama by Vibhishana and others. Rama was taken aback by the glamorous dress, ornaments etc. of Sita, and immediately a suspicion arose in his mind, and he kept mum after asking Lakshmana to do whatever Sita wanted. As soon as she heard those words of Rama, Sita asked Lakshmana to light a funeral pyre saying that the woman suspected by her husband should not live and so she (Sit) would quit her life in the very presence of Rama.

Lakshmana cast a pathetic look at Rama; but his face exhibited no change of feeling. He granted Sita’s request by his silence. Those present there awaited developments with bated breath. Lakshmana, with the help of the monkeys got a pyre ready. After going round Rama with folded hands Sita leapt into the glowing fire. Within a very short time three divine forms emerged from the fire, Svarahdevi, Sridhar Devi and God Agni. His suspicions having thus vanished Rama welcomed Sita back and the next day they left for Ayodhya in the Puspaka Vimana. Vibhishana, Sugriva, Hanuman and others followed them. After reaching Ayodhya Rama returned the Puspaka to Kubera. Bharata came back from Nandigrama. In the presence of all relations and others concerned the coronation of Rama as king took place. Bharata was appointed crown Prince, Lakshmana Commander-in-chief of armies and Satrughna, Finance minister.

31) Sita abandoned. Under Rama’s rule the country overflowed with milk and honey. Nobody had to fear anything from enemies. He made Sita kill Sahasramukha Ravana. (For details see under Sahasramukharaavana). Sri Rama used to go about the country in disguise to enquire about the welfare of his subjects. On a particular day he happened to be standing outside the house of a washerman. The washerman scolded his wife, who had gone out of the house that night for something. He suspected that she had gone to meet her paramour. He bluntly told his wife that he was not prepared to act like Rama, who had accepted Sita, though she had lived with another person. Sri Rama, who heard the above talk, returned to his palace very sad. After thinking about for a long time he decided that it was his duty to abandon Sita in the interests of his subjects. Then Sita was in the seventh month of her pregnancy. She had on the previous day, expressed a desire to go to the forest areas once again. Rama considered this as the most suitable opportunity to abandon Sita in the forest and Lakshmana was entrusted with the matter. That day at Sun rise Lakshmana took Sita in a chariot to the suburbs of Valmiki’s ashrama, abandoned her there and returned to the palace. (According to the Ramayana written by Kamba, a Tamil author, it is said that Sita was left in the suburbs of Gautama’s hut. There, Sita, who was pregnant was looked after by Ahalya, the wife of Gautama.) Weeping aloud Sita fell down. Young munis—Valmiki’s disciples—saw her and took her to the ashrama. At the ashrama she delivered two sons, Kuśa and Lava.

32) Ayamedha. After abandoning Sita in the forests Rama led a sad life for five years. Yet, he decided to perform an Ayamedha yajña. As soon as Rama thought of him, Hanumam appeared and he was deputed to invite Vibhishana, Sugriva and others from Lakshaka and Kiskindha and the feudatory princes and armies from other countries.

Sugriva was put in charge of the armies, Vibhishana in charge of finance, and central authority was vested in Lakshmana. Then the yajnic horse, accompanied by the army, was let loose to travel all over the country. Accompanied by cavalry, the elephant division, infantry and the chariot-force the horse went about the various kingdoms. The army, on its way back to Ayodhya with presents collected from many kingdoms, encamped for rest near Valmiki’s ashrama when Kuśa and Lava tied the yajnic horse, which was strolling there unfettered. Consequent upon this action of Kuśa and Lava a fight broke out between them and the king’s army in which the latter got defeated. Even the arrows of Lakshmana failed to have any effect on the boys. The boys having not returned even though it had become very late in the evening, the asrama was in search of them and it was only when they came to the scene of fighting did Lakshmana and others know who the boys really were.

During this period of time infants’ death was very much on the increase in Ayodhya. It was believed that such deaths increased when Sūdras died tapas, and to find out if any Sūdra was engaged in tapas Rama flew over the Danjaka forest where he found a Sūdra called Sambūka performing tapas hanging down from the branch of a tree with his head down. Rama killed him and his spirit got salvation. Afterwards, appreciating the beauties of the forest Rama came near Valmiki’s ashrama where he and Sita met face to face. Kuśa and Lava also came there and they noticed with surprise the change in appearance brought about in their mother and Rama on their meeting each other. When they heard from Hanumam the real facts about Rama they withdrew their arrows and prostrated at the feet of Rama.

Sri Rama then, with the consent of all and in accordance with his own desire, took back Sita and returned with her to Ayodhya. Lakshmana and others followed him. Kausalya and others received Sita most heartily. Sri Rama, who till then was having no wife, made a golden image of Sita for the purposes of the aya-medha. Now, since the real Sita was with him the idol was an unnecessary thing. The Ayamedhayajña went off very well.

33) The end. Sri Rama’s reign became all the more prosperous. It was during this period that Rama, as desired by the munis in the Yamunā plain, killed Lavanāsura, son of Madhu in the great city called Durga in the centre of the Madhu forest. (For details see under Lavanā). After Lavanā’s death, a sect of Gandharvas called Saliśas, who lived on the shores of the eastern sea, proved to be enemies of Ayodhya. Sri Rama annihilated them also. Kaikēyī began getting jealous of the prosperity and happiness of Sita. One day when Rama had gone to hunt in the forest, Kaikēyī closely questioned Sita over particulars in Lāñkā and prevailed upon her, overruling her unwillingness, to draw a picture of Rāvana. Sītā drew on a piece of ‘sitting-plank’ Rāvana’s figure with the ten heads. Kaïkeyī took away the picture on the pretext of exhibiting it in the ladies’ quarters, and gave it to Rāma, when he returned from hunting, to sit on at the time of Pūjā (worship). Rāma got angry to find Rāvana’s picture drawn on the ‘sitting plank’. Kaïkeyī then told him that it was Sītā, who had drawn the picture and also that she usually praised Laikā and Rāvana. Rāma pronounced the death penalty on Sītā for having drawn Rāvana’s picture. The inmates of the palace shuddered to hear the judgement. When Lākṣmāṇa seated Sītā on the floor to kill her, Bhūmidevi (earth) rent itself open into two and carried her off through the opening.

Śrī Rāma grew sadder and sadder following the disappearance of Sītā. Ill omens began to appear in Ayodhyā in increasing measure. One day a divine Rṣi whom the people of Ayodhyā had not seen till then, came to Rāma’s palace. He told Rāma that he had to impart certain secrets to the latter and after making Rāma vow that no one would enter the room while they were conversing and that if any one did come when they were talking, he should either be killed or forsaken for ever, he began to talk with Rāma in a secluded spot. Rāma posted Lākṣmāṇa at the entrance with the strict injunctions that nobody should come into their presence. Within a short time great mūnis like Sanaka came there and told Lākṣmāṇa that they wanted to see Rāma. They were not prepared to wait even for a short time as requested by Lākṣmāṇa, but threatened ruin to the royal family. Lākṣmāṇa then, was prepared to suffer the consequence, and went to Rāma and told him about the arrival of Sanaka and others. Rāma, in keeping with his vow, banished Lākṣmāṇa immediately. But, when Rāma came out and looked for Sanaka and others no one was to be found anywhere there. When he returned to the inner apartment the Rṣi also was not to be seen. In fact they were Kāla and his emissaries deputed by Brahmana to recall Rāma as the object of his incarnation was already achieved.

Rāma, who had already been suffering mental agony on account of Sītā’s departure, lost all peace of mind as Lākṣmāṇa’s banishment followed Sītā’s departure. He decided to put an end to his life for which purpose he went to the river Sarayū. All the dependants followed him. While the great mass of people who thronged both the banks of the river burst out into weeping Śrī Rāma and his followers drowned themselves in the waters of the Sarayū, and their spirits attained Vai-kūṇṭha. (Vālmīki Rāmāyana, Kamba Rāmāyana and Tulasidāsa Rāmāyana).

RĀMAHRA. A holy place on the boundary of Kurukṣetra. Ambā, daughter of a King of Kāśi once bathed here. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 28).

RĀMAKĀ. A mountain. Sahadeva, during his triumphal tour of the south, conquered this mountain. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 68).

RĀMĀNA. I. A son born to the Vasu known as Soma of his wife Manoharā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 22).

RĀMĀNACINA. A particular region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

RĀMAṆA (M). (RĀMAṆAKAM). An island near Dwārakā where, according to Chapter 38 of the Southern Text of Bhārata, there was a forest. It was in this island that Viṇatā, mother of Garuḍa and Kadrū, mother of the nāgas lived. Garuḍa, after freeing his mother from her slavery evicted the nāgas from this island. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 17). Following the eviction, many of the prominent nāgas lived in Pāṭāla. But, Kāliya, in fear of Garuḍa, lived in Kālindī. After his suppression by Śrī Kṛṣṇa Kāliya, with his family, as advised by Kṛṣṇa returned to Rāmaṇākam. (Bhāgavata, 10 th Skandha).

RĀMAṆĀKA. The third son of Yajñabhū, son of Priyavrata. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RĀMAṆĪYĀKA. The island called Rāmaṇākam where the nāgas live. (See under Rāmaṇāka).

RĀMĀTHA (S). I. A mlecha tribe who lived in the kingdom of Māṇḍhāṭa. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 14).

RĀMĀTHA (S). II. People of a low caste (mlecchas) who lived in South India during Purāṇic times. Nakula, subjugated this caste, and from that day onwards they became devoted to the Pāṇḍavas. They were invited to the Rājasūya conducted by Yudhishtīrā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 25).

RĀMĀTĪRTHA I. A holy place in the river Gomati. He who bathes in this tirtha will derive the results of performing the Aśvamedha yājña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 73).

RĀMĀTĪRTHA II. A holy spot on the top of the Mahendra mountain where Pārśurāma lived. A bath here brings the benefits of performing the aśvamedha yājña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 17).

RĀMĀTĪRTHA III. A holy place in the plains of river Sarasvati. (Sāvya Parva, Chapter 49, Verse 7).

RĀMĀYAṆA.

1) General. Rāmāyana is considered to be the first poetic composition in the world or at least in India, and hence it is called the Ādi Kāvyay (First Epic). It is an epic as it contains descriptions and references to ancient themes. Vālmīki is its author, and hence Vālmīki is known as the ‘Ādi kavi’ also. Vālmīki and Śrī Rāma were contemporaries. During his life in exile in the forest Rāma visited Vālmīki’s āśrama. It was in this āśrama that Sītā lived after being abandoned by Rāma. The connection in many ways of the life of Vālmīki with the ‘Rāma story’ was an incentive for him to write the Rāmāyana.

2) Composing of Rāmāyana. Once while returning from the river Tamasa Vālmīki witnessed a hunter shooting down one of a Krauñca (a kind of bird) couple. The intense emotion created by the incident burst out as follows in verse form.

Ma niṣāda pratīṣṭhānīn śvaṁgaṁaṁ śaṅvatīṁ samāḥ /
Yat krauñcamihunām ādikamavadhīṁ
kāmamohitam. //

Immediately Brahmana appeared on the scene and advised Vālmīki to write the story of Rāma in the same pattern as that verse. Brahmana taught him about the past and the future of the history of Rāma. As Sītā, Kuśa, and Lava were living in his āśrama Vālmīki was well in the know about the present. In the above background Vāmēki completed writing the Rāmāyaṇa Story in 24,000 verses. The epic is divided into seven kāṇḍas (sections) of five hundred chapters. The seven sections are the Bālākāṇḍa, the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, the Araṇyā kāṇḍa, the Kīṣkindhā Kāṇḍa, the Sundara Kāṇḍa, the Yuddha Kāṇḍa and the Uttarākāṇḍa.

Vāmēki taught the poem to Lava and Kuśa and when they went with Vāmēki to Ayodhyā during the aśvamedhayajñā of Śrī Rāma, they sang the poem in the open assembly there.

3) Different views about the author. Tradition ascribes the authorship of the Rāmāyaṇa to Vāmēki. But, western scholars hold the view that a part of Bālākāṇḍa and the whole of Uttarākāṇḍa are interpolations of a future date. The following are the reasons for this view.

(i) Two different texts are found for cantos one and three of Bālākāṇḍa. In one of them many of the stories mentioned in the other are missing. It may, therefore, be surmised that the two texts were composed during different periods.

(ii) In the early texts of Rāmāyaṇa stories like Gaṅgāvataraṇam are not to be found. So they must be interpolations of a later period.

(iii) Only in Kāṇḍas one and seven is Śrī Rāma treated as an incarnation. In the other Kāṇḍas he is considered in the capacity of a hero only.

(iv) Uttarākāṇḍa is not to be found among the early translations of Rāmāyaṇa into other languages.

(v) In the Bālākāṇḍa it is stated that Vāmēki composed the Rāmāyaṇa, taught it to Kuśa and Lava, and that they recited the whole poem before Śrī Rāma at Ayodhyā. Many of the things mentioned in this Kāṇḍa are repeated in Uttarākāṇḍa, which, therefore, must have been written by someone else.

4) The period of Rāmāyaṇa. According to Indian belief Śrī Rāma lived at the end of Tretāyuga, which came to its close in 8,67,100 B.C. As per Rāmāyaṇa Śrī Rāma ruled the country for 11,000 years. He was forty years old when he ascended the throne. Vāmēki began writing the Rāmāyaṇa after Lava and Kuśa were born. In the light of the above facts, certain scholars opine that the Rāmāyaṇa was written near about 878000 B.C.

But, western critics and some eastern critics do not accept this view. Professor Jacob holds the view that the original of Mahābhārata is anterior to Rāmāyaṇa. Most scholars do not agree with this view.

A great majority of critics are of opinion that Rāmāyaṇa is anterior to Mahābhārata. They argue as follows:

(i) The traditional belief in India is that Rāmāyaṇa was written much earlier than Mahābhārata.

(ii) Rāmāyaṇa makes no reference to any of the characters of Mahābhārata.

(iii) The Śrī Rāma story is referred to in many a Jātaaka story of the Buddhists.

(iv) Vāmēki has made no mention about the city of Pātaḷiputra established near about 380 B.C. It is an irrefutable fact that Śrī Rāma had passed by the city.

(v) During the reign of emperor Aśoka the Prākṛta language was spoken in the areas where the incidents mentioned in Rāmāyaṇa took place. But, Rāmāyaṇa was written much anterior to the emergence of Prākṛta language.

According to Professor Keith Rāmāyaṇa was written in 300 B.C.

5) Different readings of Rāmāyaṇa. In various parts of India three original texts or readings are found of the original Rāmāyaṇa. In each of the three texts nearly 1/3 of the portions differ from one another. The Bombay text is popular in northern and southern India. The second is the Bengal text. The third, the Kashmir text, is popular in the north-western parts of India. The inference to be made from the existence of these three different texts is that the original epic was composed in a Prākṛta language, which was most popular at the time and that it was later translated into Sanskrit by different persons at different times. This theory will explain the existence of the different texts. For many years it continued to be handed down from mouth to mouth till it assumed written form in Sanskrit.

6) Other Rāmāyaṇas. The Rāmāyaṇa story in other forms and garbs, is also prevalent in India. One of them is Vāsiṣṭhārāmāyaṇa or Jñānāvāsīṣṭha. The authorship of it also is ascribed to Vāmēki. Most of the Rāmāyaṇas like Vāsiṣṭhottarārāmāyaṇa, Śitāvijaya, Adhūttarārāmāyaṇa, etc. found in different parts of India are believed to have been written by Vāmēki. Adhūttarārāmāyaṇa is composed of twentyseven cantos. According to this Rāmāyaṇa, it was Śiṭā, who killed Rāvana of ten heads. There is another Rāmāyaṇa in Sanskrit called Adhyaṭmā-Rāmāyaṇa, it is a poem separated from Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa. It is written in the form of a conversation between Umā (Pārvatī) and Śiva. Ananda-Rāmāyaṇa and Mūla-Rāmāyaṇa extol the greatness of Hanūmān.

RAMBHĀ. An asura. (For details see under Karambhā).

RAMBHĀ I.

1) General. One of the most beautiful of the apsarā women. Urvaśī, Tilottamā and Rambhā are really reputed for their beauty.

2) Birth. All the famous Celestial women were daughters of Kaśyapaprajāpați by his wife Pradhā. Devarṣi (Kaśyapa) begot the following daughters of his wife Pradhā i.e. Alambusā, Mārakēsi, Vidyutparañā, Tilottamā, Arunā, Rakṣitā, Rambhā, Manoromā, Subhā, Keśini, Sūrātā and Surañjā. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65).

3) Rāvana cursed. Rāvana raped Rambhā and Nalakūbara cursed him. (See under Nalakūbara).

4) Purūravas and Rambhā. Purūravas once killed an asura chief named Māyādhara and held a festival in honour of the victory. At the festival Rambhā danced before his preceptor Tumburu. Purūravas too was present on the occasion and he ridiculed Rambhā for her mistakes in dancing. Moreover he claimed that he was a greater master of dance than Tumburu preceptor of Rambhā. Enraged by this claim Tumburu cursed that Purūravas would be separated from his wife Urvaśī. (Kathāsarit-sāgara, Lāvānakalambara, Taranīga 3).

5) Rambhā and Suseṇa. There was a King called Suseṇa on mount Citrākūṭa. This handsome bachelor prince used to sit alone in the lotus pond near his palace. When once Rambhā passed through the sky above the pond her eyes met those of Suseṇa and she alighted on the spot and the long talk between the two ended in their marriage. Suseṇa enjoyed life there for a long time with Rambhā without knowing that she was an apsarā woman. He had attempted many a time to know the real facts about her, to no purpose. Rambhā did not even think about her native Svarga. Her companion, a Yakṣi, showered gold all over Suseṇa's kingdom. In due course Rambhā delivered a beautiful female child and then she told the King that she was Rambhā and that she had continued as his wife till then as she felt love towards him. She further told him that now she had begot a daughter, she was leaving him and that she had a curse upon her which had been redeemed now. She also assured him that they would meet in Svarga in case the daughter was duly wedded. Rambhā departed to Svarga. Suṣeṇa named the child Subocanā and when she came of age he married her to Vatsamahārṣi and then went to Devaloka where he lived happily with Rambhā for a long time. (Kathāsaritsāgara, Madanamaṇīcukālambaṅka, Taranāṇa II).

6) Other information.

(i) The powerful asura called Caturāṣya once felt a great yearning for Rambhā and her maid Svayamprabhā managed things for him. He built a garden-city and presented it to Svayamprabhā in return for her service stated above. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṃkhandha Kāṇḍa).

(ii) The Sage Gautama alias Śaradvān experienced seminal emission on seeing Rambhā and from the semen was born Kṛṣṇa whom in due course of time Dronācārya married. (Kathāsaritsāgara, Madanamaṇīcukālambaṅka, Taranāṇa II).

(iii) Indra once deputed Rambhā to break the vigorous tapas Viśvāmitra was observing. She approached him in the guise of a nightingale and with her song disturbed his meditation. The muni cursed her as follows and turned her into a rock. “Oh evil woman Rambhā, you have cheated me, who have mastered desire and anger and so you be turned into a rock for a thousand years. The great brahmin ascetic, Bhūrītejas will absorb you from my curse and you will then resume your own form.” (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 64).

(iv) Rambhā gave a dance performance on the occasion of the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 62).

(v) She had lived for sometime in the court of Kubera serving him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 10).

(vi) When Arjuna lived in Svarga as Indra’s guest Rambhā danced in honour of the former. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 29).

(vii) On another occasion she danced in Kubera’s court in honour of Aṣṭavakra muni. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 44).

RAMBHĀ II. Wife of Mayāśyarā. The couple had the following seven children i.e., Māyāvi, Dunḍubhi, Mahīśā Kālaka, Ajakarna, and Mandodari. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, 3.6. 28-29).

RAMESVARA. There is in South India a very famous holy place called Rāmevara and a Śiva temple there. Rāma and others encamped on the sea shore to cross over to Laṅkā to release Sītā from Rāvanā’s custody. This temple, according to Kamba, was built by Rāma at that time. The following story is from the Yuddha Kāṇḍa of Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.

To make the passage over to Laṅkā easy, Rāma decided to build a great temple at Rāmevara and install a Śivalīṅga in the temple. Under the expert supervision of the great architects, Nala and Nila, all the monkeys cooperated to build the temple. As ordered by Rāma, Hanūmān went to Kailāsa to fetch Śivalīṅga. Hanūmān did not return with the linga though the auspicious time for the installation was very near. How could the installation be made without the idol and the installation had to be made at the appointed time.

Sri Rāma stood ready near the installation platform. It was the exact time for the installation of the idol. A divine effulgence was seen to emerge from Rāma and immediately a Śivalīṅga automatically appeared at the spot where rituals were conducted for installation. Everyone was wonder-struck by this mysterious happening.

Hanūmān by now, returned with the linga and he felt sorry that the installation of the idol had already been made. Śri Rāma told him: “Please remove the idol already installed, we shall install a new one.”

Happy at the words of Rāma, Hanūmān entwined the idol with his tail and jumped directly upwards. But, his tail was cut, head clashed against the roof which was broken and Hanūmān fell down unconscious. Śri Rāma held him up and patted him on the head and Hanūmān was more pleased than ever. Afterwards, to fulfill Hanūmān’s desire and for the prosperity of the temple Hanūmān was made to install the new Śivalīṅga in front of the eastern tower of the temple. Śri Rāma laid down the following rule also. Only after worshipping the idol at the tower, should the God inside the temple be worshipped.

The rule was also recorded there.

RĀMOPĀKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub-parva of Mahābhārata comprising chapters 273 to 292 of Vana Parva.

RAMYAGRĀMA. Capital of a State. Sahadeva, during his triumphal tour, conquered Ramyagrāma. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 14).

RAMYAKA I. A son of Agnīdhra, who had nine sons by his wife Pārvacitti. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha). Ramyaka ruled the Kingdom called Ramyaka Varṣa near Nilagiri. Arjuna, during his triumphal tour conquered Ramyaka and levied taxes from the people there (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 28).

RAMYAKA II. A particular region in Iḷāvṛta, one of the seven Continents. On the eastern part of Iḷāvṛta there exist three mountains called Nilagiri, Svetagiri and Śrīgavān. These mountains jut into the sea, and are separated from one another by a distance of two thousand miles each and are the source of many rivers. In between the three mountains are three regions of land called Ramyaka, Hiraṇmaya and Kuru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

RĀNA. A Rākṣasa. He was killed by Vāyu deva in the war between Hiranyāka and the Devas. (Padma Purāṇa, Srṣṭi Khaṇḍa).

RĀNAYANI. A Preceptor in the line of the Sāma (Veda) disciples of Vyāsa. (Jaiminiya Grhyasūtra 1, 14).

RĀNGADĀSA. A great Śūdra devotee of God. He built a number of temples on mount Veṅkaṭācala (Śkanda Purāṇa).

RĀNGAVIDYĀDHARA. A Gandharva. (See under Sudeva III).

RĀNOTKATA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Śalya Parva Chapter 45, verse 68).

RANTIDēVA. The Kindest and the most liberal of the Kings in ancient India.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Vīṣṇu thus: Atri-Candra Budha - Purūravas - Āyus - Nahuṣa - Yayati-Puruṣa-Janamejaya-Pracīnvaṇ - Pravirā - Namasu-Vitabhaya Sunāḍu - Bahuvīdha - Sānyāti - Rāhovēdi - Raudrāśva-Matinēra - Santurodhā - Duṣyanta - Bharatavē Subhutra-Suhotá-Gala-Gardu-Suketu-Bhaktasatra-Nara - Sāṅkṛti Rantideva.
2. His importance. Rantideva’s unique kindness is very famous in history. After the great war was over, Nārada once narrated the stories of sixteen kings to Dharmaputra. There are a number of stories relating to Rantideva’s kindness, hospitality etc. He had engaged 20,000 people to cook food for guests who came to the palace everyday. He was very vigilant about treating guests day and night alike. He gifted away all wealth which had been rightfully earned, to brahmins.

He learned Vedas and subdued enemies by Dharma (righteousness). The very blood that flowed from the skin of cattle killed to entertain his guests formed itself into a river called Carmavyati. (Sánti Parva, Chapter 29.

21,000 cows were daily killed for the guest. (Drona Parva, Chapter 67).

3. Other information.
(i) Rantideva entered Svarga by giving Vaśīṭha warm water. (Sánti Parva, Chapter 294, Verse 17).
(ii) He once worshipped mahārajs with fruits and vegetables and achieved his desire. (Sánti Parva, Chapter 292, Verse 7).
(iii) He never ate flesh. (Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 67).

RAPHEṆAKA. A nāga born in Takṣa’sa’s dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janaimejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 8).

RASĀṬALA. A particular part of Pātāla where, according to the Purāṇas, the Nīvātakavacaras live. The Mahābhārata contains the following information regarding Rasāṭalā.

1) During the deluge the Agni called Saṁvarta rent the earth and reached up to Rasāṭalā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 188, Verse 69).

2) The Rāksaṁ called Kṛtṛ yay created by the asuras once carried away Duryodhana to Pātāla. (Vana Parva, Chapter 251, Verse 29).

3) Rasāṭalā is the seventh stratum of the earth. Surabhi the mother of cows born from nectar lives there. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 1).

4) It is more comfortable and happy to live in Rasāṭalā than to live either in Nāgaloka or Svarga. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 14).

5) It was in Rasāṭalā that Mahāviśnu incarnated as Boar and killed the asuras with his tusk. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 206, Verse 26).

6) Mahāviśnu, who assumed the form of Hayagrīva went to Rasāṭalā, killed Madhu and Kāitabha and resurrected the Vedas. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 347, Verse 54).

7) King Vasu went to Rasāṭalā because he uttered one lie. (Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 34).

8) Rasāṭalā is Ananta’s abode. Balabhadraśāma who was an incarnation of Ananta, gave up his material body at Prabhāśa tīrtha and attained Rasāṭalā. (Svar-gārohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 28).

RĀŚMIKETU. A Rāksaṁ who fought on the side of Rāvaṇa against Rāma. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa; Sarga 9).
RAŚMIVĀN. An eternal, universal Deva (Viśvadeva). (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 36).

RĀṢṬRAVARĪDHANA. A minister of Daśaratha. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 6).

RATA. A daughter of Daśaprajāpati. Dharma married her and the Vāsū called Ahar was born to the couple. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 17).

RATHAÇITRA. A river famous in the Purāṇas. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 26).

RATHAJVĀJA. Father of King Kuśadhvaja of Videha. Vedavati was his grand-daughter. (See under Vedavati).

RATHAJVĀNĀ. Another name of Virāgni, son of Śaṅhyu. (Vana Parva, Chapter 219, Verse 9).

RATHAKRANTA. A warrior. He had accompanied Śatruighuṇa who led the Aśvamedhic horse of Rāma. (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭalakhaṇḍa).

RATHAKRANTA. A Yaka who rotates in the month of Caitra along with the Ādiyta called Dhātā. (Bhāgavata 12th Skanda).

RATHAKSHA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 63).

RATHANTARA I. A Ṣāman, which, having assumed form, worships Brahmā in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 30). This Rathantara Ṣāman possesses the power to cure fainting fits. Once Vasiṣṭha restored Indra to consciousness with this Ṣāman. (Ṣānti Parva, Chapter 281, Verse 21).

RATHANTARA II. Son of the Agni called Pāṇcājanaya. He was also called Tarasāhara. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222, Verse 7).

RATHANTARĪ (RATHANTARI). Mother of King Dusyanta. She was the daughter of King Illa and had five sons, i.e. Dusyanta, Śūra, Bhīma, Pravasu and Vasu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94).

RATHĀTRIATHASAṆKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub-Parva of Sānti Parva, Chapters 165-172.

RATHAVAHANA. Brother of the Virāṭa King. He fought against the Pāṇḍavas. (Drona Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 42).

RATHĀVARTA. A holy place considered to be on the right side of Śākambharīdevī. He who visits this place will, due to the grace of Śiva, attain salvation. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 23).

RATHAVITI. A mahārṣi. He lived in a hilly region very far away from the Himalayas. Once the mahārṣi called Śyāvāśva invited Rathaviti to perform a homa at the yajña conducted by King Taranta, and when he came for the homa with his daughter the father of Śyāvāśva asked him to marry his daughter to Śyāvāśva. Rathaviti not only refused, but also dismissed Śyāvāśva from the yajña platform. At last Rathaviti married his daughter to Śyāvāśva at the request of King Taranta. (Kṛṣṇa, Śaivaśāhitya).

RATHTARĀ. A king of the solar dynasty. He was the son of Pratāpaśva. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skanda).

RATI I. Wife of Kāmadeva and some Purāṇas hold the view that Kāma was the son of Dharma whose father was Brahmā. But, the story of Kāma and Ratī is described in the Kālikāpurāṇa as follows.

Brahmā created ten prajāpatis. A beautiful lady called Sandhīyā was his next creation. As soon as she was born, seeing her exquisite beauty Brahmā and the prajāpatis jumped to their feet. All of them thought in the same way. While the court of Brahmā was in such a perplexed confusion, an extremely handsome person emerged from his mind. Fish was the symbol on his flag, and he asked Brahmā thus: “Oh father, what should I do? Give me a suitable name and you should also decide upon a place and position and also a wife for me.” Brahmā told him as follows:—“You be moving about everywhere in this world (full of men and women) engaged in the eternal function of creation with the five arrows of flower in your hands and thus multiply the population. Your arrows will go everywhere and no one, not even the Devas will dare to obstruct your arrows. Everyone will yield to your behests. Viśṇu, Śiva and I also will yield before your arrows. You will enter the hearts of living beings in invisible form and giving them happiness engage yourself in eternal creation. The chief aim and object of your arrows of flower will be the hearts of living beings. You will be given a suitable name just now.”

The prajāpatis, who understood the wish of Brahmā, after mutual consultation said: “You emerged churning our minds. Therefore, you will become famous under the name Manmatha (he who churns the mind). You will lay low Śiva’s haughtiness and conceit. Oh ! best among men, Daśa, chief among the prajāpatis, will give you a wife.”

Happily pleased at the above words of Brahmā Kāma held up in his hands the bow and arrows of flowers and decided to shoot five arrows, i.e. harsanam (pleasing or gladdening), Rocanām (attracting or tempting), mohanam (deluding or infatuating), 'sohanam (weakening) and māraṇam (killing). He decided to use the arrows first against Brahmā and then against the prajāpatis. Accordingly the arrows shot forth and Brahmā and all the prajāpatis overwhelmed by sexual passion stared at Sandhyādevī. Sandhyā also got excited and from her body sprouted up 49 parts; 64 kalās (arts) also were born from her. She used incessantly against the leaders of the world (Brahmā and others) who were downed by the arrows of sexual passion, arrows dear to Manmatha. The expressions of Brahmā made Sandhyā sick with love. Śiva, who was just then travelling along the sky, seeing the boisterous exhibitions of passion by Brahmā and others alighted there. He ridiculed Brahmā for his display of passion towards his own daughter Sandhyā and spoke further like this: “This Kāma too is a fool. He tested his arrows here itself, he has no sense of propriety and discretion.”

Brahmā was thoroughly ashamed at the words of Śiva. He perspired and swept with his hands the drops of sweat that oozed from his body. With great difficulty he controlled his passion and gave up Sandhyā. From the drops of sweat falling on the ground from the body of Brahma were born the pitris called Agniṣṭvātas and the Barhiṣadas, the former 64,000 in number and the latter 4,80,000. Drops of sweat from the bodies of the prajāpatis also fell on the ground and from them were born the Devas. The pitris called Somapās are the sons of Kratu; those called Svakaṅkhas are the sons of Vasiṣṭha; sons of Pulastya are called Ayapaṅ and Havirbhuts are the sons of Aṅgiras.

Brahma, who was angry that Kāma shot his arrows against him in the presence of Siva cursed the former that he would be burnt to ashes in the fire of Siva’s eyes, and Kāma trembling with fear at the curse prostrated at the feet of Brahma and wept. Then Brahma said that though he would die in the fire of Siva’s eyes, he would be born again.

From the drops of perspiration that fell on the ground from Dakṣa’s body arose a beautiful woman, and Dakṣa told Kāma that the woman, his daughter would become famous as Rati devī. Dakṣa gave Rati Devī to Kāma to be his wife. Thus did Rati become Kāma’s wife. (For the second birth of Rati see under Pradyumna and for other details see under Kāma.)

RATI II. An apsārā woman of Alakīpurī. She danced on the occasion of Kubera welcoming Aṣṭāväkramuni. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 45).

RATI III. Wife of Viñhusu born in the dynasty of King Rṣabhadeva of Ajanabhavas. Prthuṣena was her daughter. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RATIGUṆA. A Devagandharva whose father was Ka’yapaprajāpati and mother Rādhā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 47).

RATIVIDADHĀ. A courtesan of Hastināpura. As she performed the pious deed of feeding brahmins she attained Vaikuṇṭha after her death. (Padma Purāṇa, Kriyākhandā).

RATNAGRIVA. A king of Kaṅcanaanagarī who was a great devotee of Viṣṇu. He performed tapas and attained Vaikuṇṭha. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātaḷa Khaṇḍa).

RATNĀKARA. A Vaisya. He was killed by an ox, but he attained Vaikuṇṭha as a brahmin called Dharmaśāva sprinkled Gangā water on him. (Padma Purāṇa, Kriyākhandā).

RATNAKUṬĀ. One of the wives of Atrimahārṣi. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātaḷa Khaṇḍa).

RĀTRIDEVI. The presiding deity of night. Indraṇī once worshipped Rātridevi for the fulfilment of her desires. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 13, Verse 25).

RAUBHYA. A hermit. It is seen in Uttara Rāmāyaṇa that this hermit called on Śri Rāma on his return from Lāṅkā.

RAUDRA. A class of giants who lived on Kailāsa and Mandara mountains. The hermit Lomaśa gave warning to the Pāṇḍavas, when they went to the north during their forest life, to be careful of the Raudras. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 10).

RAUDRAKARMĀ. One of the hundred sons of Dhrūtarāṣtra. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 127, Stanza 62, that Raudra-karmā was killed in the battle of Bhāratara by Bhīmasena.

RAUDRĀSVĀ I. A son born to the emperor Pūru of his wife Pausṭi. Raudrāsva had two brothers Pravrā and Iśvara.

Once Raudrāsva fell in love with the celestial maid Miśrakesi. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, that as a result of the married life of these two, ten archers beginning with Anvagabhānu, were born.

RAUDRĀSVĀ II. A hermit who was the disciple of the hermit Kātyāyana. Once Mahiṣāsura came in the guise of a beautiful woman to the hermitage of Raudrāsva to hinder his penance. The hermit cursed Mahiṣāsura, “You will die because of a woman”. (Kālikā Purāṇa, Chapter 62).

RAUMYA (S). A group of ganas (warriors of Siva). It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 284, that these Raunyas were born from the hairpores of Virabhadrā, the chief of the guards of Siva.

RAUPYĀ. A Purāṇically famous river of Ancient India. The holy bath Prasarpāna of the hermit Jamadagni is situated on the banks of this river. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 129, Stanza 7).

RAURAVA. One of the twentieth hells. For details see the part Naraka under the word Kāla.

RĀVANA. The Rākṣasa King of Lāṅkā who had ten heads.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus:—Brahma—Pulastya—Viṣṇu—Rāvana.

2) Birth. Viṣṇu, grandson of Brahma and son of Pulastya married Kaikaśi, daughter of Sumāli. While Viṣṇu and Kaikaśi were living in the forest Śleṣmātaka, Kaikaśi became pregnant. She delivered four children in four Yāmas, with an interval of one yāma between them. The elder three were the famous Rākṣasas, Rāvana, Kumbhakarṇa and Viṣṇuḥa; the fourth one, a girl, was named Sūrpanakhā. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakhaṇḍa).

Kubera was another son of Viṣṇu born of another wife called Devavarnī alias Ilabīti. As soon as he came of age Kubera captured the Puuspaka chariot and began ruling the kingdom with Lāṅkā as capital. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Precious lives of Rāvana. See under Jaya XI.

4) Rāvana secured boons. Kaikaśi (Rāvana’s mother) who became envious of the pomp and prowess of Kubera advised her son to secure boons from Brahma by tapas and become equal to Kubera. Accordingly he went to Gokarna with his brothers and began tapas. Kumbhakaṇṭha did tapas for 10,000 years; Viṣṇuḥa also did tapas for 10,000 years standing on one foot. Rāvana, standing in the middle of the five fires, meditated upon Brahma. Though 10,000 years passed thus, Brahma did not appear yet. Rāvana then cut one of his ten heads and made an offering of it to Brahma in the fire. Thus, within 9000 years he cut nine of his heads and offered them to Brahma in the fire. Lastly when he was about to cut off his tenth head, Brahma appeared and asked him to choose whatever boon he wanted. Rāvana chose the boon that from none but men should he meet with his death. Kumbhakaṇṭha desired to secure the boon of ‘nirdevatva’ (Absence of the devas) but secured by a slip of the tongue ‘nīrāvattvam’ (sleep). Viṣṇuḥa chose devotion to Viṣṇu. On his return after securing the boons, Rāvana occupied Lāṅkā, drove away Kubera and took his Puuspaka chariot. Rāvana further declared Mahāviṣṇu to be his eternal enemy. Hearing about Rāvana’s victory the Rākṣasas from Pātāla came to live in Lāṅkā.
5) Family life. Rāvana married Mandodari, foster-daughter of Mayāṣura and three sons, Meghanāda, Atikīya and Aksakumāra were born to the couple. He then conquered the whole world with the cooperation of his sons and other Rākṣasas. The Aṣṭādikpālakas (protectors of the eight regions) were subjugated. He attacked Devaloka, but was defeated and imprisoned. Meghanāda by magical trickery captured Indra and released Rāvana from custody. Meghanāda came to be called Indrajit from that day onwards.

7) Curses heaped on Rāvana. As a result of ruling the land, as a terror to the whole world, for many years and of his triumphal journey Rāvana had invited on his head eighteen sāpas (curses) as follows.
   (i) Nalakūbara śāpa. Rāvana once insulted Rambhā, the betrothed wife of Nalakūbara during her tour at a place near Alakā. On hearing about the insult Nalakūbara cursed that Rāvana should die with his ten heads broken.
   (ii) Vedavatīśāpa. While Vedavatī, the only daughter of sage Kuśadhvajā, was doing taps to secure Śrī Mādhava as her husband. Rāvana committed rape on her and she cursed him thus:—"You and your family will be ruined by Lord Nārāyaṇa on account of me."
   (iii) Brāhmaṇaśāpa. He invited a Vedic brahmin to install the idol of Tripurasundarī given to him by Śiva. As the brahmin happened to be a bit late to come, Rāvana imprisoned him for seven days, and the old brahmin cursed that Rāvana would be imprisoned seven months by a man.
   (iv) Nandikēśvarasāpa. For calling him ‘monkey’ at Kailāsa, Nandikēśvara cursed that Rāvana and his kingdom would be destroyed by monkeys.
   (v) Vasiṣṭhaśāpa. As Vasiṣṭha refused Rāvana’s invitation to teach the Vedas etc. he took the former captive. When he was released from captivity by the solar King Kuvalayāśīva, Vasiṣṭha cursed that Rāvana and his family would be destroyed by those born in the solar dynasty.
   (vi) Astāvakraśāpa. Rāvana once saw sage Aṣṭāvakra at Ślesmātaka and gave him a kick saying, ‘Oh! handsome fellow! I shall cure your eight hunches’, and the sage cursed Rāvana as follows:—"For kicking me, a poor innocent sage, you will be kicked from head to foot and foot to head by monkeys."
   (vii) Dattātreyaśāpa. Rāvana once poured on his own head water kept purified by mantras by Dattātreya to bathe the head of his Guru, and the latter cursed that Rāvana’s head would be polluted by the feet of monkeys.
   (viii) Duḥśāyaṇaśāpa. When Rāvana molested and wounded the lips of Duḥśāyaṇa’s sister in his own presence he cursed that Rāvana’s sister would be mutilated by a man and he would be humiliated by monkeys.
   (ix) Māṇḍavaśāpa. During a pleasure trip of his with Mandodari Rāvana cruelly manhandled Māṇḍava-mahārṣi, when the latter cursed that Rāvana too would be roughly handled by a monkey.
   (x) Atriśāpa. Rāvana once dragged by hair the wife of Atri in his very presence, and Atri cursed that Rāvana will have to witness his wife being denuded of her dress and dragged by the hair by monkeys.
   (xi) Nāradāśāpa. Nārada refused to explain the meaning of ‘Om’ to Rāvana and the latter threatened to cut the tongue of Nārada. Nārada then cursed that all the ten heads of Rāvana would be cut by a man.
   (xii) Ṛtuvarmāśāpa. Rāvana once raped Madanamaijari, wife of Ṛtuvarman, who lived as an anchorite in the marutura forest, and the latter cursed that Rāvana would be killed by a man.
   (xiii) Maudgalyāśāpa. Once mahārṣi Maudgalya was sitting in the svastikā pose resting his neck on the yogadāṇḍa (a short stick-like piece of wood with a handle) Rāvana happened to come there and he cut into two the yogadāṇḍa with his Candrahāsā (sword) with the result that the mahārṣi fell down with face upwards and broke his back-bone. The mahārṣi then cursed that Rāvana’s Candrahāsā would prove ineffective in future.
   (xiv) Brāhmaṇajanaṇaśāpa. Certain young brahmin girls who had gone for sea-bath were humiliated by Rāvana in the presence of their mothers when they cursed that the wife of Rāvana would be insulted in his very presence by monkeys.
   (xv) Agniśāpa. Rāvana once humiliated Svāhādevī, wife of Agni in his very presence and Agni cursed that Rāvana’s wife would be humiliated by monkeys in his presence.
   (xvi) Anaranyāśāpa. Rāvana killed by one blow on his chest King Anaranyā of the solar dynasty who sought refuge with him, and the King cursed that Rāvana would die with all his ten heads cut by the arrows of a prince of the solar dynasty.
   (xvii) Bhṛhaspatiśāpa. When Rāvana was about to return after conquering Devaloka and taking the devas captives, Sulekhaidevi, daughter of Bhṛhaspati tried to take shelter somewhere when Rāvana attempted to catch her by force. Then Bhṛhaspati cursed that Rāvana would die hit by the arrows of Rāma.
   (xviii) Brahmadevasāpa. Rāvana tried to humiliate Puṣjikadevi, daughter of Brahmā, and the latter cursed that Rāvana would die with all his ten heads broken if he touched unwilling women.

8) Rāvana got Candrahāsa. See under Candrahāsa.

9) He threated Devas. Rāvana during his triumphal march with the armies, came to the Uśīrāvīra mountain. Then the King called Marutta was performing Mahēśvara yajña on the plains of the mountain. Indra and the other devas came to receive their portion of the offerings. But they ran away in fear on the arrival of Rāvana. Indra assumed the form of a peacock, Yama that of a crow, Kubera that of a chameleon and Varuṇa that of a swan, and the devas, thus assuming various forms went away in different directions. Marutta got angry and got ready to fight Rāvana. But, as the mahārṣis prevented him from it no fighting took place. Rāvana returned with the glories of victory.

10) He defeated Kāla. Once Nārada felt the urge to witness a quarrel. He went to Laṅkā and told Rāvana tales about Kāla, that Kāla was more powerful than Rāvana, that Kāla would soon be causing Rāvana’s death etc. These stories awakened the anger in Rāvana against Kāla, and the former, with a strong army challenged Kāla, and war between the two started.
Brahmā was in a fix, for he had given Rāvaṇa the boon that the latter would be killed only by a man. At the same time he had given the boon to Kāla that anybody thrashed with his (Kāla's) club would die. Brahmap, therefore, decided to end the fighting between Kāla and Rāvaṇa somehow, and he approached Kāla and requested him to withdraw from fighting. Accordingly, Kāla acknowledged defeat and thus the fighting ended.

11) Rāvaṇa attacked Pātāla. Afterwards Rāvaṇa marched with his army to Pātāla where he defeated Takṣaka, the nāga King and exacted tribute from him. Then he attacked Nīvātakavacas. When the fighting became very fierce Brahmap intervened and brought about a compromise between the two. Next, Rāvaṇa attacked Surabhi in Varuṇa's palace, but the Rākṣasas who emerged from the pores on Surabhi's body drove away Rāvaṇa.

12) Raped Rambha. See under Nalakūbara.

13) His death. Rāvaṇa's sister, Śurpanakāhā met Śrī Rāma and Laksmaṇa at Paścavaṭi and wanted first Rāma and then Laksmaṇa to marry her. But, Laksmaṇa cut away her nose, breasts etc. Enraged by this Rāvaṇa abducted Sītā. Śrī Rāma, with the help of the monkey-army, killed Rāvaṇa in war. (See under Rāma.

RAVI I. A prince of Sauvīra. It was this prince who stood with the flag behind the chariot of Jayadratha, who had come to carry away Draupadi. He was killed by Arjuna. (Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 27).

RAVI II. A son of Dhrtrāśtra. He was killed by Bhima in the great war. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 14).

RAYA. A King of the lunar dynasty and son of Purūravas. Urvaśi, who had many sons like Āyus, Śrutāyus, Satyāyus, Raya, Vījaya and Jaya. (bhāgvata, 9th Skandha).

RĪHU I. An ancient sage. He was the son of Brahmap. He was an extraordinary scholar who became the preceptor of Nidāgha who was the son of Pulastya and the grandson of Brahmap. Rīhu conveyed all knowledge to Nidāgha. But he saw that although he taught Nidāgha all branches of knowledge, the latter did not take any interest in "Advaita". So he left him in disappointment but later got him interested in Advaita. (Viśṇu Purāṇa, Arṇā 2. Chapters 15-16).

RĪHUS. They made a cow and covered it with the skin of the dead cow and placed it in front of the calf. Because of its likeness to its mother, the calf believed it to be its mother.

(ii) Rīhu restored their parents who had become old, to youth. (Ṛgveda, 1st Maṇḍala, 16th Anuvāka. 11th Sūkta).

(iii) Ṛgveda says that it was the Rīhu who made Indra's horses, the chariot of the Aśvinis and Bṛhaspati's cow.

RCĪKA (AJĪGARTA). A king of the Pūru Dynasty.

1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order:-Brahma-Atṛi-Candra-Budhha-Purūravas, Āyus-Nahuṣa, Yaśạti-Puru-Janmejaya - Prācinān - Praśrā-Namasyu-Viṭabhava-Ṣuṇḍu-Bahuvihida-Saṇyāti - Ravo-vādi-Raudrāvya and Ṛcīka. (Visnu purāṇa, chapter 26).

2) Other details.

(i) His mother, Mīrakāśī was a goddess. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 10).

(ii) He had two other names; Anvagbhu and Anvrṣṭi. Matināra was the son of Ṛcīka. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 94, Verses 11-13).

RCĪKA I(AJĪGARTA). A famous sage.

1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order:-Brahma-Bṛghu-Cyavana-Ṛcīka. Ṛcīka was the father of Jamadagni and grandfather of Parāśurāma.

2) Ṛcīka's marriage. Gādhi, a king of the Lunar dynasty had a daughter, Satyavati. Ṛcīka wished to marry this beautiful princess. Gādhi agreed to give his daughter in marriage to the sage if he gave 1,000 horses with black ears. Ṛcīka offered worship to Varuṇa to help him in the matter. Varuṇa was pleased and a thousand horses rose up from the river Gangā. Ṛcīka married Satyavati after giving the horses. Afterwards both of them went and settled down in the forest.

3) Birth of Jamadagni. One day Satyavati made a request to Ṛcīka that she should have a son. Besides, she requested him that her mother should be blessed with a son, so that she might have a brother. Ṛcīka performed a "homa" and after that he made two balls of rice and gave them to Satyavati. He advised her to eat one of them and to give the other to her mother. Ṛcīka had put "Brahmatejas" (brilliance of Brahmins) in the first rice-ball and "Kṣātraṭejas" (brilliance of Kṣatriyas) in the other. When Satyavati and her mother ate the rice-balls, it so happened that the rice-ball intended for her mother was eaten by Satyavati and the one intended for Satyavati was eaten by the mother. Later Ṛcīka came to know of this mistake. In due course, Satyavati and her mother gave birth to sons, Satyavati's son was named Viśvāmitra. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 57).

4) Other sons of Ṛcīka. After this three more sons were born to Ṛcīka. The eldest of them was named Sunahpuccha, the second was named Sunaśēṭha and the third, Sunolāṅgūla.

5) The sale of Sunaśēṭha. Once king Ambariṣa started a yāga. Indra who was jealous of him, stole the sacrificial cow. Since it was an evil omen, the priest advised Ambariṣa that either the lost cow or a human being in its place must be obtained to complete the yāga. In spite of searches made in many places, the cow could not be traced. At last Ambariṣa's men met Ṛcīka who was doing tapas on Bhriguṭuṅga. Ṛcīka sold his second son, Sunaśēṭha to Ambariṣa in exchange for the price of 100,000 cows,
The king took Sunāśēpha with him and came to Puṣkara tirtha. There they happened to meet Viśvāmitra. Sunāśēpha complained to Viśvāmitra and lamented over his ill-fate. Viśvāmitra wished to save him and went to send one of his own sons in his place with Ambariṣa. But none of his sons was willing to oblige. Viśvāmitra cursed them and turned them into eaters of human flesh. Then he turned to Suna-sēpha and said:—

"When you stand ready to be sacrificed near the altar, offer your prayers to Agni. If you do so, you will attain siddhi."

('salvation or mokṣa). He also taught him two songs of praise to Agni.

While standing at the altar ready to be sacrificed Suna-eha recited the two songs of praise. Indra and the other gods appeared and after saving Sunāsēpha rewarded Ambariṣa for his yāga. (Vālmiki Ramāyana, Bālakāṇḍa, 62nd Sarga).

6) Rekha and the Vaisnavī bow. Once Viśvakarmā made two mighty bows. One of them was taken by Śiva to burn the Tripuras. That bow is known as "Saivācāpa". The other bow was given to Viṣṇu. It is called "Vaisnavācāpa". The Devas wished to see a trial of strength between Śiva and Viṣṇu. They prompted Brahmā to bring about such a conflict. Brahmā succeeded in causing a quarrel between Śiva and Viṣṇu. A fight began between Śiva and Viṣṇu. Both the Saivācāpa and Vaṣṇavācāpa went into action. But Śiva was defeated. After that, Śiva gave his bow to Devarāta, king of Videha. By inheritance it came into the hands of king Janaka, the father of Sītā. It was this bow which was broken by Śrī Rāma at the time of Sītā's Svayānivāra.

After the battle with Śiva, Viṣṇu gave his bow to Rekha who, in turn gave it to Jamadagni. Jamadagni presented it to his son Paraṣurāma. It was with this Vaisnavācāpa that Paraṣurāma confronted Śrī Rāma who was returning after Sītā's Svayānivāra. (Ramāyana, Bālakāṇḍa, 75th Sarga).

7) Other details.

(i) Rekha was given 1,000 white horses with black ears which could run fast, by Gādhi as dowry. Varuṇa presented these horses on the bank of the river Gaṅgā. The place in Gaṅgā where the horses rose up, came to be called "Avatārtha." Gādhi gave Satyavatī to Rekha at the place called 'Kanyākubja'. (M.B. Aranya Parva, Chapter 115).

(ii) Mahābhārata, Aśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 23 says that Rekha once tried to stop Paraṣurāma from killing Ksatriyas.

(iii) Once Duyumān, King of Sālva, presented a tract of land to Rekha. (M.B. Anuṇasaṇa Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 28).

(iv) Rekha attained Vaikuṇṭha and his wife Satyavatī accompanied him in her earthly body. It is said that after it, Satyavatī transformed herself into a river under the name "Kausikī" and began to flow in north India. (Vālmiki Ramāyana, Bālakāṇḍa, 34th Sarga).

RCIKA 11. One of the twelve Ādityas. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 42).

RCIKA 111. A King who was the grandson of emperor Bharata and son of Dyumanyu. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 24).

RDDHĪ. Varuṇa's wife. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 9).

RDDHĪMĀN. A great serpent. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 160, Verse 13, there is a reference to the killing of this serpent by Garuḍa.

REŚU 1. A teacher-priest, who was the son of hermit Viśvāmitra and the author of a Sūktā in Rgveda. (Aitareya-Brāhmaṇa 7. 17. 7; Rgveda 9. 70).

REŚU 11. King of the dynasty of Ikṣvāku. Reṇukā the wife of the hermit Jamadagni, and the mother of Paraṣurāma was the daughter of this King. Reṇu had other names such as Prasenajit, Prasena and Suveṇu. (M.B. Anuṇasaṇa Parva, Chapter 116; Verse 2).

REṇUKĀ I. The wife of the hermit Jamadagni. (For further details see under the word Jamadagni).

REṇUKA II. A holy place frequented by Sages. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Stanza 82 that those who bathe in this holy bath would become as pure as Candra (Moon). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, that this holy place lies within the boundary of Kurukṣetra.

REṇUKA. A powerful Nāga (serpent). This serpent who was a dweller of Pātāla, (another world) once went to the Dīggaṇajas (Eight elephants supporting the globe), in accordance with the instruction of the gods, and asked them questions pertaining to duty and righteousness. (M.B. Anuṇasaṇa Parva, Chapter 132, Stanza 2).

REPHA. A hermit of the period of Rgveda. Once the asuras threw this hermit into water. This was the punishment for the sins committed by him in his previous life. (Rgveda, Manḍala 1, Anuṇaḥ 17, Sūkta 116).

REVANTA. A son of the sun.

1) Birth. The sun married the daughter of Viśvakarmā named Saṃjñā. She gave birth to three children named Manu, Yama and Yāni. Once, being unable to bear the radiance of her husband, Saṃjñā went to the forest to do penance. During this period Chāyā the maid of Saṃjñā attended on the sun. Three children, Sāṇiścara, Manu and Tapati were born to the Sun of Chāyā. Once Chāyā cursed Yama. Then only did the Sun remember about Saṃjñā. At that time Saṃjñā had been doing penance in the forest in the form of a mare. The Sun took the form of a horse and lived with her in the forest. From this union Aśvinikūmāras and also the last son Revanta were born. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anuḥ 3, Chapter 2).

2) Lakṣmī astounded at the sight of Revanta. For the story of how Lakṣmī was astounded at the sight of Revanta's handsome figure and how Mahāviṣṇu cursed Lakṣmī consequently, see under Ekāvīra.

REVATA. The father of Revati, the wife of Balabhadraṇa. Revata was the son of Ānarta and the grandson of king Saṃjñā. It is mentioned in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 7, that Revata was the first king who erected his capital in the Island Kuṣasthali and began to rule over it.

REVATI I. Wife of Balabhadraṇa. Revata the son of Ānarta and the grandson of King Saṃjñā was ruling over the island Kuṣasthali. Hundred sons beginning with Kukudmi, were born to him. As the youngest of all a daughter named Revati was born. At the instruction of Brahmā the beautiful Revati was given in marriage to Balabhadraṇa. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10; Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

REVATI II. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 230, Stanza 29, the name 'Revati' is used as a synonym of Aditi Devī.
REVATI III. One of the twentyseven stars. The following statements occur in the Mahabharata about the importance of this star.

(i) Sri Kraṣṇa started on his journey at the auspicious moment of Maithra on the star Revati in the month of Kārttika. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 6).

(ii) If a cow is given as alms on the day of this star that cow will go to heaven and make preparations for the comforts and convenience of the giver. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 33).

(iii) He who gives offerings to the manes on Revati day would become wealthy. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 89, Stanza 14).

REVATI IV. The mother of Raivata, the lord of the fifth Manvantara (age of a Manu). There is a story in the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa about the birth of Revati.

A son was born to the hermit Ṛtavāk on Revati day. By and by he became wicked. Having learned from the hermit Garga that his son became wicked because he was born under the star Revati, Ṛtavāk cursed the star Revati and kicked it down from its place. The spot on which the star fell became a lake. After a time a beautiful damsel was born from the lake. The hermit Pramucu took the girl home and brought her up. She was called Revati. When she came of age, she was given in marriage to Durgama, the son of king Vīkramaśīla. At the request of Revati her marriage was conducted at an auspicious moment on the day of the star Revati. The hermit blessed the couple “Let a son, who would become the Lord of the Manvantara, be born to you.” As a result of this blessing the bright and valiant son Raivata was born to them. This Raivata was the Lord of the fifth Manvantara.

RGGVEDA. The Rgveda is the oldest recorded work of the human race. The Egyptians claim that another book entitled “Book of the Dead” was also written during the period of the Rgveda. The Babylonians have an ancient work called ‘Gilgamish’, which according to scholars, is not as old as the Rgveda. Rgveda is the work that forms the basis of Hindu religion. Of the four Vedas, Yajurveda, Sāmaveda and Atharvaveda were composed after Rgveda. The Rgveda sūktas were interpreted for the first time in Yāska’s “Nirukta” and Śaṅkara’s “Vedārthapraśāsa”.

The most important of the four Vedas is Rgveda. It is divided into ten “Māṇḍalas”. There are 1017 sūktas and 10472 Rks in it. Although there are 11 more sūktas called “khilas,” they are not usually included in the Rgveda.

Māṇḍalas two to seven of the Rgveda were composed in different Rṣikulas. The second Māṇḍala was of Bhārgava Kula, the third of Viśvāmitrakula, the fourth of Vāmadeva, the fifth of Atri, the sixth of Bharadvāja and the seventh of Vasīṣṭha. The eighth Māṇḍala and the first 50 sūktas of the first Māṇḍala were composed by Kaṇva-kula. The general view is that the tenth Māṇḍala was written by someone at a later period.

Most of the Rgveda sūktas are praisers. But some of the Sūktas in the tenth Māṇḍala are of a different type. We can see in many sūktas the joy and wonder experienced by the Aryas when they entered the beautiful land of India for the first time. Most scholars believe that the Rgveda was composed during the period between 2, 500 and 2,000 B.C.

Ancient Belief about Rgveda. The four Vedas—Rgveda, Yajurveda, Sāmaveda and Atharvaveda emerged from the four faces of Brahmā. In Kṛṣṭayuga, Brahmā gave these Vedas to his sons. In Dvāpara-yuga, the Rṣis got these Vedas. Mahāvīra incarnated on earth for the preservation of Dharma, in the person of Veda Vyāsa. Vyāsa distributed the Vedas among his son Śākalya and his disciples. Śākalya received Rgveda. He communicated it to his disciples. (Bhāgavata, 12th Skandha. See under the word Veda).

RIPU. Grandson of Dhruva. Two sons called Śiṣṭi and Bhavya were born to Dhruva by his wife Sambhū. Śiṣṭi’s wife Suchāyā delivered five sons, i.e., Ripu, Ripuṇjaya, Vipra, Vṛka and Vṛkatejas. Cakṣuṣa Manu was born as the son of Ripu by his wife Brahāti. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 13).

RUPUṆJAYA. I Son of Suratha, lord of Kaṇḍala city.

When Suratha captured Śiṣṭi’s yājñic horse there ensued a fierce war between him and Satruṅgha. Ripuṇjaya too was present at the fighting. (Padma Purāṇa).

RIPUṆJAYA II. A brahmin, who was born as Divodāsa, king of Kaśī in his rebirth. When once fire ceased to be in Kaśī, he took upon himself the function of fire. (Skanda purāṇa, 4.2, 39-48).

RIPUṆJAYA III. See under Ripu.

RIṣṬA. A king. He worships Yama in his assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8).

RIṢVĀ. A king mentioned in the Rgveda. Once he besieged the city of another King, Vaṅgrda, with the help of Indra. (Rgveda, 1st Maṇḍala, 10th Anuvaṇa, 53rd Sūkta).

RJRASVA. A muni (sage) celebrated in the Rgveda. Some details. (1) RJrāśva was made blind by his father (Rgveda, 1st Maṇḍala, 16th Anuvaṇa, 112th Sūkta).

(2) RJrāśva was the son of the royal sage, Vṛṣaṅgī. Once the donkey which was the vehicle of the Aśvinidesas assumed the shape of a she-wolf and went to RJrāśva. RJrāśva gave it 100 sheep belonging to the people of the country and cut them to pieces and offered the same as food to the she-wolf. This plunder of the people’s wealth enraged Vṛṣaṅgī. He cursed RJrāśva and made him lose his eye-sight.

RJRāśva who thus became blind offered prayers to Agni, who restored his eyesight. (Rgveda, 1st Maṇḍala, 17th Anuvaṇa, 116th Sūkta).

R. A small section of the Veda. The Veda which issued from the face of God at the time of creation, consisted of 1,00,000 books in four sections, beginning with R. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 4). The root “R” means “to praise”. It got the name “R” meaning “to praise gods”.

RKŚA I. A king of the Puru dynasty. He was the father of Saṁvaraṇa. For genealogy see under the word Saṁvaraṇa (M. B. Adi Parva, Chapter 94).

RKŚA II. King Hariha had a son named RKṣa born to him by his wife Sudeva. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 95 says that this RKṣa had a son named Matīnāra, by his wife Jvalā.

RKŚA. Wife of Ajamidha, who was a king of the lunar dynasty. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 37).

RKṢADEVA. Son of Śiṅkhaṇḍi. Mahābhārata, Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 23 refers to his horse with white and red colour.
RKŚAMBĪKA. A woman follower of Lord Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 12).

RKŚARAJAS. A monkey who was the foster-father of Bāli and Sugriva. He was the king of Kīśkindhā. He had no issue for a long time. Bāli and Sugriva were brought up by Ahalyā at Gautama’s āśrama. Rksarajas, with the permission of Indra, went to the āśrama and took Bāli and Sugriva with him to Kīśkindhā. From that time, Bāli and Sugriva remained with him as his foster-sons. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

There is a story in Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Prakṛipta Sarga, about the origin of this monkey.

Once when Brahmā was in a state of meditation on the Meru mountain, tears rolled down from his eyes and he gathered the tears in his own hands. From those tears, a monkey came into being. Rksarajas was that monkey.

One day, Rksarajas went to a lake to quench his thirst. Seeing his own image reflected in the water, he thought it was some enemy and jumped into the lake, to attack him. But he soon realized his mistake and returned to the shore. As soon as he came out of the water, he felt that he had become a woman. Seeing her fascinating beauty, Indra and Sūrya were filled with lustful passion. Both of them had involuntary emission of semen. Bāli was born from Indra’s semen which fell on the head and Sugriva was born from Sūrya’s semen which fell on the neck of Rksarajas. Towards the end of the night, Rksarajas lost his female form and regained his former shape as a male. At once he took the two children with him to Brahmā and told him the whole story. Brahmā sent a messenger with Rksarajas and had him appointed king of Kīśkindhā. After the time of Rksarajas, Bāli became king of Kīśkindhā. (RKSASRGA. The younger son of Dīrghatapas who was performing tapas in Mandāravana on the northern part of Kāši. Since he was killed by Citrasena, all others committed suicide. But Dīrghatapas who was left behind collected their bones, and deposited them in the sacred Sūlabhedatirtha. Skanda Purāṇa says that consequently they attained Heaven.

RKŚAVĀN. One of the seven mountains in India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

ROCAMĀNA. An attendant of Skandadeva. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 28).

ROCAMĀNA I. A Kṣatriya King. The following information is available from Mahābhārata about him.

(i) Rocamāna was born from a portion of an asura named A’vagrīva. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 18).

(ii) Rocamāna also was present at the Śvayānvara (marriage) of Draupadī. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 10).

(iii) Rocamāna was the King of the country Aśva-medha. Bhimasena, at the time of his regional conquest, defeated this King. (Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 79, Stanza 8).

(iv) At the beginning of the battle of Kuruksetra, the Pāṇḍavas sent an invitation to this King to join the battle. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 12).

(v) Rocamāna was a mighty warrior on the side of the Pāṇḍavas in the battle of Kuruksetra. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 47).

(vi) Rocamāna was killed by Kṛṣṇa in a combat. (M.B. Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 49).

ROCAMĀNA II. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27, Stanza 19, mentions another Rocamāna who had been defeated by Arjuna in his regional conquest.

ROCAMĀNA III. Mention is made in the Mahābhārata, Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 20, that teacher Droṇa had killed two brothers with the name Rocamāna in the Bhārata-battle.

ROCANĀ I. The daughter of the King Devaka. Vasudeva married Rocanā. Two sons Hema and Hemāngada were born to her. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

ROCANĀ II. Grand-daughter of Rukmī, the King of Vidarbha. Aniruddha the grandson of Śrī Kṛṣṇa married her at Bhojakata. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

ROCANĀMUKHA. An asura. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 105, Stanza 12 that Garuḍa killed this Asura.

RODAH. A hell. See the part Naraka under the word Kāla.

ROHIṆĪ I. The mother of all the cows. The following is a story about the origin of Rohiṇī, given in Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Aranyā Kānda, Sarga 14. Prajāpatī Kaśyapa married Surabhi the seventh daughter of Dākṣa. Two daughters Rohiṇī and Gandharvi were born to Surabhi. In later years cows and oxen were born in the world from Rohiṇī and horses from Gandharvī. In the Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 66, it is mentioned that two daughters Vimalā and Anālā were born to Rohiṇī and that from these two, in later years cattle were born.

ROHIṆĪ II.

1) General information. One of the wives of Candra (Moon). The twenty-seven stars are the wives of Candra. Of these twenty-seven wives, Rohiṇī was loved most by Candra. (See under Candra).

2) Rohiṇī and Daśaratha. (See under Daśaratha, Para 10).

ROHIṆĪ III. The mother of Balabhadrārāma.

1) General information. Vasudeva had two wives Devaki and Rohiṇī. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was born from Devaki and Balabhadrārāma from Rohiṇī.

2) Previous Birth of Rohiṇī. Vasudeva was the rebirth of Prajāpatī Kaśyapa. When Kaśyapa took birth as Vasudeva, his two wives Aditi and Surasā took birth as Devaki and Rohiṇī respectively. (They took birth thus, because of the curse of Varuṇa. For details of the curse see under Kaśyapa, para 6).

3) The birth of Balabhadra. The seventh child of Devaki was placed in the womb of Rohiṇī and Balabhadrārāma was born. (For this story see under Kṛṣṇa, para 6, Kaṁsa, para 6 and Saḍarbhaķaka).

4) Death. As soon as a messenger named Dāruka brought the news that the entire race of the Yādavas had perished in Dvārakā, “because of grief, Vasudeva, Devaki and Rohiṇī forsook their bodies.” (Bhāgavata, Skandha 11).

ROHIṆĪ IV. Niśā the third wife of the Agni (fire) called Manu or Bhānu gave birth to a daughter named Rohiṇī. Because she had done some misdeeds, she became the wife of Hiranyakaṣipu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221).
ROHINI V. The mother of Utaathya, a famous hermit. (For details see under Satyataapas).

ROHITA (ROHITASA). The son of Hariscandra. This son, who was born by the blessing of Varuṇa, was wanted to be sacrificed by Varuṇa himself. In connection with this Hariscandra had to bear much sorrow and misery. (For details see under Hariscandra).

ROHITAKA (ROHITAKARANYA). A mountain famous in the Purāṇas. Places surrounding this mountain also were known by the name Rohitaka. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 32, Stanza 4, that during the regional conquest of Nakula, he passed through this country. The present name of this country is Rohtak (Haryana).

ROMAHARSHA. A famous disciple of Vyāsa. The great Vyāsa gave the collection of Purāṇas to Romaharsa. Sumati, Agnivarca, Mitraya, Śāmaśāpanaya, Akṛtvana and Sāvarṇi were the six disciples of Romahāraśa. (See under Guruparamparā).

ROMAKA. A country in ancient India. The inhabitants of this country were called the Romakes. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 17, that the Romakes came with presents to the horse-sacrifice performed by Yudhiṣṭhīra.

ROMAPADA. See under Lomapāda.

ROMAS. A daughter of Bhṛpati. The reply given by Romāśī to her husband when he teased her, is given in Rgveda, Manadal 1, Anuvāka 19, Sūkta 126.

RŚABHA I. A King of the Lunar dynasty. He was the great grandson of Upāricaraśu. Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 12 says that he fought within the Gārūḍavyūha formed by Droṇa.

RŚABHA II. A muni (sage) who was the grandson of King Agnīdhra.

1) General information.

Rṣabha was the son of King Nābhi by his wife Merudivi. One hundred sons were born to Rṣabha by his wife Jayanti. After entrusting his kingdom to Bhṛata, the eldest of his sons, Rṣabha went to the forest and did tapas in Pulaha’s āśrama.

2) Rṣabha and Rṣabhakītā Rṣabha did tapas in the forest for many years. The mountain peak on which he performed his tapas got the name “Rṣabhakītā”. The sage who wished to observe strict silence did not like the presence of strangers and visitors in the vicinity. So he pronounced a curse that the mountain should drop boulders on any one who ventured to come there. Once he ordered the wind to blow without noise as it passed by the side of the mountain. He declared that anyone who made noise in Rṣabhakītā would be struck with thunder. A place of holy waters came into existence there. (M.B. Aranya Parva, Chapter 171).

3) The power of Rṣabha’s Yaga. Rṣabha became a devotee of Śiva by worshipping him.

Once a Brāhmaṇa named Mandara had an illicit alliance with Pīṇgalā, a prostitute. Both of them died together. Mandara was re-born as Bhadrāyū, the grandson of Nala and Pīṇgalā as Sumati, the wife of King Vajrabhū (Aṃśumān). Sumati became pregnant. Her co-wives who were jealous of her poisoned her. As a result of it, she and the child born to her fell victims to diseases. Daśārṇa abandoned them in the forest. Sumati lived in the house of a Vaśyā with her child. While living there, the child died of disease. Rṣa-bha went to the grief-stricken Sumati and comforted her. (Siva Purāṇa).

4) Rṣabha’s End. Rṣabha performed tapas according to the rules of Vānaprastha āśrama and conducted yāgas as ordained by Śāstras. On account of his austerity he became so lean and thin that all the veins in the body could be seen. Putting a pebble in his mouth, he went about in the forest, determined to renounce his body. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Chapter I, Section 1).

In the course of his wanderings in the forest a wild fire broke out in which his body was burnt up. Siva Purāṇa says that the soul of Rṣabha who died in the wild fire, attained Siva Loka.

RŚABHA III. A Nāga born in the Ṭhṛtarashtra family. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 11, we read that this nāga was burnt to ashes at Janame-jaya’s Sarpaśatra. (Snake sacrifice).

RŚABHA IV. An Asura. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 51).

RŚBABHADVIPA. A holy place on the banks of the river Sarasvatī. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 says that by bathing in this place, one would obtain Devavīmaṇa.

RŚBABHAKŪṬA. See under Rṣabha II and Rṣabhaparvata.

RŚBABHAPARVATA. There are twenty mountains on the four sides of Mahāmeru. Rṣabha is one of them. (Devi Bhāgavata, Aṣṭama Skandha).

There is a reference to Rṣabha Parvata when Sugriva gave instructions about the way to the army of monkeys going out in search of Sītā. Sugrīva speaks about the Rṣabha mountain as situated in the middle of the ocean of milk. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kishkindhā Kāṇḍa, 4th Sarga, Verse 44).

RŚBABHĀTĪRTHA. An ancient place of holy waters in Ayodhyā. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 says that an observance of fast at this tirtha is equivalent to the gift of 1,000 cows and a Vajapeyavajāna.

RŚI. Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 248 states that the letter “ṛ” means “sound”. The word “ṛśi” is derived from this root. During the period when the art of writing was not known, Vedas, Śāstras and other sacred lore were communicated through the mouth of the Ṛṣis. The voice of Āraśa Bharata itself is the voice of the Ṛṣis. Hindus believe that the Vedas are the outcome of the inspiration, introspection and spiritual vision of the Ṛṣis. There is a Sāṃskṛta stanza defining a Ṛṣi, which is given below:

Urhdvaretātapasyaṁ
Niyatāśe ca saṁyamı /
Śāpanugrahayoḥ śaktah
Satyaasandho bhavedrśi//

India has given birth to numerous Ṛṣis. The word “ṛśi” may be found throughout the Vedas. Ṛśis born in all classes of people had lived in India. The general belief is that the number of Ṛṣis may come to about 48,000. It is not possible to know the names of all of them. In the Rāmāyaṇa we find that when Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhīya after his life in the forest and took up the reign, many Ṛśis came to Ayodhīya from all parts of the country. Among them, Viśvāmitra, Yavākrita, Raibhya, Kanva and Garga came with their party of disciples from the cast; Dattātreya, Namuci, Pramuci, Vālmiki, Soma, Kūndu and Agastya came with their disciples from the south; Vṛṣaṅgu, Kaviṣa, Kaumya, Raudreya, Namadeva, Saubhari, Aṣṭāvakra, Suka, Bhrgu, Lomaśa, Maudgalya and others with their disciples came from the west and Kaśyapa, Vasiṣṭha, Atri, Gautama, Jamadagni, Bharadvāja, Sanaka and party, Śrāvasti, Durvāśas. Mātanga, Vibhāṅdaka, Tumburu, the Saptarśi and others with their party of disciples arrived from the north, according to Uttarā Rāmāyana. There are three classes of Rṣis—Brahmārśi, Rājaṛṣī and Devarśi. Vasiṣṭha was a Brahmarshi, Visvāmitra, a Rajaṛṣi and Kaśyapa, a Devarshi.

Rṣigiri. A mountain situated near Girvṛaja, the capital of Magadha kingdom. This mountain is also known as “Māṭāṅga” (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verses 2 and 3).

Rṣīka I. A Rājaṛṣi. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verses 32 and 33 state that he was the rebirth of Arka, the Asura leader.

Rṣīka II. A town in North India. A terrible battle took place here between Arjuna and Rṣīka, the Rājaṛṣi. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 27, Verse 25).

Rṣīkulya. A sacred river in ancient India. Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 47 mentions that those who bathe in this river will attain Mokṣa (salvation).

Rṣyamūka. A mountain. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 9 states that Rāma and Laksmana visited the sage Mārkandeya on the top of this mountain. It was here that Rāma and Laksmana met Sugrīva. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 279, Verse 44 states that the river Pampā runs round the Rṣyamūka mountain.

Rṣyaśṛṅga. Son of the sage Vibhāṅdaka.

1) Birth. Vibhāṅdaka, son of Kaśyapa was the father of Rṣyaśṛṅga. There is a strange story about him in the Mahābhārata.

Once sage Vibhāṅdaka happened to see Urvasī at Mahābhārata. At the very sight of her, the sage had an involuntary emission of semen. The semen fell in the water and just then a female deer came there to drink water. It swallowed the semen with water and in due course became pregnant and gave birth to a human child. But the child had the horns of a deer. Consequently Vibhāṅdaka named the boy “Rṣyaśṛṅga”. Vibhāṅdaka and Rṣyaśṛṅga lived together in the āśrama. Rṣyaśṛṅga grew up into a youth, but he had never seen anyone except his father Vibhāṅdaka.

2) Rainfall in the kingdom of Āṅga. At that time, the kingdom of Āṅga was ruled by Lomapāda, a friend of Daśaratha. Once he cheated a Brāhmaṇa. Consequently all the Brāhmaṇas in that country left the place and emigrated to other lands. From that time there was no rainfall in the land of Āṅga. A severe drought and famine followed. Lomapāda invited devout Brāhmaṇas and consulted them how they could bring rain to the land. They told him that if he could get a Muni (sage) who had never seen women to perform a yāga, there would be rainfall in the land. The King sent his men far and wide to find a Muni who had never set eyes on a woman. At last he got news that Rṣyaśṛṅga, son of Vibhāṅdaka was the sage who had never seen women. He then began to plan how Rṣyaśṛṅga could be brought over to Āṅga.

Lomapāda called together some prostitutes and asked them whether they could bring Rṣyaśṛṅga to his country. All except one of them said it was quite impossible. One of them, however, agreed to try. As desired by her, the King sent her with several other damsels.

The young women went to the forest and made a floating āśrama in a boat in which they sailed in the river by the side of Vibhāṅdaka’s āśrama. They stopped the boat close to the āśrama and one of the girls entered the āśrama when Vibhāṅdaka was not there. She had a talk with Rṣyaśṛṅga in the course of which she used all the amorous enchantments of her sex to captivate the young Muni. She told him that she was the daughter of a Muni, living in an āśrama, three yojanas away. Rṣyaśṛṅga felt a peculiar fascination for her and tried to please her by offering fruits etc. When she left him, he felt deeply distressed and unhappy. He was in that depressed and gloomy state of mind when Vibhāṅdaka returned to the āśrama. Finding him unusually restless and dejected, the father asked him whether anyone had come there. Rṣyaśṛṅga who was an entire stranger to the feminine world told his father that a handsome youth of irresistible charm had visited him during Vibhāṅdaka’s absence. But from Rṣyaśṛṅga’s description of the “youth” Vibhāṅdaka understood that the visitor must have been a woman. But he could not guess who it was.

On another occasion, the same woman came again to the āśrama in the absence of Vibhāṅdaka. At her sight Rṣyaśṛṅga was enraptured and before his father’s return, they left the āśrama. They entered the floating āśrama in the boat and the woman set the boat sailing in the river. It glided slowly down the river and at last reached near the palace of Lomapāda. They landed there and the King married his daughter Śāntā to Rṣyaśṛṅga.

To appease Vibhāṅdaka, Lomapāda sent him rich presents and much wealth. When Vibhāṅdaka returned to his āśrama he was met by the King’s servants who had brought the presents and wealth. Ignoring them and their rich presents, the furious Brāhmaṇi set out to the city of Campā, the capital of the Āṅga Kingdom. At the royal command, Vibhāṅdaka was welcomed by the people with honour. When the sage found that the whole kingdom belonged to his son, his anger was allayed. After ordering his son to return to his āśrama after the birth of a son, Vibhāṅdaka left the palace. As a result of Rṣyaśṛṅga’s yāga there was rainfall in Āṅga and famine ended. After the birth of his child he returned to the forest as ordered by his father. (M.B. Aranyā Parva, Chapters 110-112).

3) Rṣyaśṛṅga in Ayodhyā. King Daśaratha of Ayodhyā had no children for a long time. His Minister Sunmansa advised him to invite Rṣyaśṛṅga to perform a yāga for the purpose. Lomapāda sent Rṣyaśṛṅga to Ayodhyā at the invitation of Daśaratha. He arrived at Ayodhyā and performed a yāga called Putrakāṃśēti. From the sacrificial fire there arose a dark monstrous figure, with a pot of pudding in his hand. Daśaratha received it from him and gave one half of it to Kauśalyā and the other half to Kaikēyī. Both of them gave half of their shares to Sumitā. Thus Sumitā got two shares while the other two wives of Daśaratha got only one share each. As a result Kauśalyā and Kaikēyī gave birth to a son each, while Sumitā had two sons. Kauśalyā’s son was named Rāma, Kaikēyī’s son was Bharata and Sumitra’s sons were Lakṣmīna and Satrughna. (Vālmiki Ramayana, Bāla Kānda, Chapters 14-16).

RTA I. One of the 11 Rudras. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 12).

RTA II. See under the word Pramṛta.

RTA III. This word has a general meaning “truth”. Besides, in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 152, we see that it also means “something obtained by begging”.

RTADHMĀ. Another name of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 342, Verse 62).

RTADHVAJA I. (KUVALĀSVA—DHUNDHUMĀRA).
A famous King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty.
1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order—Brahmā—Mārti—Kaśyapa—Vivasvān—Vaiśvānara—Manu—Ikṣvāku—Vikukṣi—Saśāda—Kākutstha—Anenas—Pṛthulā—Viṣvagā—Adri—Kuvalāśva (Dhundhumāra).
2) How he got the name Dhundhumāra. The most heroic exploit of Kuvalāśva or Kuvalayāśva was his killing of the Asura Dhundhu.
Madhu and Kaiṭabha were two Asuras born from the ears of Mahāviśu. The Asura Dhundhu was their son. After his birth, Mahāviśu killed Madhu and Kaiṭabha. Dhundhu was furious over the death of his fathers. He worshipped Brahma who granted him unconquerable strength. After defeating the gods he went to the desert called Ujjālaka and lay beneath the sands. Whenever he heaved a sigh clouds of dust rose up to the sky and the earth shook for seven days. It caused great damage to life and property in the world, like a storm. Uṭṭāṇika, a sage who lived in the neighbourhood of Ujjālaka was the person who suffered most from Dhundhu’s misdeeds.

Bṛhadāśva, of Ikṣvāku dynasty and father of Kuvalāśva in his old age entrusted the rule of the country to his son and prepared to go to the forest. At that time, sage Uṭṭāṇika came there and advised the King to go to the forest only after killing Dhundhu. Bṛhadāśva called his son Kuvalāśva and after giving him the task of killing Dhundhu, proceeded to the forest.
Kuvalāśva had 21,000 sons. Leading them, he went to the desert Ujjālaka to kill Dhundhu. Uṭṭāṇika declared that anyone who killed Dhundhu would get part of Mahāviśu’s strength. Kuvalāśva’s sons surrounded Dhundhu. The Asura awoke with anger. In the fire from his eyes, all the 21,000 sons of Kuvalāśva were burnt to ashes. Next Kuvalāśva came into conflict with Dhundhu. In that fight Dhundhu was killed. The gods gave Kuvalāśva many boons. From that day, Kuvalāśa got the name, “Dhundhumāra” (one who killed Dhundhu). (M.B. Vana Parva, 4 Chapters from 201).

3) Īśaṇa. Kuvalāśva had three more sons named Dhṛṣṭāśva, Kapilāśva and Candrāśva, or Bhadrāśva besides the 21,000 sons. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 204, Verse 40).

4) Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 59 gives the following account of how Kuvalāśva won the favour of sage Gālava.
Long ago while sage Gālava was performing tapas in his āśrama, an Asura called Pātalaketu used to disturb his meditations regularly. One day, the sage looked up to Heaven and heaved a sigh. At once a horse dropped down from the sky. A mysterious voice was heard saying—“This mighty horse will travel thousands of yojanas in a day.” The sage received that horse and presented it to Rādhvajā, King of the lunar dynasty. Rādhvajā mounted the horse and killed Pātalaketu. It was Viśvāvasu who dropped this horse from Heaven. Pātalaketu had once fallen in love with Viśvāvasu’s daughter, Mādālāśa. It was in revenge that Viśvāvasu had done this.

RTADHVAJA II. A Maharsi (sage). The sage Jabali was his son. (For further details, see Para 2 under the word Viśvāvasa).

RTAMBHARA. An ancient King. He worshipped Kāmadhenu and obtained a son who was a devotee of Viṣṇu. The son’s name was Satyavān. In connection with Śrī Rāma’s Aṣvamedha-yāga, Satrughna who was leading the horse, arrived in Satrughna’s city during his tour of the eastern lands. (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṇāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 30).

RTASTUBH A Muni (sage) celebrated in the Rgveda. (Rgveda. 1st Maṇḍala, 16th Anuvāka, 112th Sūkta).

RTAYU. See under Kālīṅga.

RTYEYU I. A king of the Lunar dynasty.

RTYEYU II. A Maharsi (sage) of the western country. He was a rātvik (priest officiating at a yāga) of Varuna. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 36).

RTUKĀLA. The time that is most auspicious for sexual intercourse for a woman with her husband. In ancient India certain days were prescribed as the best period for women to become pregnant. This period is called RTukāla. (Rt—Menstruation. Krāla—time, period.)

The sixteen days following menstruation are supposed to be good; but the first three days are not very good and it is advisable not to have sexual intercourse during those days. The next even days beginning with the fourth day (4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 14th and 16th) are the best days for coitus if a male issue (a son) is desired. The odd days (5th, 7th, 9th, 11th 13th, 15th) are to be preferred if a female issue (daughter) is desired. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 151).

RTUPARNA. A king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty.
1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order—Brahmā—Kaśyapa—Vivasvān—Vaiśvānara—Manu—Ikṣvāku—Vikukṣi—Saśāda—Puraṇāja—Kākutstha—Anenas—Pṛthulā—Viṣvagā—Adri—Kuvalāśva (Dhundhumāra).

2) Other Details.
   i) Nala’s incognito life. While Nala was wandering in the dense forest after leaving Damayanti, he was bitten by the serpent, Karkoṭaka. His complexion turned blue owing to the effect of the poison. Karkoṭaka gave him a garment by wearing which Nala could regain his form. As advised by Karkoṭaka, Nala went to the palace of Rātparna, king of Ayodhyā, assuming the name Bāhuka. He lived there as the chief charioteer of the king. He had made the art “Avahṛdaya” by which he could drive the chariot-horses with astonishing speed. Rātparna appointed him as his chief charioteer and gave him two assistants, Vāṃṣu and Jivala. (M.B., Aranyā Parva, Chapter 67).
   ii) Rātparna and the second marriage of Damayanti. Damayanti came to know that Nala was living in Rātparṇa’s palace, through the messenger Parnāda. She sent a secret message to Ayodhya through a Brähmana named Sudeva that her second marriage was fixed for the next day and that Rtuparna should attend the ceremony. Rtuparna started at once with Bhāhuka as his charioteer. On the way, Rtuparna's cloak happened to fall down from the chariot. At once he asked Nala to stop the chariot. But he told him that within a moment, the chariot had covered a distance of one yojana from the place where the cloak fell. They saw a tree in the forest which was heavily laden with fruit. Rtuparna was able to tell at a glance, the exact number of leaves and fruits on that tree. He told Nala that he was able to do so with the help of the art "Āksāhṛdaya" and he taught it to Nala. In return for it, Nala taught the king the art of Āsvāhrdaya. At last they reached the city of Vidarbha. Damayantī managed to recognize Nala even in his disguise. Rtuparna who was happy over the reunion of Nala and Damayantī returned to Ayodhya on the next day. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 77.

RTUSTHALA. A Celestial damsel. In Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, we find that she attended the birth festival of Arjuna.

RTVĀ. A Deva Gandharva. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122 states that he had taken part in Arjuna's birth-festival.

RTVIK. A Priest who officiates at a yāga. Those who perform yāgas like Agnisandhāna, Agniṣṭoma, Pākayāna etc. are called Rtviks. (Manusmṛti, Chapter 2, Verse 143).

RUCAKAPARVATA. (The mountain Rucaka) A mountain standing near the mountain Mahāmeru. It is mentioned in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 8, that there are twenty mountains including Rucaka on the four sides of Mahāmeru.

RUCI I. A celestial maid of Alakāpuri. This celestial maid danced in the Palace of Kubera on the occasion of the visit of Aṣṭāvakra. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 44).

RUCI II. A son of Brahmā and a Prajāpati. This Prajāpati married Akūti the daughter of Manu Svāyambhuva. A son and daughter were born to Ruci of Akūti. The son was the incarnation of Viṣṇu. He was named Yajña. The daughter who was incarnation of Mahālaṣṭmi was named Dakṣinā. Yajña was brought up in the hermitage of Svāyambhuva and Dakṣinā grew up in the hermitage of Ruci. When they grew up Yajña married Dakṣinā. Twelve sons, named Toṣa, Santosa, Pratosa, Bhadra, Sānti, Īdaspati, Idhma, Kavi, Vibhu, Vahni, Sudeva and Rocana, were born to the couple. In the time of Manu Svāyambhuva these twelve were called the Tūtis, a group of devas (gods).

RUCI III. The wife of the hermit named Devāśarmā. (For detailed story see under Vipula).

RUCIPARVA. Son of the king Ākṛti. In the Bhārata battle, to save Bhīmasena, Ruciparva confronted the elephant of Bhagadatta and was killed by Bhagadatta. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 51).

RUCIRĀŚVA. A king of the Lunar dynasty. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

RUDHIRĀMBHAS. A hell. (See under the word Kāla).

RUDHIRĀŚANA. A giant-chief who came to fight with Śrī Rāma, under the leadership of the giant Khāra. In that fight the captains of the army of the giants were Rudhirāsana etc. All of them were killed by the arrow of Śrī Rāma. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā, Kāṇḍa Sarga 26).

RUDRA. A form of Śiva.

1) General information. The birth of Rudra is from Brahmā. Even before the creation of the Prajāpatis, Brahmā had created Sanandana, Sanaka, Sanātana and Sanatkumāra. These four were not desirous of mundane pleasures and were not prepared to beget children. They were great sages and scholars, of abstinence and without any discord and animosity. When these four showed no interest at all in the creation of the world, Brahmā became angry to such an extent that he was prepared to destroy the three worlds. At that time the whole of the three worlds shone in the radiance that emanated from the fire of the fury of Brahmā. Then from his shining eyebrows which were curved with fury, a figure of unbearable radiance like the mid-day sun came out. That figure was Rudra. Half of the fierce body of that Rudra who was very furious, was a woman and the other half was a man. Brahmā, saying, “Divide body”, disappeared. Instantly Rudra split himself into the figure of a man and the figure of a woman. He again divided the body of the man into eleven parts. These eleven figures are the eleven Rudras.

The names of the eleven Rudras are given differently in Purāṇas. In a text it is said that the eleven Rudras are, Manyu, Manu, Mahīnasa, Mahān, Śiva, Rtudvaja, Ugraretas, Bhava, Kāma, Vāmadeva and Dīttavrat. According to some other Purāṇas, the eleven Rudras are Aja, Ėkāpāda (Ękāpāt), Aṇiṇhudhyana, Tvāṣṭā, Rudra, Harā, Šambhu, Tryambaka, Aparājīta, Īśāna and Tribhuvana. Brahmā apportioned to the eleven Rudras the eleventh positions of the heart, the five organs of senses and the organs of action and to Rudra the eight positions of life, ether, air, fire, water, earth, the sun and the moon. It was said before that Rudra was divided into man and woman. From the woman portion eleven Rudrānis came into being. They were Dhi, Vṛtī, Uśānā, Umā, Niuyutā, Sarpī, Ila, Ambikā, Iravati, Sudhā and Dīkṣā. The eleven Rudrānis became the wives of the eleven Rudras. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Arṇīa 1, Chapter 7). 2) Other information regarding Rudra. Details about the orgin, life, character etc. of Rudra which occur in other Purāṇas are given below.

(i) Thirtythree children were born to Prajāpati Kaʿya-pa, by his wife Aditi, as Adityas, Vasus, Rudras and Aśvins. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kāṇḍa Sarga 14).

(ii) From the fury of Brahmā, Rudra was born; from the lap of Brahmā, Nārada was born; from the right thumb, Dakṣa; from the mind, Sanaka and the others; and from the left thumb, a daughter named Viṣṇu was born. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

(iii) In the beginning of Kalpa (Age of Brahmā) Brahmā meditated upon getting a child like himself and a child of blue complexion appeared on his lap. He ran here and there crying aloud. Brahmā asked him “Why are you crying?” He replied: “I must be named.” Because he was crying (doing rodana) Brahmā named him Rudra (He who cries). He cried seven times more. Brahmā gave him seven more names. They were Bhava, Śarva, Īśāna, Paśupati, Bhima, Ugra and Mahādeva. Thus there were eight Rudras. To each of them, Brahmā gave a position and wives and children.
The Sun, water, earth, air, fire, ether, Brahmin who has taken vow and the moon were allotted to them as their positions and figures. Their wives were Suvarcalā, Usā, Vikeśī Śivā, Svāhā, Dīśā, Diksā and Rohini. This world is filled by the sons and grandsons and so on of these wives. Their sons respectively were Śaṇaśicara Śukra, Lohitāṅga, Manojaya, Skanda, Sarga, Santāna and Budha. This Rudra who is described above, married Satī the daughter of Prājāpati Dakṣa. (Visṣu Purāṇa, Anīsa 1, Chapter 8). (For further information see under ŚIVA also).

RUDRAKETU. An asura. Two sons named Devāntaka and Narāntaka were born to this asura by his wife Śāradā. The hermit Nārada was greatly pleased at the valour of these two sons, and taught them “Pañcākṣarīmahāvidyā.” Devāntaka and Narāntaka, who became haughty and arrogant by their prowess were killed by Gaṇapati. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa, Kriyā Kanda 2).

RUDRAKOTI. A holy place in North India. Once a large number of hermits gathered in this place to worship Śiva. Greatly pleased at this Śiva appeared before them in the form of many phalluses. From that day onwards the place Rudrakoṭi became a holy place. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Stanza 118).

RUDRĀKṢA. (Elaco Carpus seeds) Beads for rosaries.
1) General information. A holy thing worn by devotees. In the Purāṇas much importance is attached to Rudrākṣas.
   In Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 11, there is a story stating how Rudrākṣa came to be honoured in this way. Once there lived an asura chief who was mighty and valiant. His name was Tripura. He defeated Devas and deva chiefs and became emperor of the asuras. The Devas were much grieved because of him. They went to Śiva and represented their grievances. Śiva thought for a while, how to kill Tripura, and sat with open eyes. This sitting continued for a thousand divine years. After this prolonged time Śiva winked his eyes and tears fell down from them. The Rudrākṣa tree originated from these tears. From the Sun-eye of Śiva twelve types of Rudrākṣas came into being; from the moon-eye sixteen kinds of Rudrākṣas and from the fire-eye ten kinds of Rudrākṣas originated. Those which originated from the Sun-eye are bloodcoloured, those from the moon-eye white Rudrākṣas and from the fire-eye black Rudrākṣas. Boiled Rudrākṣa is considered a Brahmin caste, red rudrākṣa a Kṣatriya caste, white one a Vaśya caste and the black rudrākṣa a Śūdra caste.
2) Division of rudrākṣa based on quality. The division of rudrākṣa according to the number of faces, and qualities thereof are given below:
   With one face: Rudrākṣa with only one face is the figure of Śiva. By wearing this remission from the sin of Brahmatāyā can be procured.
   With two faces: Rudrākṣa with two faces is the figure of Devideva. This is known by the name “Gaurīśākara”. By wearing this remission from all sins committed knowingly and unknowingly, would be obtained.
   With three faces: This is the figure of Agni (fire). By wearing this the sin incurred by Śrīhātā (killing a woman) would be washed away.
   With four faces: Rudrākṣa with four faces is the figure of Brahmadeva. By wearing this, the sin incurred by Nara- hātā (killing a man) could be got rid of.
   With five faces: This is the figure of Kālāngi (Fire of Kāla the God of death). By wearing this, remission of sins incurred by eating food which ought not to have been eaten and enjoying woman who ought not to have been enjoyed, could be obtained. All sorts of sins would be absolved by five-faced rudrākṣa.
   With six faces: Six-faced rudrākṣa is the six-faced god Kārttikeya. By wearing it on the right hand, remission from all sins, beginning with Brahmatāyā could be obtained.
   With seven faces: Rudrākṣa with seven faces is the figure of Kāmadeva (Cupid). If this is worn, sins such as theft of gold etc. could be removed.
   Eight faces: Rudrākṣa with eight faces is the figure of Vināyaka, the general of the great army. By wearing this, sins incurred by deceit such as selling rice of low quality as good quality, keeping false weights and measures, giving gold of lower carat as good carat gold, by enjoying woman of wicked families, touching the wife of teacher, and so many other kinds of sins would be absolved, and impediments would be avoided and finally one can attain supernal bliss.
   With nine faces: This rudrākṣa is the figure of Bhairava. This should be worn on the left hand. By doing so one would become as mighty as god and would become devoted to god and would attain salvation. The sins incurred by killing the child in the womb a thousand times and killing Brahmans a hundred times would be got rid of by wearing this rudrākṣa.
   With ten faces:—This is the figure of the real Janārdana. If one wears this, the devils, wicked planets, Ghosts, goblins, spirits haunting funeral places, Brahmārākṣas (a kind of demon) etc. will not come near him. Moreover, snake-bite would not affect him.
   With eleven faces:—Rudrākṣa with eleven faces is the figure of the Eleven Rudras. This should be worn on the head. By doing so one could obtain the fruits of performing a thousand horse-sacrifices and a hundred Vājapeyāyāgas (A kind of sacrifice).
   With twelve faces:—Rudrākṣa with twelve faces is the dwelling place of the twelve Ādityas. This should be worn on the ear. If it is done so, the sun-god will be pleased. The wearer will obtain the fruits of performing horse-sacrifice, cow-sacrifice etc. He will not be wounded by animals with horns, or quills or teeth. He need not fear disease or worry. He need not fear to go anywhere. Wherever he goes he will be honoured as God. All the sins incurred by slaughter of elephant, man, snake, rat, frog etc. will instantly be absolved.
   With thirteen faces:—he who wears rudrākṣa with thirteen faces will be equal to Kārttikeya. All his wishes will be realized. He will get rasa (mercury) and rasiyana (sweetened medicine) and all the pleasures and luxuries of the world. The great sins of killing parents, brothers etc. will be removed.
   With fourteen faces:—He who wears rudrākṣa with fourteen faces will be exactly like the real Paramāśiva.
3) The mode of wearing Rudrākṣa. He who wears thirty-two rudrākṣas on the neck, forty on the head, six on each ear, twelve on each hand, sixteen on each of the upper arms, one on each eye, one on the lock of hair, and one hundred and eight on the chest is really Śrī Nilakaṇṭha Paramāśiva Himself.

RUDRAMĀRGĀ. A holy place. If a day and a night’s fast is taken in this place, one will attain the world of Indra. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 181).
1) General information. King of the Province Bhogakaṭa in the country of Vidarbha. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 62, that this Rukmi was born from a portion of the Asura named Krodhavaśa.
2) Birth. Father of Rukmi was the king Bhīṣmaka.
Two children were born to Bhīṣmaka, named Rukmi and Rukmini. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 62).
3) Getting a bow. Śrī Kṛṣṇa took Rukmi’s sister Rukmini by force and married her. Rukmi did not like this and so he confronted Śrī Kṛṣṇa. In the contest Śrī Kṛṣṇa reviled him. Rukmi got angry at this and went to Kailāsa and did penance before Śiva. Śiva appeared before him after three years, and gave him a bow for destroying the enemies. Śiva told him that it would be broken, only if it was used against Mahāviśtu. After getting this bow he returned to Bhogaṅkāta and lived there.
4) The details regarding Rukmi, given in the Mahābhārata.
(i) Rukmi accepted the suzerainty of Sahadeva at the time of his regional conquest. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 62).
(ii) Rukmi paid tribute to Karnā at the time of his regional conquest. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanza 14).
(iii) The Pāṇḍavas had sent invitation to Rukmi for the Bhārata-battle. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 16).
(iv) Bhīṣmaka, the father of Rukmi, was known by the name ‘Hiranyaroma’ also. Rukmi became famous throughout all the countries. He accepted Druma, a famous Kimpurusa (Kinnara) as his teacher in archery. Druma presented him with a bow called Vijaya. This Vijaya was on a par with the Gāndīva.
Rukmi fought with Śrī Kṛṣṇa and was defeated. The place at which he was defeated was known as Bhojakāta.

After having been defeated by Śrī Kṛṣṇa, a thought arose in the mind of Rukmi to keep amity and concord with Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Knowing this, the Pāṇḍavas invited Rukmi to their palace. He promised his help if ever Arjuna feared to do battle. At this Arjuna laughed and said that he was not in need of any help. After this Rukmi went to Duryodhana and promised to help him.
But Duryodhana also rejected his help. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 150).

5) Death of Rukmi. Discontented with everybody, Rukmi lived in Bhogakāta, having no contact with any body.
During this period the king of Kaliṅga once approached Rukmi and advised him to challenge Balabhadra-ārāma for a game of dice. The challenge was made knowing that Balabhadra was not a good player. Knowing that to reject a challenge was not honourable, Balabhadra went to play the game. Rukmi won the first round of the game. Staking everything, the second round of the game began and Balabhadra won the game. But Rukmi and the king of Kaliṅga did not accept the victory. All the kings who witnessed the game sided with Rukmi. Instantly an ethereal voice said “Balabha-” “drārama has won the game.” The friends of Rukmi did not accept the ethereal voice. They began to create a tumult in the hall. Balabhadra-ārāma who became furious at this ridicule took a pestle of iron and killed
RUKMINI

Rukmini with one blow. The rest of the kings fled from the place. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

RUKMINI. The chief queen of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

1) Birth. From the chief Purānic statements, it could be understood that Rukmini was the incarnation of goddess Lākṣmī.

   (i) "Śrī Devī (Lākṣmī) by her portions, took birth in the earth as Rukmini in the family of Bhiṣmaka". (M.B., Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 156).

   (ii) Formerly Lākṣmī Devī took birth as the daughter of Bhṛgu by his wife Khyāti. Next she took birth from the sea of Milk at the time of the churning of it by the combined efforts of the devas and the asuras, to take Aṃṛta (ambrosia). When Viṣṇu took birth as Aāditya, Lākṣmī took birth from lotus. When Viṣṇu incarnated as Paraśurāma Lākṣmī Devī became the earth-goddess. In the incarnation of Śrī Rāma she became Sītā and in that of Śrī Kṛṣṇa she was Rukmini. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anśa 1, Chapter 9).

2) It was in the kingdom of Vidarbha that Lākṣmī Devī took birth as Rukmini during the incarnation of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. To Bhiṣmaka, the King of Vidarbha, five sons beginning with Rukmi, were born. The sixth was a daughter who was named Rukmini. She grew up into a beautiful damsel. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

2) Marriage. Rukmini fell in love with Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Her parents agreed to her choice. But her brother Rukmi was an enemy of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Rukmini desired to give her sister to Śīsūpāla. The date of the marriage was fixed and the heart was burning within Rukmini. She sent a Brahmin as messenger to Kṛṣṇa.

The time of marriage drew near. The kings of Aṅga, Kālliṅga, Mālava, Kekaya, Vāṅga, Magadha, Kosala, Śālva, Cola, Pāṇḍya, Kerala and so on took their seats in the nuptial hall. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra came with their army. The army under the leadership of Balabhadra remained behind and Śrī Kṛṣṇa went alone to the nuptial hall. While preparations were being made to give Rukmini to Śīsūpāla, Śrī Kṛṣṇa took her in his chariot and quickly left the place. All the other kings who ran after Śrī Kṛṣṇa to fight had to confront with the mighty army of Balabhadra, who defeated the kings and returned to Dvārakā. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

3) Sons. It is mentioned in Bhāgavata, Skandha 10, that ten sons were born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa by Rukmini. They were Pradyumna, Čārudeśa, Sudeśa, Čārudeha, Sucāru, Čārugupe, Bhadracāru, Čārcandra, Čārubiha and Čāru. But a slight difference is observed in the description of the sons of Rukmini given in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 14, Stanzas 33 and 34.

4) Married to the chariot by Durvāsas. See under Durvāsas, Para 3.

5) Consoled Arjuna. After the death of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna visited Dvārakā. Seeing the dilapidated city without rulers and the women without husbands, he cried aloud. Rukmini, Devī ran to him and consoled and seated him on a golden chair. (M.B. Mausala Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 12).

6) Death. After the death of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Rukmini, with the other wives of Śrī Kṛṣṇa jumped into a burning pyre and died.

"Śaibyā, Rukmini, Gāndhārī, Haimavatī and Jāmba-
3) Marriage. Ruru happened to see the exceedingly beautiful Pramadvarā the daughter of Viśvāvasu by Menakā. The moment he saw her he fell in love with her. The father of Pramadvarā came to know of this and he decided to give her in marriage to Ruru. Preparations for the marriage were being made. One day during that time Pramadvarā who had been running here and there joyfully, was bitten by a snake and she fell down dead. Ruru instantly reached the spot.

Ruru who was greatly sad and disappointed, got down to the Ganges and bathed. Then rinsing his mouth he took some water in his hand and said “By the favour of God I have acquired by my devotion and worship of gods, devotion and service to my teacher, by my scripture-study, my worship with Gāyatrī, my prayer, and meditation, my penance, my offerings to the holy fire, and my oblations, let her come to life. If she does not come to life, I will die in this Ganges water.” Making this prayer, making the gods witnesses he poured the water down.

Immediately a messenger from heaven appeared in the sky and said that she would come to life again provided Ruru was prepared to give half of his life to her. Ruru agreed to it. Thus Pramadvarā came to life again and Ruru married her. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 2).

4) Hatred towards Serpents. A relentless hatred grew up in the heart of Ruru against serpents, because a serpent had killed his wife. He wandered about destroying every serpent he came across. Finally when he confronted Duṇḍubha he was given exhortations and good advice regarding righteousness by Duṇḍubha. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 9, Stanza 19). Moreover it is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, that Ruru had taken a living sacrifice in the sacrifice of Janamejaya meant for the extermination of serpents.

Ruru II. A mighty and valiant Asura. After procuring a boon from Brahmā, Ruru became arrogant and attacked the realm of gods. The Devas who were defeated by Ruru ran to the Blue mountain and prostrated before the goddess Śakti, who had been doing penance there. This goddess Śakti had been born from the matted hair of Śiva.

Ruru followed the Devas and reached the Blue mountain. When Devī saw Ruru and his mighty army a loud laugh burst out from her. From that laugh thousands of devilish figures came into existence. They completely annihilated the army of Ruru. After this Devī killed Ruru with the nail of her toe. (Padma Purāṇa, Ṣrīṭi Ḫanda).

RuruKa. A King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. This King was a scholar in economics and administration. (Harivaṁśa, 13:29).

Rusabhānu. Wife of Ḫiraṇyākṣa, an asura. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

Rusadrathā. A King of the Aūga family. He was the son of Titikṣu and the father of Paila, a member of the line of Vyāsa’s disciples. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

Rusadru. A King in ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabha Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 13, that this King stays in the palace of Yama.

Rusamā. A Priest who had studied the Vedas well. A story occurs in the ‘Paṇcavīṁśa Brahmāṇḍa’, about this priest.

Once Indra and Rusuṣāma bet on going round the world. Both got ready and started. But Rusuṣāma walked round Kurukṣetra and returned, while Indra travelled the whole of the way round the world and kept the conditions. The question arose as to who won the bet. The devas gave the decision, “Kurukṣetra is the dais of Brahmā, and so Kurukṣetra contains the entire world. Therefore both Indra and Rusuṣāma were declared to have won the bet.”

Rusāngū. An ancient hermit. Once the great hermit Ārṣīśeṇa came to the hermitage of Ṛusuṣāngu and did severe penance. Viśvīmitra obtained Brahmāṇḍa (Brahminhood) by doing penance in this place. Towards the end of his life Ṛusuṣāngu and his sons came to Pṛthvādakātitha and sang laudatory songs about Pṛthvādakātirtha. Ṛusuṣāngu said that those who did penance and died in this holy bath would not have to undergo miseries after death. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 39, Stanza 24).

Rusuṣarddhika. A wicked King of the Saurāstrā dynasty. Mention is made about this King in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Stanza 14.

Ruyyaka (Rucika). A Sanskrit playwright who lived in the 12th century. He has another name ‘Rucika’ also. The book of criticism called “Alaṅkāra-sarasvavas” is written by him. He was the teacher of Maṅkha, the author of Śrikṣaṇthacarita’. Some are of opinion that Ruyyaka had written only the Sūtras in the book ‘Alaṅkāra-sarasvavas’ and that the gloss or commentary was given by Maṅkha. Some of the other works of Rucika are Sahdarayalī, Alaṅkārānusarāṇi etc.

S

Ṣa (Ṣ). The letter Ṣa means to lie down and also Ṣaṅkara. ‘Ṣam’ means comfort or happiness. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

Ṣa (Ṣ). Ṣa means noble, sublime. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

Ṣa (Ṣ). The sound ‘Ṣa’ means indirect; ‘Ṣa’, Lakṣmi (Godess of wealth and prosperity) and ‘ṣam’ means hair. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

Ṣabala. A nāga born to Kaśyapaprajapāti of his wife Kadrū. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 7).

Ṣabalākṣa. A divine maharṣi. He once visited Bhīṣma. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 7).

Ṣabalāśva I. The thousand sons born to Dakṣa of his wife Viśānav, are known as Ṣabalāśvas. To procreate man-kind Dakṣa first created five hundred sons by his wife Asikni and named them Harya-vas. Dakṣa had to create the Ṣabalāśvas as the Harya-vas were misled by Nārada. But, Nārada approached and told the Ṣabalāśvas also that it was not correct on their part to procreate children before they had studied the interior, exterior, bottom and top of the earth. Believing Nārada’s advice the Ṣabalāśvas also set out to measure the extent of the earth and they have not yet returned. Because of this Brahmā cursed that Nārada, instead of living at one place, should always be on the move. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 15).

Ṣabalāśva II. A King born in the dynasty of King Kuru. His father, Aviksīrt or Aśvāvān was the grandson of King Kuru. Aviksīrt had, besides Šabalāśva, seven sons called Pariksīrt, Adirāja Viśāja, Sālmali, Uccaiś-ravas, Bhaṅgakāra and Jitīrī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 52).
Śabara. A mleccha—low caste. The Mahābhārata has the following about Śabaras.

(i) Śabaras were born from the dung and urine of Nandīni, the cow of Vasiṣṭha. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 174, Verse 16).

(ii) When Sātyaki annihilated the Kauravas the dead bodies of thousands of Śabaras were heaped on the battle-field. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 46).

(iii) In early days the Śabaras lived in the kingdom of Māndhātā, their profession being murder and looting. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 13).

(iv) Śiva had once taken the form of forest-dwellers and Śabaras. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 17).

(v) Many Kṣatriyas lived for many years hidden in caves for fear of Parāśurāma, and as they had no association with kṣatriyas during the period, they became Śabaras. (Āśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 15).

Śabara. A woman of the tribe of forest-dwellers. Śī Rāma, during his life in the forest, gave her salvation.

1) Former life. Śabari, in her former life, was the only daughter Mālinī of the Gandharva King, Citrakavaca. An erudite scholar, Viṭihotra, married her. As he was ever immersed in contemplation of Brahman his wife Mālinī, (later Śabari) kept one hunter, Kālmāṣa, as her paramour, and her husband cursed her thus: "As you have become a lover of the hunter, you turn out to be a hunter-woman."

2) At the Suburbs of Mātaṅga’s hermitage. Mālinī in tears sought redemption from the curse from her husband, and he told her that she would get absolution from her infamy and the curse from Śī Rāma. Immediately she was transformed into a hunter-woman and she came to the suburbs of Mātaṅgāśrama. She took a special liking for the place, the reason being that the flowers in the āśrama possessed a special fragrance. Once while the disciples were carrying a load of flowers for the muni (Mātaṅga) a few drops of sweat from their bodies fell on the ground, and the muni blessed that the trees and creepers, which grew up from the sweat and their flowers would never fade. This is described as follows in Canto 73, Aranyakaṇḍa of Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa.

"Oh! Rāma! nobody plucks and wears those flowers. They neither fade nor fall down. While the disciples of Mātaṅga were carrying a load of flowers for him, they sweated on account of exhaustion and some drops of sweat fell on earth which developed themselves into flowers due to the prowess of the guru’s tapas. Even today may be seen there Śabari, who has taken to sannyāsa and who tends the flowers. She will attain heaven only after seeing you."

Śabari lived for long there serving Mātaṅga’s disciples, performing tapas and learning knowledge about Brahman. At the time of the munis giving up their physical bodies they blessed Śabari that without further delay she would meet Rāma and get redemption from the curse. They also blessed that she would possess divine eyes to see hidden things and also the past and the future. After that she was spending her days awaiting the arrival of Rāma.

It was the period of the life in the forest of Rāma and Lakṣmana. After visiting various āśramas Rāma at last came to Mātaṅgāśrama. Hearing about Rāma’s visit Śabari had gathered a lot of fruits. Now, Rāma and Lakṣmana came and Śabari received them most respectfully. After herself biting each fruit to test its taste she gave the fruits for them to eat. The left-overs of Śabari appeared as nectar to Rāma. Then Śabari told Rāma thus: "When you go a short distance southwards there is the beautiful stream called Pampū. You cross Pampū and advance a little further and you will reach mount Rṣyamūkha. On the top of that mountain lives Sugrīva, son of Sun, and if you enter into alliance with him you will succeed in finding out and getting back Sītā after annihilating the enemies. Oh! Lord! my salutations."

After speaking thus, Śabari the great anchorite and chaste woman closed her eyes. Immediately she was transformed into Mālinī, the Gandharva damsel, and all at once a handsome Gandharva prince appeared there in a divine plane. It was Viṭihotra, the husband of Mālinī. After saluting Śī Rāma he took away his wife in a chariot to the Gandharva city. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyakaṇḍa).

Śabarimala (Śabari Mountain). A sacred place in South India in the eastern region of Kerala on a mountain called Śabarimala. It is not quite certain whether the name of this mountain is in any way related to Śabari, to whom Śī Rāma had given salvation. At any rate a very ancient temple with Śītā as the presiding deity therein is found at Śabarimala today. It is proof positive of the great sanctity attached to the ancient temple that every year lakhs of devotees from all parts of India visit it braving dense forests, mountains and wild beasts on their way. Historical evidence about the origin of the temple or its philosophical importance is sparse, but there is a legend, more illuminating than facts of history, about Śītā (Ayyappan) the deity installed in the temple. The legend is as follows—

In olden days the royal family of the Pāṇḍyas divided itself into two branches, one of them settling down at Velliyūr and the other at Madura. When the king of Madura one day went hunting in the forest he met a handsome and very powerful and courageous Malayālī youth. The king immediately took a liking for him and appointed him as an officer in his army. The youth gradually rose up in military service to become the Commander-in-Chief. The other officers, who were jealous due to the rise of the youth—Ayyappan—began conspiring to drive him out. The queen became a weapon in the hands of the conspirators, and at their instance she, pretended herself to be very ill and lay in a fainting fit. All the physicians acknowledged defeat in curing her. Then a physician, an agent of the conspirators, came forward and assured the king that he would cure the queen of her illness within one and a half hours if a leopard’s milk was made available. The king told Ayyappan about it.

Ayyappan went into the forest and returned to the palace with many she-leopards. He rode a tiger leading the leopards. People in the royal court were frightened by the sight of the leopards. The King realised that Ayyappan was not an ordinary person. Being questioned about him by the King, Ayyappan replied that God was his father and the whole world his home. As he did not like to live any further with tale-bearers and conspirators he returned to Kerala.
Ayyappan's departure made the King sad and very restless in mind. After giving all his immovable property to the King followed Ayyappan to Kerala taking all his ornaments, jars and other utensils, and came at last to Pantalam. This region of Kerala was then in the control of a petty Chieftain called Kaippuzha Tampan. The King of Madura purchased some land from the Tampan, put up a palace there and lived therein with the members of his family. Ayyappasvami on his way back to Kerala met Parashurama, who told the former that he had already, for the protection of Kerala, installed on mountains and that the sea-coast idols of his (Ayyappasvami) and that he would install another idol of Ayyappan at Sabarimala where they had now met each other. From that day onwards Ayyappasvami took his abode there.

One of those days the Pandyan king living at Pantalam had a dream, and in that dream Ayyappasvami appeared and told him that he (Ayyappan) was living at Sabarimala and the King might meet the Svami if he went there. The next day morning the King with his retinue started for Sabarimala. At Sabarimala the King got the forest cleared and made a search of the ground where he found an idol installed by Parashurama. The King built a temple there and installed the idol of Ayyappasvami therein. He also got necessary purificatory ceremonies conducted in the temple by the famous tantric (high-priest) Tazhamaan. A routine programme for the conduct of affairs in the temple was fixed. As it was difficult for men to live in the forest infested by wild beasts and conduct pujas etc. daily, it was fixed that pujas need be conducted only for five days in every month and that Makarasamkranti should be the annual festival day. From the first of Makaram (January) for five days it was to be utsava with the deity led in procession. On the fifth of Makaram every year a 'Kalabham' and on the seventh day a 'guruti' also were ordained.

On the annual festival day the temple priest, the senior pilgrim, marars and other employees go to Sabarimala carrying with them rice etc. for food and calling aloud 'Swamiyae Saranaam Ayyappa!' (Oh! lord Ayyappa! you are our refuge), devotees climb the mountain today also repeating this slogan. (See under Sastā).

SAJAHAKA (SALAKA). See under Dhanañayya V.

SABHANARA. A King of the Bharata Dynasty. He was son of Anudruhyu, and the father of Kālanara. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

SABHAPARVA. An important section in the Mahābhārata. The main theme mentioned in this section is the building of the palace of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sabhā = palace).

SABHAPATI. A prince who took the side of the Kauravas and fought against the Pāṇḍavas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Karna Parva, Chapter 89, Stanza 64, that this prince was killed by Arjuna.

SAJEE. Daughter of Pulomā and wife of Indra. The following information about Sāci is gathered from the Mahābhārata.

(1) It was from an aspect of Sāci that Pāncāli, daughter of King Dusupada was born. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 157).

(2) Sāci is seated on the best throne in the assembly of Devas in the court of Indra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 4).

(3) She worships Brahmā also in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 42).

(4) It was Śacidevi, queen of Indra, who took Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhāmā, during their visit to Devāloka to the Devamātā, (mother of Devas). (Sabhā Parva, Dākṣiṇāyatapāthā, Chapter 38).

(5) When Indra, afflicted by Brahmadhvā, hid himself away from Devāloka Śacīdevi was kept under the protection of Brhaspati. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 20).

(6) While he was made Indra, Nahuṣa wanted to take Śacī for wife and she tried hard not to fall into his clutches. (See under Nahuṣa).

(7) Śacī was present at the birth of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 13).

SADACARA (Good conduct).

1) General information. Each country has good customary practices of its own. A man with good habits or behaviour is considered as having conquered the two worlds. The sound 'Sat' denotes 'Sādhus'. Sādhus are those who are without any bad conduct or behaviour. The habits and practices of the Sādhus are called Sadacara. The Saptarşis, (the seven hermits), the Prajāpatis (Lords of all creatures) and Manus (the fathers of men), were persons who were careful to keep up the good practices. Once the hermit Aūra advised Sagara, what the good usages of the people of Bhārata ought to be. The laws of good conduct according to hermit Aūra are given below:

2) The passing of excrement and urine. Every one should wake up in the Brāhma-muhūrtā (Two hours before dawn). After having risen, he should go to the south-west corner of the village or house at a distance of an arrow-shot for stooling and passing urine; should not pour the water used for washing the face and the legs, in the courtyard; should not pass urine in one's own shadow, or in the shade of a tree, or facing cow, the Sun, fire, wind, teacher and Brahmin. Ploughed fields, fields where grains are ready for harvest, cattleshed, crowd, path, lakes or rivers and their banks, are places, forbidden for stooling or passing urine. When there is no danger, a wise man should pass urine, facing the north in the day and facing south at night. When passing excrement the ground should be covered with grass and his head should be covered with cloth. Should not sit long or talk much when stooling.

3) The conduct of ablution after answering the calls of nature and rinsing the mouth after meals. Soil such as taken from white ant-hill, ground thrown up by moles or rats, soil at the bottom of water, remainder of soil used by another, soil taken from the wall, soil gathered by worms and flies, ploughed soil etc. should not be used for ablution. By using soil, do the cleansing of the urethra once, the anus thrice, the left hand ten times, and both the hands together, seven times. After this use pure water (in which there is no mud or foam and which has no foul smell) and rinse the mouth. Take soil again and wash the legs with it. Rinse the mouth thrice and wipe the face twice. When pouring water in the hand, touch the apertures in the head such as eye, etc. the crest of the head, both upper arms, navel and heart. With this rinsing take bath. After bath, with the help of a mirror, tie the hair, anoint the eyes with collyrium, and wear flower garlands etc. carefully. Bathing should be done in river, rivulet, lake, jungle-stream, mountain. or holy bath (tirtha), or draw water from the well and bathe there or carry well-water home and bathe there. After the bath put on clean dress. Then take some water in the hand, offer it as oblation to gods, sages, and the manes with care. Throw water thrice for the blessing of the gods and hermits and to Prajapati once, as ordained. In the same way, to the manes and the great ancestors also give oblation of water thrice.

After so much is done do the customary sacrificial offerings, prayer etc. to Devi. Then invite guests to the house and welcome them. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anāśa 3, Chapter 11).

SADĀJIT. A king of the dynasty of Bharata. He was the son of Kuntī and the father of Māhiṣmān. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 9).

SADĀKĀNTA. A river in India, Purānicly very famous. Mention is made of this river in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 25.

SADĀNĪRA. A river in India very famous in the Purāṇas. Mention is made of this river in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 204. Some scholars are of opinion that this river is the same as the Karatoya of Modern India.

SADARBHĀKA (S). Six sons of Maricī. Subjected to a curse they had to live many lives and ultimately they resumed their old forms as children of Devaki. (For details see under Kaṭaṅga, Para 2).

SADASVA. A king of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 12, that this king remains in the palace of Yama, glorifying him.

SADASYORMI. A king. He is a worshipper of Yama. (M.B. Sabha Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 11).

SADGUNA I. The six qualities or attributes of Bhagavān (God). Aśvāram (prosperity), Viśyam (prowess), Vairāyam (non-attachment or renunciation), Viṇānam (super-knowledge), Śīra (welfare and prosperity) and Yaśas (fame, reputation) are the six attributes of Bhagavān.

SADGUNA II. Six kingly or political policies. Sandhi, Vigrahā, Yaṇa, Āśana, Dvaidha and Asrayā are the six policies of state-craft. (Manusmrī, Chapter 8, Verse 160)

1) Sandhi. To enter into peace and concord with the enemy is Sandhi. One may make peace for one's own benefit with the enemy, who is powerful and is fighting. There are sixteen kinds of sandhi called Kapalasandhi, etc. No kind of peace or treaty should be made with twenty kinds of kings, i.e. infants; old men; one suffering from chronic disease; cast out by one's own people; coward; one whose supporters are cowards; miser; one whose people are misers; who is very much addicted to women and such other material things; one, who has not a mind of one's own and is ruled by more than one adviser; he, who does not respect Devas and brahmans; one hated or forsaken by God; blasphemner; one subject to scarcity and sorrow; one not with satisfactory army; local person; one with many enemies; one whose days are numbered and one devoid of truth and righteousness. One shall only fight and not enter into peace with the above types of people.

2) Vigrahā. Fighting, i.e. war is vigrahā. War is the result of mutual evil-doings. The king, who desires prosperity who is troubled by others and in whose favour time and circumstances are, should go in for war. The main causes of war are the following: the desire to capture kingdom, woman, position etc. haughtiness and impiersiousness, obstruction to duties and rights, the interest of friends and allies, destruction to one's allies, both parties getting interested in one and the same thing etc. Enmity is engendered chiefly due to the following causes:- rivalry of co-wives, disputes about property and women, verbal controversies and wrongs committed. The following kinds of wars should not be fought:- Wars the benefit of which is meagre or futile; war which would cause harm in the present as also in future; with the enemy whose strength is not correctly known; incited by others, for others, on account of women, which would continue for long; with brahmans, where time and fate are not in favour; with him, who has powerful allies, though of temporary advantage but which will not be so in future; though of advantage in future but useless at present. The king should always do what will be of advantage at present as also in future. If one's own army is strong and enthusiastic and when the army of the adversary is not so, one may go in for war. Also, when all circumstances are in one's favour and against the antagonist one may fight.

3) Yaṇa. Yaṇa means marching for war. One may start for war after declaring it, after making peace, after making alliances; and incidentally also.

4) Āśana. To remain quiet or doing nothing which is also of four kinds as yaṇa.

5) Dvaidha. To get in between the contending parties to support with words only and to remain without joining either side is dvaidha. He who takes up the stand should, on meeting both the parties, serve the stronger side. But if he finds that both the parties are making peace, and not in need of his aid, he should approach their enemy, who is more powerful than they, or he should fight by himself.

6) Asrayā. When one is attacked by a stronger enemy and if one finds no means to retaliate, one should depend upon another person, who is noble, truthful and powerful. To put on a supplicant's look, to understand the moods of that person whose help is sought and to be humble to him—these are the characteristics and traits of the dependent. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 240).

SĀDHU. An incarnation of Śiva. The Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa contains the following story about it.

When the Himālaya and Maināka mountains once began a very intense tapas, the Devas and Rṣis fearing great ruin to the world in case the mountains got salvation, sought Śiva's protection and prayed for a solution for the problem. So Śiva, in the guise of a brahmin named Sādhu, went to the mountains, spoke to them condemning Śiva and thus made them retract from their devotion to Śiva.

SĀDHYĀ. Mother of the Sādhyas. (See under Sādhyas).

SĀDHYA (S).

1. General. A Gaṇadevatā. These Devatās often used to play an important role in Purānic movements and incidents. The Sādhyas were born from the seed Virāt Puruṣa. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 35). But according to Viṣṇu Purāṇa (Part 1, Chapter 35) the Sādhyas were the grand-children of Dakṣa-prajāpati. Of the sixty daughters of the Prajāpati by his wife Asīkṣi, ten were married by Dharmadeva; The Viśvadevas were the sons of Dharmadeva by his wife Viśvā and the Sādhyas were his sons by Sādhyā.
2. Other information.

(i) The Sāḍhyas fought with Garuḍa, who went to Devakula for Amrita and got defeated. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 16).

(iii) Sāḍhyaganas participated in the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 70).

(iv) Sāḍhyas took their place in planes above the palace of Drupada to witness Draupadi’s wedding. (Ādi Parva Chapter 186, Verse 6).

(v) They were present at the Devayājña conducted at Naimisa forest. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 195, Verse 3).

(vi) They were present with various kinds of arrows at the battle between Śrī Krṣṇa and Arjuna on the occasion of the burning of the Kaṇḍava forest. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 226 Verse 38).

(vii) They live in Indra’s court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 22).

(viii) They go to the court of Brahmā also and worship him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 44).

(ix) In the battle between Subrahmanya and Tārakāsura they fought on the side of the former. (Vana Parva, Chapter 231, Verse 71).

(x) Once they made a prayer to Daṭṭāṭreya muni. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 36, Verse 3).

(xi) On the occasion of the battle between Karpa and Arjuna at Kurukṣetra the Sāḍhyas wished success for the flatter. (Salya Parva, Chapter 41, Verse 29).

(xii) They served as store-keepers at the yajña performed by king Marutta. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 22).

(xiii) They remain on Mount Munīṭrā forest during yajña. (Āśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 1).

SĀDYASKA. A yājña ordained for Rājaṛṣī. It could be performed in one day. (Vana Parva, Chapter 204, Verse 16).

SAGARA. A king of the solar dynasty, Sagara ruled Ayodhya.

2) Birth. Bāhuka, father of Sagara, was known as Subāhu also. Sagara was Bāhuka’s son by his wife, Yādavi. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16). Though Sagara was a prince he was born at the aśrama of Ayurva, and there was a reason for it.

Subāhu and Yādavi did not have a child for long. But, as a result of many yājñas conducted for the gift of a child, Yādavi conceived. While she was in the seventh month of her pregnancy her co-wife administered poison to her with the result that she did not further advance in pregnancy and deliver in due time. Thus she continued as a pregnant woman for seven years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16). The King became an old man. During this period Tālājaṅgha, king of Hēhya, attacked Ayodhya with his army, and Subāhu, despite his old age, fought back. But the fighting grew fiercer. Subāhu found that he would not be able to defeat Tālājaṅgha and so he escaped into the forest with his wife Yādavi. They took shelter in the aśrama of sage Auruva. Subāhu expired there due to old age and Yādavi got ready to follow him in his pyre. The Muni prevented her from doing so by pointing out to her that the child in her womb was a very fortunate one and would become emperor of the seven islands when he grew up to manhood. Yādavi delivered shortly. As the poison (gara) given to her by the co-wife had immobilised her pregnancy so long Auruva named her child Sagara. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 16 and 17).

3) To Ayodhya. Sage Auruva conducted the Upanayana ceremony of the boy and taught him the Vedas etc. Once Yādavi went to hear the boy address the muni ‘father’, and when the son asked her the reason for it she told him that the muni was not his father, who was really greater than the muni. She also told him their previous history, and Sagara decided to return to Ayodhya somehow.

The people of Ayodhya lived scattered here and there in fear of Tālājaṅgha, and disgusted with such an existence, they came together and took refuge with Vasiṣṭha, who told them that king Subāhu had expired in Auruvaśrama, but that his son Sagara was there in the aśrama. He further advised them to bring Sagara back and reconquer Ayodhya. Yādavi went at the sight of the people from Ayodhya and they insisted upon Sagara’s return to the state as their king. They waited in the aśrama for five days for Sagara. Then Sagara and his mother, with the blessings of the Sage, returned to Ayodhya along with the people. Sagara fought Tālājaṅgha, reconquered Ayodhya and crowned himself as king. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 20 to 23).

4) Family life. Sagara had two wives called Sumati alias Vaidarbhī and Keśinī alias Śaibyā. Sumati was the daughter of Garuḍa.

As he had no issues for long, Sagara, with his wife, went to Himālayas and began doing tapas at Bhrguprasavaṇa mountain. After hundred years Bhṛgu appeared and blessed Sagara that one of his wives would give birth to 60,000 sons and the other to one, who would add to the glory of the dynasty. Sumati chose 60,000 sons and Keśinī the one son.

The king and the queens returned to Ayodhya and in due course Sumati delivered the son called Asaṃjāsa who was to bring prosperity to the dynasty. Sumati gave birth to a lump of flesh, which developed into 60,000 children. They were put in pots of ghee and they grew up to become young persons. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāṇṭha, Canto 33).

Some Purāṇas contain stories somewhat different from the above about the birth of the 60,000 children. e.g. in the 9th Skandha of Devi Bhāgavata, the story is related as follows: "Keśinī delivered the son Asamaṇjaṣa and Sumati did not deliver at all. So she did tapas for Śiva for children and because of his blessing she conceived. Sumati delivered only hundred years after continuing to be pregnant, and even that was only a piece of flesh, and she began weeping addressing Śiva, who appeared before her and cut the mass of flesh into 60,000 parts. Each piece of flesh transformed itself into a very powerful and efficient man."
5) Loss of children. Kapila turned into ashes the 60,000 sons of Sagarā. Bhagīrathā revived them. (For details see under Bhagīrathā.)

6) Triumphal tour. Sagarā ruled the kingdom well and while living happily thus with his sons, he set out on a triumphal tour. After conquering the northern regions he moved towards the south, his object being Māḥiṣmati, Kingdom of the Hchayas. He destroyed the Hchayas completely in battle. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 89 and 90).

7) Evening of life. Sagarā ruled the kingdom for 300 years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 91). His son, Asamañjasā was a tormentor of his subjects. In the evening of his life, Sagarā transmitted the throne to his grandson Amsumān (son of Asamañjasā). The rest of his life he spent in Aurvāśrama with his wife engaged in meditation.

8) Other information.

   - (i) Sagarā worships Yama in his court, (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19).
   - (ii) Sagarā ousted Asamañjasā from the palace, because he led an immoral life. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 89).
   - (iii) Sagarā went to heaven after handing over the throne to Amsumān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 64).
   - (iv) Sagarā had gone, in the plane of Indra to Virāṭanagara to witness the fight between Arjuna and Kṛpa. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).
   - (v) Śrī Kṛṣṇā once described the yājña and dāna of Sagarā. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 29 Verse 130).
   - (vi) Sagarā never ate flesh in his life. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 66.
   - (vii) He is considered to be one of the kings to be remembered both at dawn and dusk. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 49).

SAGARA. Ocean. Samudra (ocean) got the name Sagarā as it was formed later at the place where the 60,000 sons of King Sagarā dug the earth in the course of their quest for the missing yājñī horse. (See under Sagarā.)

SAGARAKA. A Ksatriya king who lived at the place called Sagarā. He participated in Yudhīśhṭha's Rājasūya. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18).

SAGARODAKA. Holy water of the sea. He who bathes in it will go to heaven in an aerial chariot. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 9).

ŚAGNI (S). Pitrī, who are sons of Brahmā. Aghisvattīs, Barhisadas, Anagnis and Śagnis are the Pitrī born from Brahmā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 20).

SAHA I. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhīmasena. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 8).

SAHA II. A very powerful Agni. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222).

SAHĀ. A Celestial woman. She also was with the apsārā women who were present at Indraloka to receive Arjuna. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 30).

SAHABHOJA. A bird in the line of the offsprings of Garuḍa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 12).

SAHADEVĀ I. The fifth among the Pāṇḍavas. Facts about Sahadevā are related under the headings, Dharmaputra, Bhīma, Arjuna, Nakula and Pāṇḍavas.

Only those facts, which have not been so related are given hereunder.)

1) A brief biographical sketch. Sahadevā was the son of Pāṇḍu by his wife Māṇḍri. Two sons, Nakula and Sahadevā were born to Māṇḍri by the Asvinīdevas. Along with Yudhīśhṭha, Bhīma and Arjuna, sons of Kuntī, Nakula and Sahadevā spent their childhood in the company of Sages at Śatāṛīga mountain. Pāṇḍu died and Māṇḍri followed him in the funeral pyre. After that the Pāṇḍavas lived at Hastināpura under the care of Kuntī. When the 'lac-palace' was burnt down, they took themselves to the forest and ruled the kingdom with Indraprastha as capital. The Pāṇḍavas, who were defeated in the game of dice went again into the forest. Their going into the forest has been described as follows by Vidura.

Yudhīśhṭha, covering his face with cloth and Bhīma stretching out his powerful hands moved into the forest. Arjuna followed them throwing up sand particles. Sahadevā went rubbing his face with earth, Nakula, the most handsome of men, followed them, his body smeared with dust. Pāṇḍalī, her face concealed in hair and weeping went behind the king. Sage Dharmānya with Kuśa grass in his hands, accompanied them chanting Vedic hymns. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 80).

Dhṛtarāṣṭra asked Vidura why the Pāṇḍavas assumed these different poses and attitudes and Vidura answered him thus : Yudhīśhṭha covered his face to show that he would not retaliate in anger though he had lost the kingdom due to cheating. Bhīma stretched out his hands to show that he was unrivalled in manual power. Arjuna threw out sand to say that he would shoot his arrows into the enemy camp like particles of sand. Sahadevā rubbed earth on his face as he did not want anybody to distinguish his face. Nakula, the most handsome of men, smeared his face with dust so that, on the way, women should not desire him.

When the Pāṇḍavas returned after twelve years' stay in exile in the forest and one year's stay incognito Durvudhana refused to allot them even a single line house, and war for eighteen days between the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas was fought in the field of Kurukṣetra. The Kauravas were wiped out. Yudhīśhṭha became king and performed the Rājasūyaajñā after which the Pāṇḍavas went out on the great journey and gave up their lives.

2) Other information about Sahadevā.

   - (1) He was dedicated to the service of elders. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 114).
   - (2) He was exceptionally handsome. (Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 111).
   - (3) In the fight that followed Arjuna's endeavour to capture king Drupada to be presented as Gurudakśinā (tuition fee to Drupa, who trained the Pāṇḍavas in the use of arms) Nakula and Sahadevā protected the wheels of Arjuna's chariot. (Adi Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 27).
   - (4) A son called Śrutasena (Śrutakarman) was born to him of Pāṇḍalī. (Adi Parva, Chapter 220, Verse 80).
   - (5) He had also married the daughter of King Duyutmān of Madra called Vījāyā and the couple had a son called Suhotra. (Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 80).

(10) He deputed Ghaṭotkaca to collect taxes from Vibhiṣaṇa, king of Laṅkā. Vibhiṣaṇa sent Ghaṭotkaca back with a lot of gold and gems. Vibhiṣaṇa also deputed 88,000 Rākṣasas to carry the gold etc. (Sabha Parva, Southern text, Chapter 31).
(11) He was Yudhiṣṭhira’s minister during the Rājasūya yajña. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 40).
(12) After the yajña was over, he conducted Droṇa and Aśvatthāmā back to their palaces. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 48).
(13) He took the vow that he would kill Śakuni. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 77, Verse 9).
(14) In the battle that followed the abduction of Draupadī by Jayadratha, the chariot of Yudhiṣṭhira went out of action and he, therefore, rode in the chariot of Sahadeva. (Vana Parva, Chapter 271, Verse 15).
(15) During his life-incognito he thought of assuming the name Tantripala. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 9).
(16) He went to king Virāṭa disguised as Vaiśya called Aṅiṣṭanemi and got himself appointed as head of the king’s dairy. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 5).
(17) He, in the guise of a dairy-man, used to give milk, butter-milk etc. to the Pāṇḍavas. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 13, Verse 9).
(18) Saṣjaya emphasized the fact that Sahadeva was a heroic warrior to Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 31).
(19) When Yudhiṣṭhira, during the great war, divested himself of his armour and started towards the Kaurava army, Sahadeva questioned the action. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 19).
(20) On the first day of the battle he fought a duel with Durmukha. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 25).
(21) He defeated Vikarna, Salya and others in the battle. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 71, Verse 83).
(22) He annihilated the cavalry of the Kauravas. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 89, Verse 32).
(23) He ran away from the battle-field. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 105, Verse 16).
(24) He fought a duel with Kṛpācārya. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 110, Verse 12).
(25) He fought with Śakuni. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 22).
(26) He fought again with Durmukha. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 13).
(27) He killed Nirmitra, the Trigarta prince. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 25).
(28) In the fight with Karna he got defeated. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 167, Verse 15).
(29) He defeated Duṣṇāsana in battle. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 188, Verse 2).
(30) When Sātyaki was about to kill Dhṛṣṭaduryoṇa, he pacified the former by a tactful speech. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 198, Verse 53).
(31) He defeated Paundrarakṣa. (Karna Parva, Chapter 22, Verse 14).
(32) He defeated Duṣṇāsana again. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 23).
(33) He got wounded in the fighting with Duryodhana. (Karna Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 7).
(34) He defeated Ulūka. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 43).

SÅHASRÅKA. A holy place of pilgrimage. This place is situated in Kurukšetra. It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Vana Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 158, that those who bathe in this place will get the merits of giving thousand cows as gifts.

SAHASRAMUKHARÅVÅNA. 1) General. A Daitya King, who ruled Trilokapuri, a country thousands of miles away from India. Trilokapuri was an island at the centre of the seas. He was a terror to the whole world and possessed a thousand heads and two thousand hands.

2) Secured boon. This Râvana once went to Satyaloka and performed the most intense tapas for many years. Yet, Brahmä did not appear and then he began cutting his heads one after the other and offering them in the fire. Nine hundred and ninety nine of his heads were cut thus. When he was about to cut the last head also, Brahmä, fearing the end of the world, appeared and granted him the following three boons.

(i) You will not die at the hands of anyone, but a woman.

(ii) Brahmassra, which would annihilate, will be at your disposal.

(iii) You will also possess an aerial chariot for travels as you please.

Sahasramukha, who returned to his country with the boons became emperor of all Daityas and then conquered heaven, Pâtâla, Kailåsa, Vaikuṇṭha and the eight regions of the world. He then defeated Pâtâlalâraṇa and wedded his only daughter Indumukhi. He got as a present a weapon called Kaṭhukuntha. He propagated in the world the customs and practices of heaven with the result that all the customs of the Devas were derogated. Good people felt harassed. In the rise of unrighteousness righteousness became helpless.

3) Curse. Once on his way to his father-in-law’s house Sahasramukharaṇa raped a Vidyâdhara woman, Cañcalakṣi, who was performing tapas of Lakṣmîdevi and Cañcalakṣi cursed him that Lakṣmîdevi would kill him.

4) Son. Vajrabahu was Sahasramukha’s son. He secured from Siva Pâṣupatâstra and an armament iner-penetrable by anyone. Vajrabhûta Indra and Subrahmânya killed the former.

5) Death. Sahasramukha had an army-chief named Bâna and both of them together did incalculable harm to the three worlds. Śri Râma was King of Ayodhya at the time, and Devas and sages complained to him about Sahasramukha and as soon as the complainants left Ayodhya, Sugriva and Vibhîśana came there. They told Râma about the abduction by Sahasramukha’s second son, Candragupta of Sugriva’s daughter and Vibhîśana’s daughter-in-law. At once Śri Râma, with Laksmâna, Sugriva, Vibhîśana, Hanûmân and a great army of monkeys reached Sahasramukha’s capital city. Śri Râma sent word to him through Hanûmân that Sugriva’s daughter and Vibhîśana’s daughter-in-law should be returned, Indra should be released and that pardon should be begged for, for his errors. Angered at this message Sahasramukha deputed Bâna to fight Śri Râma. Bâna was killed in battle. (See under Bâna IV). Then ensued a fierce battle between Râma and Sahasramukha, the latter aided by Candragupta. Añgada was about to be overpowered by Candragupta, and then the following celestial voice was heard: “Candragupta will not die as long as his wife Padmâvatî is reciting Brahmanamrita imparted by Brahmä.” Then Vibhîśana sent Hanûmân to the women’s quarters and as a result of the latter using a “Kūṭatantarayantra” great confusion and quarrels broke out among the women-folk, and utilising the opportunity Añgada killed Candragupta. Sahasramukha fought Śri Râma single-handed. All tactics of Râma proved to be of no use. Then he remembered Brahmâ’s boon to Sahasramukha and Cañcalakṣi’s curse upon him. Immediately Śri Râma brought down Sitâ from Ayodhya and the latter shot the Śaktika arrow at the throat of Sahasramukha and he was killed. (Kamba Râmâyana, Uttarakanda).

SAHASRÂNÅMA (N). (Sahasra = thousand; nāma = name).

Hymns containing the thousand names of Viśnu, Śiva and Devi are generally known as Sahasrânåma. The recitation of these names is considered to be annihilative of all sins. Sahasrânåma of Viśnu is more popular.

SAHASRÅNIKA. A King of the solar dynasty. (For details see under Udayana).
SAHASRAPĀDA (SAHASRAPĀT).

1) General. A maharsi, who was transformed into a serpent by the curse of Khagama, another maharsi. But a talk with King Ruru restored him to his former self. (For details see under Ruru, para 4).

2) Other information. Ruru desired to get some information about serpent yājña from Sahasrapāt, who answered the former that he would hear the story of Āstika from brahmmins and then disappeared. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 3).

SAHASRAVĀK (SADAHSUVĀK). One of the hundred sons of Dhūtarāstra. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 100).

SAIHYA I. A King of ancient time. He was the grandfather of Bhagadatta. After performing tapas in the tapovana at Kurukṣetra he attained Indraloka. (M.B. Aṃravāśika Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 10).

SAIHYA I. A river flowing between the two mountains, Meru and Mandara. Arjuna conquered and subdued the low class people who inhabited the valley of this river. A low-class people known as “Khasas” used to live on the banks of this river under the shade of the dense growth of bamboo trees. These low class people had brought presents of gold for Yudhiṣṭhirā's Rājaśīya. (M.B. Sābha Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 2).

SAIHYA I. A Gandharva. A class of Gandharvas is also known as “Sailūṣas”. Some references found in the Purāṇas concerning SAILūṣas are given below:—

(i) Śrī Rāma sent Bharata and completely destroyed the class of Gandharvas called SAILūṣas who were causing trouble on the shore of the eastern ocean. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Uttara Rāmāyana). During the reign of Śrī Rāma, as ordered by him, Bharata killed with his shower of arrows, the wicked Gandharva named SAILūṣa and his three crores of sons who lived on the banks of the river Sindhu. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 11),

(iii) Rāvana's brother, Vībhīṣaṇa had married Saramā the daughter of a SAILūṣa Gandharva. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

(iv) The Gandharva named SAILūṣa serves Kubera and remains in Kubera's assembly. (M.B. Sābha Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 26).

SAIHYA I. A disciple of the hermit Śaunaka. (See under Gurūparamaprāṭa).
SAINDHAVA II. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 25, that the inhabitants of the kingdom of Śindhu were called Saṁdhavas.

SAIṢHĀVĀṆAṬYĀ. An ancient holy place of pilgrimage in Bhārata. This holy place is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 89, Verse 15.

SAIṢHĀVAYANA. One of Viśvāmitra’s sons, who were expounders of Vedas. (M.B. Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 31.)

SAIṆYAṆIṆIṆA PARVA. A sub-section of Udyoga Parva in Mahābhārata. This subsection comprises Chapters 151 to 159 of Udyoga Parva.

SAIRANDHRI. The pseudonym assumed by Pāṇcālī, when the Pāṇḍavas lived incognito in the palace of King Virāṭa. (See under Pāṇcālī.)

SAIRIṢAKA. A region in India, celebrated in the Purāṇas. Nakula, in the course of his triumphant march in the western regions, conquered this land also. (M.B. Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 6.)

SAIṢAṬA. A land famous in the Purāṇas. The Kṣatriya Kings of this country brought presents for Yuddhiṣṭhira’s Rājaśūya. (M.B. Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18.)

SAIṢIṆREYA. An ācārya who was the disciple of Śakalya. “Saṁśiṛiya Saṁhiṭā,” a work produced by him is considered to be an authoritative treatise on the Śakalya branch of knowledge.

SAIṢIṆIRINDHRA. A country in ancient India. Mention is made about this country in Mahābhārata, Bhisma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 57.

SĀIṆAGĀṆA. Siva’s bow. It was made by Viśvakarmā. He made a Vaiśnavacāpa and a Śaiva-cāpa for the purpose of a battle which was fought once between Viṣṇu and Siva. (See the 7th sub para, 7th para under the word Viṣṇu.)

Long ago when Siva set out to break up Dakṣayāga, he was armed with this bow. After defeating the enemy and breaking up the yāga, Siva cooled down and presented the bow to his devotee, the king of Videha. The king took the bow to his palace, kept it in his armoury and used to offer due worship to it. His descendants also continued to worship it. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa.)

SĀIVĀṆA. A town in India. There is a reference to it in Mahābhārata, Bhisma Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18.

SĀKA. A particular sect of people or caste. The following information about the Śakas is gathered from the Mahābhārata. (i) Śakas were born from the breast of Nandini, Vaśiṭha’s cow. (Adi Parva, Chapter 147, Verse 36). (ii) Bhimasena, during his triumphant tour of the eastern regions subjugated the Śakas. (Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14). (iii) Nakula conquered them. (Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14. (iv) King of the Śakas participated in Yuddhiṣṭhira’s Rājaśūya. (Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 32. (v) The Pāṇḍavas invited them to take part in the great war. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 15.)

(vi) They did along with Sudakṣiṇa, king of Kāmboja, service in Durvodhana’s army. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 21.)

(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa once conquered them. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 45.)

(viii) Karna once defeated them and conquered their country. (Karna Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 18.)

(ix) Śakas who were originally Kṣatriyas were demoted as Śūdras as they incurred the displeasure and anger of brahmās. (Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 21.)

(x) As the Śakas and the Yavanas had helped the Haihaya kings Pārīṣurāma, Sagara and Bhārata defeated them in war and drove them off from the country. (Bhāgavata, Navama Skanda.)

SĀKA. A tree in the Śaka island. The island got the name from this tree. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 23.)

SĀKAḌVĪṆA. One of the Saptadvīpas (seven islands). Saṁśiṇa once gave Dhrārāstrā a description of this island. (Bhisma Parva, Chapter 11.) Jambuḍvīṇa, Plakṣadvīṇa, Sāmalidvīṇa, Kuśadvīṇa, Krauṇidvīṇa, Sākaḍvīṇa and Puṣkaraḍvīṇa are the Saptadvīpas. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skanda.)

SĀKALA. A city made famous in the Purāṇas. Once it was the capital of the Madra kingdom. (Saṁbhā Parva Chapter 32, Verse 14.) Modern scholars opine that the modern Siyalkot was the old Śakala.

SĀKALADVĪṆA. An ancient kingdom referred to in the Purāṇas. Pratīvindhya, king of this kingdom was defeated by Arjuna. (Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14.)

SĀKALYA. A mahārṣi in the lineage of gurus (preceptors). (See under Guruparampara.) He systematised the Vedāsahhitās. It was Bādārāyanaṅkṛṣṇa, who became later famous as Vedavyāsa, who first arranged in systematic order the Vedāsahhitās. Prominent scholars hold the view that Vyāsa lived between 1500-1500 B.C. The saṁhitā text now popular systematised by Śakalya is called Śakalya sākhā (Śakalya branch).

Śakalya is reported to have saved Kaśyapa mahārṣi once. When King Pārīṣit was cursed that he would die by Takṣaka’s poison Kaśyapa started for his court to save the king from the calamity. But, Takṣaka met him on the way and sent him back laden with presents of gems, ornaments etc. People derided Kaśyapa, who on account of covetousness, retreated from the duty of saving the king’s life and non-cooperated with him in every way. In this contingency Kaśyapa sought the help of Śakalya, who advised the former to bathe in the sacred tirthas in the rivers Godāvari and Sarasvatī. Kaśyapa did so and regained his old reputation.

SĀKAMBHIṆA. A sacred place dear to Devi. He, whofasts for three nights here, will derive the same benefits as of eating lettuce (śāka) for twelve years. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 13.)

SĀKAṬA. An asura. (See under Kṛṣṇa, Para 9, Sub Para 2)

SĀKAṬALA. An intelligent minister. (For details see under Vararuci.)

SĀKAṬAYANA. A famous grammarian. He lived before Vāśka and Pāṇini. He is considered to be the author of the well-known text on grammar called ‘Unādīśūtrapāthā’. He is referred to as the foremost among the grammarians in the aṣṭādhyaṅyā of Pāṇini. (Pāṇinīśūtra, 1, 4, 86 and 87.)
Sākavakra. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Mahābhārata, Saliya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 78).

Sākayanya. A maharṣi. (For details see under Brhadratha)

Sākha. According to one view Sākha was the younger brother of Subrahmanya while there are others who maintain that he was Subrahmanya's son. In verse 37, Chapter 44 of Saliya Parva it is stated that Sākha was the son of the Vasu Anala and the younger brother of Subrahmanya and that he had two brothers called Vaiśākha and Naigameya. It is stated in Chapter 15, part I of Vīṣṇu Purāṇa as follows:—"Āpa, Dhiruva, Soma, Dharma, Anila, Agni, Pratyuṣa and Prabhāsa are the aśavasus. Vaitanda, Śrama, Śanta, and Dhvani were sons of Āpa. Kāla, who annihilates the entire world is the son of Dhiruva and Varccas is Soma's son. Varccas gives people the vital glow. Draviṇa, Hutaḥhavyavaha, Śīṣvara, Prāṇa and Varaṇa were the sons of Dharma by Manohārā. Anila's wife was Śīva, and two sons, Manojava and Avijñatagati were born to the couple. Kumāra, son of Āgni was born in Sārastamba and he had three brothers called Sākha, Viśākha and Naigameya."

The following story about the birth of Sākha is from Taranīga 6, Lāvānaka-lambaka of Kathāśaritāgāra:—Defeated in battle by Tārakāsura, Indra decided to have no more fight with him and retired to Mount Mahāmeru. Devas and maharṣi's sought asylum with Subrahmanya, who gave them protection. Indra came to know of it and fought with Subrahmanya feeling that the latter had captured his kingdom. Two sons, Sākha and Viśākha were born from the face of Subrahmanya wounded by the Vajrāyuḍha of Indra.

Sākra. A synonym of Indra. (See under Indra.)

Sākradeva. A prince of Kaliṅga, who fought on the Kaurava side in the great war and got killed by Bhima. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 24).

Sākramārīkā. A sacred place from very olden days. Those who bathe there will attain heaven. (Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 81).

Sākravaṇi. A nāga, which lived in a forest near Girivrajā. The forest was near the āśrama of Gautama. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 9).

Sākravaṭṭa. A holy place. He who worships Devatās and the souls of his ancestors here will attain the holy world. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 29).

Sākrīdgraḥa. A rural area in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

Sākta. Son of Manasvi, the great-grandson of emperor Pūru. Sauvīrī was his mother. He had two brothers called Snāhanana and Vāgmi, both of them great in warfare. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 7).

Sākti I. (1) General. Son of Vaiśīṣṭha by Arundhati. He was the first-born among the hundred sons of Vaiśīṣṭha. Kalmāṣapāda, the Rākṣasa captured and ate Sākti and his pregnant wife Advṛṣyāṇi spent her days in great grief with Vaiśīṣṭha. Parāśāramuni, father of Vyāsa, was Advṛṣyāṇi's son. (For details see under Advṛṣyāṇi).

2) Other information
(i) It was Śīva, who incarnated himself as the son of Vaiśīṣṭha.
(ii) Gopāyana, Bharadvāja, Āpastamba and Arṇodara belong to the line of disciples of Sākti. (Vāmanā Purāṇa, Chapter 6).

Sākti II. The weapon of Subrahmanya is called Sākti, and it was made by Viśvakarman. Viśvakarman once grilled Sūrya (sun) on his machine and reduced his glow. The glow thus released by Viśvakarman fell on the earth and Viśvakarman made with that glow the cakra (disc) of Viśnu, the trīsūla (trident) of Śiva the Puspakā, aerial chariot of Kubera and the Sākti of Subrahmanya. (Viśṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 2).

Sākti III. The sound 'S' means welfare or prosperity and 'kti' prowess. Therefore Sākti means she, who is the embodiment of prosperity and prowess or she, who grants prosperity and prowess. The definition of 'Bhagavati' is, she who combines in herself knowledge affluence, wealth, reputation, power and the female organ. Therefore the word 'Sākti' may be taken to mean Bhagavati and Pārvatī, and what are termed as Bhagavati, Sākti, Devī, Ambikā, Pārvatī etc. are the manifestations of Sākti, Śiva's spouse. This Sākti exists fractionally in all Devas. When, once upon a time the devāsura war broke out the Sāktis of Devas like Brahmā emerged to help Caṇḍikā. The vehicle, ornaments, weapon etc. of each Deva, his Devi also possessed. The Sāktis (Devis) of the Devas appeared in the following manner. Brahmā, wife of Brahmā, rode on the swan wearing beads around her neck and holding the water-vessel in her hands. She was followed by Vaśīṇi Viśnu's Sākti on Garuda wearing yellow clothes and with the conch, disc, lotus etc. in her hands. Śaṅkārī Śiva's Sākti rode on the ox with the crescent moon and serpents as ornaments and holding in her hands the Śula. 'Kaumārī', Subrahmanya's Sākti rode on Airāvata with Śūla in hands. The Sākti called 'Vārāhī in the form of a great boar rode carrying a corpse, Naśatīthi' Sākti took the form of narasiṁha (half man and half lion). Yāmā, Yama's sāktī, rode on buffalo holding in her hands a long stick. Saktis called Kauberī and Vārūṇī took their respective forms and in this manner all the Sāktis came to the help of Devi. This sight pleased not only the Devas, but the mother of the universe also. Along with them incarnated on earth Śāṅkara, who gives 'sārī' (happiness) to the world and blessed Caṇḍikā on the battle-field (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th and 9th Skandhas).

Sāktībhadra. A dramatist in Sanskrit, who lived in the seventh century A.D. He belonged to Chengannur in the Kerala State. He was a disciple of Śaṅkaraçārya. The Dramatic composition 'Ācarya-cūḍāmanī' is his work.

Saktibhadra, after writing his drama, once read it out to Śaṅkaraçārya. As the ācārya was observing silence that day, he made no comments about the drama. Disappointed at this silence of his Guru, the dramatist burnt his work to ashes in fire. When his observance of silence was over, the Guru asked his disciple for the drama. When told about the burning of the drama the ācārya repeated from memory the whole drama. The above legend is widely prevalent in Kerala.

Śakuna (omens) 1) General. In ancient times people in all countries used to consider Śakunas to be harbingers of good or evil things. Today also many people believe in omens. In India Śakuna had developed as a science even in olden days. A general description about omens, good and bad, according to the Indian concept, is given below.

Mixed medicines, black grains, cotton, grass, dried cow-dung, charcoal, molasses, one whose head is shaven clean or whose body is smeared with oil or who is naked, flesh-eater, iron, dirt, skin, hair of the head, insane person, eunuch, prison, guard, women, who are either carrying or are widows; oil cake, paddy husk, ashes, skull, bone, broken vessel etc. are evil omens. Broken, fierce or murmuring instrumental music also is a bad omen.

It is a good omen to hear the voice of beckoning (come) in front of the traveller, but it is not good if the voice is heard from behind. It is good if the voice of farewell (go) is heard from behind, but is bad to be heard in the front.

Disapproving or prohibitive words like “Where are you going, stop, don’t go”, “what is to be done by going there?” etc. will cause death. It is a bad omen to see carnivorous birds perched on the top of flag-staff etc. For vehicles to bump, weapons to break and head to get wounded by dashing against doors etc. as also for umbrella or clothes to fall down are ill omens. Praising or worshipping Viṣṇu will do away with the inauspicious results of ill omens. But, if evil omens are seen continuously the traveller should return home.

White flowers are good omens. Full pots are the best of omens. Flesh, fish, sound from afar, old man, solitary man, cow, goat, ox, horse, elephant, devas, burning fire, Dūrva grass, fresh cow-dung, prostitute, gold, silver, gems, Orris root, mustard, medicinal herbs rooted out of soil, Bengal gram, weapon, sword, stool, royal symbols, dead body being carried without lamentation, fruits, ghee, curdled milk, milk, akṣata, mirror, honey, conch, sugar cane, auspicious words, music by devotees, loud thunder and lightning are auspicious omens.

2) Two kinds of omens. Omens are divided into two varieties, diptā (glowing) and sāntā (quiescent, mild). Glowing omens bring about auspicious results and the other inauspicious results. There are six ways or elements, which make omens diptam, i.e. velā (time), dik (region), deṣā (place), Karāṇa (action), rūta (cry) and jāti (kind). The power or effect of diptā increases in ascending order.

To see creatures, which move about during day time as moving about during night and vice-versa is velādiptā. In the case of stars, lagnas (the dominant zodiac) and planets, those which are virulent are considered to be diptās. With regard to stars and lagnas, those which the Sun enters into are dhūmīta, those where in the Sun is already present are jvalāta and those from which the Sun has left are Amārini. These three are diptās and the rest sāntās. (This is called velādiptā).

When dik (region) is dipta it is called digdiptā. To see forest animals in village and village-animals in forest is digdiptā. To see good brahmans at inauspicious places is deṣādiptā. To see some one doing work not ordained to his caste is karāṇadīptā. To hear different horrible voices is rudadīptā. To see purely flesh-eating animals is jātidiptā. If all the characteristics of diptā do not synchronize but differ from one another it is called sāntā and if the characteristics of diptā and sāntā are mixed up it is called miśra.

3) Birds, animals etc. If the cāsa bird (wild crow) makes sound when the king gets out of the palace, he will meet with dishonour. If the sound is heard on the left side, there will be quarrel, but food will be served. If the bird is sighted on the right side at the start of the journey, it is a good omen. If the peacock makes different sounds, threats from thieves will result. If a deer is seen in front of the king going out on a journey, death will happen to him. To see the monkey-bear, rat, tiger, lion, cat and donkey coming in the opposite direction also will bring about death. Donkey braying in awkward notes is also inauspicious. To see kapitiōla bird on the left side is an excellent omen; on the right side also it is not bad. But, behind the person, it is a bad omen.

Tittiri bird also on the rear is not good. It is always a good omen if the deer, boar and spotted deer cross the path from the left to the right side; the opposite of it is bad omen. It is a favourable omen if the ox, horse, jackal, tiger, lion, cat and donkey pass from the right to the left side. It is auspicious to see the females of the jackal etc. on the right side and the males on the left. To hear the serpent, hare, boar and wild lizard named is good, but to see them is not so. Contrary to this is the effect to see the monkey, ox etc. The result of the important and powerful omens witnessed at the start of the journey will be experienced the very same day. The omen of the intoxicated, those craving for food, children, people quarrelling and those who stand away from the limits of the road is effectless. To hear the jackal howl once, twice, thrice or four times is a good omen, but to hear it five or six times is bad. The seventh time is good.

If heard for more than the seventh time it will have no effect. Dipta omen facing the Sun will horripilate men, cause fear in the case of vehicles and is to be greatly feared. If sārāṅga (lotus, deer, elephant, peacock, cuckoo, lion, horse etc.) is met as the first thing in an auspicious place its good effect will last for one year, and if these are met at the inauspicious place, the result will be bad. Everybody should see sārāṅga at some auspicious place every dawn.

If the crow is found crowing in fear on the left side of camps put up for the army of the King, the head of the army will have to face great threats. If the crow, perches on and pecks on the shadow, vehicle, slippers, umbrella, clothes etc. the owner of those things will die. If they are respected by the crow, honour will accrue to their owner. If the crow flies about the entrance of the house it means that he, who had left the house will return. If the crows bring and scatter red coloured and baked things in the courtyard, the owner of the house will meet with imprisonment. If the crow carries to a house something yellow in colour, gold or silver, the owner of the house will get such things. Whatever thing the crow carries away from the house, such things therein will be destroyed. If the crow vomits raw flesh in the rear of the house, the owner of it will come into possession of wealth; if soil is deposited thus, land will be acquired. If gem is deposited, extensive lands will come to the owner of the house. If the crow flies in the same direction as the one chosen by the traveller, prosperity and success will result to him and if it flies in the opposite direction not only will the traveller not achieve his object but, he will also meet with danger. If the crows come crowing against one starting on a journey, it will be hindered. To see the crow on the left side is a good omen. If it is seen on the right side, the journey will not end in success. It is very good if the crow flies in the same direction as the traveller on his left side, if on the right side the result will be of medium nature. If it flies in the opposite direction on the left side the traveller will face hindrance. If the crow flies into the house when one is about to start on the journey, it means the journey may be begun. The crow which looks at the sun with one eye and perches on one leg is surely indicative of fear for the traveller. If it is in the hollow of a tree great calamities will happen. To dream of crow with its mouth full of excretion is indicative of all-round success.

If the dog enters and barks in the house the result will be sure death of the owner of the house. But, if the dog smells on the left side of the man it is good, and if it smells on the right side, it is bad. If the dogs come against the person about to start on a journey, it will cause hindrance to him. If the dog stands blocking his path there will be threat from thieves. If it comes facing him with a piece of bone in its mouth, he will fail to achieve the object of his travel; if it comes biting a cord, the same will be the result. It is auspicious to see dog, which carries a slipper in its mouth or the mouth of which is filled with flesh. Fear will overtake him in front of whom the dog urinates and goes away. But if not a bitch and if, after urination, it goes to an auspicious place, to the shade of an auspicious tree or towards an auspicious thing, then it is a good omen. The same considerations are valid in the case of the jackal etc.

If cows cry without cause or reason, it indicates ruin to the master. If the cry is in an awkward tone, death will result. If the ox murmurs during night, it is good for the master. Ox tied to a cord also is good omen. If cows are found to treat their calves without love, it spells ruin for pregnant women. It is a good omen to see cows which have got wet and whose horns are smeared with earth. These considerations apply to buffaloes as well.

If elephants indulge in the sexual act in villages, it augurs ill to the villages. If the she-elephant delivers or gets mad in the country, i.e. not in the forest, it spells ruin to king. Ruin to the King will be the result if the elephant objects to his mounting it or runs back home or if the mad elephant is found without madness. It is an auspicious omen if the elephant places its right foot on the left foot of it and also if it holds its tusk with its trunk.

SAKUNI I

A serpent born in the Dhṛtarāṣṭra dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña conducted by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 16).

SAKUNI II

An asura who was the son of Hiranyaka and brother of Śambhara, Trimūrdhā, Saṅku and Ārya. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

SAKUNI III

A king born in the dynasty of Bharata, son of Dusyanta. Sakuni was Bhimaratha's son and father of Urudhi. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

SAKUNI IV

A son of Ikṣvāku. (For details see under Viśvākarmā, Parā 2).

SAKUNI V

A mahaśī to whom were born nine sons called Dhrusta, Sāli, Budha, Tāra, Jyotisīmāna, Nirmova, Jitakama, Dhyānakaśha, and Guṇādhika. The first five of them led householder's life while the last four took to Sannyāsa even as children. (Padma Purāṇa Ādiḥkhaṇḍa, Chapter 31).

SAKUNI VI

The notorious uncle of Duryodhana. Son of King Subala of Gāndhāra and brother of Gāndhāri. Sakuni, staying at Hastinapura, pulled the strings for all the evil actions of Duryodhana. It was Sakuni's hands, which worked in the background in driving the Pāṇḍavas out of the kingdom and in denuding Pānčālli of her clothes. It was also his evil tactics, which tore asunder all chances of conciliation with the Pāṇḍavas on their return from the forest and thus led to the great war that lasted for eighteen days. At last he was killed by Sahadeva during the war. (Sāla Parva, Chapter 28, Verse 61). A resume of the part played by Sakuni in the Bhārata story is given below:

1. It was with his help that Duryodhana defeated Dharmaputra in the foul game of dice. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 50).

2. He was born, due to the anger of the Devas, to destroy righteousness. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 11).

3. He was Dvāpara re-born. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 78).

4. It was he who took the initiative in marrying Gāndhāri to Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 109 Verse 15).

5. He was present at the wedding of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 2).

6. He once advised Duryodhana to annihilate the Pāṇḍavas, root and branch. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 199).

7. He was present at the Rājasūya yajña performed by Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 66).

8. Even after the yajña was over and everyone had departed, he remained there for some time more with Duryodhana. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 68).

9. It was he who first discussed with Dhṛtarāṣṭra the question of inviting Dharmaputra for a game of dice so that the wealth of the Pāṇḍavas might be extracted from them. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 49).

10. By foul play he defeated Dharmaputra in the game of dice. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 60, Verse 61).

11. It was he who cooperated with Duryodhana to invite Dharmaputra again for a game of dice fixing the bets and in defeating him in the game. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 76, Verse 9).

12. He once prophesied that the Pāṇḍavas would not return after their life in forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 7).

13. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Dvaita forest Sakuni suggested the need for leading a procession to them. (Vana Parva, Chapter 238, Verse 21).

14. Sakuni and Duryodhana led the procession. In the forest he got wounded in fighting with the Gandharvas and he returned home. (Vana Parva, Chapter 241, Verse 17).

15. Afterwards he once advised Duryodhana to restore the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 251, Verse 1).

16. He too participated in the great war and on the first day of the war he fought a duel with Pratīvindhyā. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 63).

17. In the battle that followed, Trāvān killed five brothers of Sakuni. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 25).
(18) He then fought with Yudhisthirā, Nakula and Sahadeva and got defeated. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 105, Verse 8).

(19) He fought with Sahadeva. (Drona Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 22).

(20) Then Śakuni resorted to certain magical tricks. Arjuna successfully faced the tricks and Śakuni ran away from the battlefield. (Drona Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 15).

(21) He fought with Abhimanyu. (Drona Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 5).

(22) He fought with Nakula and Sahadeva. (Drona Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 21).

(23) He fought with Śātvyaki. (Drona Parva, Chapter 120, Verse 11).

(24) Bhīmasena killed the seven mahārathis and five brothers of Śakunī. (Drona Parva, Chapter 157, Verse 22).

(25) Nakula defeated Śakunī. (Drona Parva, Chapter 269, Verse 16).

(26) He attacked the Pāṇḍava army at the instance of Duryodhanā. (Drona Parva, Chapter 170, Verse 66)

(27) Arjuna defeated Śakunī. (Drona Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 25).

(28) On the death of Droṇācārya Śakunī ran away from the battlefield in great fear. (Drona Parva, Chapter 193, Verse 9).

(29) In the fight that followed he defeated Śrutasena. (Karna Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 40).

(30) Śakunī was defeated in the fighting with Śātvyaki. (Karna Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 48).

(31) In the fight with Bhīma he fell down. (Karna Parva, Chapter 77, Verse 66).

(32) In the next fight he killed the Kalinda prince. (Karna Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 7).

(33) Cavalry of the Pāṇḍavas attacked Śakunī and he got wounded. (Salya Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 41).

(34) In the battle that followed Sahadeva killed Śakunī. (Salya Parva, Chapter 28, Verse 61).

(35) After the war was over Vyāsa summoned the souls of those killed in the war to the surface of Gaṅgā and Śakunī's soul was present among them. (Āśrama-vāsikā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 9).

(36) After his death he joined Dvāpara. (Svargarohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 21).

(37) Synonyms of Śakunī used in Mahābhārata: Gāndhārapati, Gāndhāra-rajā, Gāndhāra-rājaputra, Gāndhāra-rājasuta, Kitava, Parvatiya, Saubala, Saubalaka, Subaleya, Subala and Subalapatra.

ŚAKUNI. A mahārṣi, who lived in Madhu forest. Of the nine sons of Śakunī, Dhruva, Śila, Budho and Tāra were house-holders and agnihotriś (those who sacrificed offerings in fire). (Padma Purāṇa, Svaragha Khanda 81).

ŚAKUNIGRAHA. Vināṭā, in her fierce attitude or aspect is Śakunigraha, Brahmins call it Skandāpasmāra also. (Vana Parva, Chapter 280, Verse 26).

ŚAKUNIKĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 15).

ŚAKUNTA. A son of Viśvāmitra. He was a Vedāntin. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 50).

ŚAKUNTALĀ. Foster-daughter of sage Kaṇva.

1) Birth. Śakuntalā was a daughter born to Viśvāmitra of the Apsarā woman called Menakā. Viśvāmitra was engaged in intense tapas on the banks of river Mālinī in the Himālayas. Indra deputed Menakā to break the mahārṣi's tapas. She enticed him away from his tapas and got pregnant by him. But she forsook the child on the banks of Mālinī and returned to Devaloka.

2) Childhood. Birds gathered round the forsaken orphan-child. While Śakuntas i.e. birds were petting the child Kaṇva came that way, saw the child and took it with him to the āśrama. As Śakuntas had petted it, the child was named Śakuntalā.

3) As queen. King Dusyanta of the lunar dynasty married Śakuntalā and to the couple was born the famous Bharata. This is the original story about Śakuntalā's married life. All the Indian languages contain two different versions of Śakuntalā's life. One version is that related in Vyāsa's Bhārata and the second is that contained in Kālidāsa's Sākuntalā. Many scholars opine that in the matter of the Śakuntalā episode Kālidāsa has gone a step further and for the better, and therefore both the versions of the story are to be carefully studied by us.

(i) Vyāsa's Sākuntalā. Śakuntalā, now grown up as a maiden, was alone in the āśrama when King Dusyanta, out in the forest on a hunting expedition, came there. In the absence of her foster-father Kaṇva, Śakuntalā welcomed the King. They fell in love with each other and the King married Śakuntalā according to the Gāndharva way of marriage and lived with her for a few days. Śakuntalā became pregnant. The King returned to his palace.

Kaṇva returned to the āśrama and he was pleased that what had been destined to take place had happened. In due course of time Śakuntalā delivered a boy, who was named Sarvadamanā. When the child was grown up, Kaṇva sent his mother along with him to Dusyanta's palace. The King did not recognise them, but a celestial voice convinced him that the child was his own son. The King heartily welcomed his wife and son and Śakuntalā lived in the palace as his honoured wife.

(ii) Kālidāsa's Sākuntalā. Kaṇva brought up Śakuntalā born to Viśvāmitra of Menakā in his āśrama and she had two companions called Anuśāsana and Priyāvīdā. All the three grew up and became maidens. King Dusyanta, who went out hunting in the forest followed a deer to Kaṇva's āśrama where he saw Śakuntalā watering the garden with her companions. Kaṇva was then away at Cakratīra. Dusyanta, who fell in love with Śakuntalā, married her according to the Gāndharva rules and lived with her at the āśrama for a few days. Meanwhile Śakuntalā became pregnant, and emissaries from the palace came and the King returned with them. He left the āśrama after promising Śakuntalā that he would soon return to her. He gave her his signet ring.

Sad over the separation from Dusyanta and immersed in thought about him, Śakuntalā was sitting there in the āśrama when Durvīśas came there. She did not see the mahārṣi nor welcome him respectfully. He got angry at this and cursed her that she be forgotten by him about whom she was so intensely thinking. Śakuntalā did not hear the curse either, but her companions heard it begged pardon of the muni on behalf of Śakuntalā and prayed for absolution from the curse. Then he said that if Śakuntalā showed the King any sign about their relationship the King would remember her. Her companions did not tell Śakuntalā about the

Days and months passed by, yet Duṣyanta did not return and Kaṇva sent Śakuntalā, in whom signs of pregnancy had become prominent, to the palace of the King in the company of Gautami and Sāṅgīravā. Anasīyā reminded Śakuntalā to take particular care of the signet ring. On their way to the palace Śakuntalā and others bathed in the Somavāratīrtha, and nobody noticed Śakuntalā losing from her finger the ring in the tirtha. They reached the King's palace. None noticed them. Duṣyanta did not remember having even seen her. The signet ring was missing. After leaving Śakuntalā at the palace her companions returned to the āśrama. Menākā, whose heart melted at the pathetic wailings of Śakuntalā led her to Kaśyapa's āśrama, left her there and returned to Devaloka.

The signet ring lost by Śakuntalā was swallowed by a fish, which was netted by a fisherman, who went about the streets to sell the ring extracted from inside the fish. Servants of the King took the fisherman captive. At the sight of the ring thoughts about the past dawned on the King and he remembered all about Śakuntalā. His days became sad pondering over separation from Śakuntalā.

Śakuntalā delivered a boy at the āśrama of Kaśyapa. The child was named Sarvadamanā and he grew up as a courageous boy.

On his return from the devāṣura war, Duṣyanta entered Kaśyapa's āśrama where he saw Sarvadamanā counting the teeth of a lion he had captured. Having heard details about him from the boy the King went inside the āśrama and saw Kaśyapa and Śakuntalā. He returned with Śakuntalā and the boy to the palace with Kaśyapa's blessings. It was this boy Sarvadamanā, who afterwards became Bharata, the famous emperor of India.

ŚAŁA I. One of the three pugilists deputed by Kaṃsa to attack Kṛṣṇa at Mathurā, the other two being Cāṇuṭra and Muṣṭika. Kṛṣṇa kicked Śalā to death. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

ŚAŁA II. A serpent born in Vāsuki's dynasty and burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 5).

ŚAŁA III. One of the hundred sons of Dhrṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhima. (Kaṃsa Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 3).

ŚAŁA IV. Son of Somadatta, a King born in the Kuru dynasty. He had a brother called Bhirūśravas.

1) Śala was present at the wedding of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 15).
2) He was present at Yudhishṭhīra's Rājasūya yajña. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 8).
3) He was a fierce warrior in Duryodhana's army. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 68).
4) He fought from the southern wing of the great vyūha set up by Bhīṣma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 57).
5) He fought with Abhimanyu in the great war. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 37).
6) He was killed by Śrutavarmā in the battlefield of Kuruksetra. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 108, Verse 10).
7) He was one among the valiant souls brought to the surface of the Gāṇḍā by Vyāsa (Āṣramavāṣika Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 10).
8) After death he became one with the Viṣādevas. (Svārgārohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 16).

ŚAŁA V. Son of King Parīśīt of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. Suśobhanā, daughter of the Mandāka King was his mother. He had two brothers called Dala and Bala. Śala did not return some horses, which he had taken as loan from Viṣādeva mahārāja. Angered at this the mahārāja created some Rākṣasas, who killed Śāla. (Vana Parva, Chapter 192).

ŚAŁAṬHA I. An asura, son of Kaśyapapraśāpati by his wife Danu. He was born in his next life as Prahlāda, the Bālhika King. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 30).

ŚAŁAṬHA II. A warrior, who fought against the Kauravas on the Pāṇḍava side. He was killed by Karna. (Karna Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 49).

ŚAŁAṬHI. Wife of Atrimahārṣi. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, 3, 8; 74-78).

ŚAŁAṬHI. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 26).

ŚAŁAṬRA. A stone emblem of Viṣṇu.

1) Origin of the name. Śālagrāma is the kind of ammonite, used for making the image of Viṣṇu. Mahāviṣṇu is known by the name Śālagrāma also. This name originated from the name Śālagrāma, which is the name of the place from where the river Gandāki, which flows through Nepal, starts. This Śālagrāma is considered to be a holy place. Mahāviṣṇu and other gods always dwell in this place. Śālagrāma is the name of Viṣṇu who dwells in Śālagrāma. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 123 to 125).

2) The importance of Śālagrāma. The place Śālagrāma is at the origin of river Gandāki. There are various kinds of stone figures which are called Śālagrāmas. These Śālagrāmas themselves have originated from portions of Viṣṇu. That is why those stones are used for making images of Viṣṇu. There is a story in the Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, stating that the derivation of these stones is from a portion of Viṣṇu.

During the early days, Sarasvatī, Lakṣmī and Gandā were wives of Mahāviṣṇu. One day there arose a family quarrel among them. (See under Tulasi). As a result of this quarrel, the Devis cursed each other. Sarasvatī cursed Lakṣmī and changed her to holy basil plant (Tulasi) on the earth. When Lakṣmī was about to depart as Tulasi, Mahāviṣṇu blessed her thus, "Look ! Lakṣmī! you will live in the world as a holy basil and when the curse has been completed you will come back to me. On that day, a river named Gandāki, will start from your body which will be in the shape of the holy basil plant. (It is also said that the river Gandāki has taken birth from the sweat of Śiva and Viṣṇu. Refer to the word Gandāki). On the bank of that river, I will remain as a stone image. There will be so many worms with strong tusks and teeth, which will pierce the stone into the shape of Sudarśana cakra (the weapon of Viṣṇu) and will create numberless Śālagrāmas. The Śālagrāmas thus made, will be of various sizes and shapes.

3) Different classes of Śālagrāmas. Mention is made in the Purāṇas about nineteen classes of Śālagrāmas. They are given below:
(i) Lakṣmīnārāyaṇa. With one hole, four cakras (wheels) and Vanamālā (a line like the garland) and of the colour of clouds.

(ii) Lakṣmīnārāyanadana. This is the same as Lakṣmīnārāyaṇa, with the difference that there will be no Vanamālā.

(iii) Raḥgūrāṇa. With two holes and four wheels and mark of the hoof of a calf. This also will have no Vanamālā.

(iv) Vāmana. With two very small wheels and the colour of the cloud. This too will have no Vanamālā.

(v) Śrīdhara. This is the same as Vāmana with the exception that it will be having Vanamālā. The house in which this is placed will have a prosperity and well being of its own.

(vi) Dāmodara. Will be large and round with two cakras (wheels) and with no Vanamālā.

(vii) Raṇarāma. Neither too large nor too small, but of medium size and round, with two wheels and the marks of child’s kick, bow and quiver.

(viii) Rājarājasvarā. Of the size of Raṇarāma with seven cakras, (wheels), ornamented with the mark of umbrella. This will earn for the possessor kingly wealth.

(ix) Ananta. Somewhat thick with fourteen wheels, and as black as a cloud. This Sālagrāma will give men the four Puruṣārthas (objects of life) ‘Dharma’ (Duty, wealth, desire and salvation).

(x) Madhurādāna. A Sālagrāma in the shape of a wheel with two wheels, and impression of cow’s hoof, having the shade of cloud, of ordinary size. This will be very bright.

(xi) Sudārāṣana. Sudārāṣana will have only one cakra (wheel).

(xii) Gadaḍhāra. This also will be having only one wheel which will not be bright.

(xiii) Hayaḍhāra. This will have two wheels and the face of a horse.

(xiv) Nārāsinha. With a very wide mouth, two wheels, and awful shape. This Sālagrāma will cause instant self-renunciation.

(xv) Lakṣmīnārāsinha. This also will be having a wide mouth and two wheels. Besides these, there will be the Vanamālā also. This will make house-holders cosset and comfortable.

(xvi) Vāsudeva. The Sālagrāma with two wheels at the region of the hoole and with round shape having vividness and brightness, is Vāsudeva. This will grant all desires.

(xvii) Pradyumna. This will have only a minute wheel. The colour will be that of clouds. But on the outer side, there will be a hole in the inside of which there will be a number of cuts or dents. This will give house-holders comfort always.

(xviii) Saṅkarṣaṇa. In the Saṅkarṣaṇa two wheels will be joined face to face. The fore-part will be thinner than the hind-part. This also will do good to house-holders.

(xix) Aniruddha. The colour of this is yellow. This will be quite round and bright. This also will give comfort to the house-holder. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 9; Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 46).

4. The greatness of Sālagrāma. Of these, the stores with cakras (the weapon Discus), are Bhagavān Viṣṇu in reality. Those who worship this stone with mark of cakra, need not have to take another birth. He who habitually worships Sālagrāma, should avoid arrogance and should be charitable. He who worships Sālagrāma with the mark of wheel should not covet others’ wealth and women. The cakra from Dvārakā and the stone from Gaṅgā will bring atonement in a moment for sins incurred in a hundred births. Even if one has incurred thousands of sins, one will get remission for all of them by drinking the water of Sālagrāma. Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra will attain heaven if they become house-holders according to Vedic convention and worship Sālagrāma. On no account should women worship Sālagrāma. If by ignorance, a woman, whether she is good-natured or of a higher status, happens to touch Sālagrāma, all her merits earned by good deeds will be lost and she will go to hell. Brahmin sages say that women throwing flowers as oblation on Sālagrāma, commit the greatest sin. If a woman touches a Sālagrāma, the offering of Sandal-wood will be like poisoned rice, flowers like diamond, and meals presented to god before being eaten by the servants in the temple, will be like Kāla-kūṭa (th: poison of Vāsuki), to Bhagavān Viṣṇu. If a woman touches Sālagrāma, she will have to remain in hell for the duration of fourteen Indras. Even the sin of Brahmahatya (killing a brahmin) will be remitted by drinking the water of Sālagrāma and he will attain heaven. Basil (tulasi) sandalwood, water, conch tinkling bell, wheel, stone, copper pot, and name of Viṣṇu comprise ‘Padāmṛta’ (the celestial nectar of words) which is said to have the power of remitting sins. The merits obtained by bathing in all the tirthas and the performing of all the yāgas (sacri-fices) dwell in each drop of water of Sālagrāma.

(Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 20).

ŚALĀKĀ. Wife of mahari Śrī Dhanānayā, who belonged to Vasiṣṭha gotra. (For details see under Dhanānayā V).

ŚALAKARA. A nāga born in Takṣaka’s dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya, (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 9).

ŚALAKĀṬAṬKĀṬA (ŚALAKĀṬAṬKĀṬA) I A synonym for Alambaṣā. (See under Alambaṣā).

ŚALAKĀṬAṬKĀṬA II. A giantess who was the daughter of Śaṅdhyā. The giant Viḍyuṭkeśa married this giantess Śaḷaṅkaṭaṅkaṭa. A son named Sukeṣa was born to them. (See under Viḍyuṭkeśa).

ŚALAKAṬAṬKĀṬI. Another name of the giantess Hīḍimā. (See under Hīḍimā).

ŚALANKĀYANA. A son of Viśvāmitra. He was an expound-er of the Vedas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsa Parva, Chapter 4, about this Śaḷaṅkāyana.

ŚALI. A mahrāṣ in the lineage of Gurus (preceptors). See under Guruparamparā.

ŚALIHOTRA. A muni of ancient days. Vyāsa had once lived in his āśrama. There was a tree near the āśrama which had outlived time. A drink of the water in the pond here quenches hunger and thirst. The tree and the pond were created by the power of Šalihotra’s tapas. The Pāṇḍavas, during their life in exile in the forest, visited this place in the company of Hīḍimā and quenched their hunger and thirst by drinking water from this pond. (M.B., Southern text, Chapter 154).
Sālīhotra was an adept in āśvaśāstra (science about horses). To bathe in the tirtha called Śālisūrya created by the muni is to derive the same result as that of making a gift of a thousand cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 71, Verse 27 and Chapter 83, Verse 107).

ŚALIKA. A divine mahārāśi. He met Kṛṣṇa once on his (Kṛṣṇa's) way to Hastināpura and had a talk with the lord. (M.B. Udyoga Pava, Southern Text, Chapter 83).

ŚALIPINDA. A nāga born to Kasyapaprajāpati of his wife Kādrū (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 14).

ŚALISIRAS. A Devagandharva, son of Kasyapaprajāpati by his wife Muni. He participated in the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 4).

ŚALISORYA. A holy spot in Kurukṣetra. It is said to have been the place where muni Śālīhotra lived. To bathe at this place is to derive the same result as that of making a gift of a thousand cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 10).

ŚALMAILI. A King of the lunar dynasty. He was the grandson of Kuru and son of Avikṣīt. He had seven brothers. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 52).

ŚALMALIVIPA. One of the seven islands.

1) General. Śalmali island, which is double in extent of Plaka island is surrounded by Ikṣurasa (sugar-cane juice) ocean on all four sides of it. There are seven mountains there which produce gems and they are seven boundaries which separate the regions. Just like this, there are also seven rivers there. The seven rivers are Yoni, Toya, Vītrā, Candrā, Muktā, Vīmocani and Nīrīṛti. Mere remembrance of the seven rivers is sufficient to annihilate all sins. Here people divided into the four classes live. Brahmins, Kṣatriyas Vaīyas and Śādras here are called Kapilas, Arunas, Pitas and Kṛṣṇas. These devout people worship Viṣṇu in the form of Vāyu by sublime yajñas. Devas are ever present on this most beautiful island. A tree named Śalmali which grows mental comfort grows in this island. The island is surrounded on all four sides by an ocean of Surā (liquor). (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part II, Chapter 4).

2) Śalmali island and nāgāstra. See under Nāgāstra.

ŚALUKINI. A sacred place in Kurukṣetra. To bathe in the Daśāvatārtha there, is to derive the same benefit as performing ten aśvamedhas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 13).

ŚALVA I.

1) General information. The lover of Ambā (q.v) the daughter of the King of Kāśi. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 16 that this Kṣatriya King Śālīva was born from a portion of Ajaka the younger brother of Vṛṣaparvā. (i) Śālīva was the ruler of the city named Saubha. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 61).

2) Other details.

(i) Śālīva was the ruler of the city named Saubha. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 61).

(ii) He was present at the Svayamvar marriage of Draupadi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 186 Verse 15).

(iii) He was present at the sacrifice of Royal consecration (Rājasūya) of Yudhīśvara. (M.B. Sahā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 9).

(iv) At the death of Śīśupāla, King Śālīva became angry and besieged Dhārākā. In the battle which followed Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed Śālīva. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 15 to 22).

(v) Śālīva had several friends such as Dāmahaṇa, Āṅgī, Kaliṅga, Mālava, Kekaya, Yāngī, Magadha, Kosala, Kusākaṇa, Hṛcaya, Cola, Pāṇḍya, Keral and others. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

ŚALVA II. There is a story in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, stating that three Śālīvas and four Madras were born to Bhadrā from the dead body of her husband Vyuṣṭiśāva. (See under Bhadrā II).

Here, 'Śālīvas' means the rulers of Śālīva. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 14, Stanza 26 that the people of Śālīva fled to the south in fear of Jarāsandha. Satyavān, the husband of Sāvitrī, was a native of Śālīva. It is also mentioned that the soldiers of Śālīva who joined the army of the Kauravas fought against the Pāṇḍavas. There were Śālīvas on the side of the Pāṇḍavas also. Mention is made in Drona Parva, Chapter 154, that the Śālīvas on the side of the Pāṇḍavas, attacked Drona, the teacher.

ŚALVA III. A king of the low castes. The details given below about this king are from Mahābhārata.

1) This king attacked the vast army of the Pāṇḍavas in the battle-field of Kurukṣetra. (M.B. Śālā Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 1).

2) The elephant of this Śālīva was as big as a mountain and belonged to the family of elephants called Mahābhadrā. (Śālā Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 2).

3) Duryodhana had honoured this low caste King Śālīva. (M.B. Śālā Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 2).

4) Śālīyaki killed this king Śālīva; and Dhṛṣṭadyumna killed his elephant in the battle of Bhārata. (M.B. Śālā Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 4).

ŚALVA IV. In Uttara Rāmāyaṇa a Śālīva, who was a contemporary of Kuśadavāj, is mentioned. Kuśadavāj once approached this king Śālīva and requested for some financial help. But the covetous Śālīva did not give any help. So Kuśadavāj performed a sacrifice to obtain wealth and prosperity. Sītā was born from that sacrificial fire. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

ŚALVA V. A story occurs in Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, describing how Renukā, the wife of Jamadagni, was infatuated at the sight of a handsome Śālīva, and how this event subsequently led to her death. (See under Renukā).

ŚALVASENI. An ancient place in South India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 61).

ŚALVAYANA. A king in ancient India. He ran away to South India with his brothers and attendants in fear of Jarāsandha. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 27).

ŚALYA. A king who gave advice and leadership to the Kauravas. He ruled over the Madra or Bālhiṇka kingdom. Mādrī, wife of Pāṇḍu was Śalīva's sister. Yet, in the great war he stood firmly on the Kaurava side and died at Kurukṣetra. The following role he played in the Bhārata story:
